

Тем, что эта книга дошла до Вас, мы обязаны в первую очередь библиотекарям, которые долгие годы бережно хранили её. Сотрудники Google оцифровали её в рамках проекта, цель которого – сделать книги со всего мира доступными через Интернет.

Эта книга находится в общественном достоянии. В общих чертах, юридически, книга передаётся в общественное достояние, когда истекает срок действия имущественных авторских прав на неё, а также если правообладатель сам передал её в общественное достояние или не заявил на неё авторских прав. Такие книги – это ключ к прошлому, к сокровищам нашей истории и культуры, и к знаниям, которые зачастую нигде больше не найдёшь.

В этой цифровой копии мы оставили без изменений все рукописные пометки, которые были в оригинальном издании. Пускай они будут напоминанием о всех тех руках, через которые прошла эта книга – автора, издателя, библиотекаря и предыдущих читателей – чтобы наконец попасть в Ваши.

Правила пользования

Мы гордимся нашим сотрудничеством с библиотеками, в рамках которого мы оцифровываем книги в общественном достоянии и делаем их доступными для всех. Эти книги принадлежат всему человечеству, а мы – лишь их хранители. Тем не менее, оцифровка книг и поддержка этого проекта стоят немало, и поэтому, чтобы и в дальнейшем предоставлять этот ресурс, мы предприняли некоторые меры, чтобы предотвратить коммерческое использование этих книг. Одна из них – это технические ограничения на автоматические запросы.

Мы также просим Вас:

- Не использовать файлы в коммерческих целях. Мы разработали программу Поиска по книгам Google для всех пользователей, поэтому, пожалуйста, используйте эти файлы только в личных, некоммерческих целях.
- Не отправлять автоматические запросы. Не отправляйте в систему Google автоматические запросы любого рода. Если Вам требуется доступ к большим объёмам текстов для исследований в области машинного перевода, оптического распознавания текста, или в других похожих целях, свяжитесь с нами. Для этих целей мы настоятельно рекомендуем использовать исключительно материалы в общественном достоянии.
- Не удалять логотипы и другие атрибуты Google из файлов. Изображения в каждом файле помечены логотипами Google для того, чтобы рассказать читателям о нашем проекте и помочь им найти дополнительные материалы. Не удаляйте их.
- Соблюдать законы Вашей и других стран. В конечном итоге, именно Вы несёте полную ответственность за Ваши действия – поэтому, пожалуйста, убедитесь, что Вы не нарушаете соответствующие законы Вашей или других стран. Имейте в виду, что даже если книга более не находится под защитой авторских прав в США, то это ещё совсем не значит, что её можно распространять в других странах. К сожалению, законодательство в сфере интеллектуальной собственности очень разнообразно, и не существует универсального способа определить, как разрешено использовать книгу в конкретной стране. Не рассчитывайте на то, что если книга появилась в поиске по книгам Google, то её можно использовать где и как угодно. Наказание за нарушение авторских прав может оказаться очень серьёзным.

О программе

Наша миссия – организовать информацию во всём мире и сделать её доступной и полезной для всех. Поиск по книгам Google помогает пользователям найти книги со всего света, а авторам и издателям – новых читателей. Чтобы произвести поиск по этой книге в полнотекстовом режиме, откройте страницу <http://books.google.com>.

---

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google<sup>TM</sup> books

<https://books.google.com>

C 371057

AT 2
H/19

JULY 1935 35 Cents

Hearst's INTERNATIONAL

Beginning THEY CALL ME CARPENTER
By UPTON SINCLAIR

YOU are cordially invited to become a Member of the International Institute of Economics. . . . Its object is simply to distribute among those Americans farsighted beyond their own coastline and enterprising enough to wish some real participation in the world's rebuilding, such economic facts and figures as are not only reliable but inspiring. . . . There are no dues, fees, or charges of any kind whatever. . . . On the contrary, the Business Weather Map of the World, showing each month the economic changes in some seventy-five nations is mailed free to all members. In addition to this general monthly bulletin, every Member is entitled, upon request, to any specific information about specific conditions in any country at any time. . . . To give such service, to distribute absolutely unbiased and accurate information on trade and investment conditions in foreign nations, to such Americans as can best make use of them is a timely contribution to world welfare the Institute is most desirous of making. . . . Will you, perhaps, as an enrolled Member give us your welcome co-operation?

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF ECONOMICS

HEARST'S INTERNATIONAL

119 WEST 40th STREET, NEW YORK

ANY dramatist who can make a first-night Broadway audience rock with laughter knows the secrets of humanity as well as the secrets of humor. Even those blasé critics Alan Dale and George Jean Nathan roared at the opening of Montague Glass's new play. Just how funny and how human this man Glass is you will see for yourself when you read his story in Hearst's International for August.

MONTAGUE GLASS

In This Number:

NORMAN HAPGOOD'S Editorials
on Russia, Germany and Religion 6

Three Distinguished Serials

They Call Me Carpenter 9
By Upton Sinclair
Illustrated by Lucius Wolcott Hitchcock

Carnac's Folly 42
By Sir Gilbert Parker
Illustrated by Walt Londerback

The Better Wife 70
By Gouverneur Morris
Illustrated by Henry Raleigh

Seven Short Stories

The Pagan 19
By John Russell
Illustrated by W. T. Benda

Wandering Daughters 26
By Dana Burnet
Illustrated by Everett Shinn

Old Hardhead 36
By Damon Runyon & Bozeman Bulger
Illustrated by Frank Godwin

Woman to Woman 49
By Frederic Arnold Kummer
Illustrated by Baron de Meyer

The Hidden Trail 57
By Emma-Lindsay Squier
Illustrated by James H. Crank

The Sinfulness of Skippy 61
By Owen Johnson
Illustrated by James Montgomery Flagg

Lapidowitz Dines Out 77
By Bruno Lessing
Illustrated by M. Leone Bracker

A World Survey in Articles

You Own Yourself 5
By Vice-President Calvin Coolidge

Henry Ford's Jew-Mania Part II 14
By Norman Hapgood

They Lie About Me in America— 32
Trotzky By Bessie Beatty

Edison Tells of the Miracle of Radio 53
By Allan Benson

Who's to Blame in Ireland? 67
By Frazier Hunt

Prohibition Has Made Good 81
By Woods Hutchinson, M. D.

Whiskers for Women 90
By Walt Mason

Your Payroll and World Trade 99
By James H. Collins

Play, Book, Art and Science

Kiki, André Picard's Comedy 85
Adapted by David Belasco

Vandemark's Folly 92
By Herbert Quick

The Rise of Abbott Thayer 89
By Gardner Teall

What Your Glands Are For 95
By James Hopper and E. E. Free

The Children and Sir Nameless 52
A new poem by Thomas Hardy

This special offer brings these important issues:

July: Summer Fashions—Complete guidance for your summer wardrobe. Also the smartest sports clothes. Everything that the well-dressed woman will need on her travels or for motoring.

August: Children's Number—Fashions for children and grown-ups, too. First news of fall fashions. Fascinating fiction by famous writers. Latest Society notes and pictures.

September: Forecast of Fall Fashions—The first indications of the new fall mode from Paris and New York. Street dresses, autumn hats, evening gowns, and a very special showing of the new furs in new models.

October: Annual Fall Fashions Number—At last, final and definite news about fashions for fall and winter. The important fall number. A most variegated and carefully selected showing of the latest creations of the foremost Paris and Fifth Avenue houses.

November: Winter Fashions Number—The clothes that Society women have selected for their own use for day and evening wear. Frocks, sports clothes, hats, gloves, veils, footwear, fabrics.

December: Christmas Number—A wonderful array of unusual gifts, especially gifts for children. A concluding word on the Winter fashions from Paris and New York. Lingerie, Late Winter hats. Shopping Service.

January: Sports Clothes for Out-of-Doors—Whether your hobby is skating, skiing or tobogganing, you cannot enjoy yourself unless properly clothed. The latest and most approved costumes for every sport. Interesting fiction for the long Winter evenings.

February: Fashions for the South—The first hint of the Spring fashions. What is being worn by Society leaders at Miami, Palm Beach, Atlantic City, and other Southern resorts.

Novels—Short Stories—Society
Besides fashions, Harper's Bazar brings you novels and short stories by such writers as Arnold Bennett, G. K. Chesterton, Cosmo Hamilton. Also reports of what smart people are doing and wearing in Paris, New York, Palm Beach, the Riviera; the Stage, Art—many, many features.

Special Offer Harper's Bazar

8 MONTHS for $2

Half the Single Copy Price

THE most useful as well as the most beautiful fashion magazine published, Harper's Bazar now makes you this offer which enables you to enjoy it at a saving of half.

Bought singly at 50 cents a copy, these eight issues would cost you $4.00. If you use the coupon below you can get them for $2.00.

The advantage of this offer is that it brings you Harper's Bazar throughout the important fashion seasons—Summer, Fall, Winter—when this last-word news of fashions is most valuable to you.

By helping you to avoid a single mistake in the purchase of a hat or a gown, the $2.00 you spend now will be saved for you many times over.

Take Advantage of This Offer!

Eight months of Harper's Bazar for half the regular price—the cost of a bit of neckwear or one theatre ticket! How else could you get so much for so little?

Won't you use the coupon—today?

HARPER'S BAZAR
119 WEST 40TH ST.
NEW YORK CITY
I have decided to take advantage of your special offer. Enclosed find check (or bills) for $2.00, for which send me Harper's Bazar for eight months.
(Canada, $2.75; Foreign, $3.50).

Name .....

Street .....

City and State ..... HI 7-22

OUR VICE-PRESIDENT Says—

You OWN Yourself

By Calvin Coolidge

INDUSTRY is changing from the theory of exclusion to the theory of inclusion. It no longer is content with one small part of the individual; it seeks to enlist all his powers, to recognize all his rights as well as require the performance of all his obligations. In the ideal industry, each individual would become an owner, an operator, and a manager, a master and a servant, a ruler and a servant, a ruler and a subject. Thus there would be established a system of true industrial democracy.

In very many industries, this is already taking place. Employees are encouraged to purchase stock in the corporation and are provided with credit facilities for such purpose. This gives them ownership. They are encouraged to make suggestions for the better conduct of the business. They are requested to apply their inventive ability in the various mechanical operations. Through trade unions and shop committees they have part in the determination of wages and conditions of labor.

There is a principle in our economic life that needs somewhat more emphasis. Long ago James Otis declared that kings were made for the good of the people and not the people for them. It needs also to be remembered that the people are not created for the benefit of industry, but industry is created for the benefit of the people. Those who are employed in it are its chief beneficiaries. Those who have acquired skill in organization provide the management for the workman. The manager secures the raw materials and markets the product. Capital and management perform this great service for the benefit of the workman. He performs a corresponding service for them.

Unto each who contributes in accordance with his ability, there is due equal consideration and equal honor. There is no degradation in industry; it is a worthy enterprise, ennobling all who contribute to it. It will be successful in accordance with the opportunity given for the development of all the powers of mankind and of the acceptance of the obligation alike to rule and to obey.

It was not very long ago that the man who owned an industry assumed to be the absolute lord over it. He fixed the hours and the conditions of employment and dictated the amount of wages. He recognized little or no obligation towards his employees and had little regard for his customers.

In large enterprises, the ownership gradually became more and more divided with the advent of the corporation. In that case, oftentimes the management was entrusted to representatives, while the owners corresponded to absentee landlords.

Under this system, as soon as employees could organize and make demands, a condition existed which led to the most violent and bitter of industrial disputes. All hands were eagerly asserting their right to rule, forgetful of their obligation to obey.

Investigation and experience have gradually brought about the recognition of the correct principle. Time and economic development will insure its adoption.

NORMAN HAPGOOD on Russia,

Shall We Wake Up? EVEN for its day, Mr. Taft's cabinet was conservative. In conversation a little while ago, a member of that cabinet said: "Nicolai Lenin is the only ruler in the world who is trying for the ideal while taking account of the practical. He is the greatest statesman alive."

When you consider that this ex-cabinet officer as recently as 1912 was rated a conservative, you get an idea of how fast thought is moving. It moves under the surface, to be sure, but it does move. Some time, possibly, other statesmen than Lenin will dare to say in public what nearly all of them are now ready to say in private, that if we are to save the world we must help it to be re-made.

Our State Department THE cabinet officer just referred to does not share any of the ideas of Lenin: far from it. What he sees is that in the spirit of Lenin is life, while in the spirit of our timid politicians and bureaucrats is death.

Look at this contrast. The most business-like, industrially cautious and experienced of the Moscow officials is Leonid Krassin. He has been an engineer and a big business man most of his life. Before he would return in 1917 from Germany to Russia, risking his fortunes in a social earthquake, he exacted from Lenin serious retreats from the then-prevailing form of working-men's control.

Krassin desired to come to this country. He desired to place before our State Department and our business men his plans for reconstruction, his plans for compromise and upbuilding, for help from us to Russia, and help from Russia to the world. We preferred to gamble with death and destruction to help another group to power.

Our State Department would not allow this nation to be contaminated by the presence of Leonid Krassin. Time passed, and another Russian sought admission. This was the well-known bandit, Semenov, claiming the throne made vacant by the death of our favorite, Admiral Kolchak. He not only received his passport, but likewise was received by the head of the Russian bureau of our State Department.

The chiefs of the bureaucracy dress admirably. No one of them ever wears a white tie where a black would be more in keeping. Whether the lowest button of a waistcoat should be open or not is decided with security and no hesitation. But the needs of a changing world are something they do not comprehend.

We Split A Hair

WE have been talking about the cowardice and shallowness of politicians. Let us not confuse shallowness and cowardice with the tacking and reefing needed by every mariner. Watch us now in the soul-stirring feat of being able to distinguish and divide

A hair 'twixt the north and northwest side.

Next to Lenin, the most notable statesman who survived the issues of the war is David Lloyd-George. The difference between his record on Russia and that of our State Department is exactly the difference between adroitness and woodenness.

Why should we complain if Great Britain, or Great Britain and Holland, get the Russian oil? It is our own fault. Our whole Russian policy is one not of tolerant realism, like England's, but of intolerance and political bigotry. It is perhaps one of the natural results of parochialism. We do not, as a state department, want to know anything about Russia: we only want to sit on our tail and emit dismal howls. If we kept out altogether, from fear begotten of ignorance, that would be comprehensible. But we don't. We try to combine aloofness with interference and preaching. We have acted not as a detached country in a vacuum, but as a docile pupil of "Ambassador" Bakhmetev.

Select the Real

THOSE who read these words are scattered from California to Maine, from Dakota to Louisiana. All can have one test in common. If you live in Wisconsin you have in La Follette a burning issue. There are plenty of matters on which La Follette and the writer of these lines do not agree. But La Follette thinks and dares. His unchained mind broods over the railroads, over imperialism, over the products by which we are warmed and fed. He is one of the handful who give reality to a Senate mainly composed of stuffed shirts under the leadership of Lodge.

Let us repeat one safe principle about Senatorships: Make each candidate pledge himself on Newberry. Lorimer kept his seat on one vote and lost it on the next. There is no better way of testing a man on the fundamentals: if he will not pledge himself against Newberry, don't let him into what should be sacred, the walls of that chamber where our rights are supposed to be protected.

A senator can honestly vote to seat Newberry, but he cannot vote to seat Newberry and have the kind of mind that is suitable for leadership at a time when one of our subtlest needs is to purify public life and release it from the power of gold.

New Germany and Religion

The Bottom of It

NOT always do we agree with the Farm Bloc, but it has that health about which we have been talking: it deals with realities. We must look at the coal mines, the railroads, water-power, taxation, inheritance, control of credit, as freely as if we were landed afresh from Mars. The insane Lear spoke the truth:

Plate sin with gold
And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks.
and in his frenzy the old King went on:
Get thee glass eyes;
And, like a scurvy politician, seem
To see the things thou dost not.

The campaign on which we are about to start will have little to do with realities. It is not likely to give much time to methods for keeping the coal mines open all the year. That might be done by a mere regulation about freight cars put into force by the Interstate Commerce Commission. But how many candidates dare to spend their voices on things so fundamental?

Get After This One

LODGE is the titular leader of the money forces in the Senate. He is the official mainstay of the old, rotting system. Therefore, next to Wisconsin, the election in Massachusetts is, this coming November, the most important. If Lodge is sent back, it means approval of the passing and decayed. If he is defeated, it means hope and at least the attempt to grope our way to the promising and the new.

Trend in Germany

SOME people imagine that party government has taken the form in Germany that it has long held in England. But there is an essential difference. The German government is more like the French—a sort of soviet of party leaders. The leaders have an importance that in England, in normal times, they do not have.

The latest shiftings in Germany have to do with the monarchists. The monarchial party is split into two wings, the Hohenzollerns and the much more numerous anti-Hohenzollerns. Within the last few months the monarchial movement in Bavaria has split in the same way. The powerful People's Party renounced Rupprecht and began, with French intrigue, to try to get behind Prince Alphonse, who favors secession from Germany. The move, dangerous as a part of the French assault on German recovery, has the incidental advantage of making less likely a monarchist coup in Bavaria, which at one time was probable. The most useful lesson the French could possibly learn would be that a prosperous and United Germany is safer for France than a demoralized and divided one. There is no advantage in inviting another Bismarck. The only safety is in close economic relations between Germany and France.

Are We Educated?

THE world is struggling for religion. All kinds of freak sects are springing up or increasing. The people who plan to see the elect go to heaven in their pajamas or overalls, while the goats remain here, are rapidly increasing. State legislatures, energetically backed by Mr. Bryan, after finishing Charles Darwin, are no doubt sharpening their teeth for Euclid, Newton, and Copernicus. A gardener we knew spoke thus: "I say the sun goes 'round the earth. Against it you have some reasoning you call science. For it I have the evidence of my own eyes and the word of Almighty God." A negro preacher was answering Ingersoll's lecture on the "Mistakes of Moses." "I cast no aspersions," he said, "on the veracity of Mr. Ingersoll. I make no remarks about which character is more likely to tell the truth. I just point out this one fact: Mr. Ingersoll wasn't there, and Moses was."

After all, a civilization is more amazing if it contains the state legislatures and Mr. Bryan. Perhaps not more intelligent, but certainly more amazing.

They Call Me Carpenter

IN BEGINNING a religious novel in this issue, we give an example of our policy. We are surfeited with conventions. Of cowardice, there is too much. This novel is arresting and stirring as a story: as thought, it is a challenge.

Rev. John Haynes Holmes, who has read "They Call Me Carpenter," speaks of it with ardent praise. In his own most recent book, "New Churches for Old," Dr. Holmes treats of what Christianity means in a world of railroads, coal mines, telephones, subways, imperialism, and swift-going steamers. He takes his stand against those who, in the words of Shaw, "are quite determined not to have their property meddled with by Jesus or any other reformer."

"They Call Me Carpenter" will be followed by other novels that strike deep into the problems amid which we live. Nothing, either in fiction or in articles, will be denied a place in this magazine because of its unfashionable candor. Our only tests for admission are importance in content, interest and attractiveness in form.

I lifted my eyes and there in the aisle of St. Bartholomew, standing with his hand on my head, was the figure out of the stained-glass window. Where the figure had been was a great hole with the sun shining through.

C No novel of our time caused a greater sensation than "The Jungle" by Upton Sinclair. Now he has undertaken to answer the question men and women have asked for 2000 years: C What would CHRIST do if he should return to earth today?

They Call ME CARPENTER

By Upton Sinclair

Illustrated by Lucius Wolcott Hitchcock

THE BEGINNING of this strange adventure was my going to see a motion picture which had been made in Germany. It was three years after the end of the war, and you'd have thought that the people of Western City would have got over their war-phobias. But apparently they hadn't; anyway, there was a mob to keep anyone from getting into the theater, and all the other mobs started from that.

Before I tell about it, I must introduce Dr. Karl Henner, the well-known literary critic from Berlin, who was traveling in this country, and stopped off in Western City at that time. Dr. Henner was the cause of my going to see the picture, and if you will have a moment's patience, you will see how the ideas which he put into my head served to start me on my extraordinary adventure.

You may not know much about these cultured foreigners. Their manners are like softest velvet, so that when you talk to them you feel as a Persian cat must feel while being stroked. They have read everything in the world; they speak with quiet certainty; and they are so old—old with memories of racial griefs stored up in their souls. I, who knew myself for a member of the best clubs in Western City, and of the best college fraternity in the country—I found myself suddenly indisposed to mention that I had helped to win the battle of the Argonne.

This foreign visitor asked me how I felt about the war, and I told him that it was over, and I bore no hard feelings, but of course I was glad that Prussian militarism was finished. He answered: "A painful operation, and we all hope that the patient may survive it; also we hope that the surgeon has not contracted the disease." Just as quietly as that.

Of course I asked Dr. Henner what he thought about America. His answer was that we had succeeded in producing the material means of civilization by the ton, where other nations had produced them by the pound. "We intellectuals in Europe have always been poor, by your standards over here. We have to make a very little food support a great many ideas. But you have unlimited quantities of food, and—well, we seek for the ideas, and we judge by analogy they must exist——"

"But you don't find them?" I laughed.

"Well," said he, "I have come to seek them."

THIS talk occurred while we were strolling down our Broadway, in Western City, one bright afternoon in the late fall of 1921. We talked about the picture which Dr. Henner had recommended to me, and which we were now going to see. It was called "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari," and was a "futurist" production, a strange freak of the cinema art, the nightmare of a madman.

"Being an American," said Dr. Henner, "you will find yourself asking, 'What good does such a picture do?' You will have the idea that every work of art must serve some moral purpose." After a pause, he added: "This picture could not possibly have been produced in America. For one thing, nearly all the characters are thin." He said it with the flicker of a smile—"One does not find American screen actors in that condition. Do your people care enough about the life of art to take a risk of starving for it? They are all so well fed."

Now, as a matter of fact, we had at that time several millions of people out of work in America, and many of them starving. There must be some intellectuals among them, I suggested; and the critic replied: "They must have starved for so long that they have got used to it, and can enjoy it—or at any rate can enjoy turning it into art! Is not that the final test of great art, that it has been smelted in the fires of suffering? All the great spiritual movements of humanity began in that way; take primitive Christianity, for example. But you Americans have taken Christ, the carpenter——"

I LAUGHED. It happened that at this moment we were passing St. Bartholomew's Church, a great brownstone structure standing at the corner of the park. I waved my hand towards it. "In there," I said, "over the altar, you may see Christ, the carpenter, dressed up in exquisite robes of white and amethyst, set up as a stained-glass window ornament. But if you'll stop and think, you'll realize it wasn't we Americans who began that!"

"No," said the other, returning my laugh; "but I think it was you who finished Him up as a symbol of elegance."

Thus chatting, we turned the corner, and came in sight of our goal, the Excelsior Theater. And there was the mob!

At first, when I saw the mass of people, I thought it was the usual picture crowd. I said, with a smile, "Can it be that the American people are not so dead to art after all?" But then I observed that the crowd seemed to be swaying this way and that; also, there seemed to be a great many men in army uniforms. "Hello!" I exclaimed. "A row?"

There was a clamor of shouting; the army men seemed to be pulling and pushing the civilians. When we got nearer, I asked of a bystander, "What's up?" The answer was, "They don't want 'em to go in to see the picture."

"Why not?"

"It's German. Hun propaganda!"

Now you must understand, I had helped to win a war, and no man gets over such an experience at once. I had a flash of suspicion, and glanced at my companion, the cultured literary critic from Berlin. Could it possibly be that this smooth-spoken gentleman was playing a trick upon me—trying, possibly, to get something into my crude American mind without my realizing what was happening? But I remembered his detailed account of the production, the very essence of "art for art's sake." I decided that the war was three years over, and I was competent to do my own thinking.

Dr. Henner spoke first. "I think," he said, "it might be wiser if I did not try to go in there."

"Absurd!" I cried. "I'm not going to be dictated to by a bunch of imbeciles!"

"No," said the other, "you are an American, and don't have to be. But I am a German, and I must learn."

I noted the flash of bitterness, but did not resent it. "That's a l nonsense, Dr. Henner!" I argued. "You are my gues , and I won't —"

"Listen, my friend," said the other. "You can doubtless get by without trouble; but I would surely rouse their anger, and I have no mind to be beaten for nothing. I have seen the pic ure several times, and can talk about it with you just as well."

"You make me ashamed of myself," I cried, "and of my country!"

"No, no! It is what you should expect. It is what I had in mind when I spoke of the surgeon contracting the disease. We German intellectuals know what war means; we are used to things like this." Suddenly he put out his hand. "Good-by."

"I will go with you!" I exclaimed. But he protested; that would embarrass him greatly. I would please to stay, and see the picture; he would be interested later on to hear my opinion of it. And abruptly he turned, and walked off, leaving me hesitating and angry.

At last, I started towards the entrance of the theater. One of the men in uniform barred my way. "No admittance here!"

"But why not?"

"It's a German show, and we ain't a-goin' to allow it."

"Now see here, buddy," I countered, none too good-naturedly, "I haven't got my uniform on, but I've as good a right to it as you: I was all through the Argonne."

"Well, what do you want to see Hun propaganda for?" he demanded.

"Maybe I want to see what it's like."

"Well, you can't go in; we're here to shut up this show!"

I had stepped to one side as I spoke, and he caught me by the arm. I thought there had been talk enough, and gave a sudden lurch, and tore my arm free. "Hold on there!" he shouted, and tried to stop me again; but I sprang through the crowd and towards the box-office.

There were more than a hundred civilians in or about the lobby, and not more than twenty or thirty uniformed men maintaining the blockade; so a few got by, and I was one of the lucky ones. I bought my ticket, and entered the theater. To the man at the door I said, "Who started this?"

"I don't know, sir. It's just landed on us, and we haven't had time to find out."

"Is the picture German propaganda?"

"Nothing like that at all, sir. They say they won't let us show German pictures, because they're so much cheaper; they'll put American-made pictures out of business, and it's unfair competition."

"Oh!" I exclaimed, and light began to dawn. I recalled Dr. Henner's remark about producing a great many ideas out of a very little food; assuredly, the American picture industry had cause to fear competition of that sort! I thought of old "T-S," as the screen people call him for short—the king of the movie world, with his roll of fat hanging over his collar, and his two or three extra chins! I thought of Mary Magna, million dollar queen of the pictures, contriving diets and exercises for herself, and weighing with fear and trembling every day as the weight would increase!

It was time for the picture to begin, so I smoothed my coat, and went to a seat, and was one of perhaps two dozen spectators before whom "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari" received its first public showing in Western City. The story had to do with a series of murders; we saw them traced by a young man, and fastened bit by bit upon an old magician and doctor. As the drama neared its climax, we discovered this doctor to be the head of an asylum for the insane, and the young man to be one of the inmates; so in the end the series of adventures was revealed to us as the imaginings of a madman about his physician and keepers.

As I left the theater, upon my ear broke a clamor that might have come direct from the inside of Dr. Caligari's asylum inhabited by mad people.

Q, "If you'd only let me take a little food to those men outside!" Carpenter said pleadingly to T-S.

"Ya, ya! Boo, boo! German propaganda! Pay your money to the Huns! For shame on you! Leave your own people to starve, and send your cash to the enemy!"

I stopped still, and whispered to myself, "My God!" During all the time, an hour or more, that I had been away on the wings of imagination, these men had been howling and whooping outside the theater, keeping the crowds away, and incidentally working themselves into a fury! For a moment, I thought I would go out and reason with them; they were mistaken in the idea that there was anything about the war, anything against America in the picture. But I realized that they were beyond reason. There was nothing to do but go my way as quickly as possible and let them rave.

But soon I saw that this was not going to be so easy as I had fancied. Right in front of the entrance stood the big fellow who had caught my arm; and as I came towards him I saw that he had me marked. He pointed a finger into my face, shouting in a fog-horn voice: "There's a traitor! Says he was in the service, and now he's backing the Huns!"

C T-S rapped imperiously on the table with both his knife and fork, and cried commandingly to his guest: "Mr. Carpenter, eat your dinner. You eat it now, I say!"

I never tried harder to avoid trouble; I wanted to get away, but that big fellow stuck his feet between mine, tripped me, lunged and shoved me into the gutter, and so, of course, I made to hit him. But they had me helpless; I had no more than clenched my fist and drawn back my arm, when I received a violent blow on the side of my jaw.

I ask you to believe that I did not run away in the Argonne. I did my job, and got my wound, and my honorable record. But there I had a fighting chance, and here I had none; and maybe I was dazed, and it was the instinctive reaction of my tormented body—anyhow, I ran. I staggered along, with the blows and kicks to keep me moving. Then I saw half a dozen broad steps, and a big open doorway; I fled that way, and found myself in a dark, cool place, reeling like a drunken man, but no longer beaten, and apparently no longer pursued. I was falling, and there was something nearby, and I caught at it, and sank down upon a sort of wooden bench.

I HAD run into St. Bartholomew's Church; and when I came to—I fear I cut a pitiful figure, but I have to tell the truth—I was crying. I don't think the pain of my head and face had anything to do with it, I think it was a rage and humiliation; a sense of outrage, that I, who had helped to win a war, should have been made to run from a gang of cowardly rowdies. Anyhow, here I was, half-lying in a pew of the church, sobbing as if my heart were broken.

At last I raised my head, and holding on to the pew in front, looked about me. Directly in front of me a gleaming altar, and high over it a stained-glass window. You know, of course, the sort of figures they have in those windows; a man in long robes, white, with purple and gold; with a brown beard, and a gentle, sad face, and a halo of light about the head.

I was staring at the figure, and at the same time choking with rage and pain, but clenching my hands, when suddenly that shining figure stretched out its two arms to me, as if imploring me not to think those vengeful thoughts!

I knew, of course, what it meant; I had just seen a play about delirium, and had got a whack on the head, and now I was delirious myself. I thought I must be badly hurt; I bowed my reeling head in my arms, and began to sob like a kid, out loud, and without shame, until suddenly I felt a quiet hand on my head, and heard a gentle voice saying:

"Don't be afraid. It is I." The tone was soft, persuasive.

I lifted my eyes, and there, in the aisle of the most decorous church of St. Bartholomew, standing with his hand on my head, was the figure out of the stained-glass window! I looked at him twice, and then I looked at the window. Where the figure had been was a great big hole with the sun shining through!

WE KNOW the power of suggestion, and especially when one taps the deeps of the unconscious, where our childhood memories are buried. I had been brought up in a religious family, and so it seemed quite natural to me that while that hand lay on my head, the throbbing and whirling should cease, and likewise the fear. I became perfectly quiet, and content to sit under the friendly spell.

After a bit, he asked, "Can you stand up?"

I tried, and found that I could. I felt the side of my jaw, and it hurt, but somehow the pain seemed apart from myself.

"Are you going out now?" he asked. As I hesitated, he added tactfully, "Perhaps you would let me go with you?"

Here was indeed a startling proposition! His costume, his long hair—there were many things about him not adapted to Broadway at five o'clock in the afternoon! But what could I say? It would be rude to call attention to his peculiarities. All I could manage was to stammer, "I thought you belonged in the church."

"Do I?" he replied, with a puzzled look. "I'm not sure. I have been wondering—am I really needed here? Am I not more needed in the world?"

"Well," said I, "there's one thing certain." I pointed up to the window. "That hole is conspicuous."

"Yes, that is true."

"And if it should rain, the altar would be ruined. The Reverend Dr. Lettuce-Spray would be dreadfully distressed. That altar cloth was left to the church in the will of Mrs. Elvina de Wiggs, and God knows how many thousands of dollars it cost."

"I suppose that wouldn't do," said the stranger. "Let us see if we can't find something to put there."

HE started up the aisle, and through the chancel. I followed, and we came into the vestry-room, and there on the wall I noticed a full length, life-sized portrait of old Algernon de Wiggs, president of the Empire National Bank, and of the Western City Chamber of Commerce. "Let us see if he would fill the place," said the stranger; and to my amazement, he drew up a chair, and took down the huge picture, and carried it, seemingly without effort, into the church.

He stepped upon the altar, and lifted the portrait in front of the window. How he got it to stay there I am not sure—I was too much taken aback by the procedure to notice such details. There the picture was; it seemed to fit the window exactly.

The effect was simply colossal. You'd have to know old de Wiggs to appreciate it—those round, puffy cheeks, with the afternoon sun behind them, making them shine like two enormous Jonathan apples! Our leading banker was clad in decorous black, as always on Sunday mornings, but in one place the sun penetrated his form—at one side of his chest. My curiosity got the better of me; I could not restrain the question, "What is that golden light?"

Said the stranger, "I think that is his heart."

"But that can't be!" I argued. "The light is on his right side; and it seems to have an oblong shape—exactly as if it were his wallet."

To that the other replied quietly: "Where the treasure is, there will the heart be also."

After that, we passed out through the arched doorway, and Broadway was before us. I had another thrill of distress—a vision of myself walking down this crowded street with this extraordinary looking personage. The crowds would stare at us, the street urchins would swarm about us, until we blocked the traffic and the police ran us in! So I thought, as we descended the steps and started; but my fear passed, for we walked and no one followed us—hardly did anyone even turn his eyes after us. Then I realized this was because Western City is familiar with strange costumes and strange people.

So here I was, strolling along quite as a matter of course with my strange acquaintance. I saw that he was looking about him, and I prepared for questions, and wondered what they would be. I thought that he must naturally be struck by such wonders as automobiles and crowded street cars. I failed to realize that he would be thinking about the souls of the people.

Said he, at last, "This is a large city?"

"About half a million."

"And what quarter are we in?"

"The shopping district."

"Is it a segregated district?"

"Segregated? In what way?"

"Apparently there are only courtesans."

I could not help laughing. "You are misled by the peculiarities of our feminine fashions; details with which you are naturally not familiar."

"Oh, quite the contrary," said he; "I am only too familiar with them. In childhood I learned the words of the prophet: 'Because the daughters of Zion are haughty, and walk with stretched forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet; therefore the Lord will smite with a scab the crown of the head of the daughters of Zion, and the Lord will discover their secret parts. In that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon, the chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers, the bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the headbands and the tablets, and the earrings, and nose jewels, the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping pins, the glasses, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the veils. And it shall come to pass that instead of sweet smell there shall be stink; and instead of a girdle a rent; and instead of well set hair, baldness; and instead of a stomacher a girding of sackcloth; and burning instead of beauty.'"

"Be careful!" I whispered. "People will hear you!"

"But why should they not?" He turned on me a look of surprise. "The people hear me gladly." He added: "The common people."

Here was an aspect of my adventure which had not occurred to me before. "My God!" I thought. "If he takes to preaching on street corners!" I realized in a flash—it was exactly what he would be up to!

I began to speak quickly. "We must get across this street while we have time; the traffic officer has turned the right way now." I began explaining our remarkable system of traffic handling on congested streets.

We had gone less than a block farther when I heard a voice, "Hello, Billy!" I turned. There was Edgerton Rosythe, moving picture critic of the Western City Times. Precisely the most cynical, the most profane, the most boisterous person in a cynical and profane and boisterous business!

"Hello, Billy! Who's your good-looking friend?" Rosythe demanded.

The stranger spoke.

"They call me Carpenter."

"Ah!" said the critic. "Mr. Carpenter, delighted to meet you." He gave the stranger a hearty grip of the hand "Are you on location?"

"Location?" said the other. At this Rosythe shot an arrow of laughter towards me.

I made a pitiful attempt to protect my dignity. "Mr. Carpenter has just arrived," I began—

"Just arrived, hey?" said the critic. "Oviparous, viviparous, or ovoviviparous?" He raised his hand; actually, in the glory of his wit, he was going to clap the stranger on the shoulder!

"See here, Rosythe," I said, "I can't stand on the street.

¶ "Tell me, Mr. Carpenter, are you only a close-up from The Servant in the House?" asked Mary, that bold and vivid queen of the movies. "Mary," he said, "eighty generations have lived since Isaiah's day, but women haven't discovered anything new in the way of ornaments."

I'm beginning to feel seedy. I think I'll have a taxi."

"No," said the critic. "Come with me. I'm on the way to pick up the missus. Right around the corner—a fine place to rest." Without further ado, he took me by the arm and led me along. We went into an office building, and entered an elevator. I did not know the building, or the offices we came to. Rosythe pushed open a door, and I saw before me a spacious parlor, with birds of paradise of the female sex lounging in upholstered chairs. I was led to a vast plush sofa, and sank into it with a sigh of relief.

The stranger stood beside me, and put his hand on my head once more. It was truly a miracle, how the whirling and roaring ceased, and peace came back to me.

It was so comfortable there, I did not care what happened. I closed my eyes for a while; then I opened them and gazed lazily about the place. I noted that all the birds of paradise were watching Carpenter. With one accord, their heads had turned and their eyes were riveted upon him, while he seemed to be listening to a moaning from an inner room.

A stoutish woman, out of a Paris fashion-plate, came trotting across the room, smiling in welcome: "Meester Rosythe!" She had a black earring flapping from each ear, and her face was white, with a streak of scarlet for lips. She took the critic by his two hands, and the critic laughed. Then he turned to us.

"Madame Planchet, permit me to introduce Mr. Carpenter. He is a man of wonder, he heals pain. But from his looks, I judge he thinks you make the ladies suffer too much."

"Ah, but the ladies do not mind the pain? What ees eet? The lady who makes the groans, she can not move, and so she ees unhappy. Also, she likes to have her own way."

"O-o-o-o-o-o-o-o-h!" came from the other room; and Madame Planchet prattled away: "I weel tell you someth'ing. The lady what you hear—that ees Meeses T-S. You know Meester T-S, the magnate of the moving pectures?" [Continued on page 114]

The Inside Story of HENRY FORD'S Jew- Mania

HERE is the second article in a series that tells the dramatic and comic story of a rich man's phobia and by which we hope to do something to establish the principles of American freedom

LAST MONTH we told some of the most important facts about Ford's persecution of the Jews. We showed how closely connected it was with the persecution of the Jews carried on in this country by those Russians who are attempting to get a Romanoff back on the throne. We described in a general way how the Ford investigators functioned like a detective agency, they being headed by a brother of Josephus Daniels. The workings of that organization are more fully told in the present article.

SINCE KNOWING I was to tell an inside story of Mr. Ford's doings against the Jews, a number of persons have asked how I got the material.

It is an easy question, and I have no secrets.

The time is late December, 1921. The scene opens in a private dining-room in a New York club. In the room are four persons, eating together.

One is a distinguished American novelist, traveler, and commentator.

One is a Russian, let us call him Mr. M., who occupied one of the highest positions in the Russian government, under Prince Lyov, that followed the overthrow of the Tsar.

The third, whom we may call Mr. A. was at the head of the Constitutional Government at Omsk, until he was overthrown by the militarists and aristocrats who had appointed Kolchak dictator; those who enlisted the support of our government, and other governments, for that would-be dictator.

The fourth is myself, acting as host.

The conversation naturally enough falls on Henry Ford and his latest vagary.

"What is the matter with him?" asks one of the Russians.

I undertake to reply. "He is a great manufacturer," I explain; "probably, the greatest manufacturer who ever lived. But he is not only ignorant of the world and of history, he is proud of this ignorance. He is boastful of it. Having been a great money-maker, he has been flattered and spoiled until he has decided he can understand everything without knowing anything.

"This vanity makes it easy to 'pull his leg,' as we say in choice American. One Jewess-pulled his aforesaid leg for a large sum,

*On
the Trail
of the Sleuths*

By Norman Hapgood

on a moonshine errand, and this feat is supposed to have helped his mind give way on the Jewish issue. It was his first persecution complex. He is, at heart, all right, and if he had had any education he would not have fallen into a persecution-mania that all over Europe is always associated with reaction."

"Always," said Mr. M.

"Always," said Mr. A.

Then one of these Russian statesmen proceeded to tell me a fact. I do not suppose he realized that it was large-scale "news." He has not a newspaper mind. I have. So when I heard this statement, the news centers in my brain began to jump.

"I have seen," said Mr. A, "the documentary proof that Boris Brasol has received money from Henry Ford."

"What!" I exclaimed. "Are you quite sure of that?"

No need for any of us to explain what that short statement meant politically, although I was the only one who fully knew what it meant journalistically.

POLITICALLY it meant that history was repeating itself. As Brasol was chief in this country of the expatriate Russians trying to put the Romanoffs back on the throne, it meant that Ford's persecution had, with the logic of events, joined with that crusade, centuries old, that the despots of Europe stirred up repeatedly, in order to inflame, for their own purposes, the ignorant religious passions of the dark masses.

Journalistically, it meant much. "Well," I said, "if Ford money has found its way to Brasol, I think we shall give Mr. Ford something to think about. Perhaps we shall educate him."

The Russians, of course, did not know what I meant, in terms of journalism, but they understood in terms of human history. Having seen and suffered from the dark methods of the Tsar, they understood.

Well, I started to get that simple document, if I could. I wanted, merely, the receipt for an amount, however small, that once belonged to Henry Ford and came to belong to Boris Brasol. I cared not if it was only a dollar. But I wanted the proof.

I started an investigation in the town where, according to Mr. A, the documentary proof existed. Then there happened what often happens in serious investigations. We go after one thing and we find a nest of other things.

I started after any little piece of writing that would make the connection between Ford's anti-Semitic raging and the Tsarist anti-Semitic raging, and I ran into a whole picture—a tale that was farce in its form, tragic in its deeper meaning.

People who heard that I wanted information on the subject brought me things I had not dreamed of. All I had to do was to distinguish between the genuine and the forgeries, and I had had some experience in handling such material without being fooled.

Such was the way the facts about organization of investigators came into my hands. I knew Ford's paper was lapping up refuse from everywhere, using any tale by any crank, writing letters of invitation to any half-wit who happened to break into the papers with an anti-Jewish speech. But the elaborate organization was undreamed of by me, until the proof was put into my hands.

To the philosophic mind, the whole evil was dramatized when the name of Ford and the name of Brasol were brought together. But for the public, for the untrained mind, the investigators were a godsend. It dramatized the tale.

LAST MONTH we stopped after making you acquainted with Mr. Daniels, head of the group, and brother of Josephus. This month it becomes our duty to introduce the pseudo-detectives, by their code numbers, and show you something of what they thought they were accomplishing.

The affair was operated in New York at 20 Broad Street, presumably in the very citadel of international Jewish bankers, and the chief was Mr. C. C. Daniels, an excellent Southern gentleman, but about Jews quite awry in the head. So much secrecy was considered necessary, that a set of secret numbers existed in Mr. Daniels's office, designating different individuals. Here is the list:

|       |               |       |                  |
|-------|---------------|-------|------------------|
| 120 X | C. C. Daniels | 122 X | W. J. Cameron    |
| 121 X | E. G. Liebold | 123 X | F. Hunter Creech |

|       |                   |        |                           |
|-------|-------------------|--------|---------------------------|
| 124 X | Charles W. Smith  | 102 AB | Operative under Sam Smith |
| 125 X | Wanda Kazanecka   | 103 A  | Dr. Houghton              |
|       |                   | 104 A  | Prof. A. L. Frothingham   |
| 50 D  | Bessie M. Shugrue | 105 A  | Henry A. Wise Wood        |
| 51 D  | Henry J. O'Neill  |        |                           |
| 52 D  | Henry A. Forster  | 25 H   | Albert Bailinof           |
| 53 D  | John S. Wise, Jr. | 26 H   | J. F. Lannigan            |
| 54 D  | C. H. Martin      | 27 H   | Miss Shugrue              |
| 55 D  | P. E. Tuthill     | 28 H   | Miss Murray               |
|       |                   | 29 H   | Miss De Bogory            |
| 101 A | A. M. Jungman     | 30 H   | L. C. Burton              |
| 102 A | Sam Smith         |        |                           |

Presumably a few friends of the Ford Course in general were unwittingly "numbered" by the chief investigators so that they could be referred to with secrecy like real professional detectives. Not every person on this list was a Jew-baiting would-be detective. Indeed the very putting of some of them on the list at all is as farcical as the whole Ford Crusade. For example, Professor Frothingham.

In a letter bearing the stenographer's check mark of F. H. C., presumably Mr. F. H. Creech, who is number 123 X, William J. Cameron, the editor of the Ford weekly, with the "numbered reporters," learns this:

"Confidential. Also received this week a letter from Professor Arthur L. Frothingham of Princeton, New Jersey, of whom you know, in which he said:

"I heard last night a most peculiar thing—that the riot and attack on the Union Club, ostensibly Sinn Fein—was really instigated by Jews who stayed in the background. I was told of the man who has the proof of this even to the main investigation. The person who has the proofs is in a position to know."

Professor Arthur L. Frothingham is a member of the Princeton faculty. I was curious to know whether a Princeton professor really believed that a crowd of people, coming out of a large Roman Catholic Cathedral and attacking a club across the street, perhaps fifty feet away, was led by Jews. So I wrote to him. As to detectives, or semi-detectives, I long ago ceased to be surprised at the beliefs of any of them, from William J. Burns down.

FORM 717

| CLASS OF SERVICE | SYMBOL |
|------------------|--------|
| Day Message      |        |
| Day Letter       | Blue   |
| Night Message    | Wite   |
| Night Letter     | W L    |

If none of these three symbols appears after the check (number of words) this is a day message. Otherwise the character is indicated by the symbol appearing after the check.

Ford Motor Company

Automobile Manufacturers

TELEGRAM

---

RECEIVED AT MAIN OFFICE

VIA POSTAL TELEGRAPH CO.

WU-11-PCC      New York City
11:21AM 13th

HENRY FORD
Dearborn Publishing Co.

Mr. Daniels:

— I am sending this to you, without answering it, to handle as you like. I don't like sending wires around promiscuously giving identification to strangers.

W.J.

Advise if Chas. W Smith is your representative Reply collect

J F Jennings

sa/11:42AM
9/13/21

❶ Dozens of sane men fell for the mysterious nonsense, but J. F. Jennings appealed to Mr. Ford directly to know about Charles W. Smith numbered as an investigator. Mr. Jennings received no reply.

New York City, March 24, 1921

But I had an idea that Princeton professors were not so easy, and I did not believe that Mr. Frothingham was fairly represented when the Ford operators pretended to make him one of their organization. My suspicions were correct. Professor Frothingham answered my request for information as follows:

"I was waiting to answer you on the point you raised as to the source of the attack on the Union Club until I could look through my files. But, having been 'laid up' with a cold for the last few days and my secretary being off on a holiday, I will just say a few words in re. I have no real evidence as to the attack being pulled off by Jews. I can not imagine how anyone could have got the idea that this was my personal opinion, because it is not. I merely read, soon after the attack took place, that the Jews were really back of it. I do not remember where I read it. I have something on file about it, and if I come across it I will send it on to you if it amounts to anything.

"As for Henry Ford, I never took much stock in his attack. I know what was at the back of it—injured vanity and personal desire for revenge at being made ridiculous. Neither do I hold any brief for the 'authenticity' of the Protocols, though I have plenty of material relating to various forms of the Jewish 'peril'—if you know what I mean, and believe in open discussion of real phases of it. I despise monomanias, hate lying propaganda, am devoted to a pitiless unveiling of important groups of facts that bear on public and international conditions, am against disruption and for reform."

WHILE dozens of apparently sane men fell for the mysterious nonsense, there was also plenty of misgivings and some inquiries, among those who were approached. One J. F. Jennings sat himself down on the thirteenth day of September at the hour of 11:21 A. M., and made up his mind that he wanted to know the truth about Charles W. Smith, operator 124 X. He telegraphed about it: he didn't wire to any Ford factory underlings. He reached out for Mr. Ford himself, in a telegram which said:

"Henry Ford, Dearborn Publishing Company. Advise if Charles W. Smith is your representative. Reply collect. J. F. Jennings."

Mr. Ford never answered this telegram. He has people hired for such purposes. Whether Mr. Jennings ever learned the identity of Mr. Smith is not known. In one corner of the telegram in handwriting is this statement:

"Mr. Daniels. I am sending this to you without answering it, to handle as you like. I don't like sending wires around promiscuously giving identification to strangers." The initials signed to this statement are W. J. C., those of William J. Cameron, editor of Mr. Ford's weekly newspaper.

In other words, Mr. Cameron naturally feared being "double-crossed." Knowing that his employees were prying about everywhere, he feared that hostile detectives, hired by Jews, might be carrying on counter-espionage.

A counter-protocol—forged, of course, like all of them—will appear in this tale immediately.

We reproduce a letter from the most private of Mr. Ford's private secretaries. Mr. E. G. Liebold is writing to Mr. Daniels. The letter is reproduced on page 18, so here we give it as it would have appeared had Mr. Liebold used the numbers, instead of merely every-day names, as the organization did in matters deemed sufficiently important.

Mr. C.C. Daniels
20 Broad St
Room 1611
New York City.

Dear Mr. Daniels

I am herewith enclosing the Protocol of the Conference which was held last Night. You will please excuse my writing as I felt tired after being up almost the whole night. After leaving your office Mr. Liebold and myself discussed the matter again and we thought that the Pogroms should be started late in Fall. Mr. Liebold agreed with me upon this, of course you understand this is for your information only.

I am leaving tonight for Detroit where I will remain for a few days. You are also invited to come there if you can get away, as a definite date for the Pogroms may be set there.

Yours very truly,

D. Rodionoff

New York City March 25, 1921.

Received from Mr. E.G. Liebold $25,000 for material to be delivered to him during the year of 1921, and shall I not be able to deliver him the material which I agreed upon, I am to return to him the above mentioned amount of money..

D. Rodionoff

G. D. Rodionoff, active in the Anti-Jew Mania, was the man whom the author of this particular set of fake Protocols sought to discredit.

Mr. 120 X,
20 Broad Street,
New York City
Dear Mr. 120 X:

I still have before me the letter of July 10th, relative to 123 X's work at Washington stating that certain information will be forthcoming the following week. Can you advise me if anything definite has transpired as a result of their activities, and oblige?

121 X

ALTHOUGH the course of history had prepared several fake Protocols, it seemed wise to a certain enemy of Ford to prepare some fake Protocols of his own. He had heard, in all probability, being a Russian, of the famous Sergius Nilus Protocols,

File 407.

March 18/21.

Protocols

© UNDERWOOD &amp; UNDERWOOD

C. Boris Brasol, head of the Tsarist movement in this country, promoter of anti-Jew activities.

Protocol of the Conference of saving the United States and the World. All present the following people, Chairman Boris Brasol C.C. Daniels, H. F. Creech, Chas. W. Smith, Dr. Houghton, H. De Bogory, E. Gordinko, Chairman Brasol I will now introduce to you Mr. Radionoff as he has important matters to tell us about.

Mr. Radionoff, I just arrived here from Japan upon the request of Mr. Liebold I reported upon my arrival to Mr. C. W. Smith. Now, I want to tell you a little of the Protocol, as you all know that we had lots of trouble in Russia from 1900 to 1905 with Jews and Masons. We the Russian secret Police thought it advisable that we shall get something written about the Jew and his tactics. We therefore selected our great Friend who has written these Protocols. After we have distributed them in Russia it created a big sensation, especially among the Zionists. Of course you understand that we have not got any such a thing as the Jewish Protocols written by a Jew or in Jewish, but I got a Man at my office in Japan, that Man is a very educated Jew, and he is writing up for me in Hebrew those Protocols which we will be able to send you here a Photograph of those Protocols after he has completed writing them, but you of course understand that you must tell your officials and the other people that those Protocols was stolen by a woman in France from the Zionist Headquarters there. You no doubt also know that the Roman Catholics are in with the Jews in the world greatest Conspiracy to Capture the whole world, and that they plan to do by creating all the trouble they can through Labor Organizations.

C. C. Daniels I want to say that neither the Jew or the Roman Catholics are Americans or Patriots of any other Country. Just as soon as these two elements put their feet on the Soil of a Country they ruin in, and that is for the purpose of Capturing the Country.

C. A little American skill and snappiness have added zest to the European art of forging Protocols. This fake document pretends to report a meeting at which pogroms were advocated.

from which Ford printed excerpts, and with which Hearst's International will deal in its next issue.

Americans may not all know that a Protocol is only a secretary's report of a meeting. These counter-fakes have a certain distinction, because they are written about men in the United States. In Russia, the forging of documents, back and forth, has long been a recognized move of political argument. The police forged against the revolutionary elements and the revolutionists forged against the government. It was like any other industry. But with us it is comparatively new. If Sergius Nilus thinks he is a protocolist, let him consider, if he is still alive, or if he ever existed, whether a little American skill and snappiness do not add zest to the Protocol game. This counter-protocol brings in the most important of the Ford-Daniels operators. It forges along as follows:

MARCH 18-21

PROTOCOLS

"Protocol of the conference of saving the United States and the world. All present the following people Chairman Boris Brasol, C. C. Daniels, F. H. Creech, Charles W. Smith, Dr. Houghton, H. De Bogory, D. Gordinko. Chairman Brasol: 'I will now introduce to you Mr. Rodionoff, as he has important matters to tell us about.' Mr. Rodionoff: 'I have just arrived here from Japan on the request of Mr. Liebold. I report upon my arrival to Mr. C. W. Smith. Now I want to tell you a little of the Protocols as you all know we had a little trouble in Russia from 1900 to 1905 with Jews and Masons. We, the Russian Secret Police, thought it advisable that we shall get something written about the Jews and his tactics. We therefore selected our Great Friend who has written these Protocols. After we had distributed them in Russia, it created a big sensation especially among the Zionists. Of course you understand we have not got any such thing as the Jewish Protocols, written by a Jew or in Jewish, but I got a man at my office in Japan, that man is a very educated

The Washington
Washington D.C.

Friday afternoon
5/27/21

Dear Mr. Daniels:-

Have been making very good progress, and am getting hold of some good stuff
today, while I was

out of my room some one was good enough to come in my room and take some copies of the second volume out of my hand bag.
But there is nothing exciting about it!

Sincerely,

J. Hunter (reel)

Q. The investigators were pursued by villains, like Sherlock Holmes by Professor Moriarty.

man, and he is writing up for me in Hebrew these Protocols which we will be able to send you."

This reference to Rodionoff has its purpose. The individual who forged this particular Protocol knew Rodionoff and was annoyed at his association with the Ford-Daniels machine, so he undertook to discredit him as an honest Protocol-producer; and he also undertook to sell his masterpiece to people who were opposed to the Ford campaign. It finally found its way into my hands. Not being quite so credulous as Mr. Ford and his underlings, I sent the copies of the Protocol both to Lieutenant Brasol and Mr. Daniels because I thought it might "get a rise" out of them, to see that not all the Protocols were on one side. However, knowing there is dynamite in this series, I took the precaution of requiring and receiving back from them receipts declaring categorically that I presented the Protocol definitely as a forgery.

Another extract from this Protocol ran as follows: "Mr. Smith

Henry Ford
Dearborn, Mich.

July
22nd
1920

Mr C C Daniels
20 Broad St
New York City

Dear Mr Daniels:

I still have before me your letter of July 10th relative to Mr Creech's work at Washington stating that certain information will be forthcoming the following week.

Can you advise me if anything definite has transpired as a result of their activities, and oblige?

Very truly yours

E. A. LEBOLD

General Secretary to HENRY FORD

EGL 2

Q. Mr. Ford's secretary keeps the investigators on the job.

(said): "The best way to do with the Jew and the Roman Catholic is to first fight the Jew and use the Roman Catholic to help us fight the Jew, and after we have succeeded in starting a pogrom on the Jews here in New York we will clean them out from here."

Another extract runs: "Dr. Houghton . . . I agree with Mr. Smith and with Mr. Liebold and that we shall start pogroms on the Jews at the earliest possible date. You understand that it is no easy job to uproot the big Jewish bankers here in one day. It will take them some time before they can get them out of our way. But after we do get them out of our way we will have no trouble at all in proceeding with our other work." B. Gordinko: "In Russia I experienced and helped many pogroms on the Jews, and I found it a success for a government or for a big corporation to have the Jew and the Gentile all split up."

To this document is forged the name of "D. Rodionoff, Secretary." The person who tried thus to turn their own
[Continued on page 106]

C If you think that Hate is the strongest force in the world, you will wonder why Henry of Vitongo, the brown-skinned half-caste of the South Seas, waited more than eighteen years to avenge the wrong done him by the father of the girl he loved

The Pagan

By John Russell

Illustrated by W. T. Benda

IT MAY be that some men can hold hatred in their hearts like a secret spring in a rock; that they actually do carry out feud and grievance and retributive vengeance after many years. But the men must be men of sour and bitter strain—very different from Henry of Vitongo. He grew up under the shadow of an unsatisfied wrong without once swearing a vendetta or taking a blood oath.

Henry was half Samoan—the gentlest, most tolerant and peaceable stock in all the jumbled racial chemistry of this world. And Henry himself was the laziest, most hopelessly easy-going and unconsidering youngster that ever drowsed and dreamed and played away the hours on the fringe of a jewelled beach. He had no hatred, only sunshine and laughter in his heart: Henry of Vitongo.

That was not all his name, of course. He had inherited the estate and the lawful designation of his father.

In the garden of the ramshackle, jig-saw homestead—imported piecemeal from Australia—stood a weather-beaten marble tomb—imported bodily from Hawaii. Between the jungle that ran over in tangled green and the lagoon that frothed in cream and blue, there it had stood for eighteen years; and from its ornately carved epitaph the half-caste boy had first learned his letters:

HENRY GORDON SHOESMITH

b. Scotland 1847

d. Vitongo, Sept. 6, 1898

"Every man's work shall be made manifest."

I. Cor. III

And underneath lay the original trader of Vitongo—the tough old, far-wandering Scot who had founded home and family and fortune in this restful island nook; who had been brought to his last rest treacherously and terribly—slain by an unknown hand.

"Unknown," be it said at once, in the official sense only; for no person had ever been tried for the deed. "Unproven" would be more nearly exact; for in private talk, the murderer had been charged, tried and condemned long since.

C. Tito stood in the glow of the moon, gazing at her father and her lover. She had a flawless face, with a beauty that would have matched the Reni Madonna—a soft, rich, almost Latin type.

SOME hundreds of folk in the Aana district of Upolo could have told how Henry Gordon met his death in the disordered days of Tri-Partite government, when men died without formality and law was weak in the land. Some dozens of old-timers along the coast from Apia town could have stated the case and the quarrel nearly enough. . . . They could have, but they did not; the natives because of native caution; the whites because of white policy. It was really nobody's business unless it was young Henry's business. And—

"Tu'u ia mo paga," said Henry; which means, it is nothing, it is forgotten—it should not count. He climbed ashore and sat shaking the wet from his straight black hair and gleaming in the sun like a bronzed merman. "Eighteen year, tha's awful long time," said Henry of Vitongo.

His cousin Gordon scowled down at him.

"A long time don't change the fact. If you was a man, Henry Shoesmith—the 'alf of a man——!"

"Ah, tha's it," smiled Henry quietly, without malice. "Tha's why—eh? I am only 'alf a man beside you." A neat way of recalling that Gordon's mother had married a white; wherefore Gordon was a quarter-caste, college-taught in New Zealand, and wore celluloid collars and satin ties and altogether comported himself with the dominant race. Wherefore Gordon despised a second cousin who preferred to live Samoan fashion—camping on an open veranda while real carpets and red curtains and pink lace doilies went to rack and ruin inside his neglected house, and never wearing so much as a pair of pants when he could help it.

"Tu'u ia mo paga," repeated Henry.

The other bit his lip. It was his vehement annoyance that this graceless young scamp should have fallen into the best part of the Shoesmith possessions. It was almost equally annoying that the scamp should care so little to augment those holdings, to deploy them with social gestures—or even to protect them, as appeared. "List'n to me," he said, severely. "Everybody knows who killed your father. Everybody knows it was the same h-wicked, h-wicked man who is trying to thief away the rest of your land now!"

Henry pillowed himself on the warm sand and continued to smile indolently out across the smiling bay.

"He will do it, too—unless you fight. He has bought up all the notes of your foolish borrowings in Apia and raised the amount by tricks and false claims. Oh-h, a cunning d-hevil! It was so easy how he robbed and killed your father. 'Ave you forgotten?" Gordon's voice fell a sinister tone. . . . "Your father had loaned him much money. They went together one night to drink at Mulifanua. Afterwards, somebody—somebody—rode a white horse from Mulifanua in the dark and cut your father's throat as he slept, and thieved all those papers of those loans! Eh? And now this same man comes again to r-r-rob you. Only this time he does not need to use a knife . . . Henry Shoesmith!" Gordon called upon him. "Henry Shoesmith; do you remember that knife?"

SOMETHING like a cloud passed over Henry's face; something like a shudder took him, as when a damp wind turns the pandanus leaves. Did he not remember that knife? It was the substance of every evil vision he had had from childhood. He always saw it as it hung over his father's bed—a Malay kris, really, though Henry never knew it as such; one of the relics the shrewd old trader had gathered in his travels before he settled down as an island patriarch; a thing with a wavy blade and a handle set in colored stones that glittered—glittered dreadfully. He always saw it glittering through a red mist since the morning when, as a mere toddler, he had been first to discover the tragedy.

"List'n. I know where that knife is kep! I know three men in Apia who have seen it. The stones are very valuable, and Joranson needs money again, as he did before. . . . He has tried to sell it—Joranson the Dane!"

Still Henry made no response.

"You could find that knife if you searched on board his trading cutter. . . . If you dared!" said Gordon, with a spurt of anger. "Hoh! But you do not dare. Even when Tito is waiting there for you. A beau-tiful girl is Tito—the daughter of Joranson. She fears 'im, and every night he beats her with a bamboo stick. She is only waiting for some strong man to take her away from him. But she will not wait long for you when she knows you are a coward!"

Henry sat up at last. "I am not a coward," he said, stung into full-throated native speech. "I am sprung from the seed of Alipia Nailetai—Alipia Who Died in the Sea". He was a great chief of Samoa, and Samoans are not cowards!"

"Samoans are not cowards, but thou knowest what white folks say of them? They are quit-ter," returned Gordon, bitterly. "They will not fight. They quit! They can not carry through anything, even in their own defense. . . . And so it is with thee, who art no Samoan. What art thou? Only a fish-man and a fool. Only swimming and joking and idling while thy blood-enemy goes unslain and unpunished!"

"It is not for a Samoan to have a blood-enemy. It is not the custom of the country to slay anybody."

"It is the custom to ask justice! As nearest of kin you must ask the court yourself. . . . Come now, Henry, let me take your case," pleaded Gordon. "We can so easy prove that Joranson did it, and we can leave the killing to the English judge."

He will 'ave Joranson 'anged by the neck. And then you can marry Tito—and Joranson's cutter and all that is Joranson's will be yours!" he added eagerly.

HENRY lay back on the beach again with one arm thrown over to shade his brow. But while he regarded the importunate visitor, in the pooled depths of his eyes ran a tiny flickering light which might have recalled—which did recall—the temper of that able Scotch trader, his father.

"Gor-don Shoesmith," he said, slowly, "go away. You are smart-man and lawyer-man. You are thinking if anything 'appens to me you will be next to own Vitongo—eh? And any'ow if you stir up bloody row you make me fight to keep Vitongo for you—eh? List'n. I am maybe fool but I am not dam fool! Go away, Gordon Shoesmith."

So Gordon went, swearing aspirated oaths as he mounted his rattletrap cart, and slashing his flea-bitten pony as he turned back towards his own plantation. Henry watched him go, and Henry laughed. He would have liked to keep on laughing. But after a while the laughter failed. All very well to check a meddlesome schemer; all very well to postpone a troublesome issue in true Samoan style with a handy proverb, saying it was naught—it was forgotten—it did not count. But the trouble which had been making for him pretty much since his birth would not banish so readily on this critical morning of his twenty-third year.

Henry of Vitongo was that curious modern product—seldom noticed—the man midway East and West, whose heritage swings between two pasts as wide apart as the poles. It was a remarkable share in the heritage, and the world's indirect tribute to a noble native race, that as a half-caste of Samoa he need never be ashamed of it.

Pride of race is so rare with mixed bloods; still rarer when granted by white to dark. Only among descendants of certain American Indian tribes, of the Maoris and kindred Polynesian branches through the Islands, will you find such pride held and acknowledged. And this was Henry's.

Not but he knew well enough the ways of a saddle-tinted society—like Gordon and Gordon's womenfolk, who anxiously aped the manners of a money-making middle class. Not but he saw Shoesmiths and Smollets and Schmidts—offspring of beachcombing adventurers in the last century—established now, and vastly concerned with a quaint parade of high heels and ormolu clocks and afternoon teas. But he also knew in this same society how carefully the old Samoan names were remembered and honored; how closely the old Samoan link still held. Even Gordon, with a sophisticated taste in neckwear and lawsuits—even Gordon himself claimed an ancient chief's title through a famous taupo, his grandam, and never dreamed of denying his island origin or the island speech.

THE difference with Henry was that he had no call to be a Shoesmith at all. To these striving relatives of his many things seemed essential; invitations at Government House, land and profits and the tricks of commerce. To Henry nothing in life seemed important except the living.

It always had been so with him. Since his orphaned boyhood he had been a scandal to his kind. In his school days at the Marist Mission he had offered a sad problem to those earnest saints who shed a pale cast of culture on the riotous tropics. The best swimmer and cricketer, the quickest hand with net and bonito boat, he had never felt a really vital concern in compound percentage, the rule of three and the "Book of Sacred Gems." . . . As sheerly a matter of feeling as when Brother Leo used to catch him playing truant with garlanded madcaps at the jumping-rock—used to shake an angry finger at the elfin face and explode a six-barreled German word which signified, in approximate meaning, a "throw-back."

"That is what you are, Henry Shoesmith. You are a gentleman—no?—with a fine home and a trading store. And you act as a little pagan. Ach, such conduct displeasing to the good God; you should blush for yourself!"

Brother Leo intended no jest. It hardly occurred to him that a skin like sun-gilded fruit does not show a blush in the sight of the good God. But otherwise Brother Leo had hit the truth. Henry of Vitongo was a born pagan.

To ride the breaker, to chase the rainbow fish, to beguile the hours, nourished at nature's ripe breast and sleeping there without doubt or care—no books had taught him this; no books could teach him better. The casual villages in each shining bay—the bee-hive houses without walls or doors like the open, simple lives of their in-dwellers—they were home to him, and homelike and kindly were the scents of health and thatch and freshly plucked masoo'i, of cocoanut-shell fires and new cocoanut oil, heavier than any musk that ever scented the Orient.

Q. "You've got a nerve, hanging around that kid of mine," said Joranson the Dane. "Drop it, do yo' hear? Or I'll skin you alive. She'll fetch a white husband, that girl. I'll have no more tar-brush in my family. Now you clear."

ALL of which was harmless enough, to be sure—all of which involved nothing worse than the talk and the scandal aforesaid—to the fateful moment when he learned that he loved, and hopelessly loved, pretty Tito Joranson. . . .

"A beautiful girl is Tito, the daughter of Joranson the Dane. Every night he beats her with a bamboo stick. She only waits for a strong man."

Well, whatever anyone might say or think of it, Henry certainly had done his best to qualify.

Had he not enlarged Vitongo store at reckless cost? Had he not plunged with a bold financial gesture on three trading ventures to Savaii? Had he not mortgaged and borrowed right and left in order to gamble disastrously in copra and cocoa—all at Joranson's own cunning suggestion and all for the single purpose of proving himself a strong man and a gentleman by every half-caste standard, and a worthy candidate for a son-in-law?

His effort had failed. It had worse than failed, for Joranson was coming this very night to demand a settlement; and Henry dreaded it. How terribly he dreaded it, only one could have guessed who had ingrained in his make-up the obscure inhibitions of Polynesia—primitive without savagery—wise without wisdom; the people who do not fight: "they can not carry through anything, even in their own behalf." Here and now he was going to have to meet the crisis of his life—to square life and love somehow with the reputed murderer of his father!

Such was the case of Henry Shoesmith on this particular morning of his twenty-third year.

It was not a good case, but it offered no escape by his own lights and limitations. Neither by compound percentage. Nor yet by the "Book of Sacred Gems." And finally it drove him out of his dreams into making some sort of show for himself. . . .

He hurried to the big house. He donned a pair of dove-gray pants. He laid out a shirt with pearl buttons. Better still; from a battered cowhide trunk he unearthed old yellow shoes, a jacket of black alpaca and a venerable silk waistcoat sprigged with forget-me-nots. Once he had scrubbed away the mildew and tucked up the sleeves and nearly strangled himself with a collar button and had set a warped straw hat to top the glory, he felt like an armored knight; very gentlemanly, indeed. Then he marched over to the store where he relieved his Niue-boy clerk and sold three yards of calico for a total profit of ten pence half-penny and felt himself a business man.

THE moral uplift sustained him all day long. Until swift tropic night began to pour in against the land. Until a lantern on Joranson's cutter cocked its baleful and expectant eye at him across Vitongo Bay. Until he crept down cautiously to avoid his dear cousin Gordon—who doubtless would be watching and spying somewhere among the palm-trees—and paddled out in his little outrigger proa on the dappling phosphorescence of the lagoon to achieve his destiny. . . .

Tito was waiting for him. Somehow he had been sure that Tito would be waiting and he was glad, though inwardly quaking. In a way this encounter was worse than the prospect of his ordeal with Joranson, for a half-caste courtship is hedged with infinite ceremony and he never actually had addressed a dozen words to his lady-love. He could see her gown as a lighter patch there on the forward deck. So he put on his shoes—instruments of torture which he had saved to the last moment—and climbed aboard over the cutter's rail.

"A-good even' to you, Miss Joranson."

"A-good even', Mis-ter Shoesmith."

He swept off his hat with a flourish. She made him a courtesy in the grand manner of the saddle-tinted aristocracy. But both of them rather spoiled the effect by turning an anxious glance towards the after cabin, where their common ogre sat alone at his dinner. Their voices were hushed.

"I did not fin' you at the pi'ture theater las' Thursday night," began Henry politely.

"No. Tha' was the same n-ight the dance of the La-dies' Tuina Club," returned Tito primly.

As a matter of fact, Henry had not gone to the picture theater; neither had Tito gone to the dance. These were company conventions, to which they desperately clung.

"Business 'as been good today," observed Henry, fanning himself. "Copra is up again. I think there will be much money in the villages this season."

"Yes. And much gay time' in Apia," agreed Tito. "Two weddings will be soon—and a christen' party."

As a matter of fact business and parties were equally far from them; but they were saying the proper things.

Out on the broad horizon grew a faint halo, luminous with coming moonlight. It made a background for Tito's fillet-bound head. Higher yet hung two quivering points of radiance. Henry thought they must be fireflies caught in the dusky web of her hair. Then he saw they were stars, and presently, as a wonderful and very dear and very intimate revelation, they showed him her face.

A FLAWLESS face; of a beauty that would have matched a Reni Madonna—the soft, rich, almost Latin beauty of her type. Henry knew its loveliness. But now as he looked down at the tremulous mouth, the glorious great eyes uplifted and dwelling in his by the starlight—now in a dizzy sweep of tenderness he knew something else; her wistful appeal; her trouble that answered his own trouble—the same timid and passionate longing clouded with the same complex of doubts and misgivings and imposed restraints possessed each of them.

She wore a tight frock of some pink stuff. On her arms, smooth and firm as copper cast as flesh, and over her superb shoulders she had tied a woolly shawl. By one ear dangled a bunch of ribbon, and she went mincing in ballroom slippers—velvet with jet trimmings—the kind that knock about all the shelves of the Pacific in job-lot consignments for the Colonial trade. Her whole splendid body, made for sun and freedom and the embrace of cresting seas, had been pinched and frilled and tricked out in a pathetic attempt at fashion.

And with sudden enlightenment Henry recognized the pathos—not, as another might have done, the absurdity, of it; suddenly this girl who had seemed an unattainable mystery seemed a mystery no more. She was so delightfully embarrassed; so exquisitely uncomfortable—it thrilled him. . . . Surely her feet must hurt even worse than his own!

You see, Tito herself was just another product. She, too, had been taken as a child from her native mother and run through a mission. She, too, had submitted to the ideals of some gloomy suburb half a world away—like West Ham, perhaps, or Dulwich, or wherever the good sisters of the Papautu Girls' School hail from; had struggled with the rule of three and tried to find compensation for living in an earthly paradise by the "Book of Sacred Gems." And she had not made much more of it than Henry Shoesmith. He was aware of that at once, by voice and eye and the throb of a woman's breast—things not taught in missions. . . . Surely, some time or other, somebody must have called her a little pagan, too!

"Tito—!" he cried, and would have reached to her. But his collar button nipped him in time. After all, it is hard to discard a gentlemanly training; you see, he had come braced and belted in gentlemanly style. . . .

"Miss Joran-son," he corrected. "You look aroun' this place—eh?" He swept a stiff arm over the bay. "From shore to shore is Vitongo. You know?"

"Yes," she said, innocently. "Yes, Mis-ter Shoesmith. I know. Vitongo."

"You like it?"

"Yes," she said. "Oh, yes Mis-ter Shoesmith. It is very pretty. And very es'pensive."

"IT GIVE me gr-eat pleasure," he stammered, "if you will accept per invoice . . . I mean—if you will do me the 'onor. . . ." With choking eagerness he tried to capture an eligible half-caste formula. "Dear Miss Joran-son; list'n. All this is mine. This plantation, with a fine 'ome and a trading store. I own Vitongo myself—"

"Like hell you do!"

The words fell upon them with the force of a club. They started apart. And there at the hatchway of the little cabin stood their ogre; the white man—the inevitable white man who always has appeared in just that manner to the gentler peoples of the earth, who always does stand at the hatchway—grim and masterful and full of power.

"I heard you, Henry. I been waiting for you. Come inside here and cool off." His voice grated on the humorous note more compelling than any threat. Tito he passed over without a glance. At the first turn of his big hand, she vanished aft like a wraith. "Henry," he repeated, with formidable pleasantry, "don't be backward, my boy. Did I not tell you to come in here? . . . You're late."

A Joranson the Dane and Henry Vitongo went reeling through dim immensity. With one arm, Henry hung about his enemy's neck; with the other he fought for the knife. With the knife he could scatter a dozen sharks.

Joranson was one of those figures that have made the South Sea the last far-flung, picturesque frontier. In the old days they possessed it with the missionary, step for step. The missionary sought the bewildered souls of black and brown men. The pioneer sought their labor and their lands. The one set up a paralyzing system of morality, while the other cashed in. Together, pioneer and missionary farmed the helpless island world—and few had come off better than Joranson. Blackbirder, gin-seller, gun-runner; he had tried most ways of scoundrelism in season. If he had died in that lawless period he might have become almost legendary, like the pirate Bully Hayes, whose disciple he has been. But he survived. And he survived because he was far-sighted as he was ruthless.

JORANSON THE DANE, they called him. The name had lost its original meaning; the man himself had long since moulded to the prevailing trader type, Colonial in speech and Yankee in oath. And this very adaptability was the line of his success. His early rivals were dead—Shoesmiths and Smollets and Schmidts with whom he had played the old frontier game of fraud and violence as it used to be played. They were gone, and—"eighteen years, that's an awful long time." He seldom needed a weapon nowadays; he preferred a court order. He no longer beat the native over the head and sold him into slavery; he gave him credit and sold him into debt. And occasionally, when luck was kind, he caught some shiftless heir of one of his former foes and squeezed the life out of him with a very special satisfaction.

As in the case of Henry Shoesmith.

"You was saying you owned something; and I was saying you did, nix." . . . Powerful—built on a huge, loose scaffolding of bone and muscle—he was still in steel-hard condition. Only his gray hair and his gray face betrayed him. He had a face grid-ironed like a devil's, and slitted eyes with a cold spark in them.

"You'll find it by these papers, Henry," he remarked, as he tossed out a sheaf of documents on the tiny cabin table. "You don't own nothing. Them notes of yours went to protest, d'y' see? All you got to do is sign y'r assets to me . . . All assets," he added amiably.

Henry gasped.

"You mean—Vitongo?"

"The whole outfit."

"Vitongo—!"

"What t' hell else did you expect?"

Henry could hardly have told; but even with Gordon's warning he never had expected this. He never had thought of Vitongo itself as a piece of property—something you buy and sell. Vitongo was the land—his birthplace; the soil to which he belonged. . . . It stunned him.

He wanted to resist. Doubtless the papers had been juggled—perhaps actually falsified, as Gordon had said. But he could not tell how or where. He wanted to charge the other with his treachery; he wanted to deal or dick or to bargain somehow for his heart's desire. These were the things he might have learned in school, if he had been capable of it. But he had not learned.

Uncounted centuries debarred him. He was the man of color, and against him stood the white man, armed with the white man's power and backed by the white man's code. He was the predestined victim. He had no choice but to obey, in a sort of helpless trance. Meanwhile Joranson continued to enjoy himself. It made a rare moment for Joranson, this neat turn—which was also the triumph of his ancient feud. "I don't mind telling you," he said once, with infernal geniality, "I ought a had the place long ago. Your father beat me out of it. But I notice such crooked doings have a way of coming straight. . . . Sign y'r name right there, Henry—on the line."

And again:

"You'll understand there ain't a holy chanst for you, Henry. Not a chanst. I been too blame' careful. There'll be no pickings left over. Not even for that smart blackmailing cousin of yours—Gordon. I got Mr. Gordon stopped—don't you worry!" Which information, oddly enough, gave poor Henry a fleeting touch of comfort in the midst of his misery.

But the worst was at the last. When the business was done, when the name had been signed, Joranson slipped the mask a little. "That'll be all, Henry. Just one thing while you go." He bent a look on the boy like chill lightning. "Just one point.

You got a hell of a nerve hanging around that kid of mine. Oh, I seen y'; and you drop it, d'y' hear?—or I'll skin you alive. She'll fetch a white husband any time, that girl—and by God, I'll have no more tar-brush in my family. . . . Now you clear!"

Henry cleared. With that glance piercing his shoulder blades, with that final insult in his ears, he scuttled up the after companion and stumbled on deck.

And there Tito met him again.

Out to seaward the moon had swung high, the swelling moon of Samoan nights, like a vast, golden breadfruit in the sky. It gave light—light to show off silks and satins and tricked-out finery and mincing steps, perhaps—plenty of light for grand manners. But Henry did not think of them; and neither, somehow, did Tito. She met him at once; her hands fluttering towards his, her lips breathing broken little phrases of pity. He reached to her, and this time—collar button or no collar button—this time he did not draw away.

"Tito, Tito—!" he whispered, wrung with vague shame and suffering.

"I know," she soothed. "I know—I know. I was listening. But do not weep." Unconsciously they had spoken in their liquid native tongue, made for love and the low murmur of love, soft as the call of wild pigeons in the mating season. "Nay, weep not. I can not bear that!"

Again he saw her face, so near to his, and again came to him the glory and the wonder of woman, loved and loving—the amazing revelation of it.

"You heard? Then it is also known to you that I have nothing any more, Tito. No house. No plantation. I am a beggar. I do not remember if I have even any claim on the clan of my dead mother. Perhaps her village would give me a home in charity. . . . But that is all."

"I know," she repeated. "It makes no change. We have ourselves—thou and I." Very different was her speech now; very different its simple message which struck back to the ultimate sources. "No harm is done to us while we live. Only tell me where you will go for shelter and what you mean to do. Be quick—before he stirs!"

HENRY looked down the ladder. The ogre was busied below at something. He looked to sea. The cutter had been anchored just inside the passage of the reef, in deep water; it was quiet outside—only an easy rolling of the ground-swell. Last he looked towards the land; its shore a thin strip of silver a quarter mile off; its shoulders rising in a great silvered sweep from height to height, by crag and jungle and forest to the star-tipped basaltic peaks above. . . . "Would you seek me out, then? Would you follow?" he questioned eagerly.

"Perhaps." She smiled a little, shyly. "But I would be sure you are safe."

With one arm he caught her close to him. They did not kiss; that caress, unknown to the East, is still a curious invention of the West. But he felt the beat of her heart against his, tripping twice as fast as his own—a marvelous fact. "Turn your eyes to Vitongo, yonder," he said. "Do you see the shape of that big candlenut tree on the hill? . . . No. Not beside my house. Away to the right. Do you see the cloud of its many blossoms—pale and clustering?"

"Yes," she answered, near his cheek.

"Up past that tree runs a ravine. It is wild and rocky and overgrown. Few have ever climbed it. But I know the path, and up beyond the palms—beyond the taro and the banana groves—is a flat place in the mountain-side. There as a child I once built me a little fale for a play-house; a hut—hidden among the vines. There one is always safe."

"Yes."

"Nobody comes so far. Nobody can ever find us. We can live on the sweet mountain fruits and water in the brook, taking nothing that belongs to anyone—staying all to ourselves—thou and I." Very different was this courtship; very different the offer he made. "Tito—let us go there!"

"Now . . . ?"

He nodded.

"But my father would kill us! He would see us going." She gestured forward where Henry's proa was tied, past the forward cabin hatch. "He will stop us!"

"I do not mean that way."

"How then?"

He pointed across the bay. She drew a quick breath as she understood. "There may be sharks!"

"What do we care for sharks—we two?" he demanded.

An instant they clung—while the splendor of the thought gained and glowed in them—while they waited, palpitant, on the urge of it. Came a warning sound from the cabin. Henry gripped the neckband of his expensive shirt. Tito's arm slid free with a start of ripping stuffs . . .

"Make haste!"

Alas for the true ladies of Papautu School; also, alas for the prim young gentlemen of the Marist Mission! Alas for high heels and waistcoats sprigged with forget-me-nots; for ribbons and shawls and frills and fal-lals and the dove-gray suitings of fashion—and once more alas for the polite teachings of West Ham, the uplift of the rule of three and the "Book of Sacred Gems" and many other things so very, very essential to morals and imported propriety. . . . All forgotten. All abandoned within three seconds.

Only the moon was witness, with unveiled face. But the moon was a Samoan moon; the mellowest, most tolerant and kindly scamp of a moon—quite used to beaming on youth and lovers since a golden, olden age. It stared with all its might on Vitongo Bay, but never blushed.

But perhaps, with a certain whimsy, perhaps it might have smiled to see those two youngsters kicking free so earnestly and eagerly—emerging from their finery at last, a pair of superb, silver-bronze chrysalides, clad in their own native garb—Henry with his kilted lava-lava and Tito with her dainty ahu! . . . Thereafter, it had a parting glimpse of them for just a wink as they stood hand in hand at the cutter's stern—ere they went overboard into the warm yielding sea.

The clean, double scoop of their dive raised a startled challenge behind them. Followed hasty footsteps upon the ladder and presently one comprehensive roar of rage exploded over Vitongo. From the rail Joranson made out their two dark heads, surging for shore. His dinghy still lay on deck, but he did not wait to launch it. Darting down through the cabin, he came forward at a jump and cut the lashing of Henry's outrigger canoe. The fugitives were hardly a hundred feet to the good when he began to dig out. Few persons had ever succeeded in getting much of a lead on Joranson the Dane.

WHEN Joranson dashed into their wake, Henry dropped back to cover the retreat. But he need not have bothered. Joranson wanted something he could hit soon and hit hard; Joranson took after him first of all. The proa bore down on Henry in hissing spurts of foam and the opening of that affray was a vicious swipe with a paddle.

Henry ducked—came up out of reach. Joranson whirled like a water-beetle and struck again, and again. Henry slipped from under. This was sport for a fisherman. He could have played it all night. Each time he drew the chase farther aside from Tito. It kept him cheered to think that Tito was drawing away with every stroke. . . . But there [Continued on page 106]

With Tito, Henry turned away into the night where the soft cymbaling of palm-fronds made bridal music and pigeons murmured sleepily.

❧ It isn't only the mother whose heart aches when her children seem to grow away from her. Every father will understand why Will Bowden could not sleep the night his daughter did not come home until two o'clock in the morning

Wandering Daughters

By Dana Burnet

Illustrated by Everett Shinn

THE trolley-conductor caught Mr. Bowden's familiar signal, gave a friendly nod and pulled the bell-rope. Mr. Bowden folded his evening paper and stood up, grasping at the strap overhead. His pale blue eyes, mild behind their steel-rimmed glasses, glanced about the car. There was a kind of gentle expectancy in that glance. Mr. Bowden, in spite of fifty-five years of dealing with human nature, was still something of a sentimentalist. It gave him a pleasant thrill to meet the eyes of people he knew.

But tonight, though it was Saturday and the car was full, there was none whom he recognized, or who recognized him. Only the conductor spoke to him as he came out.

"Not many of my old passengers left, Mr. Bowden," said the conductor, a dried-up, dusty little man who had grown gray on the James Hill run.

"Not many," agreed Mr. Bowden, getting down rather stiffly from the platform step.

The car went on. Mr. Bowden looked about with his usual cautiousness. An automobile was coming towards him. He stopped to let it pass. As it went by him, a stout man in the glass-enclosed tonneau leaned forward and waved his hand—

Mr. Bowden smiled and nodded several times in return.

"Charley Horton!" he reflected, making for the curb. "Used to ride out with him every night. . . . Got his own car now."

That was why there were so few of the old passengers left. They all had automobiles now. It was not the first time he had observed that fact; but for the first time, it struck him as a matter of importance to himself. As he walked up the cement pavement towards the plain, square-built brick house that was his home, he groped for thoughts to balance against the prosperity of such men as Charley Horton. He, Will Bowden, hadn't an automobile; but he had other things. He had a home, and there wasn't a penny on it. Not a penny. He had paid off the mortgage ten years before. He had a small, steady insurance business that gave him enough to live comfortably. He had the best wife in the world, one servant—and Bessie.

At the thought of Bessie, he felt a slight misgiving, a certain uneasiness that he realized was becoming familiar to him. Bessie was the joy of his life, but with her blonde prettiness, her vivacity, her eagerness for wider horizons, she was also a problem. It was Bessie who made him stop and think.

He opened the front door with his latch-key, entering directly into a large room known as the hall. It was a room furnished plainly in dark oak furniture of the mission type. Adjoining it, to his left as he entered, was the parlor, a somewhat smaller room with a gas-log fireplace and a marble mantel that had been the pride of his earlier days. The parlor was filled—perhaps too full—of gilt furniture which had been a wedding present from his wife's mother. He remembered, with a twinge of pain, that Bessie recently had made disparaging remarks about that gilt furniture—

He went on into the back hall, hung his hat and coat in the closet and opened the door of the kitchen. A smell of cooking, of fresh bread baking in the oven. . . . He had always loved that smell and he still loved it.

His wife, stirring something on the stove, turned towards him a flushed face, giving him the smile that he had come to regard as the benediction of his day. But tonight— Was that smile quite the same? Had it, too, become a trifle time-worn, underlaid with a touch of care?

He put the dark thought away from him and going to her kissed her as he had done for thirty years past.

"You're late, Will."

"I had a little extra work at the office, Annie."

"Supper's almost ready. . . . Delia's setting the table."

"Well, I'll go wash up. Oh, where's Bessie?"

"Upstairs. Dressing. You know, she's going out tonight."

Mr. Bowden felt once more that little stab of pain at his heart.

"Party?" he asked lightly.

"A dance. At the Country Club."

"Well, well! Bessie's getting to be—way up in society, isn't she? That's twice she's been to the Country Club this week."

His wife's full, oval face grew worried. She pushed back a lock of her graying hair—a gesture that he knew expressed nervousness.

A slight blonde young woman, radiant in a low-necked dress . . . a moment of astonishment . . . How could he and that drab woman in the kitchen have produced so rare a creature? That was what puzzled Will Bowden.

"Yes. I wish she wouldn't. We don't belong to the club—and I don't think it's right for Bessie to go there so much. With that crowd."

"Oh, well! She's young, you know."

"But that's kind of a fast crowd, Will. They've all got money. . . . Austin Trull is coming for her in his car."

"Trull, eh? Let's see, isn't he the young fellow who—?"

"Yes, he is. Arrested downtown for hitting a policeman. They say he'd been drinking—and was speeding—"

"Hum. Have you talked to Bessie?"

"Yes. I told her I wished she'd consult me before she chose her friends. . . . I don't know where she meets them all, I'm sure."

"What did Bessie say?"

"She said they were all right. That Trull was—all right. She said: 'You know, mama, things aren't like they used to be when you were young.'"

MR. BOWDEN heard the troubled note in his wife's voice, and stepped towards her. But he didn't put his arms around her as he had been moved to do. Somehow an issue had been created.

"Well, well! I guess that's true enough. . . . Though I can't seem to think of you as growing older, Annie. You look about Bessie's age tonight."

"Now, Will—"

Her smile made him feel at once relieved and guilty.

He left the kitchen with a sense of foreboding that he couldn't quite account for. It was as though he were going to fight something intangible, something that he himself didn't understand. He must understand it first. That was obvious.

He met Bessie unexpectedly in the upper hall. A slight, blonde young woman, radiant, in a pale green low-necked dress, with green slippers and stockings to match—the latter generously displayed. A moment of astonishment, of wonder for the ways of life. . . . How could he, and that rather drab woman downstairs in the kitchen, have produced so rare a creature!

"Hello, papa!"

"Hello, hello! Don't we look nice!" He kissed Bessie's cheek, aware of an essence, a perfume that seemed to breathe from her youthful prettiness.

"Do you think it's all right? Emma made it." Emma was the family seamstress. "She's so terribly old-fashioned about her sewing."

"Old-fashioned? Let me see." Bessie pirouetted slowly before him. "Well! Of course I don't know much about it—" (That was a mistake. He shouldn't have said that. Why didn't he know about it?) He finished weakly: "But I should say it was fine. Fine!"

"Oh, I guess it's all right. It's new anyway. Nobody's ever seen it before."

"Does that make a difference?"

"Why, of course. The girls I go with never wear—" Bessie stopped, looked at her father's somewhat plump, undistinguished figure and added: "But they can afford it."

"You're going to a dance tonight, Bessie?"

"Yes."

"That's nice. I want you to have a good time—" He stopped, and they looked at each other, Bessie rather defiantly. "But I—I'd like to know more about your friends. Suppose we go into my den, and have a little talk before supper."

"Why—certainly, papa."

The den was a room consciously devoted to Mr. Bowden's enthroned masculinity; it had been considered proper, in the days when he and Annie were building, to have a den.

"Sit down, dear."

"I'd rather not, papa. I'll muss my dress—"

"Oh!" The excuse was transparent. She was resisting him, resisting his offer of friendship.

"Well, I just wanted to ask you about your—new friends."

"They aren't so terribly new. I've known Genevieve Horton ever since we were in dancing school together."

"And it was Genevieve who introduced you to—the others?"

"Yes."

"But she hasn't always gone with that set, has she?"

"No. But since her father made all that money in stocks—or whatever it was—she's gone with them."

"I see." Mr. Bowden had a fleeting vision of Charley Horton, stout and successful, rolling by in his expensive limousine. . . . "I see. And you like them better than your old friends? The girls and boys you grew up with?"

"Oh, well, papa, they're different. They've got—they're the best people in Jamestown."

Mr. Bowden did not argue the point.

"And Mr. Trull? You—like him?"

"Why—certainly. He's been awfully nice to me. Oh, I know what you mean—about his being arrested, and everything! But that wasn't his fault. He told me all about it. He wasn't speeding at all, and when the cop swore at him—well, he got mad and hit him. It wasn't his fault."

"The papers said he'd been drinking."

"Well, he hadn't. Anyway he wasn't—he's not what people say he is at all. Of course he's got money—but that's no crime! And he—Austin's artistic. He's going to be a painter. He's already had one magazine cover accepted."

"But he—drinks, doesn't he?"

Bessie's hand played nervously with the tulle of her dress.

"Yes. A little. Everyone drinks nowadays, papa. It's all on account of prohibition—"

"Do you drink, Bessie?" Mr. Bowden's tone was only an approximation of the indifference he tried to put into it.

"No—," answered Bessie, hesitatingly.

"Not at all? Never?"

"Oh, well—I have—maybe one cocktail!" she admitted.

“Why everyone drinks nowadays,” Bessie had admitted to her horrified father. “You sort of have to—or people think you’re—a frost.”

THE HORROR that rose in Mr. Bowden's breast was out of all proportion to its cause. He had a sudden feeling of danger, awful and imminent, as though he had come abruptly to the edge of an abyss.

"Where do you get these cocktails?"

"Everybody has them, papa. It's—sort of—the thing to have cocktails."

"I see. Do they serve them at the club?"

"Oh, no! But the boys—bring them."

"Well, Bessie, I—I'm a little surprised. I don't want you to think I'm shocked—or that I'm narrow-minded—but I—"

"You asked me, and I told you."

"My dear, I want you always to tell me everything. I want to be your friend, Bessie. Not just your father."

She impulsively went to him, settled down on the arm of his chair and put her arm around his neck.

"Papa, I—"

"That's all right, dear. I know you wouldn't do anything to hurt me—or yourself."

"Mother doesn't understand. She thinks I'm going to the dogs just because I want to have a good time—"

"Are you dissatisfied with your home, Bessie? Tell me the truth."

"Why, no. Only I wish we weren't so—stodgy."

"Are we stodgy?"

C. Austin Trull told Bessie he didn't believe in God or religion or anything. It developed that the anything covered matrimony.

"Yes, we are. Look at that furniture downstairs. And mama's always in the kitchen! I can never ask anybody here without letting her know beforehand."

"I see. You'd like things so that you could just——"

"Well, if I do anything at home, it's always so much trouble. When I go to other people's houses, everything's different. They don't make a fuss over asking you to dinner. And they give big parties—just kind of naturally. I haven't even had a coming-out party."

"Do you want one?"

"Of course, I'd like—but I know you can't afford it, papa."

"How do you know I can't afford it?"

"Why—you can't. Mama said you couldn't. She said not to ask you, because it was impossible."

Mr. Bowden smoothed the hand that had clenched itself on his shoulder as the girl suppressed her feelings.

"Your mother's the best woman in the world, Bessie. But suppose you come to me—next time, eh?"

"WHY, papa——! All right, I will. . . . I didn't want to worry you." (He almost smiled at that.) "Papa——"

"Yes?"

"Why don't you go into—stocks—or something, like Mr. Horton. He made loads of money, and you're just as smart as he is. Then you—you wouldn't have to work so hard."

"Stocks? Ha, ha! Well, I don't know. Perhaps I will!"

"Oh, papa! Wouldn't it be great if we had money! Then we could give nice parties—and travel—and really do things."

"Well, Bessie, I'll think it over. But don't say anything about it to your mother."

"I won't." She stood up, smiling at him. "It would be wonderful, papa, if you did that."

"By the way, does Johnnie Hargrave go to your dances?"

"Johnnie Hargrave! I should say not. He's too——"

"Stodgy?"

"Well, he's always working at that real estate business of his. Or going to church!"

"You used to like him, Bessie."

"That was when he was in college. He was awfully popular at Princeton, and a wonderful football player—but he used to pray before all the big games, even then."

"I see. You object to him on religious grounds?"

"It isn't that, papa. It's just—Oh, I don't know."

"Well, you have a right to choose your own friends. But—Bessie?"

"Yes, papa?"

"I wish you wouldn't drink any—cocktails tonight!"

"But everybody—oh, it isn't as though I liked them. But you sort of have to—or people think you're—a frost."

Mr. Bowden fought down the rising of all his Presbyterian ancestry. It was more than a little struggle.

"Well, just one cocktail, then. What do you say?"

"Why—all right, papa. Certainly! I never do anyway," said Bessie, with a deprecatory gesture.

"And don't stay too late, will you, dear? Your mother worries about you, you know."

"She needn't. I can take care of myself. . . . There's the supper bell, papa. I don't know why mother has to have a bel!" she cried, her control suddenly snapping.

"You go along down, Bessie. Tell your mother I'm coming down almost directly."

"All right."

She vanished, with a little flurry of green tulle. Mr. Bowden, rising, went into the bathroom and washed his face and hands.

That night, contrary to custom, Mr. Bowden did not retire into his den to read the evening paper. He sat in the lower hall, and when about eight o'clock the door-bell rang, announcing the arrival of Austin Trull, he himself opened the door.

"This Mr. Trull? Come right in. Bessie'll be down in a moment," he told the young caller.

He found himself studying the young man with a keenness that was new to him. Austin Trull was an attractive person. He had a finely-moulded face and head, a thin straight nose, a small mouth set off by a blond mustache, eyes restless and light. Not so solidly handsome as Johnnie Hargrave, perhaps. . . . But decidedly more attractive. . . .

"I don't think we've met before, Mr. Bowden," said the caller, as the two shook hands.

"No. Glad to have the opportunity. . . . Always glad to meet Bessie's friends," returned the older man, with easy cordiality.

"Keeps you busy, doesn't it?" laughed Trull. "Bessie's a pretty popular young person, you know."

"Yes. Sit down, Mr. Trull. . . . Yes, I hadn't realized how popular she was. Young people grow up so fast."

There was a brief pause. "Bessie tells me you're studying art," said Mr. Bowden, with his most casual manner.

"Yes. I've decided to become a painter. I—like the life."

"The life? Oh, yes, I see. The Bohemian sort of existence, eh, that's what you mean?"

MR. TRULL laughed again. "I don't mean to wear my hair long, or any of that junk, but I like the artistic way of—looking at things. And then, of course, there's my talent. I think we ought to make use of our talents," said the young man largely.

"By all means," agreed Mr. Bowden. "Do you expect to do your work here or—?"

"I haven't quite decided. I may go to New York and take a studio." The young man rose suddenly. "Here's Bessie."

A slight figure, wrapped in a gray cape, with a touch of white fur at the collar, was coming down the stairs. A graceful, smiling figure, exquisite, having a virgin air—

A pain at Mr. Bowden's heart—

"Hello, Austin! Have you met father?"

"Yes," said Mr. Bowden quickly. "Mr. Trull has been telling me about his ambitions. . . . Very interesting, indeed! You must ask him to come to dinner, Bessie."

"Oh!" said Bessie.

"Some day soon," continued Mr. Bowden.

"Goodnight, Mr. Trull. Goodnight, Bessie. Don't feel that you have to hurry home." He was at the door now, holding it open behind them. "I'll trust you, Mr. Trull, to see that she gets home—not too late," he added, lightly.

"All right, sir!" came Trull's voice with a laugh in it, from the darkness of the front porch. "I'll see—"

The voice was cut short by an exclamation from Bessie. Another laugh—from both of them. Then they were down the walk and getting swallowed up by night. Trull's car contained them—a curious blending of shapes. The whirr of the starter, and the hum of the motor, catching the spark. A singing dash forward, another fainter singing dash—then a dwindling point of red light—

Mr. Bowden gently closed the door and went upstairs to bed.

He lay awake for hours, thinking. Annie stirred restlessly in the bed beside him. Once she moaned, as if in pain. He put out his hand and touched her face, stroking her cheek. . . . Poor Annie! She had been so brave about life. Brave about bringing her baby into the world. . . . And the other three, that hadn't lived. . . . Brave. But not—but not understanding. It was strange. He had always thought that mothers understood

C. There was one girl at Austin's party—he said she was a model—but to Bessie she seemed very much at home in his studio.

As he dried his face with the towel he thought: "It wasn't a success. She doesn't altogether trust me. I can get closer to her than her mother, perhaps. But not close enough. I have to drag things out of her. . . . If it came to a crisis—" (A voice within him charged mockingly, "It will! It will!")—"she wouldn't tell me. I must win her confidence somehow. I must if it kills me."

Wouldn't it be wonderful if we had money—? Money! The magic touchstone! The key to his daughter's heart. Money!

their children best. But Annie didn't understand Bessie. She had quite unconsciously let Bessie get away from her—from them.

He must get hold of his daughter somehow, in some new way.

Money would do it. If he had money—

Well, hadn't he? The five thousand that he had saved up, year after year, in spite of set-backs, in spite of doctor's bills and grocer's bills and all the other importunities of life in James Hill—

That five thousand had been a comfort to his mind these later years. But what was he saving it for? An emergency. Wasn't this an emergency?

Annie moved and woke.

"What time is it, Will?"

"Not late, I think. I haven't heard the clock strike since twelve."

"Bessie isn't home yet?"

"No. She probably won't be home for another hour. . . . But she—she's all right, Annie. You go to sleep."

IT WAS after two when Bessie got home. Mr. Bowden, lying awake listening, heard the front door downstairs close softly. He waited for her step on the stairs. It didn't come. Five minutes passed—ten minutes—it was all he could do to hold himself down. He felt helpless, ridiculous, lying there in his pajamas, under the bed-covers, waiting for Bessie to come upstairs—

Finally she came. He heard her go into her own room.

The grandfather's clock in the lower hall struck three. Mr. Bowden found himself saying, over and over again, with an absurd intensity, "Thank God, Thank God!"

He had it out with Annie the next morning at breakfast.

"But Will—!" said Annie.

"We'd been saving that for a rainy day. It's all we've got, and I—I'd been thinking that maybe, when Bessie was married, and had a home of her own, we might take it—some of it anyway—and go—somewhere. Maybe to Europe!"

"I know, I know," said Mr. Bowden gently. "I've suspected you." His smile was quite beautiful. Annie wept a little.

"Oh, Will! It's you—I don't care so much for myself. I could go on—but you've worked all your life, you've never had anything—any pleasure—"

"Yes, I have!" affirmed Mr. Bowden. "Yes, I have! Listen, Annie. We must look at things as they are. Trouble is, Bessie has grown away from us. We're practically strangers to her—oh, I know it's hard to face. But it's true. Bessie is——" he made a gesture—"groping. Groping for life. She's young, and like all young things she likes brightness and glitter. But Bessie has a mind of her own. The only way we can get around her is to get to her. That means a common ground—and since she won't come into our world, we've got to go into her's."

MRS. BOWDEN poured herself a cup of coffee with an unsteady hand.

"I'll do whatever you say, Will. You—you're cleverer than I am. You see into people's hearts."

"I don't know," said Mr. Bowden modestly. "I don't know—"

"Yes, you do. You—you think other people's thoughts. I guess," concluded Annie, with unusual penetration, "I guess that's why you aren't a rich man."

"I'm rich enough," said Mr. Bowden, smiling his characteristic, sentimental smile. "Rich enough!" he repeated with a certain unction.

To Bessie, the change came as a swift brightening of her whole horizon. That which had happened to many of her friends was now happening to her; was happening to her home—that home she had begun to despise. Had she been more [Continued on page 132]

Q. When Bessie returned from Paris, and appeared unexpectedly at Austin's New York studio, he was having a party—tea and cocktails. She was glad she hadn't brought her mother.

They Lie About Me in America

Trotsky
Tells
Bessie Beatty

I SOLEMNLY declare before the populace of the United States that I have paid all my debts unto the last kopek. Never have I been a street car conductor. Never have I dined on credit. I ate my dinner at home with my own family."

The flashing face of the man across the green-topped mahogany desk was almost magnificent in its expression of scorn. If humorous contempt could wither the tale-teller, one glance from his blue eyes, half hidden behind powerful glasses, would have wiped from the earth the entire race of gossips.

I told Trotsky of the restaurants that have basked in the light of his notoriety, the people who told how they knew him when he was collecting streetcar fares, the multitude here and there that supplied him with pocket money—to these is delivered hereby, his denial!

The tales about his advent, his stay, and his exit from America are legion, and picturesque even though lacking any ingredient of fact. He told me he was there only three months, and spent the time lecturing and writing for a Russian revolutionary newspaper. He lived with his family, his wife and two boys, in a small Bronx apartment.

"I never think of that apartment without thinking of the negro janitor who refused to rob me," said Trotsky, a puzzled look coming into his eyes.

WE PAID eighteen dollars for the first month's rent, brought our luggage and left. When we returned next day, the apartment house was locked. When we roused the landlord, he explained that the janitor had robbed him and run away. When we opened our boxes, we found a letter in an envelope and eighteen dollars tucked inside. The janitor wrote that he did not wish to take our money but only that of the landlord. I don't know why. To this day I can not understand it."

Going to Leon Trotsky's office is like crossing a frontier into another and a western country. The Commissariat of War occupies a huge cream-colored stucco building stretching across an entire block on the Znamenskaya. Outside the door of each numbered entrance stands a Red Guard. Inside, in the spotlessly clean hall is an alert young soldier with a slip of paper upon which are the names of expected visitors and the hour at which each is to come.

WHEN I walked in, the soldier glanced at me, spoke my name interrogatively, and led me up a broad staircase through a corridor and into a neat white-painted businesslike reception room. A slim young officer in uniform again spoke my name, asked me to sit down and disappeared. A moment later, he returned. Trotsky was ready. On each occasion, it was so. The Commissar of War saves other people's time as religiously as he saves his own. The endless waits in anterooms with ornate gold furniture and tattered brocades, normal approach to a Russian interview, are refreshingly absent.

The officer lead me through a room in which half a dozen soldier clerks were quietly working at uncluttered desks, into a long high-ceilinged council chamber where, at a huge felt-covered table, Tsarist generals of the old régime and young communists meet their chief to discuss campaigns and military needs. Here another officer, the personal secretary on duty, arose from his desk, bowed and motioned me to a door, at the farther end. I opened it and found myself in the big white-columned semi-circular room which is the cabinet of the Commissar of War.

Trotsky, in a severely smart uniform of military twill, without insignia, rose and walked out from behind his desk near the window, to shake hands.

The room was large, still, remote. Even the telephone buzzer spoke with a subdued voice. The regular beating of the clock, in a world where most clocks have long since stopped, emphasized the quiet.

On the desk was a tidy pile of papers and a set of bronze implements. Four white candles rose from old bronze candlesticks. At Trotsky's left was a series of telephones and behind

Ⓒ The MAN who Never Laughs

Ⓒ Trotsky had always been a vague figure in our minds. Then came two things to give us a vivid picture of the second most powerful leader in Russia. First, Balieff, Russia's foremost comedian, now in New York, told us, "I appeared before the Tsar and he laughed. I appeared before Trotsky and I never before worked so hard or tried to be so funny. But I could not make Trotsky laugh. He never laughs." Now we have Miss Beatty's interview and we understand why Leon Trotsky seldom laughs, for her story tells — more than anything you have read—of the trials and triumphs of the pacifist refugee who today heads the hardest fighting army in the world him were a filing cabinet and a revolving bookshelf. On the wall beyond was a huge war map. A holder filled with sharpened pencils was in the convenient place. Each inch of the room shone with polished order.

In America, there are thousands upon thousands of such offices, where every tool of the modern executive is sharpened and ready for use. In Russia, there is only one. Trotsky's is the only staircase I have seen that is not covered with cigarette stubs. His is the only telephone that yields immediate response at any hour of the day or night.

Trotsky picked up a small seal, and his fingers, intense, strong, nervous, played with it, then discarded it for a paper knife with a conveniently twisting handle. Looking at him as he talked, it seemed to me that even in Russia, where revolution has melted and twisted the human material into all sorts of new shapes, few men have changed so much.

In the days when he was dodging the gendarmes all over Russia, Trotsky had the force of a man with a faith. Added unto him now is that force which every American executive, with a row of push buttons under his fingertips, has felt—the power that power begets.

FOUR years and a half had passed since I first met Trotsky. It was on the night of his thirty-eighth birthday which the Bolsheviks unconsciously had chosen to make their revolution. I was at the Smolney Institute in Petrograd and the Soviet was meeting. The great white hall was full of soldiers and workers. The air was gray with tobacco smoke, tense with excitement. A murmur. Then the crowd at the door parted and Trotsky came into the hall.

His face was pale under its shock of dark hair sweeping off a high forehead. His shoulders had the narrow stooped look of a man who has bent much over books. In those days, he wore a black velvet jacket. This, and the small dark beard emphasized the pallor of his skin. His pale eyes blazed. To me that night he seemed the artist, almost the fanatic. I was introduced and he talked politely, mechanically, but his brain was whirling over things remote from our commonplace words.

At home, they still draw him in the cartoons with fire in his muzzle and lightning in his eyes. The fire and lightning are still there, but they have become the servants, not the masters, of his action. Trotsky has come under his own leash.

LAST autumn when I saw him again on the platform, I was disappointed. He seemed less eloquent, a little tired. Some of the sparkle of the man in the black velvet coat was gone. A sprinkling of gray had come into the dark hair and lightened it.

When he spoke, Trotsky spread out his facts in simple, straightforward, unadorned phrases, driving them home with an occasional cutting slash of a tense hand. I felt him master still of all the tricks of eloquence, but weary of using them. A man fed up with talking.

That impression was only a scrap of the picture.

The Trotsky on the other side of the neatest desk in all Russia, is a different man. What Trotsky, the revolutionary orator, has lost on the platform, Trotsky, the Commissar of War, conceded to be the ablest executive and best business man in Russia, has more than gained.

Trotsky's quickly lifting eyebrows are as expressive as a second tongue. He speaks German and French almost as glibly as Russian. He is uncomfortable in English. Using it is like taking off his glasses; it reduces him, so he avoids it. He has a rich voice with a wide range of inflection, and is master of the art of using it in private or on the platform.

I began by digging back into his past.

"It is for a whole year you would have me talk," he said smiling, when I asked about his boyhood.

At seventeen Trotsky met the revolutionary idea for the first time. He went from school in Odessa to Nikolaieff to college and joined a group of ardent young revolutionary students who advocated the overthrow of the Tsar. He was not a socialist, was an anti-Marxist in fact, interested in a social, not an economic, revolution. When he finished college, he tried to enter the University at Odessa to study higher mathematics. Again he met the injustice of discrimination. Because he was a Jew, he was debarred.

Trotsky waved those days aside. "Prison was my real training school," he said reflectively. "I was nineteen when I was first arrested for working in the South Russian Union. They kept me two years before they tried and exiled me. There was plenty of time to read. I read Antonio Ribollo's 'Materialist Conception of History' and Marx's 'Capital.' They made a Socialist of me between them."

Trotsky was two years in Siberia before he escaped and all that time wrote for the respectable or "legal" newspapers, under a name he had assumed. Eventually, he slipped across the Austrian border, and traveled through Europe, lecturing to Russian students in the various capitals.

He went to the congress in 1903 where Bolshevism had its birth in a split in the Social Democratic party, but he still remained a Menshevik. With the beginning of the revolution of 1905, he slipped back into Russia in disguise and made his way up through Kieff to Petrograd. He was a member of the first Petrograd Soviet, and afterward, when the president was arrested, Trotsky was made president.

THE failure of the revolution and the arrest of the entire Soviet followed. Trotsky found himself once more headed for exile. He never arrived at his destination. Trotsky's pale eyes still dance with delight when he talks of this episode. On the train that carried him into Siberia, he met a doctor who taught him how to simulate an obscure and very painful disease. He is a natural actor, so he had no difficulty in playing the part.

They put him in the village hospital at Beresovo. He stayed in bed for five days, then made his escape. He started for the Ural mines, eight hundred versts across the snowy steppes in a sleigh drawn by reindeer. The driver, Nikeno, was a fur trapper, an adventurous person ready to do anything lucrative and dangerous, and Trotsky paid well. At the mines, Trotsky passed himself off as an engineer of the Pola expedition on his way to Perm. His scheme carried him ultimately back into Finland and once more he landed in London.

The Balkan Wars found him on the front as war correspondent for a Russian newspaper. From that time on, the life of the Trotskys was that of a family of grasshoppers. When the World War broke, they were in Austria, with orders to leave in three hours.

In Zurich Trotsky found a brief breathing space and time to write a book. Going to France, he published a Russian revolutionary newspaper and wielded a disturbing pen until September, 1916, when France followed Austria's example and expelled him. He sought refuge in Spain where he was again imprisoned, then exiled. Forsaking Europe, he went to New York.

The sudden electrifying news of the fall of the Tsar put an end to Trotsky's American stay. He left immediately for Russia. The British authorities interrupted his journey at Halifax.

"My small boy would have prevented them, if he could," Trotsky remarked, smiling at the recollection of a tense pale face, a fist doubled under the nose of a guard and a child's voice demanding seriously:

"Shall I hit him, papa?"

It was not long before the exile was back again dominating the Petrograd Soviet in which he had been arrested a dozen years before.

But how has he managed to make a revolutionary pacifist into a military chief?

UNTIL the end of 1917," said he, "I never imagined I should occupy myself with military affairs. I had read books on military questions just as I had read books on astronomy and all sorts of other subjects, most of them while I was still in prison. In France during the Imperialist war, I began to take a greater interest.

"In all the domains of life, the same general methods are adapted to production. We speak of juridical logic, but that is only human logic adapted to juridical questions. In the domains of administration, a good administrator of a factory will in general be also a good military administrator. The general methods of administration are the same for everything. Human logic is the same applied in the military domain as in any other. Punctuality, firmness, are necessary in all fields where men want to construct, to create, to learn."

Where was the fiery phrase maker of that earlier day? This might be almost any American business man discussing system or organization. This new Trotsky went on deliberately:

"We have gained our technical knowledge by experience under the guns. Of mistakes and fronts we have had enough. Also we have had enough observation. From these we have learned. Our chiefs on many fronts were men without previous military training. To be a good artilleryman, it is necessary to have technical education, but to be a good army chief one need have only administrative and political qualities."

I asked Trotsky how he had managed

Q. "If he were not such an honest revolutionist, he would have been a second Napoleon," declared one of Trotsky's followers.

C. Trotsky, in rough military coat, and an officer's cap walked around the Red Square calling, "How do you do, Comrades of the Red Army?" And standing erect the soldiers shouted: "How do you do, Comrade Trotsky?"

to make a fighting army out of that rabble of weary, demoralized men, bent only upon flight and peace, which I had seen on the Russo-German front in 1917.

"Necessity," he answered. "Necessity and desire have done it. Our men knew they had to fight. If in five years we do not teach Russia to read and write, it will be sad, but not fatal. If we had failed to organize our army, we would be today only a colony of England or France.

"Our army in 1917 was not an army, but a contra-army, an army in complete decomposition, a much greater menace than no army at all."

I asked him to define the chief difference between his army and the other armies of the world.

"The Red Army is the one army that participates objectively in politics," he explained. "The rest of the world says armies must be kept out of politics. That is nonsense. It is a lie. The army, whatever one may say to the contrary, is always the servant of politics. In other countries, it serves the politics of the dominant class. In our country, it serves its own class. It is conscious that it serves itself and from this consciousness it derives all its other characteristics: unity between the chiefs, its deep democratism, its enormous thirst for general instruction and political knowledge, and its capacity to make sacrifice and endure privations."

"And how is the Red Army composed?" I asked.

"OUR ARMY is variegated," Trotsky replied. "Workers, peasants, officers from the old régime, and new wartime officers. Forty-three percent of our officers have received no special military education. They are workers and peasants whom the revolution has called from plow and factory and hardened and trained in battle. Twenty-two percent of our officers are a heritage of the old army. They have done us great service. They have taught us. We had need of them. At the same time, they have learned from us. Sixty-seven percent of all the officers are peasants, and twelve percent workers."

I first saw Trotsky, against this military background, in the Red Square in Moscow. The Square from the Voskresenya Gate to the base of the Saint Basil Cathedral was lined with soldiers. Graduating officers of the general staff academy, with fluttering crimson flags and bright new uniforms, sat astride their horses, ranged beside the revolutionary grave along the Kremlin wall.

Suddenly a ripple of movement on the outer edges of the crowd. Backs straightened, shoulders stretched, rifles came to attention. Trotsky had arrived. He wore a rough military coat over his uniform, and an officer's cap. He walked around the Square, calling to each group in turn: "Zdravstvuite tovarischi Krasnoarmeitz!" (How do you do, Comrades of the Red Army?) And they in return, standing erect, shouted: "Zdravstvuite, Tovarisch Trotsky?"

At this moment while I write, down here in Odessa, a hungry despairing city, a parade of Red soldiers goes by my window, crimson banners flying and bands playing. They are celebrating the fourth anniversary of the founding of the Red Army.

At Markstadt, in the German commune on the Volga, where the population was starving, I stopped one evening to listen to a group of soldiers singing in the street. They were practicing a new song, their bodies swaying back and forth to mark the time, in Russian fashion. The theme was "Long live Trotsky and the Red Army." I suppose there was not a full stomach in the lot, yet off there in that God- and man-forsaken spot, their loyalty still survived and found expression in song.

RECENTLY Trotsky has inaugurated a policy of decentralizing the army. He plans to bring the people and the soldiers together by creating local interest in the local regiments. It is in line with the general change in Russia. Moscow has given up trying to hold all of this vast territory in the palm of her hand. They have adopted, though they would not thank you for saying it, the boost-your-own-town spirit. Trotsky put it graphically:

"If you take a type-setter's case and mix up all the letters, the compositor will have a difficult job. Our problem is just the same. Russia is like that type-case. Everything is out of place, and from this mix-up we must make a new society. At the moment, we have given up the idea of straightening the mix-up from the center. We have divided the whole mix-up into sections. Some have been given to municipalities, some to coöperatives, some to private capital. Each group must bring its own section into order and into line with the rest.

"But," he continued, "it is not a change in policy, only a change in method. We have not abandoned state control. The state still owns the railroads and under no circumstances will anyone get control of them. We still own our mines and all the basic industries. We have not abandoned our idea."

"And your chances for success?" I queried speculatively.

Trotsky did not hesitate. "We know that unless a society produces as much or more than the society which it supplants, it is doomed to failure. But when society is passing from one system to another, that is the most poverty-stricken period. When slavery was passing into feudalism, production was at its lowest. It destroyed itself in the struggle. You saw that in your own Civil War. Even in the French Revolution, when capitalism succeeded feudalism, production was at a low ebb. We must produce—otherwise it is the end of humanity. I can only foretell that all our enemies will have the same destiny as our enemies of Brest-Litovsk. We shall outlive them all."

Outside of his work which absorbs him, there is little in Trotsky's days. The Kremlin has no social, and very little home life. Madam Trotsky who is his second wife, a Russian of the intelligenzia, is director of museums and keeps office hours like her husband. They have an apartment in an old building previously occupied by Tsarist officers. Kalenin, the peasant president, is their next-door neighbor, and Lunacharsky, the Commissar of Education, lives across the street. Trotsky had two daughters by his early marriage and by his present marriage two sons whose passion for football provides their father with exercise. Chess used to be a pastime with him, but lately he says it bores him.

Like Lenin, Trotsky is an assumed name. Prison, which helped to educate, also rechristened him. When [Continued on page 125]

Old HARDHEAD

By Damon Runyon & Bozeman Bulger

Illustrated by Frank Godwin

IN THE backwash of baseball, along that beach where sporting writers go prodding around with a stick, one finds the specimens that are rare and of historical value. Printed records, of necessity, concern themselves with the main stream only.

You may scan the officially compiled documents with a microscopic eye, but, we daresay, you will find not a fragment of information bearing on the career of the recruit who came up as a sure-fire hitter only to eat himself out of the league in exactly three months. That is a record one finds in beachcombing.

Very likely, not having waded in this backwash, you have little or no knowledge of the coming pitcher of the decade who blew himself out of the league by incessantly practicing on a cornet so as to show the boys something when he got back home.

Poke around in that rim of driftwood thrown aside by the ever-moving stream and your prod may disclose the pennant winning pitcher who was tried and dismissed on the strength of a detective's report that he drank forty-two glasses of beer, ate a bowl of pretzels and consumed fifteen raw onions in a single afternoon during the baseball season.

This report he vehemently labelled a lie.

"Gents," he explained in defense, "I ain't touched a onion in four months."

A further exploration, undoubtedly, would bring to light

Jabber McGarr, the only man in baseball who didn't lose an argument for two years because he had the loudest voice in the game; the man who boasted that he had never admitted being wrong in his life. This record is a source of more genuine pride than the layman can appreciate. Really it might have remained as a mark for the boys to shoot at forever had the final test depended upon voice culture in the rough. But—

It is our purpose to present the case of the Jabber in the hope of pointing out to the younger generation that a hardhead may be entered by means other than the force of argument, if one perseveres and is sufficiently resourceful.

As the first eye and ear witness, I have been delegated to narrate the sequence of events leading up to that fateful culmination of a warm afternoon in July at the home grounds of the Hawks, my collaborator checking me up as I go.

IN THE springtime as major league ball teams begin their migration southward, all is usually joy and goodfellowship. Anticipation of balmy breezes, of budding trees, of birds singing, of little darkies scrambling for a chance to carry the bats, of bad hotels and tricks to be played on the proprietor, tends to expand a young fellow's chest and warm him with a glow of bubbling spirit. He

Q The Jabber, purposely it seemed, got into an argument with the umpire. This time he was abusive and was put out of the game. "Ain't layin' down, is he?" asked a young recruit.

EUROPEANS THINK we Americans are crazy for getting excited over baseball. But even foreigners would become fans after reading this story of Jabber McGarr, the catcher with an ivory dome and a heart of gold cuts capers and skylarks on the train — southbound.

Starting from the East these special cars pick up different players at stops along the route to save the expense of mobilization at a general starting point.

We picked up Jabber McGarr at midnight in St. Louis and by noon he was fit.

The Hawks were noted as a news-producing team—a colorful unit—and I had been assigned to travel with them for the first time in my experience.

I got my opening flash of McGarr in action the next day at luncheon in the dining car. Knowing me to be an old-timer, Sam Dryden, of the Globe, and Charlie Crane of the Journal, had reserved a seat for me at their table. The other tables were occupied by ball players—veterans. The recruits were still standing in the vestibule awaiting their turn. The rule of seniority is very rigid in baseball, applying to upper and lower berths as well as preferred seating in the diner.

I had just got seated when there was a commotion at one of the tables, a burst of voices, at least two men talking at once. The more powerful and strident of these finally attained command, the words becoming distinguishable. Having won this point, the voice subsided.

"Say, George," the weaker voice said to the waiter, "what have you in the way of oysters or fish?"

The waiter's reply, if he made one, was drowned in an uplifted bellow that seemed to shake the cutlery.

"Where do you get that oysters OR fish stuff?" it demanded to know with exasperating irony.

"Well, he's off," Charlie Crane informed me. "Now this ought to be good."

"Shellfish, yes," we heard the reply to the challenge, "but not fish—plain fish. Oysters are shellfish. You can't get away from that."

"Can't get away from it?" the roar resumed. "That shows how much you know."

"Atta Boy, Jabber!" some player yelled from the other end of the car. "Go git 'im!"

My hastily-formed opinion, though I fully respected the Jabber's reputation as the league's crack argyfier, was that he would lose this one.

"Who is the fellow that's hooked up with the Jabber?" I asked.

"That's Dean De Forrest, a new pitcher," Dryden told me.

"Pretty good in an argument, at that—can take a lot of punishment before he hollers."

Recklessly I offered to bet the luncheon tip that De Forrest would not lose.

"Couldn't take your money," Dryden said. "You are betting against a sure thing. Up to the present, Jabber McGarr has never conceded the loss of an argument. He's got the loudest voice in baseball and simply wears 'em down."

"I'M TELLING you," we heard De Forrest again, "that oysters don't belong to the fish family because they have to wear shells to protect themselves. They are crustaceans."

"Now, listen," demanded the Jabber, irritated at this persistent opposition. "You can't tell me. I'm a hardheaded fellow. My dad was hardheaded before me and I've been hardheaded about things all my life. I have to be because I'm always right. No McGarr ever made cracks when he didn't know what he was talking about."

"That's his favorite line," Crane whispered to me. "He's warmed up now."

"You may get away with that stuff on these timid bushers," De Forrest came back at McGarr, "but your head isn't hard enough to show me that an oyster is a fish."

"One of these smart guys, eh?" yelled the Jabber. "Don't know nothin' and won't learn nothin'. I'm tellin' you oysters IS fish, and I'm going to prove it. . . . Hey, George," he called to the waiter, "bring me a good big oyster and a sharp knife."

Though highly interesting to me, this seemed to be old stuff to the players.

"You don't need any oyster or knife," said De Forrest, still belligerent. "All you've got to do is look in the dictionary."

"To hell with them dictionaries. They're just like you—just repeat what they've heard."

The waiter came with a large raw oyster on a halfshell, and a sharp steel knife.

Jabber McGarr, handling the knife deftly, slit the side of the oyster and lifted up what he called the first layer of flesh, laying it back, and exposing the inner workings.

"There! Do you see that? Take a good look now."

My curiosity forced me to go over and see what had happened. I really learned something. Under this inner layer of oyster skin, as he called it, the Jabber had exposed a perfectly clear outline of what was undoubtedly—or had been in past ages—a framework of spine and bones, like those of a herring. This was now a shadowy part of the soft flesh, but plainly indicated.

"Where'd he learn that?" I asked Crane and Dryden.

"He was an oyster opener in Baltimore. Any of them will show you that. Jabber has pulled it lots of times. His favorite sport is to catch some unwary person in an oyster argument. That demonstration knocks 'em dead."

De Forrest silently contemplated the dismembered oyster, thinking hard. Everybody waited for him to admit defeat.

"That only proves that I am right!" he finally declared, to the amazement of the Jabber, who had never been carried this far before. "That only proves that an oyster used to be a fish—ergo, he is not a fish now."

"Where do you get that ergo stuff? If he ain't a fish," belated Jabber, "how 'bout them ribs and that spine?"

De Forrest launched into a learned dissertation.

"You're off your nut, too ignorant," snapped McGarr. "Spine and bones make a fish, I'm telling you."

"If you grew long hair that wouldn't make you a woman, would it?" De Forrest demanded.

"No. And he wouldn't go so good on this club, either," some one cracked from the other side of the car.

That got a loud laugh. The Jabber's voice rose to a fighting pitch. No more could we hear De Forrest. They were still at it when we left our table to give the youngsters a chance at lunch.

As I say, that was my introduction to Jabber McGarr, the heavy-set, square-jawed catcher of the Hawks. I did not know it then, but that was also the first real introduction of De Forrest to the gang. To the players it was a historic moment. Nobody had ever carried the Jabber so far. A real challenger had arisen. Secretly, his arrival was a joy to the team.

For two years Jabber McGarr had ruled the roost of the Hawks, with a voice of rusty iron. On the diamond, being at close range, he was a constant irritant to umpires. In his whole career he had never admitted that a called strike was even within a foot of the plate. He had never hit a foul drive that wasn't fair by a foot. On the bench he was ever in argument with manager and players as to how certain plays should be made. Always, though, he was smart enough to be argumentative only, not abusive.

As I came to know the players better I found that McGarr was never popular. The players tolerated him—almost admired him—because he had the goods.

"When a guy like that Jabber can pole the ol' pill around 300 and can hand the ball down to second with the ease of a fellow passing the gravy, what are you going to do?" is the way Mike Donovan, the manager, put it.

Things had gone on this way for two years. Then came De Forrest, this tall, lean, blond giant of a pitcher and bumped into McGarr.

THOUGH De Forrest had picked up the lingo of the professional ball player he was a collegian—"a collegier" in baseball parlance. As indicated in the oyster controversy, Dean was by way of being some argyfier himself. The Hawks didn't know it but, in addition to being the best pitcher in the collegiate world in his time, De Forrest was the boss debater of the Rah-Rah sphere, a natural born demagogue. We used to amuse ourselves by trying to imagine what a whale of a speech he could have made in favor of free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

Leaving the dining car, that first day, we writing folks went into the smoker. A few minutes later we were amazed to see De Forrest and the Jabber enter and sit down together, in friendly conversation.

Instead of his usual bellicose, unpleasant attitude, Jabber acted as if he had found his affinity. Yes, if there could be such a thing, they were antagonistic affinities.

"Greatest thing ever happened to the club," Mike Donovan chuckled as he joined our group. "Now, Sam," he said to old Dryden, "I'll get square for all the arguments I've had to listen to in the last two years."

We understood this cryptic remark upon arrival at the camp. With diabolical cunning, Donovan had instructed the secretary to room this pair together.

"They can wear each other out and give the club a rest," he said, all pepped up with his idea. "That De Forrest is worth his pay even if his curve ball wouldn't dent a plate of butter. I don't care whether he makes good or not as long as he's got debating endurance and won't give up."

But De Forrest did make good. In acquiring a finished argyfier, the Hawks also had landed a whale of a pitcher.

The Jabber and De Forrest were inseparable companions but they argued from morning until night. Towards the end of the first week Dean's voice had worn down to a bare squeak, but he didn't weaken in spirit.

ONE NIGHT Dryden and I passed the open door of their room, now known to the players as The Forum, and saw De Forrest stretched out on the bed trying to conserve enough vocal strength to reply when the Jabber got through explaining how the pitcher should always give the signal for a certain throw to second base, to catch a runner napping.

"How's it going, Jabber?" asked the elderly Dryden.

"He ain't won a point in a week," said McGarr, "and, what's more, he ain't likely to."

De Forrest made no audible comment, but the fire of combat flashed in his eye. He was no quitter.

"The Jabber is all right," he said in a hoarse whisper. "but he's too ignorant to understand his lack of brains. He may be game, at that."

"What do you mean—game?" blurted McGarr. "Anybody ever say I wasn't?"

"To admit the corn when I show you up, I mean."

"There ain't a chance. You ain't got the bean. It takes something stronger than that argument of yours to get through my head."

"All right," whispered De Forrest, a peculiar light as of sudden inspiration in his eyes. "Just wait. It may happen. Miracle, you know."

Before the regular championship season had gone half way the battery of De Forrest and McGarr had become famous—to umpires, infamous, and annoying to fans.

The argyfier pair could win ball games for the Hawks, all right, but the crowd always got ready for a long session. With the appearance of the first batter they began to consult and disagree. If McGarr signalled for a certain curve or fast ball, De Forrest was sure to shake his head and insist on something else. Jabber would walk out to the box and with earnest gesticulations they would argue the point until the umpire got sore. To keep the game going, they would finally agree, but never without mental reservations and regret.

Despite their constant wrangling and nerve-wracking delays, the battery of De Forrest and McGarr was the ace in the hole any time the Hawks got in serious trouble.

"Mike," the Jabber remarked to Manager Donovan in a close game

De Forrest started his big windup and putting all he had in the throw, cut loose with the ball.

1. Donovan and the club doctor were working over the Jabber. "You win," he told De Forrest. "I'll say he didn't hit a high fast one."

with the Grays one day, "that DeForrest is a hell of a pitcher—if he wouldn't argue so much."

"Listen, Jabber," retorted Dean, overhearing the remark. "I'm pitching this game and when I want to use my fast ball, I'm going to do it. You get back there and do the catching. Keep your mouth shut and we'll win this pennant. Remember, I'm the deceiver and you're the receiver."

JUST the same when they went back to the diamond, De Forrest had to give in to every signal started by the Jabber—to stop argument. Otherwise the umpire had threatened to penalize him for delay by calling balls, a rule that is rarely invoked. The Hawks won the game, however.

"Just what I was telling you, Mike," McGarr announced in the clubhouse, "I knew this guy was a star. All he's got to do is listen to me."

"That's what everybody has got to do if he stays around this club—listen to you," De Forrest retorted. "You must be a little deaf or you'd go nuts listening to yourself."

"Oh, for the love of Pete!" pleaded Donovan. "Don't you fellows never know when you've got enough?"

"De Forrest don't," declared the Jabber.

"I've got enough of you—and that goes! If I hadn't made you let me pitch a fast ball to Reilly when you wanted a curve in the last inning, that old game might've been going yet."

"If you'd pitched a curve he'd've struck out instead of popping up to the infield. Got enough of me, eh? It ain't no cinch that you don't cross me some day, at that."

This last was uttered vindictively, causing old case-hardened players to look up in surprise. For a pitcher to cross a catcher by pitching something else after the signal has been given and agreed upon is an indefensible act, a gross violation of all baseball ethics. It is a form of treason.

For a moment De Forrest, apparently, was concentrated on unrolling the top of his stockings so as to get off his uniform breeches. The shot had hurt.

"Say," he remarked quietly, "if there wasn't so many reporters around I'd bust you in the nose."

McGarr probably realized that he had gone too far, but never in his whole life had it occurred to him to apologize for anything he had said. Instead he retorted with great spirit:

"It's a cinch you'd lose that one. If it wasn't for my hard head and strong mind, the club would toss this pennant in a week. Bust me in the nose, eh?"

De Forrest's throat was in bad shape—all from arguing. He had a violent fit of coughing and could not reply.

"That's tough," observed Donovan, sympathetically, "but, anyway, it's stopped another argument."

The tall, scholarly looking pitcher left the clubhouse alone. Not a word did he utter. The sting in Jabber's wicked remark had gone deep enough to dig up an idea—a possibility. He remembered that one poison was often used to counteract or eliminate another poison. Jabber had to be cured. According to that gentleman's own words, though, it would have to be something stronger than the force of argument. As he walked away De Forrest was trying to recall some of the stern and heroic actions taken by Napoleon in crises like this. He wanted something to justify an idea that had begun to haunt him.

Jabber McGarr, accustomed to accompanying his argumentative affinity home, looked at the retreating figure curiously. For fear that some one might think him sorry, he turned, in an effort to start an argument with the other players, but he could get no rise out of them.

"That's funny, somehow," Mike Donovan remarked to a group of us waiting at the exit gate. "De Forrest gave up that argument without a struggle and went home—alone. That boy's got something on his mind."

Donovan was perturbed over the incident because the Hawks were looking forward a little anxiously to the coming series with the Grays. On the result of this series would largely depend the pennant. It was still three weeks away, but Mike wanted everything to be running smoothly.

The next afternoon De Forrest did not show up at the grounds. That was unusual for him, but nothing much was thought of it. A pitcher always is allowed a day off without having to dress in uniform after working in a hard game. The only surprise was that Dean had not shown up simply for the sake of argument.

De Forrest and the Jabber roomed together in a little family hotel, a sort of headquarters for unmarried members of the Hawks while playing at home. Manager Donovan also lived there. We used to drop in there occasionally at night to pick up some stray bits of news, some little human interest sidelights on the game or the state of the chronic debate.

SAM DRYDEN and I, this night, had been fanning with Donovan until rather late, in the lobby. He had just gone up-stairs and we were about to leave. Glancing towards the stairs we saw the Jabber coming down. Instinctively we glanced at the clock. It was midnight.

Without looking our way, McGarr went directly to the telephone at the clerk's desk. He was calling up a doctor.

There was a preliminary argument with the central operator,

C, "Most stubborn guy in the world," The Jabber informed the doctor. "If I'd told him he ought to stay, he'd 've jumped out that bed and run to the hospital."

of course, but eventually he got the doctor on the wire. He was arguing with him to come at once, the Jabber explaining that he would wait for him in the lobby.

"What's the trouble, McGarr?" we asked, moving over towards the desk as McGarr left the phone.

"Where'd you folks come from?" He seemed surprised. "There ain't no trouble—just want to show that guy I'm right."

"What guy—De Forrest?"

"Who else could it be?"

"Isn't he well?"

"Says he is, but that's the argument. I've just bet that guy that he's got pneumonia. I'm going to prove it."

"That's pretty serious," suggested Dryden, genuinely alarmed. "Does Mike Donovan know about this?"

"No, he don't, and we don't want him buttin' in, either. It's our argument, and we'll settle it. If Dean ain't got pneumonia, I've agreed that he could go ahead and bust me in the nose. Funny fellow—that De Forrest. Would be a great guy if he wasn't so stubborn. Talks too much—and he's never right."

"Mind if we go up and see him?"

"Why not? Go on up. You might tell him something. I'll wait here till the doctor comes."

We found the big pitcher lying in bed, barely able to speak from hoarseness. Plainly to us he was in high fever.

"My throat—strained a little," he half-whispered. "Trying to put the Jabber right. Got to bust him in the nose—wait."

"You fellows had another falling out?"

The big fellow shook his head and asked for a glass of water.

"It ain't that," he whispered. "Can't fall out with a jackass—too ignorant to understand. Says I got to hit him with something stronger than argument—pole-ax, maybe . . . Will, too. . . . Think he's game, though. Wait, see."

THE doctor came at one o'clock. After a brief examination, he told us that De Forrest was suffering from bronchial pneumonia, had a high fever.

"Now, I reckon that's learned you something," Jabber said to the sick man.

"Didn't learn it from you," he replied in broken whispers.

"All . . . means is you don't get busted . . . in nose . . . not yet . . . but wait."

"Just a moment," announced the doctor, "you gentlemen stop this discussion. Mr. De Forrest mustn't be allowed to talk at all and he must be looked after very carefully. He should be sent to a hospital where he can receive proper care."

WHAT do you mean—hospital, Doc?" spoke the Jabber in true form. "If this bird goes to the hospital there'll be a lot of talk about it. Besides hospital is no place for him. I know."

"No?" said the doctor, taken aback.

"He may think so, but he's wrong. So are you," insisted Jabber in his best form.

"Of course," admitted the doctor, half amused, half angry, "it would be all right for him to stay here if he had a good trained nurse. He must be looked after constantly for the next thirty-six hours. I'll have an expert nurse called."

"Where do you get that trained nurse stuff, Doc? You're dead wrong. Wait a minute." The Jabber turned to the bed.

"Say, you big boob," he addressed the sick man, "in my judgment you ought to go to the hospital. Right, ain't I?"

"Nothing doing," whispered De Forrest, the fire of argument in his eye. "You never had—" he coughed—"any judgment of your own. . . . All wrong."

"Didn't I tell you, Doc?" said the Jabber, coming back. "If I had told him he ought to stay, he'd 've jumped out of that bed and run to the hospital. Come out in the hall a minute."

He explained that they mustn't talk in front of De Forrest or it would bring on an argument.

"Most stubborn guy in the world."

Dryden and I waited at the head of the stairs for the doctor.

"I guess they'll work it out, all right," he told us. "I'll call again early tomorrow, but I think you had better notify the manager. Don't let that fellow—what do you call him, the Jabber?—know that I told you, though. He is certainly queer."

I was working on the night desk at my office and had to go back and clean up. It was four o'clock in the morning when I stopped by the hotel on my way home. At the desk I left a note for Mike Donovan, carrying out the doctor's instruction. Then I went up the stairs to the room of the Debating Society. For some time I waited outside the door, listening. I couldn't hear a sound. Curiosity got the better of me.

As silently as possible I shoved open the door, which was unlocked. There sat the Jabber, still dressed, busily applying hot and cold packs to De Forrest's throat and chest. On a little table he had arranged the medicines and a sheet of paper on which the doctor had written his instructions. He did not see me. Occasionally the Jabber would reach over and stroke the big pitcher's hair. Evidently De Forrest was sleeping. Then I noticed the Jabber take out his watch and hold the sick man's wrist. He took his pulse and wrote it down on the little pad left by the doctor.

Silently, I slid out and closed the door.

After seeing the doctor next morning, Mike Donovan told the players that De Forrest was laid up with a slight cold.

"The boy is in pretty bad shape," Mike informed us confidentially just before the game, "but the Doc says to keep quiet about it and the treatment he is receiving will pull him through."

"The Jabber, you mean?"

"Sure. The Doc says he is a wonder. Can you beat that? The Jabber even told the Doc that without De Forrest being well and in shape to play against the Grays two weeks from now, the Hawks wouldn't have a chance. I guess we won't see much of the Jabber for a week, but don't tip it off in the papers if you can get out of it. I have a hunch that something's going to come of this."

At that very moment, as a contradiction to our thoughts, we saw the Jabber coming across the field in uniform. I knew that he hadn't had a wink of sleep. But no sooner had he reached the bench than he launched into an argument.

"How's your mate?" some one asked.

"Oh, that guy? Just lost his voice, that's all. I told him to stay in. I don't want to take advantage of no guy who can't talk back," he declared magnanimously it seemed to us.

"Feel like catching?" asked Donovan.

"Don't I always feel like catching—where do you get that stuff? 'Course I feel like it."

The Jabber started in and, purposely, it seemed, had lit into an argument with the umpire in two minutes. This time he was abusive and was put out of the game. Right away, he donned his street clothes and went back to the hotel.

"Ain't layin' down, is he?" a young recruit asked of the bench. "Looks to me like he got himself put out of that game."

"Shut up," ordered Donovan.

Mike was not deceived in the least, though. To help the thing along, he sent word up to the Jabber that, on the umpire's report, he had been suspended for three days. That was untrue, but it worked and kept the Jabber away from the park.

IN FOUR days De Forrest was up and about. They had kept the pneumonia from reaching his lungs. In another week, he was able to take his turn in the box. Not one word of sympathy had he ever received from McGarr.

The Jabber had lost eight or ten pounds and for several days the players had noted his unusual irritability. He continued to impress upon them that he was a hardheaded, tough guy, and Donovan let him have his way.

A group of us had gathered at the clubhouse on the day of De Forrest's return for duty. We were fully apprised of his presence before we saw him. He and the Jabber were coming up the steps together, and we heard them.

"If I didn't know more than you," we heard the bellowing voice of the Jabber, "I'd get sick and stay sick. You'd think a few days' rest would learn a fellow something. Where do you get that stuff—a low curve inside? I'm telling you—" etc.

YES, they had returned. The Hawks were ready for the big series with the Grays—crucial series, we called it in the papers.

The Hawks won the first game of the big series and were riding easy towards the pennant.

Mike Donovan had taken a chance on using his second best pitcher for the opener, saving De Forrest for his ace in the hole. Having won the first one, he now decided to use a left-hander in the second. This would enable De Forrest to be well rested up and ready for the third—the big game.

Slim Curley, the southpaw got away to a good start but the moment the Grays began to touch him up he lost control. Still, the Hawks had a three-run lead. Feeling that this ought to be enough to pull Curley through, Donovan hesitated about taking him out. As a matter of fact, he hesitated too long.

In the fifth inning Curley went all to pieces. With a clean single and a couple of bases on balls, the Grays got the bases full with none out.

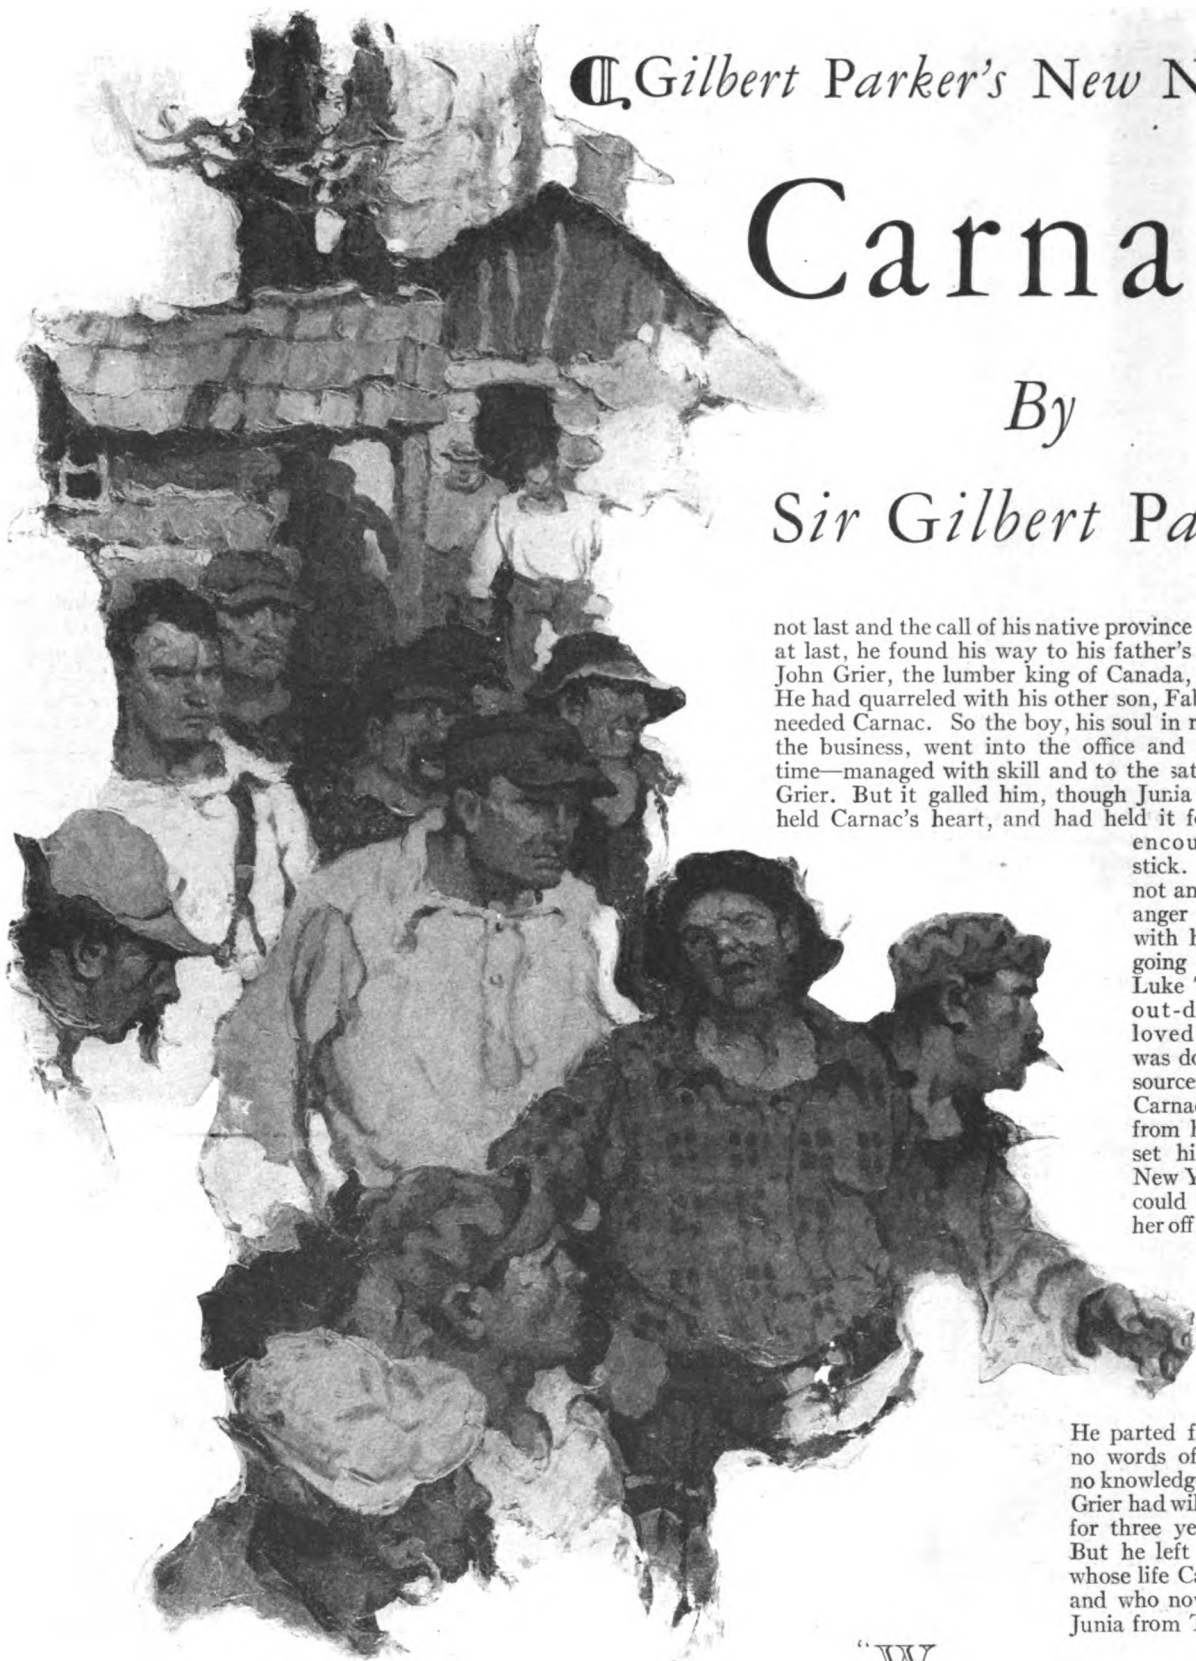

It looked like curtains for the Hawks unless something was done at once.

Calling for time, Mike Donovan signalled for De Forrest to come in from the bullpen where he had been warming up.

The moment De Forrest walked into the box the Jabber, dropping his mask, walked out to him for a conference—one of those things. They gesticulated wildly. Whatever it was they continued to argue until the umpire [Continued on page 111]

"That proves an oyster used to be a fish," said De Forrest; "ergo, he is not a fish now." "Where do you get that ergo stuff? How about them ribs and that spine?" bellowed Jabber.

Ⓒ Gilbert Parker's New Novel of

Carnac's

By

Sir Gilbert Parker

not last and the call of his native province came to him; so at last, he found his way to his father's home and Old John Grier, the lumber king of Canada, welcomed him. He had quarreled with his other son, Fabian, and sorely needed Carnac. So the boy, his soul in rebellion against the business, went into the office and managed for a time—managed with skill and to the satisfaction of Old Grier. But it galled him, though Junia Shale, she who held Carnac's heart, and had held it for many years, encouraged him to stick. Still he could not and there was red anger when he parted with his father. His going made room for Luke Tarboe, the big out-door man who loved business and was dominant and resourceful. Came to Carnac then a letter from his wife, and he set his face towards New York to try what could be done to buy her off, to get a divorce.

He parted from Junia with no words of love and with no knowledge that Old John Grier had willed his business, for three years, to Tarboe. But he left behind Denzil, whose life Carnac had saved and who now was shielding Junia from Tarboe.

"WELL, what's happened since I've been gone, mother?" asked Carnac.

It was springtime, eight months after Carnac had vanished from Montreal, and the sun of May was melting the snow upon the hills, bringing out the smell of the sprouting verdure and the exultant song of the birds.

"Junia's been away since last fall. Her aunt in the West was taken ill, and she's been with her ever since. Tell me, dearest, is everything all right now? Are you free to do what you want?" Carnac shook his head morosely. "No, everything's all wrong. I blundered, and I'm paying the price."

"You didn't find Luzanne Larue?"

"Yes, I found her, but it was no good. I said I intended to divorce her, and she replied that I'd married her with my eyes open, and had signed our names in the hotel register as Mr. and

Ⓒ A brief introduction to the people of the story and of the events leading up to this instalment:

CARNAC GRIER, tricked into a marriage with his model, Luzanne Larue, set his face flatly against the girl. There was hot passion in his heart and a strong determination to escape, to win back his personal freedom. "It is no use," his lawyer told him; "you are married fast enough." But he recognized no obligation to his wife and he went away, taking his paints and his canvas to Paris where for months he lost himself in his art. It could

Another Wild Youth

Folly

Illustrated

by

Walt Louderback

Mrs. Carnac Grier and that divorce would not be possible. Moreover, because I'd let things go so long, she said no jury would give me relief in the circumstances. I consulted a lawyer. He said she had the game in her hands, and that a case would be put up that would discredit me with jury or judge, so there it is. Bad as she is, she's fond of me in her way. She wanted me, and she meant to have me one way or another."

His mother protested. "No pure, straight, honest girl would take that position, surely."

Carnac laughed bitterly. "Don't talk that way, mother. The girl was brought up among exiles and political criminals in Montmartre. What is possible in one place is impossible in another. Devil as she is, I want to do her justice."

"Did she wear a wedding ring?"

"No, but she used my name as her own: I saw it on the door-plate. She said she would wait a while longer, but if at the end of six months, I didn't do my duty, she'd see the thing through here among my own people."

"Six months—it's overdue now!" she said in agitation.

He nodded helplessly. "I'm in hell as things are. There's only this to be said:

C. Tarboe longed for the backwoods life, for the river-men round the fire at night; he could even now smell the soup from the cook's caboose, and hungered to be once more where men were free and strong and ferocious.

she's done naught yet, and we can hope she mayn't do aught!" They were roused by the click of the gate. "That's your father—that's John Grier," she said.

They heard the front door open and shut, a footstep in the hall, then John Grier came into the room.

Preoccupation, abstraction, filled his face, as he came forward. When he saw Carnac, he stopped, his face flushed. For an instant he stood unmoving, and then he held out his hand.

"So you've come back, Carnac. When did you get here?"

As Carnac released his hand from John Grier's cold clasp, he answered simply, not uncordially: "A couple of hours ago."

The old man scrutinized him sharply, carefully. "Getting on—making money?" he asked. "Got your hand in the pocket of the world?"

Carnac shook his head. "I don't care much about the pocket of the world, but they like my work in London and New York. I don't get Royal Academy prices, but I do pretty well."

"Got some pride, eh?"

"I'm always proud when anybody outside Montreal mentions your name," the boy said. "It makes me feel I have a place in the world and can find real work to do that may be worth doing."

"Guess you've made your own place," said the other, a pleased look coming to his cheek. "You've got your own shovel and pick to make wealth."

"I care little about wealth. All I want is enough to clothe and feed me, and give me a little home."

The old man's eyes narrowed until there could be seen only a slit of fire between the lids, and a bitter smile came to his lips.

"Tarboe's taken your place in the business, Carnac. Look out he doesn't take your little home, too."

DURING Carnac's long absence in New York, Denzil had lain like a wild animal, watching, as it were, the doorway out of which Tarboe came and went. His gloom, at last, became a stark fanaticism. During all the eight months of Carnac's absence, he prowled in the precincts of memory.

While Junia was still at home, he had been watchfully determined to save her from Tarboe. He had an obsession of wrong-mindedness which is always attached to crime. Though Luke Tarboe had done him no wrong, and was entitled, if he could, to win Junia for himself, to the mind of Denzil the stain of his brother's past was on Tarboe's life. He saw Tarboe and Junia meet; he knew that Tarboe put himself in Junia's way, and he was right in thinking that the girl, with a mind for comedy and coquetry, was drawn instinctively to the scene of danger.

Undoubtedly, the massive presence of Tarboe, his animal-like, bull-headed persistency, the fun at his big mouth, and the light in his bold eye had a kind of charm for her. It was as though she placed herself within the danger-zone to try her strength, her will; and she had done it without any real loss. More than once, as she waited in the office for old John Grier to come, she had a strange, intuitive feeling that Tarboe might suddenly grip her in his arms.

She flushed at the thought of it. Yet that very thought had passed through the mind of the man. He was by nature a hunter; he was bold, self-willed and reckless. No woman had ever moved him in his life until this girl came across his path, and he reached out towards her with the same will to control that he had used in the business of life. Yet, while this brute force suggested the physical control of the girl, it had its immediate reaction. She was so fine, so delicate, and yet so full of summer and the free unfettered life of the New World, that he felt he must atone for the wild moment's passion—the passion of possession, which had made him long to crush her to his breast, to hold her for his own.

As he looked at her sitting in his office, her perfect health, her slim girlishness, her exquisite lines and graceful turn of hand, arm and body, or the flower-like twist of the neck, were the very harmony and poetry of life. But she was terribly provoking, too; and he realized that she was an unconscious coquette, that her soul loved mastery as his did.

Denzil could not know this, however. It was impossible for him to analyze the natures of these two people. He had instinct, but not enough to judge the whole situation. Denzil did not know that in John Grier's office, as Junia had gone over figures of a charitable organization in which she was interested, the big hand of Tarboe had suddenly closed upon her fingers, and that his head bent down beside hers for one swift instant, as though he would whisper to her. Then she quickly detached herself, yet smiled at him, as she said reprovingly.

"You oughtn't to do that. You'll spoil our friendship."

She did not wait longer. As he stretched out his hands to her, his face had gone pale; she vanished through the doorway, and in forty-eight hours was started for the West to visit her sick aunt. The autumn had come and the winter and the spring, and the spring was almost gone when she returned; and with her return, Catastrophe lifted its head in the person of Denzil.

Perhaps it was an imperative instinct that brought Junia back in an hour coincident with Carnac's return—perhaps. In any case, there it was. They had both returned, as it were, in the self-same hour, each having been through a phase of emotion not easy to set down on paper.

Denzil told her of Carnac's return, and then she went to the house where Carnac's mother lived. In her absence, Tarboe called. Entering the garden, he saw Denzil at work. At the click of the gate Denzil turned. When he saw who it was, he came forward.

"She ain't home," he said bluntly. "She's out. She ain't here. She's up at Mr. Grier's house, bien sur."

To Tarboe, Denzil's words were offensive. He was aware of the position held by Denzil in the Shale household; and that long years of service had given him assurance of authority. All this, however, could not account for the insolence of Denzil's words, but Tarboe had controlled men far too long to act rashly.

"When will Mademoiselle be back?" he asked.

"Tonight," answered Denzil.

"Don't be a damn' fool. Tell me the hour when you think she will be at home. Before dinner—within the next sixty minutes, or just when?"

"Ma'm'selle is under no orders. She didn't say when she would be back—but no."

"Do you think she'll be back for dinner?" asked Tarboe, smothering his anger, but set to get his own way.

"I think she'll be back for dinner—bien sur!" and he drove the spade into the ground. He then leaned over the handle, looking up querulously.

"Then I think I'll sit down and wait." Tarboe made for the veranda, determined to remain.

Denzil let him go on, and then presently trotted after and called to him. "I'd like a word with you—in my house, not here." Denzil's face was pale, but there was a fiery look in his eyes. "In my little house by the Three Trees, I've got things I'd like to show you, and there's some things I'd like to say."

Inside the little, undecorated house, Tarboe looked round. It was all quiet and still enough. It was like a lodge in the wilderness. Somehow, the atmosphere of it made him feel apart and lonely.

Presently Denzil faced him, having closed the door.

"Sit down, please, and I'll tell you my story."

Seating himself with a little curt laugh, Tarboe waved a hand as though to say, "Go ahead. I'm ready."

It seemed difficult for Denzil to begin. He walked up and down the room for a little while muttering and shaking his head. Presently, he began to tell the story he had told Carnac.

His description of his dead fiancée had flashes of poetry and excruciating touches of life:

"She had no mother, and there are lots of things she didn't know because of that—ah, plenty! She brought on her own tragedy by not knowing that men, even when good to look at, can't be trusted; that every place, even in the woods and the fields where everyone seems safe to us outdoor people, ain't safe—but no. So she trusted, and then one day——"

FOR THE next five minutes, the words poured from him in moroseness. He drew a picture of the lonely wood, of the believing, credulous girl and the masterful, intellectual, skilful man. In the midst of it, Tarboe started. The description of the place and of the man was familiar. He had a vision of a fair young girl encompassed by danger; he saw her in the man's arms; the man's lips to hers, and——

"Good God—good God!" he said twice, for a glimmer of the truth struck him. He knew what his brother had done. He could conceive the revenge to his brother's amorous hand. He listened till the whole tale was told; till the death of the girl in the pond at home—— Then the rest of the story shook him.

"The verdict of the coroner's court was that he was shot by his own hand—by accident," said Denzil. "That was the coroner's verdict—but yes! Well, he was shot by his own gun, but not by his own hand. There was someone that loved the girl took toll. The world did not know, and does not know, but you know—you—you, the brother of him that spoiled a woman's life! Do you think such a man should live? She was the sweetest girl that ever lived, and she loved me! She told me the truth—and he died by his own gun—in the woods; but it wasn't accident—but no! The girl had gone, but behind her was someone that loved her, and he settled it once for all."

As he had told the story, Denzil's body seemed to contract; his face took on an insane look. It was ghastly pale, but his eyes were aflame. His long arms stretched out with a grim realism as he told of the death of Almeric Tarboe.

"You've got the whole truth, m'sieu'. I've told it you at last. I've never been sorry for killing him, never, never, never. Now, what are you going to do about it—you—his brother—you that come here making love too?"

As the truth had dawned upon Tarboe, his great figure stretched itself up in hatred. A black spirit of hate and murder took possession of him.

When Denzil had finished, Tarboe stood up. There was dementia, cruelty, black purpose in his eyes, in every movement.

"What am I going to do? You killed my brother! Well, I'm going to kill you. God blast your soul—I'm going to kill you——"

He suddenly swooped like an animal upon Denzil, his fingers clenched about the thick throat, insane, killing rage held him.

T Tarboe suddenly swooped like an animal upon Denzil; his fingers clenched upon the thick throat, insane rage was on him. "You killed my brother—I'll kill you," he cried.

At that moment, there was a knock at the door, it opened, and Carnac stepped inside. He realized the situation at a single glance and rushed forward.

"Let him go," he cried. "You devil—let him go." Then with all his might, he struck Tarboe in the face.

The blow brought understanding back to Tarboe. His fingers loosed from the Frenchman's throat, and Carnac caught Denzil as he fell backwards.

"Good God!" said Carnac. "Good God, Tarboe! Wasn't it enough for your brother to have taken this man's love without your trying to take his life?"

The blow Carnac struck brought conviction to Tarboe, whose terrible rage passed away. He wiped the blood from his face.

"Is the little devil all right?" he whispered.

It was Denzil who spoke: "Yes. This is the second time M'sieu' Carnac has saved my life."

Carnac intervened. "Tell me, Tarboe, what do you mean to do, now you know the truth?"

Tarboe thrust out a hand. "I don't know the truth," he said simply and with all the force of a promise.

By this Carnac knew that Denzil was safe from the law.

TARBOE did not see Junia that evening, nor for many evenings, but Carnac and Junia met the next day in her own house. He came on her as she was arranging the table for mid-day dinner. She had taken up again the threads of housekeeping, cheering her father, helping the old French woman cook—a huge creature who moved like a small mountain, whose life had been a struggle for existence, yet whose one daughter had married a rich lumberman, and whose other daughter could marry wealth, handsomeness, and youth if she chose.

When Carnac saw Junia, she was entering the dining-room with flowers and fruit, and he recalled the last time he had seen her, when she had thrust the farewell bouquet of flowers into his hand. That was in the early autumn, and this was in the late spring, and the light in her face was as glowing as then. A remembrance of the scene came to the minds of both, and the girl gave a little laugh.

"Well, well, Carnac. I sent you away with flowers," she said gaily, her cheeks flushing, her eyes warm with color. "Did they bring you luck?"

"Yes, they brought the luck of a perfect remembrance."

For a moment, he held her hands. He felt them tremble in his warm clasp, the delicate, shivering pulsation of youth, the womanly feeling. It was for an instant only, because she withdrew her fingers. Then she caught up an apple from the dish she had brought in, and tossed it to him.

"For a good boy," she said. "You have been a good boy, haven't you?"

"Yes, I think I have, chiefly by remembering a good girl."

"That's a pretty compliment—I suppose it's meant for me!"

She suddenly turned full on him, and looked him in the eyes. "Carnac, I think your face looks honest. I've always thought so, and yet I think you're something of a scamp, a rogue and a thief all rolled into one."

There was determination at her lips, through which, though only slightly apart, her beautiful teeth showed. "You don't play fair. What's the good of having a friend if you don't tell your friend your troubles? And you've been in trouble, Carnac."

SHE leaned over the table and absently stretched a hand to arrange something. The perfection of her poise, the beauty of her lines, the charm of her face seized Carnac, and, with an impulse, he ran his arm around her waist.

"Junia—Junia!" he said in a voice of rash feeling.

She was like a wild bird caught in its flight. A sudden stillness held her, and then she turned her head and looked at him with subdued inquiry in her eyes. For a moment only, she looked—and then she said:

"Take your arm away."

The conviction that he ought not to make any demonstration to her broke his sudden passion. He drew back ashamed yet defiant; rebuked, yet rebellious. It was like a challenge to her. A sarcastic smile crossed her lips.

"What a creature of impulses you are, Carnac! When we were children, the day you saved Denzil years ago, you flung your arms around me and kissed me. I didn't understand anything then, and, what's more, I don't think you did. You were a wilful, hazardous boy, and went your way taking the flowers in the garden that didn't belong to you. Yet after all these years, with an impulse behind which there is nothing—nothing at all—you repeat that incident."

Suddenly passion seemed to possess her. "How dare you trifle with things that mean so much! Have you learned nothing since I saw you last? Can nothing teach you, Carnac? Can you not learn how to play the big part? If you weren't grown up, do you know what I should do? I should slap the face of an insolent, thoughtless, hopeless boy." Then her temper seemed to pass. She caught up an apple again and thrust it into his hand. "Go and eat that, Adam. Perhaps it'll make you wise like the old Adam. He put his faults upon a woman."

"So do I," said Carnac. "So do I."

"That's what you would do, but you mustn't play that sort of game with a good woman. I don't think I want to see you again. You don't improve. You're full of horrid impulses." Her passion came back. "How dare you put your arm around me!" she cried defiantly.

"It was the impulse of my heart. I can say no more; if I could I would. There's something I should like to tell you, but I mustn't." He put the apple down.

"About the other woman, I suppose," she said coldly, the hot indignation gone from her lips.

He looked her steadfastly in the eyes. "If you won't trust me, if you won't—"

"I've always trusted you," she replied, "but I don't trust you now. Don't you understand that a good girl abhors conduct like yours?"

Suddenly, with anger, Carnac turned upon her. "Why won't you believe that the reason I won't tell you my trouble is that it's best you shouldn't know? You don't know life; you haven't seen it as I've seen it—in the stew-pan, in the ditch, on the road, on the mountain and in the bog. I want you to keep faith with your old friend who doesn't care what the rest of the world thinks, but who wants your confidence. Trust me. I haven't been wanton. Won't you trust me?"

Carnac's soul was in his eyes. There was truth in him and she realized it. After a moment, she put out a hand and pushed him gently from her. "Go away, Carnac, please—now," she said softly. All her anger of a moment ago was gone.

JOHN GRIER's business had beaten all past records. Tarboe was everywhere; on the river, in the saw-mills, in the lumber yards, in the office. Health and strength and good-will were with him, and he had the confidence of all the men.

There were times when Tarboe longed for the backwoods life; when the smell of the pines and the firs and the juniper got into his nostrils; when he heard, in imagination, the shouts of the river-men as they chopped down the trees, sawed the boles standard lengths, and plunged the big timbers into the stream, or round the fire at night made call upon the spirit of recreation. In imagination, he felt the timbers creaking and straining under his feet; he smelt the rich soup from the cook's caboose; he drank basins of tea from well-polished metal; he saw the ugly rows in the taverns, where men let loose from river duty tried to regain civilian life by means of liquor and cards; he heard the stern thud of a hard fist against a piece of wood; he saw twenty men spring upon another twenty with rage in their faces; he saw hundreds of men, arrived in civilization once again, striking for their homes and loved ones, storming with life. He saw the door flung open, and the knee-booted, corduroyed river-man, with red sash around his waist and gold rings in his ears, seize the woman he called wife and swing her to him with a hungry joy; he saw the children pushed gently here, or roughly, playfully, tossed in the air and caught again; but he also saw the rough spirits of the river march into their homes like tyrants returned, as it were cursing and banging their way back to their nests.

Occasionally, he would wish to be in it all again, out in the wild woods and on the river and in the shanty, free and strong and friendly and a bit ferocious. All he had known of the backwoods life filled his veins, tortured him at times.

From the day that both wills were made and signed, no word had been spoken concerning them between him and John Grier. He respected and admired certain characteristics of John Grier; some secret charities, some impulsive generosity, some signs of public spirit. The old man was fond of animals, and had given water-troughs to the town; and his own horses, and the horses he used in the woods, were always well fed. Also, in all his arrangements for the woods, he was generous. He believed in feeding his men well.

One day, however, shortly after Carnac's return home, John

C No woman had ever moved Tarboe until Junia came across his path, slim, graceful, the harmony and poetry of life. His big hand suddenly closed upon her fingers.

Grier looked less well than usual. Things had been going mischievously for a couple of days, and the old man had been seriously overworked. He had not listened to the warnings of Tarboe or to the hints thrown out by his own body. He was not a man to take hints.

When John Grier left the office, it was with head bowed and mind depressed. Nothing had happened to cause him great anxiety, yet he had been below par for several hours. Why was he working so hard? Why was life to him such a concentration? Why did he seek for more money, more power? To whom could it go? Not to Fabian; not to his wife. To Tarboe—well, there was not enough in that! This man had only lately come into his life, and was only near to him in a business sense. Carnac was near in every sense that really mattered, and Carnac was out of it all.

He was not loved; and in his heart of hearts, he knew it, but he had had his own way, and he loved himself. No one seemed to care for him, not even his wife. How many years was it since they had roomed together? Yet as he went towards his own home now, he recalled the day they were married. He had thought her wonderful then, refined, and rich in life's gifts. His love had almost throttled her. She was bountiful and full of temperament.

So it went for three years, and then slowly he drew away from her until at last, returning from the backwoods, he had gone to another room, and there had stayed. Very occasionally, he had smothered her with affection, but that had passed, until now, middle-aged, she seemed to be not a room away from him, but a thousand rooms away. He saw it with no reproach to himself. He forgot it was he who had left her room, and had set up his own tabernacle, because his hours differed from hers, and because tossing in her bed at night made him restless.

JOHN GRIER found his wife sitting by her table in the great living room, patient and grave, and yet she smiled at him. The look on his face brought her forward quickly to him. She stretched out a hand to him.

"What's the matter, John? Has anything upset you? Something is wrong."

"Nothing's gone wrong that hasn't been wrong for many a year," he rasped out.

"What's been wrong for many a year?"

"The boys you brought into this world—your sons!" he burst out. "Why isn't Carnac working with me? There must have been something damned bad in the bringing up of those boys. I've not got the love of any of you, and I know it. What's been the cause of it? Why should I be thrown over by everyone?"

"Everyone hasn't thrown you over. Mr. Tarboe hasn't thrown you over. You've been in great spirits about him. What's the matter?"

He waved a hand savagely at her, and with an almost insane look in his eyes.

"What's he to me? He's a man of business. In a business way, I like him, but I want my own flesh and blood by me in my business. I wanted Carnac, and he wouldn't come—a few weeks only he came. I had Fabian, and he wouldn't stay. If I'd had a real chance—"

He broke off, with an outward savage protest of his hands, his voice falling.

"If you'd had your chance, you'd have made your own home happy," she said sadly. "That was your first duty; not your business—your home—your home! You didn't care about it. There were times when for months you forgot me."

Suddenly, a dreadful suspicion seized his brain. His head bent forward, his shoulders thrust out, he stumbled towards her.

"Then—well—what then!" he gasped. "Then you forgot—!"

She realized she had gone too far, saw the storm in his mind.

"No—no—no, I didn't forget you, John. Never—but—"

She got no further. Suddenly, his hands stretched out as if to seize her shoulders, his face became tortured—he swayed. She caught him. She lowered him as gently as possible to the floor, and put a hassock under his head. Then she rang the bell—rang it—and rang again.

When help came, all was too late. John Grier had gone forever from his stormy money-getting world.

As Tarboe stood in the church at the funeral, in a pew behind John Grier's family, sadness held him. He had known, as no one else knew, that the business would pass into his own hands. He suddenly felt his task a little too big for him, and he looked at Carnac, even during the burial service, with sympathy. Carnac had brains, capacity, could almost take his father's place; he was tactful, intuitive, alert. Yet Carnac, at present, was out of the question. He knew the stress of spirit that had turned Carnac from the opportunity lying at his feet.

In spite of himself, there ran through his mind another thought. Nearby, at the left, dressed in mourning also, was Junia. He had made up his mind that Junia should be his, and suddenly the usefulness of the business about to fall into his hands became a weapon in the field of Love. He was physically a finer man than Carnac; he had capacity; he had personality; and he would have money and position—for a time at least. In that time, why should he not win this girl with the wonderful eyes and hair, with the frankness and candor of unspoiled girlhood in her face? Presently, he would be in the glare of sensation, in the height of as dramatic an episode as comes to the lives of men; and in the episode he saw advantages that should weigh with any girl.

Then had come the reading of the will after the funeral rites were over, and he, with the family, was in the dining-room of the House on the Hill. He was scarcely ready, however, for the prodigious silence that followed the announcement read by the lawyer. He felt as though life was suspended for many minutes, when it had been proclaimed that he, Luke Tarboe, would inherit the property. Although he knew of the contents of the will, he felt his heart thumping like a sledge hammer.

Slowly, he looked round the room. The only consternation to be seen was on the faces of Fabian and his wife. Mrs. Grier and Carnac showed nothing. Carnac did not even move; by neither gesture nor motion of body did he show what he felt. At the close of it all, he came to Tarboe.

"Good luck to you, Tarboe!" he said. "You'll make a success, and that's what he wanted—wanted more than anything else. Good luck to you!" he said again and turned away.

When John Grier's will was first published in the press, consternation filled the minds of all. Tarboe had been in the business for under two years, yet here he was left all the property.

But the most surprised person in the country was Junia Shale. To her, it was shameful that Carnac should be eliminated from all share in the abundant fortune John Grier had built up. It seemed fantastic that the fortune and the business should be left to Tarboe. Egotistic she had known Grier to be, and she imagined the will to have been a sudden outcome of anger. He was dead and buried. The places that had known him, knew him no more. All in an hour, as it were, the man Tarboe—that dominant, resourceful figure—had come into wealth and power.

AFTER Junia read the substance of the will, she went springing up the mountainside, as it were to work off her excitement by fatigue. At the mountain-top, she looked over the River St. Lawrence with an eye blind to everything except this terrible distortion of life. Yet, through her obfuscation, there ran admiration for Tarboe. What a man he was! He had captured John Grier as quickly and as securely as a night fisherman spears a sturgeon in the flare at the bow of the boat. Tarboe's ability was as marked as John Grier's mad policy. It was extraordinary that Tarboe should have bewildered and bamboozled—if that word could be used—the old mill-owner. It was as strange and thrilling as John Grier's fanaticism.

At the same moment, Carnac, in the garden of his old home, looked out upon the river too, eyed the great expanse of country, saw the gray light of evening on the distant hills, and listened to Fabian who consoled with him. When Fabian had gone, Carnac sat down on a bench and thought the whole thing over. Carnac had no quarrel with his fate. When in the old home on the hill he had heard the will, it had surprised him, but it had not shocked him. He had looked to be the discarded heir, and he knew it now without rebellion. He had never tried to smooth the path to that financial security which his father could give. Yet now that disaster had come, there was a glimmer of remorse, of revolt, because there was someone besides himself who might believe he had thrown away his chances. He did not know that, over on the mountainside, vituperating the memory of the dead man, Junia was angry only for Carnac's sake.

As he sat in the garden, with the black storm of sudden death roaring in his ears, he had a sense of freedom, almost of license. Nothing that had been his father's was now his own, or his mother's, except the land and house on which they were. All the great business John Grier had built up was gone into the hands of the usurper—a young, bold, pestilent, vigorous man.

It felt suddenly horrible to him that the timber yards and the woods and the offices, and the building of John Grier's commercial business, were not under his direction, or that of his mother, or brother. They had ceased to be [Continued on page 126]

Posed by Miss Rosalind Fuller

WOMAN to WOMAN

By Frederic Arnold Kummer

Photographic Illustrations by Baron de Meyer

"VIRTUE and goodness are by no means synonymous," remarked Mr. Dexter impressively, lighting his cigar.

"Wrong doing is a matter of intention, rather than of act. I have never," he went on, turning to his wife, "regarded Pauline West as other than a good woman."

Mrs. Dexter folded up the letter she had been reading and laid it beside her plate.

"I am glad you feel that way, Ridgeley," she said, "for she is coming here tonight."

"What for?" Mr. Dexter evinced only an impersonal interest.

"I don't know. She writes that she must see me—that she wants my advice in a matter of the greatest importance. 'A grave crisis,' she says in her letter. I can not imagine what can be the trouble. I sincerely hope she has not gotten into another scrape."

"As president of the Women's Social Welfare League," said Mr. Dexter, regarding his cigar with a reflective and somewhat cynical smile, "I should say you were amply qualified to give her the advice she needs."

"I'm glad you think so, Ridgeley. Still, to advise one in Pauline West's position may not prove so easy as you imagine."

When, soon after her husband had left her, a slender, rather timid young girl came into the room, Mrs. Dexter received her with quiet self-assurance.

"How do you do, Pauline?" she said, her voice delicately

C, Pauline West looked at Mrs. Dexter with large tragic eyes. "The man who has asked me to marry him," she said, "is your son Royce."

balanced between welcome and reproof. "This is quite a surprise. Won't you sit down?"

The girl twitched nervously at her gloves, then seated herself with embarrassed erectness on the edge of the lounge. She seemed to be nerving herself for an unpleasant ordeal. Her face, oval in shape, and olive-pale, was almost plain beneath her simple hat and severely arranged hair. It was only when she spoke that animation gave her both beauty and charm. A frightened look lurked in her large gray eyes, yet in the poise of her head she showed a certain timid joy, as though she had found happiness and yet, distinctly, feared it.

"I came to ask your advice, Mrs. Dexter, about a decision I am obliged to make." She paused, searching the face of the woman before her for sympathy, understanding.

"Yes?" Mrs. Dexter's voice rose questioningly, but quite without emotion. Her fixed and optimistic smile neither invited confidences nor repelled them; it did, however, give to her face the appearance of a smiling, middle-aged doll.

"It—it's about myself." The girl said.

"Yes?" Mrs. Dexter questioned, raising her eyebrows.

"I—I'm in love."

"My dear Pauline! I am overjoyed to hear it. I trust you have picked out a worthy man——"

"I didn't pick him out, Mrs. Dexter," the girl interrupted, with a quick, nervous laugh. "He picked me. I love him very deeply, though," she hastened to add, as though her words had smacked somehow of disloyalty.

"That is entirely as it should be, my dear. And now, tell me! In what way can I advise you? If he is the sort of man he should be, he will give you a nice little home and no doubt make you very happy. Naturally, I can not advise you as to his suitability until you tell me who he is. Then I will have some of my friends in Boston—I assume that he lives in Boston—make me a report."

The girl seemed distressed. She moved uneasily in her seat and did not at once find a reply.

"It isn't about him that I wanted you to advise me. He's quite all right. Oh—can't you see——"

"No, my dear, I confess I can not—unless——"

"It's—it's this, Mrs. Dexter: Ought I to tell him?"

"Tell him what?" Mrs. Dexter's virginal forehead was rendered almost human by the suspicion of a frown.

"About—about myself and—and the man I was to marry—don't you understand?"

"Of course, my dear. To be sure. I had not thought of that. I see your position, at once. You feel that in some way a stigma attaches to you. You naturally do not wish to go to your future husband under false pretenses. I quite understand, my dear, and I must say that the thought does you credit. You feel that you should tell him everything."

The girl nodded. A few tears upon her long lashes spoke almost trivially of the storm of grief beneath.

Mrs. Dexter assumed a judicial manner. She was in her element in thus planning the girl's future.

C Pauline was unable to meet Royce's horrified gaze. "We could never have been happy," she sighed. "I was never meant to be happy, I guess."

"Let us consider, my dear. The man in question, I take it, loves you very dearly."

Again the girl nodded, this time quite vigorously. A flash of happiness irradiated her face, giving to it almost spiritual beauty.

"The only possible thing you have to fear," continued Mrs.

Dexter, with the air of one performing an unpleasant duty extremely well, "is that he might some day learn the truth. In that case he might justly feel that you had deceived him. But if he should continue in entire ignorance of the matter, no harm, so far as I can see, would be (Continued on page 112)

Painted by Arthur E. Becher.

The Children and Sir Nameless

By Thomas Hardy

SIR NAMELESS, once of Atbelhall, declared:
 "Those wretched children romping in my park
 Trample the herbage till the soil is bared,
 And yapp and yell from early morn till dark!
 Go, keep them harnessed to their set routines:
 Thank God, I have none to hasten my decay:
 For green remembrance there are better means
 Than offspring, who but wish their sires away."

Sir Nameless of that mission said anon:
 "To be perpetuated for my mightiness Sculpture must image me when I am gone."
 He forthwith called an architect express
 To limn a figure stretching seven-odd feet
 (For he was tall) in alabaster stone,
 With shield, and crest, and ruff; and sword, complete.
 When done, a nobler work was never known.

Two hundred years hied; Church restorers came,
 And no one of his lineage being traced,
 They thought an effigy so large in frame
 Best fitted for the floor. There it was placed, Under the seats for school children. And they Kicked out his name, and hobnailed off his nose:
 And, as they yawn through sermon-time they say:
 "Who was this old stone man beneath our toes?"

EDISON

Tells of The Miracle of Radio

An Authorized Interview by

Allan L. Benson

with

Thomas A. Edison

THE RADIO-TELEPHONE is perhaps the most spectacular invention that ever leaped from the brain of man. Recently, I went over and talked to Thomas A. Edison about it and a little later in this article I shall tell you what he said; but before Edison begins, be prepared to digest this fact:

Nothing about the radio-phone is more marvellous than the story of its beginning and its development. Before the age of scientific "miracles" nobody would have believed such a tale could be true.

We may now mine the air as our forefathers mined the earth, finding one thing at one level and another thing at another.

You set your radio instrument for a certain wave-length and hear a comic quartet a thousand miles away. You want opera and feel bored as did your ancestors when they mined for gold and struck gravel.

You adjust for another wave-length and hear a gentleman, perhaps 1,500 miles away, talking about "Civic Consciousness," or reading late news dispatches or stock market reports.

That makes you feel worse than your gold-mining ancestor felt when he went from gravel to slate, and again you change your adjustment. Behold the miracle! You have sunk your shaft into a ledge of grand opera. There is no mistaking the liquid notes. You relax and listen.

Why are you able to "mine" for music and get it so clearly and delightfully from so far away?

Because Edison, thirty-nine years ago, saw a white line on a smoked electric light bulb, marvelled much thereat, and set in motion a train of thought that, many years later, produced the music and the speeches you now hear.

The train of thought traveled slowly but far. It went to England, it went to France, it went to Germany, it went to Italy. In Italy, it found Marconi who understood it as had no other man. Marconi took the thought and made signals fly through the ether. Then the thought came back to its home in America where it was made to speak, to sing, to cry—to do anything and everything that the human voice can normally do.

Edison did not invent the wireless telephone or the wireless telegraph. In fairness to him and to others, it is necessary that this be clearly understood. But in the smoked electric light bulb was the starting point of all that Marconi brought about.

Nor is that all. In 1875, Edison discovered what he called "etheric force" which consisted of a certain electrical phenomenon observable only in a closed chamber or a "black box," as it was called. This "black box" was exhibited at the Paris Exposition of 1881, and all the scientists of Europe observed the phenomenon that took place within it.

Six years later, Hertz announced the discovery of electromagnetic waves—Hertzian waves, as they were afterward called—which related to the same phenomenon that Edison had displayed in Paris. Hertz, in other words, carried Edison's discovery a point beyond where Edison had left it, and it is upon Hertzian waves that the present wireless art is based.

THUS EDISON twice came within reaching distance of the wireless, only to be turned aside each time by the enormous task of developing and installing the incandescent electric light. On a third occasion, he actually saw wireless telegraphy, described it in his application for a patent, which was granted, and later sold the patent to Marconi who bought it to protect his own patents. This process operated upon the principle of induction which differs from the system that began in the smoked bulb. The patent was applied for by Edison in 1885 and was granted in 1891. Edison, in his application, specifically stated that it made wireless telegraphy possible, as well as telegraphing between ships at sea. The system was actually installed by the Lehigh Valley Railway Company, between moving trains and stations.

Edison, therefore, is not the father but the grandfather of the two interesting children, now so important, Wireless Telegraphy and Wireless Telephony.

"It was in 1883," said Edison, while we were talking in his laboratory at Orange, N. J., "that I observed what scientists afterwards designated as the 'Edison effect,' upon which the radio-phone is based. An 'effect' is a term applied by physicists to a new phenomenon that cannot be explained by existing theories. While working on my carbon incandescent lamp, I observed that each bulb, after it had burned for some time, was blackened inside except for a thread-like streak opposite one leg of the filament.

"The streak of clear glass interested me because I could not understand it. So far as I knew, there was no reason why it should be there. As I studied it, I observed that the streak was always nearest to the leg of the filament that was connected with the positive side of the circuit. It was as if this leg were casting a shadow. I finally deduced that the negative leg of the filament was throwing off particles of carbon that blackened all of the interior of the bulb except the thin line on the opposite side which was shielded by the other leg of the filament."

Here we see the difference between Edison and the ordinary man. The ordinary man, even if he had seen the white line in the smoked bulb, would have said only that the filament should be made of something that would not smoke. To Edison, the white streak was a challenge to him to discover why it was there. Among other things, he learned that the phenomenon he had discovered could be utilized as an electric valve, and this discovery was covered in a patent for which he applied in 1883. Without this electric valve, no wireless instrument that is in use today would work.

Edison did not realize that the smoked bulb would grow into the radio-phone, but in the induction system for which a patent was granted to him in 1891, he saw the wireless telegraph, and thus described it in his application:

"I have discovered that if sufficient elevation be obtained to overcome the curvature of the earth's surface and to reduce to the minimum the earth's absorption, electric telegraphing or signalling between distant points can be carried on by induction without the use of wires connecting such distant points. This discovery is especially applicable to telegraphing across bodies of water, thus avoiding the use of submarine cables, or for communicating between vessels at sea, or between vessels at sea and points on land; but it is also applicable to electric communication between distant points on land. . . ."

C. The artist in one of the numerous broadcasting stations sings into a Radio transmitter, unseen by the delighted audience which may be hundreds or even thousands of miles away.

On his application for a patent, Edison drew two ships at sea, with adaptations, at their mast-tops of what we should now call "aerials." But he was overwhelmed with the problem of improving the incandescent light and devising means for its distribution, and his wireless discovery was pushed to the back of his head. When Marconi picked it up and developed it, Edison sold him his patent, refusing to sell it to others who might have embarrassed Marconi.

SUCH, in brief, is the history of wireless telegraphy, out of which the radio-phone is growing. It would be as difficult to say who invented the radio-phone now in popular use as it would be to say who invented the automobile.

"It was built up," said Edison.

Lee De Forest probably had more to do than did any other one man with the development of wireless telephony. He introduced into the lamp between the plate and the filament a little sieve by means of which the rate of passage of the electrons may be controlled.

Edison pointed on a diagram to the little sieve and said: "It is a beautiful invention." It was plain from the way he said it that De Forest had done something that elicited his admiration.

John J. Carty, Chief Engineer of the American Telegraph and Telephone Company, is the great technician of the radio-phone. He has taken the invention and made it work. He it was, who, in November, 1921, enabled crowds in New York, San Francisco, and every great city between these points, to hear President Harding's address as part of the ceremony at the tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Arlington.

"The radio-phone is destined to have a profound influence upon political campaigns," said Edison. "A presidential candidate need no longer go all over the United States to speak to everybody. From three or four places he can reach everyone in the country. A presidential candidate, instead of speaking to 20,000 persons at a time, which is the limit of Madison Square Garden in New York, will be able to speak to millions at a time. I think the small orators will be driven out of business."

Edison was asked what effect he believed the radio-phone would have upon education.

"No effect, so far as I can see," he replied. "The radio-phone is fitted only for the carrying of words, and words are not the things with which to teach. The way to teach is with pictures. They are the things that, through the eye, get into the brain quickly. The world will not learn this for another fifty years yet. It is awful," he added with a gesture of impatience, "to think of the manner in which we are deadening human brains by our educational methods. Between the ages of six and fourteen, we all have a chance to get a mental start that will carry us through life. If we taught with pictures instead of with words, fifty per cent of us would get that start. But the child that has not mentally started by the time it is fourteen will never start. Its brain becomes atrophied."

WHILE Edison was speaking, there was, in the back of my mind, a picture of the ancient Greek philosophers who used to gather about them students to whom and with whom they talked. So I asked Edison why it was not conceivable that the radio-phone would give great teachers, like himself, an opportunity to address millions of earnest men and women. I had in mind what an unparalleled educational opportunity would be presented if all the men and women in America who have done or are doing things were to speak to the people of the United States.

Imagine farmers in California and Maine saying: "I've got to be at the radio at 8 o'clock tonight to hear Edison speak on 'The World After Invention Has Re-Made It,' or Henry Ford on 'How to Do Your Farm Work in Twenty-one Days a Year and Make Money Instead of Losing It.'"

But Edison did not agree with me as to the existence of this educational possibility.

"THE PROLETARIAT," he replied, "do not look at things the way we do. We belong to a caste. You see what you think is an opportunity, and you think others will see it as you do. You are wrong. They will not see it that way at all. I can perhaps best illustrate what I mean by telling the story of a man who was born blind and later had his sight created by an operation at the hospital of Johns Hopkins University. When the man was blind, he could tell an orange by its feeling—its shape and its texture. He could tell a tree by the way its bark and its trunk felt. But after he was made to see, he could tell neither an orange nor a tree by sight. The point is that the man, when he was blind, had formed mental pictures, based on feeling, of oranges, trees, and other things, that were entirely different from the mental pictures that came to him after he could see. The proletariat see the same things we do, but they do not look the same to them. We think they see things as we do, but they don't."

Inasmuch as sound and light are both derived from etheric waves, differing only in frequency, I asked Edison if it were not conceivable that the radio might yet carry grand opera to prairie firesides where it could both be seen and heard.

"It is conceivable," he replied, "but there is nothing in scientific knowledge as it now stands to indicate that it will ever be done. There are 125,000,000 nerves that lead from the eye to the brain. If I could string 125,000,000 wires from here to New York" (we were talking in Edison's laboratory in Orange, N. J., remember), "we might be able to see New York from here."

THIS SEEMS the proper place to relate something remarkable about Edison's eyes. His eyesight is taking in a great deal at a glance of extraordinary power. Many years ago, when his face was less familiar to the public than it is now, a friend of his induced him to go to an oculist in New York to have his eyes examined. After the examination, the oculist said to Edison's friend: "That man has the most marvelous optic nerve that I ever saw. It is as big as a chord. The optic nerve should be only as big as a thread. He must be a prominent man in what ever work he is engaged. Who is he?"

"The chief field of the radio-phone," Edison continued, "will be, I think, in broadcasting human speech. It is not so good for music. I tried making phonograph records by radio, but the experiment was not satisfactory. But speeches, news dispatches, market reports, weather forecasts and things like that can be handled well by radio. Transmitting the human voice, either by wire or wireless, is a very difficult thing to do. That is why I do not expect the radio to do much with music. We get along with the telephone very well because we are so accustomed to the words that most of us use that we guess at many of them, as they come over the phone—and guess right. But you will see how imperfect the telephone is if you listen to words to which you are not accustomed. Let somebody read a drug catalogue to you and see how much of it you will get. Unless you are a druggist or a doctor, you will not get much."

Edison believes that the great field for the radio-phone lies in the country.

"It will be a fad in the cities," he said, "and will soon [Continued on page 103]

Across empty spaces and through solid walls, the mysterious Radio carries the singer's voice clear and undimmed by intervening miles.

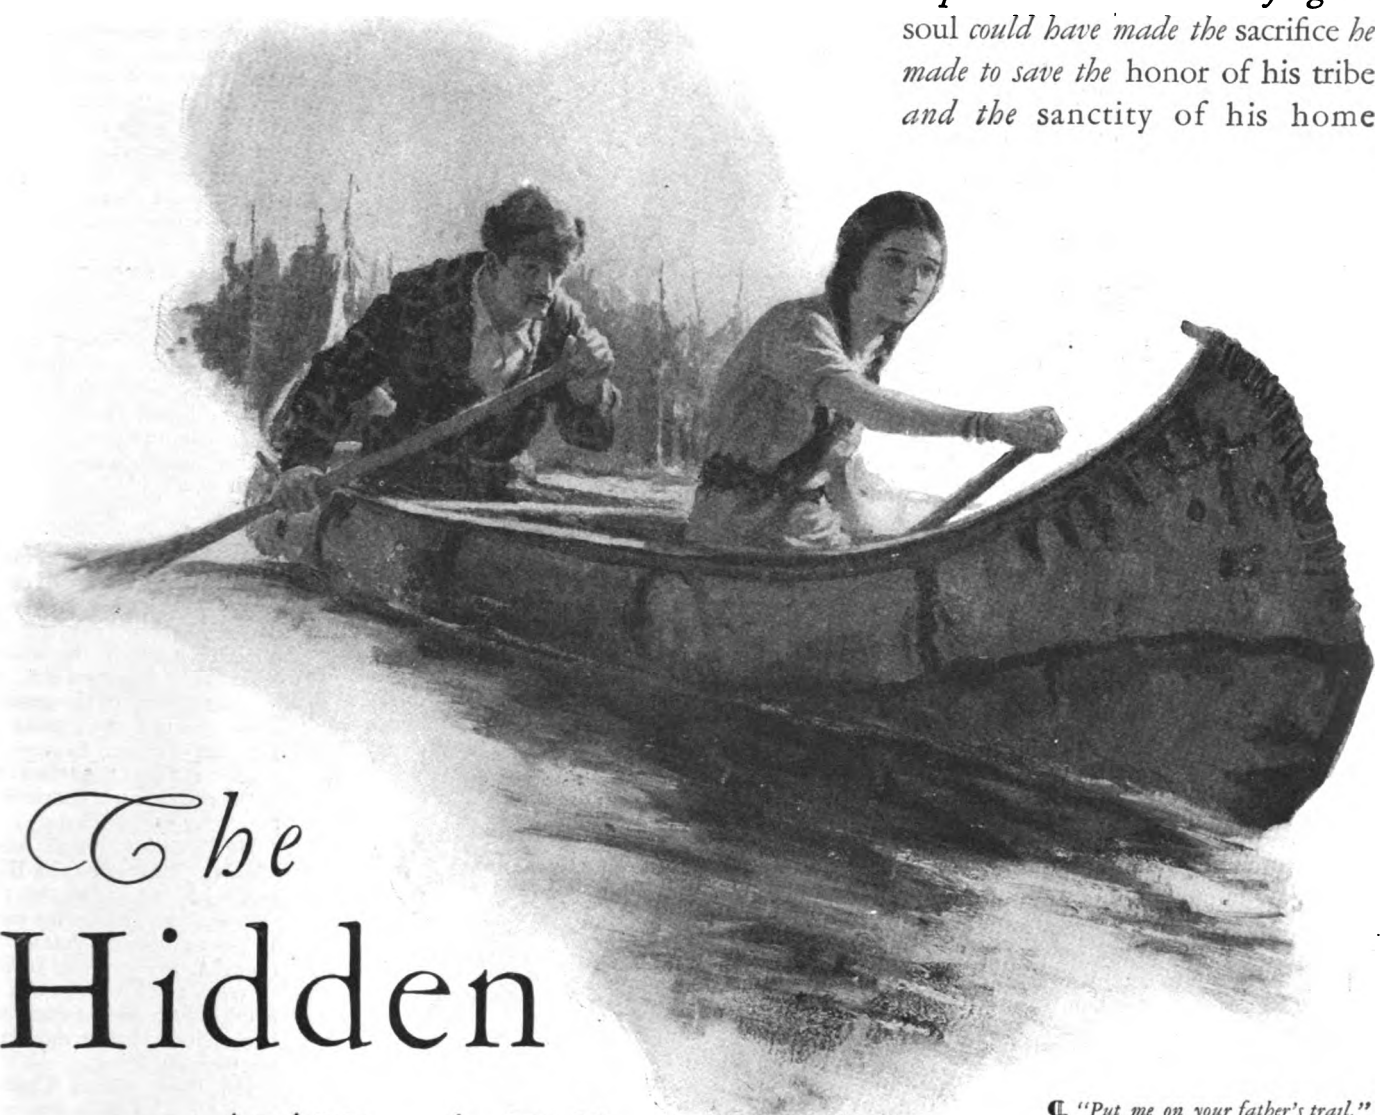

*Y*OU hear a great deal today about the "younger writers." Emma-Lindsay Squier is one of them and she is among the few with something to say. That is because she has a sympathetic understanding. You saw one phase of Emma-Lindsay Squier's genius when you read "Helen of Chinatown" in the June Hearst's International. In "The Hidden Trail," you will find a totally different story

Emma-Lindsay Squier

Sketched from life by Howard Chandler Christy

¶ Charles-Walk-On-The-Hills was a simple Micmac Indian but only a great soul could have made the sacrifice he made to save the honor of his tribe and the sanctity of his home

The Hidden TRAIL

By Emma-Lindsay Squier

Illustrated by James H. Crank

¶ "Put me on your father's trail," Scanlon Maverne had said, "and I'll go after him." So in the full glory of the day he and First Bird paddled down the lake.

ON THE point of land which stretches far out into Lake Ketchamakooogie, there lived, some half a century ago, Charles Walk-On-The-Hills, and his daughter, First Bird. Indian Charles, as they called him, was a Micmac, and had been, in his youth, a mighty man in that warlike tribe which once long ago owned all of Nova Scotia, and which made excursions as far west as the country now called Ontario, crossing the Bay of Fundy in birch-bark canoes to fight the fierce Algonquins.

Now it was not an unusual thing for an Indian to bring into Port Felix, the trading station, nuggets of rugged quartz with free gold showing clearly in the crevices. It was well known that gold in plenty hid somewhere under the brown soil of the forests, and many were the prospectors who ventured far into the wilderness with pick and shovel, to return without ever a glimpse of the shining metal. Only the Indians seemed to have the faculty of finding the precious substance. They brought it to the trading station to exchange for groceries, or, more generally, for a bottle of rum or, indeed, for anything alcoholic.

But never, even when drunkest, would one of them tell where or how he had found the gold. For it was then as it is now, a superstition of the Micmac tribe that if an Indian tells to a white man the location of a gold mine, he dies before the month is out, and his soul haunts the lakes in the guise of a black loon.

Charles Walk-On-The-Hills owned a gold mine, so much was certain. For he brought with him, at each visit to Port Felix, a bulging leather pouch of quartz chunks, from which the gold fairly oozed its dull yellow, and which set the eyes of all beholders to sparkling covetously. Many were the bribes offered him in the form of money, of rich furs, of bottles of rum, in exchange for the secret of the mine's location—and all to no avail. For drunk or sober, Charles Walk-On-The-Hills guarded his secret and no white man ever came upon it by chance.

THERE WERE three lawless trappers to whom Indian Charles's wealth was a continual source of affront. Lazy fellows they were, who would rather drink than work, and who, with eyes that bulged with envy, watched the white quartz nuggets slide from the old Indian's leather pouch onto the counter of the general store. They had succeeded in getting him drunk; but when they tried to worm out of him the secret of the gold mine, they found themselves balked and old Charles tight-lipped.

They had thought of waylaying the old Indian as he came in his birch bark canoe from Lake Ketchamakooogie, and killing him for the nuggets he carried. But Hugo Panthier, a renegade Frenchman, called the Panther, counseled against this.

Better, he said, go to the Indian's cabin some night, overcome him by force, and persuade him to reveal then and there the secret location of his wealth. As to the persuasion, well—there was little said of that, but when the Panther smiled in a certain crooked way, the two who followed him shuddered their assent.

Indian Charles at that time was worried and nervous. Jim Labrador, a half-breed, had killed a white man, and had been hanged. Somehow the thing had taken hold of his imagination. It was the first time that any of his tribe had come into direct conflict with the white man's law, and he was vastly impressed. Seeing this, the men at the general store, in their desire to tease the Indian, added new and lurid touches to the picture, describing at length how the officers of the law had tracked Jim Labrador through the woods, how they had brought him to Port Felix more dead than alive, and how they had swung him from the gallows.

Old Charles had listened, fascinated, fearful. For always the moral of the dreadful harangue was that Indians who hide gold mines from white men, refusing fair pay for a share in the wealth, should be hanged. Then Charles Walk-On-The-Hills, rising with exaggerated calm, his leathery face carefully blank, would lurch out of the door and down the narrow street to the wharf where his birch bark canoe was lying.

One night Hugo, the Panther, and his followers steeled their nerves with many rounds of strong drink and set forth upon their errand of blackness. There came a storm, swift, tumultuous. In the angry waters the befuddled crew came to grief on the jagged rocks that lie off Indian Charles's Point. Two bodies were washed ashore almost at the door of Charles Walk-On-The-Hills.

Of Hugo, the Panther, there was no trace that could be found. Indian Charles brought the bodies into Port Felix in his own canoe, and delivered them to the magistrate there. His story of finding the men was simple enough and was believed.

BUT the hangers-on at the general store saw, in the double tragedy, a new means of teasing the old Indian who would not tell the secret of his gold mine. When he came into the store that day, they pretended to draw away from him, to look at him with horror, and their voices sank as they spoke to each other and glanced at him from the corners of their eyes.

Charles Walk-On-The-Hills was hurt, and not a little perplexed by their strange behavior. He smiled ingratiatingly, and offered to stand treat for whatever the crowd would drink. They made excuses, and held aloof from him.

Little by little, they told him what was in their minds. They professed to believe that he had killed the two ruffians, and that it was but a matter of time when he would be hanged. If the half-breed had suffered the death penalty for the murder of one man, what would they not do to an Indian who had slain two white men, possibly three? For Hugo Panther's body had never been recovered.

It was thoughtless, and it was cruel. For as Charles Walk-On-The-Hills listened with startled incredulity to their deft lies, his face took on the expression of frightened misery which one sees sometimes on a dog, surrounded by a group of shouting boys, armed with sticks and stones.

He rose abruptly from his accustomed place behind the big iron stove, and drawing his blanket about him, went out. Some of the men laughed loudly, but others ordered their drinks a little shamefacedly. One young Englishman did not laugh at all.

SCANLON MAVERNE, quiet and slight of build, had come to the provinces with some vague idea of carving for himself a home in the wilderness. In Port Felix, he became a clerk in the general store, despite the pleas of his aristocratic family in England who regarded his wanderings as eccentric and unworthy of his caste.

He did not laugh when Charles Walk-On-The-Hills fled with the jibes of the trappers ringing in his ears. It was rather a shame, he thought, to see the Indian baited, and there was a helpless look in the eyes that haunted him that day, and the day following.

For three weeks Charles Walk-On-The-Hills was not seen in the general store at Port Felix. Some of the trappers spoke of his prolonged absence, and most of them pictured him as working hard in his hidden gold mine, digging out the chunks of white quartz with its veins of lustrous free gold. They thought of new ways of teasing him, and even suggested a mock hanging. But when this plan was broached, young Maverne, who spoke little, and who had the reputation of being a snob, denounced the plan. His words were few, but they stung. After that there was no more talk of Indian baiting in his presence for the men respected his attitude.

One day there came into the general store an Indian girl. She entered quietly, and stood looking down at the group of trappers in their fur caps, the awkward farmers lounging by the iron stove, the dock men and the half-breed Indians who lined the bar. When they saw her, there was a sudden silence. It was as if a breath of the mysterious forest had swept into the room carried along by the Indian girl.

"I am First Bird, daughter of Charles Walk-On-The-Hills," she said distinctly. "My father has gone into the forest through fear of what you have told him, and I can not make him come back. For two weeks, he has lived on berries, for when I followed him into the woods with food, he made me leave him, and forbade me to trail him farther, saying that the white men would find and kill us both.

"It was the idle talk he heard in this place that put such fear

Q. "De gold is mine in exchange for your life and freedom, old man," Hugo, the Panther, declared, "and de girl in exchange for de life of that young swine."

1. "You mek hard terms, man of black heart," said Charles Walk-On-The-Hills, while First Bird knelt beside Maverne, listening for the beating of his heart and chafing his wrists.

in his heart. My father is old, and he is blameless. Will one of you seek for him in the forest and tell him the truth?"

No one spoke when she had finished, but they stared at her. None of them had ever seen her. They knew that Indian Charles had a daughter, but he had kept her, as he had his other treasure, the gold mine, from the sight of all white men. They had thought of her as fat and slovenly as were the Micmac women who came into town selling grass baskets and blankets of coarse weave.

Now that she had come, had at once revealed to them herself and the tragically simple story of the old man's flight into the wilderness, a worried shame flushed their faces. They looked suddenly huddled together like sheep in vague distress. Some of them said feebly that it was too bad, that they had not known their jokes had gone so far—

Then Scanlon Maverne spoke from behind the counter, reaching at the same time for his cap and mackinaw that hung behind the door and immediately putting them on.

"If you can tell me which way he went, I'll go after him." That was all, but the men stirred as if in relief, and there was a general scuffling of feet as though they applauded his words.

The girl looked at him with questioning eyes.

"I mean it," said the young Englishman, "if you can put me on his trail, I'll go after him."

So First Bird turned and went out of the door, with Scanlon Maverne following her.

IN THE full glory of that autumn day, they paddled down the length of Ketchamakooogie, and for the most part they were silent. Scanlon Maverne, from the stern of the birch-bark canoe, watched the lithe grace of First Bird's brown arms as they rose and fell in steady sweeping strokes. Sometimes she half turned to speak to him, and once, when a loon sent its soft eerie call from far across the lake, both he and she held their paddles poised as they listened to the half-human cry.

At Indian Charles's Point, First Bird took the young Englishman into the cabin, gave him food for many days, and drew for him roughly, the trail which her father had taken. She marked the place where he might possibly be found, and told him what words he should call from time to time, so that Charles Walk-On-The-Hills would know that a friend and not an enemy was coming through the woods to him.

Their parting had a touch of awkwardness about it, for in taking the bundle of food she gave him, he touched her hand. A warmth that surely was not of the crisp October day flooded into his cheeks and into hers. He did not look at her when he left, but swung quickly down the trail that led into the forest, where the trees flung a tangle of color against the blue of the sky on towards Charles's hiding place.

For many days and nights following, First Bird was alone in the cabin on Indian Charles's Point, and the only human being she saw was an Indian trapper, John Light-In-The-Sky, who paused at her door to ask for matches and tobacco.

Then one day a man staggered against the cabin door, bounded it with his great fists, and sank down against it in exhaustion. When First Bird opened the door, the man fell forward into the room, and lay at her feet, burly, unshaven, torn of clothing, unkempt as some savage animal. She laved his burning forehead with water, brewed a tea of herbs and made him sip it slowly. Then she raised him, laid him on a couch of soft skins, and watched beside him until the fever passed out of him.

So it was that when Hugo, the Panther, came slowly back to consciousness, he looked up into the face of First Bird. He saw her dark eyes fixed upon him, eyes that were like forest pools at midnight, saw the clinking gold bracelets that ringed her smooth arms—and he coveted her. He let her nurse him back to health and strength, let her sit beside him for hours putting poultices of leaves and herbs on the wound in his scalp, let her minister to him with food hot from the fireplace where she cooked. Little by little, he learned from her who she was, how her father had fled to the woods, how Scanlon Maverne had taken the trail into the wilderness to bring him back.

"An' you, you t'ink he will fin' him and bring him back?" he asked her narrowly.

"I am sure of it," said First Bird simply.

Hugo, the Panther, smiled crookedly. For it was in his mind that he might yet possess the gold mine—the gold mine, and First Bird to whom he owed his life.

So he groaned and made pretense of being sicker than he was. "Mon dieu, mon pauvre tête," he would murmur, putting his hand up to the wound on his head.

Even when his strength came back to him, he protested that he was too weak to paddle down the lake to Port Felix, or to undertake the long overland trail to the settlement. First Bird did not wholly believe him, for once he had caught at her when she stooped over him to put a fresh bandage on his head and she saw the panther gleam in his eyes. She let him stay because she had no power to make him go. But every night, she went into the inner room of the cabin and barred the door. Her father's long barreled gun was close to her hand.

THEY came back, Charles Walk-On-The-Hills and Scanlon Maverne. On the last day of the month, they came out of the forest dragging and weary, for they had traveled far. Indian Charles looked older and more wrinkled, and he leaned heavily on the arm of the young Englishman. First Bird ran to her father, and he held her close without speech. When he strove for words, it seemed that tears would come; for he realized all at once that he was an old man, and that his strength had gone from him.

Very tender with her father was First Bird. She made him rest and brought him warm water to bathe his tired, swollen feet. She served Scanlon Maverne, too, and he watched her with eyes that were happy but haggard from lack of sleep. On the long trail into the wilderness, he had carried with him the memory of her voice and the warm touch of her hand on his.

Now at first Indian Charles was overjoyed to find Hugo, the Panther, at the cabin. In his presence there, he saw the final and strongest proof of his entire innocence in the matter of killing the men of the canoe. For Hugo would be able to tell the authorities at Port Felix that he, Charles Walk-On-The-Hills, had no knowledge of the accident that had taken the lives of two and sent the third into the wilderness, sick with a fever of forgetfulness that kept him helpless for weeks.

He said as much, but Hugo, the Panther, smiled crookedly. Suddenly Indian Charles was afraid again; more afraid than he had been in the depths of the forest, when in every shiver of the leaves, he had heard the stealthy footsteps of men with hempen ropes in their hands. First Bird, too, looked upon Hugo's face and saw in it suddenly all the evil that he had veiled. Scanlon Maverne looked from Hugo, the Panther, to First Bird, a slow wrath creeping into his brain.

Thus they sat in silence, for it was night, and the fire in the fireplace burned redly. Threads of thought crossed and recrossed like silken strands in a loom. Thoughts of lust, of love, of fear. At last Hugo Panther spoke softly, revealing that which was in his dark mind.

"Eet is pity, Charles Walk-On-The-Hills, dat I shall have to tell le magistrat at Port Felix dat it was you who have lie in wait for our canoe and have kill' my comrades."

Again there was silence, a heavy, sickened silence. Then Scanlon Maverne spoke, trying to keep his voice steady.

"You black—dog!"

Instantly Hugo was on his feet. There was no smile now on his face, only a deadly brooding look that narrowed his eyes to slits of black light, and his hairy hands were twitching.

"You call me dat, do you? You shall know how a dog can kill——" he shouted, torn with rage.

First Bird screamed aloud. For with the words, the Panther sprang, and his great arms closed around the Englishman. They fought desperately, but it was only for a moment. Hugo Panther's bulk seemed to close up on Scanlon Maverne. There was a sigh, as of a child grown very tired, and Hugo, the Panther, laughed stridently. He lifted the unconscious Englishman in his arms, higher, higher, until he held the limp form above his head, stretched out in his great hands.

"Alors," he said, breathing heavily, "I can make heem dead against de stones of de fireplace. Dere are t'ings I want. Shall we come to terms, hein?" he demanded of Charles.

THE wrinkled leather face of Indian Charles was twisted into an expression of fear and loathing. He would have spoken, but First Bird stepped forward, quietly, her dark eyes empty of emotion but her face determined.

"Put him down on the bed," she said, "and we will come to terms. We will agree to anything——"

Again Hugo, the Panther, laughed. He dropped Maverne onto the bed, strode over to where Charles Walk-On-The-Hills stood, and looked down at him, a crooked smile on his thick lips and evil gleaming in his eyes.

"Now, Monsieur Indian who keep hees gold from white men, we will come to terms, vraitment! You know well dat de law will take my word against yours eef I swear dat you have treacherously kill' my comrades as dey came out of de lake, weak and helpless from de storm, and dat you have assail me too wit' a knife." He touched the still livid scar on his scalp. "I carry de proof with me—you see?" He paused for a moment, impressively. "I can send you to de gallows you fear so, Charles Walk-On-The-Hills."

First Bird, kneeling beside Maverne, was listening for the beating of his heart, was chafing his wrists with tender hands.

Indian Charles' face had gone suddenly blank. Hugo, the Panther, thought he was stricken with terror. But Charles Walk-On-The-Hills was no longer afraid. That Hugo Panther could accomplish what he had threatened, the old man did not doubt but he gazed stonily at the leering face.

"You ask, what?" he inquired simply.

Hugo, the Panther, smiled his crooked smile once more.

"Your gol' mine, ol' man—and your daughter. I want dem both," he said with insolent assurance.

First Bird raised her head and looked at her father. He was staring at Hugo Panther without flinching.

"De gol' mine in exchange for your life and freedom, ol' man." the Frenchman was saying, "and de girl in exchange for de life of that young swine. I have half kill' him now. I will finish it unless——" his gesture was significant.

He was looking now at First Bird. Ah, his was the cunning of the panther or else how should he have known that to the Indian girl the life of Scanlon Maverne was dearer than her own honor and happiness?

Then Charles Walk-On-The-Hills spoke, slowly and with difficulty but with great force.

"You mek hard terms, man of black heart. Yet I no got him strength against white man's ways and white man's laws. Him gold mine I show you where."

"An'—de girl?" Hugo, the Panther, licked his lips.

First Bird answered for her father, steadily, without fear.

"In exchange for the Englishman's life—yes."

He made a step towards her, but Indian Charles spoke softly.

"Frenchman, my strength him go fast. Tomorrow, I be stiff and sore, not can take you to where gold lies. Not can draw for you map, for trail him damn' well hidden. Tonight, I can take you there, tonight before I rest. Tomorrow I be very tired—and no can make journey then."

The eyes of the Panther gleamed [Continued on page 100]

Just about the hardest thing in life, especially when you are sixteen, is to make the girl you love believe you are a wicked man of the world

The Sinfulness of Skippy

By Owen Johnson

Illustrated by James Montgomery Flagg

SKIPPY woke with a blood-curdling shriek and landed sprawling in the middle of the floor, his legs caught in the sheets and his head smothered in the comforter, while he had a convulsive grip on the bolster. Snorky rushed to the rescue.

"Hold him back. Help! Snorky, hold him!"

"Hold what? Who?" said Snorky, pursuing the smothered figure of Skippy who was still wrestling with the bolster. "Wake up. It's me! It's Snorky."

Skippy's grip relaxed and presently his terror-stricken eyes emerged from the comforter.

"Holy Maria! In another minute he'd have had me in the electric chair," he said, wiping the clammy perspiration from his forehead and staring wildly about him.

"Nightmare, eh?"

"Ugh! Gee! Moses!" was all that Skippy could say.

"Too much cigarettes," Snorky suggested in a wise tone.

of steel, the more it appealed to his imagination. It added zest to the new liberties of being off on a visit and gave a deep romantic tinge to the too-matter-of-fact freckled nose and hungry mouth. Besides the end was noble and the end was Miss Jenny Tupper. He considered seriously the exigencies of the part he must play.

TO BE an interesting reprobate and engage Miss Jenny Tupper's sentimental proclivities for redemption, it was necessary to present some concrete evidence of a sinful life. He was shockingly deficient of all the habits that lead to the gallows. Desperate characters, he remembered, usually had their fingers stained with telltale traces of the nicotine which was slowly eating out their lungs.

He ensconced himself by the fireplace and taking care not to inhale, smoked a cigarette to the end. But the result was unsatisfactory. He burned his fingers over the distasteful performance but acquired nothing in the way of a stain. He smoked a second and a third and then seized by the inspiration, carefully rubbed in the moist ends against his fingers.

When they walked back from the beach that morning, Miss Jenny Tupper lost no time in opening up the fascinating subject of the sinful one's reclamation. Skippy had just brought forth a cigarette, tapped it professionally on his wrist and said:

"Don't mind, do you?"

"I do mind," said Miss Tupper severely. "Juth look at your hand. It ith thaking."

Skippy extended a palsied hand with the second and third fingers yellowed like a Chinaman's.

"It's worse this morning," he said carelessly, with the sigh of one who contemplates stoically the approaching end.

"It's tewible, tewible to let a habit make a slave of you like that! At your age, too! How did it ever get such a dweadful hold on you?"

"I began as a boy," said Skippy slowly, for he had still to work out the story. "You know how it is. Fast company, money in your pockets, no one caring. That's it, that's how it was."

He raised the cigarette to his lips.

"Don't smoke it, pleath."

"Just one, just half a one," said Skippy with a haunted look. "My Lord, it's been an hour . . . " he added in explanation.

"Pleath, for my thake, Jack."

He hesitated, swallowed hard, made one or two false gestures, and flung away the cigarette.

"If you ask it like that," he said huskily.

"I'M GOING to athk more," said Miss Tupper with shining eyes. "I'm going to athk you to promith never to touch another thigarette or another card."

"I can't," said Skippy. "It's gone too far, it's beyond me."

"But it'll kill you, Jack," said Miss Tupper, alarm in the beautiful eyes.

"I couldn't promise. I couldn't keep it," said Skippy, who had

Q. "Jenny, dear," said Mr. Tuptale with clerical poise, "suppose you let us talk this over together. It would be easier, wouldn't it?"

"Golly, what a life I've been leading!" said Skippy, referring to the dream. "Barrooms and gambling dens, dark lanterns, hold-ups, race tracks and . . . "

"Wake up, wake up!"

"It's all in the dream," said Skippy sulkily. Then he remembered that through the hideous phantasmagoria, in the smoky mists of low gambling dens, in the drizzle of midnight conclaves, across the sepulchral silences of leaden prisons, there had flitted the beatific vision of an angel with velvety eyes and the softest of lisps, who was trying to save him.

"Well, go on," said Snorky.

"Can't remember any more," said Skippy. Her name must be shielded at every cost.

The more he considered the possibilities of the rôle of the lost character, the wayward son and the gentleman sport with nerves no intention of relinquishing his dramatic advantage, "but I'll make a fight for it. If you want me to . . . Jenny. If it means enough to you to care?"

The moon-ripple and the fragrance of the honeysuckle were no longer about them. Miss Tupper, in the calmer light of the day, considered her words with due regard to precept and standard.

"I'll be very glad, indeed, to help you if I can," she said properly. "We should alwayth help ath much ath we can, shouldn't we?" she asked seriously.

"How coldly you say it!" said Skippy indignantly.

"But, Jack," said Miss Tupper, alarmed at the tragic look on his face. "Juth think how little I know you."

"You're quite right," said Skippy with magnificent generosity. "I don't deserve more, and I had no right to say that. Well, it was white of you even to care this much." He took off his hat and extended his hand.

"What are you doing?"

"The only square thing by you," said Skippy with a perfect Bret Harte manner. "It's been bully to know you. Good-by."

"Do you want to make me vewy, vewy unhappy?" said Miss Jenny with a reproachful look in the velvety eyes. Skippy returned the hat at once to his head.

"I'll do anything, anything for you," he said huskily.

Now, there are two stages in the process of returning the wandering sheep to the fold and not the least interesting is the period of investigation. Miss Tupper had worked in missions with enthusiasm, but there was something in the present case which staggered her imagination.

How could a boy of sixteen, brought up with all the advantages of a home and good influences, have sunk so deeply into the mire of evil? How could one be so depraved and yet look at you with such an open, winning smile? Was he inherently bad or just weak, just reaching out blindly for some good influence to set him right? That was the question.

"If I can I'll help you," she said, leading the way to a little summer house on the parsonage grounds, and shuddering as she glanced down at the nicotine-stained fingers, "and I do want to help you. I'm several years older than you are and you muth tell me everything about yourself."

"I will, I want to," said Skippy summoning up all the powers of his imagination.

"You know," said Miss Tupper a little embarrassed, "I heard, I couldn't help hearing all you thaid that night on the boat about what you had done."

"You did Good heavens!"

"Perhaps you don't want to tell me."

"I might as well make a clean breast of it," said Skippy, wondering where the exigencies of the situation would lead him, but determined to prove himself a bad man.

"I'm afwaid, Jack," said Miss Tupper sympathetically "that your friend Arthur Green ith not, well, ith not a vewy good influenth for you if you mean to change your life and habits, don't you think?" Miss Tupper was full of concern.

C. "Kindly point out to me in the Ten Commandments where any habit of mine is forbidden," Skippy demanded of Mr. Tuptale, with the most impressive of declamatory attitude.

"Snorky?" said Skippy momentarily surprised.

"He theems to have vewy low athothiations," said Miss Tupper earnestly.

"You mean racing and jockeys and all that sort of stuff?" asked Skippy, willing to follow the line of least resistance for a while. "Oh, Arthur isn't half bad!"

"I don't think you thee him ath he really ith," said Miss Tupper firmly. "No, I don't think he ith at all the proper person for you to be with."

"Couldn't I help him?" said Skippy craftily. "We should always try to help, shouldn't we?"

"You would have to be vewy, vewy stwong for that, wouldn't you?" asked Miss Tupper, turning her velvety eyes on him. "Yes, of course," said Skippy, with his mind on the delicate arch of Miss Tupper's little foot.

Miss Tupper, who was expectantly set for an interesting confession, was somewhat disappointed at the lengthy delay.

"I'm afwaid your pawenths gave you too much money," she said finally. "It ith tho often that, ithn't it?"

There were some things that were too much even for Skippy's imagination. In the present case it absolutely refused to follow such a lead.

"No, it wasn't that," he said slowly. After all, it is only the first one hundred thousand lies that are difficult. Skippy's hesitation was brief. He remembered the episode of the factitious Tina Tanner that had so often served him in delicate moments and who must be used now.

"I almost made a wreck of my life," he began frowning terrifically at a deplorable recollection.

"Tell me," said Miss Tupper eagerly.

"She wasn't a bad sort; only—well, stage life is different."

"Stage life! You mean . . ." the girl gasped in surprise.

"She was an actress," said Skippy nodding.

"But how . . ."

"I ran away from home. They never understood me. Family fight. Swore I'd never set foot in the old house again. Cut for the West. You get to see a rough side of life like that, you know, mining camps, mule drivers, lumber men, good sorts," he added reflectively, "but wild, very wild. You couldn't understand."

"But your father and mother?" said Miss Tupper, wide-eyed and thoroughly thrilled.

"I'd rather not say anything against them," said Skippy magnanimously.

"Poor boy!"

"I've kept pretty straight, considering," said Skippy who did not wish to paint the picture too black.

"And the girl?" said Miss Tupper, who could not restrain a perfectly feminine curiosity in that direction.

"TINA? She wanted me to go on the stage with her," said Skippy, who had now told the story a sufficient number of times to begin to believe in it. "It was touch and go. Well, I didn't. That's all there was to that."

"What a dreadful thide of life you've theen," said Miss Tupper, appalled. "At your age, too!"

"I say, I never expected to tell anyone this."

"But aren't you glad you did? Don't you feel better now that you've had the couwage to tell the twuth!" said Miss Tupper enthusiastically sure of her convert.

Skippy thought this over, and acknowledged finally that confession was a relief.

"Now pwomise never, never to gamble, smoke, or dwink. Pwomise, Jack. You don't know how much better you'll feel."

"I'm not strong on signing pledges and that sort of thing," said Skippy cautiously reserving loopholes for himself.

"Oh no, juth pwomise!" pleaded the serious girl.

"For how long?"

"Until you're twenty-one."

"I think it's better to promise what you're sure you can carry out, don't you? It has a better effect," said Skippy craftily. "Tell you what I'll do. I'll make a promise for a year. Only there's one thing."

"What's that?"

"I'll promise to try and cut out the smoking, but it will have to be little by little, don't you understand?"

"Jack!"

"My nerves won't stand it," said Skippy, bringing forth the nicotine-splotched hand. "I'll do my best. I will, I'll do it for you. I'll cut down to a box a day."

"A box?"

"Ten cigarettes, only ten, but I must have ten," said Skippy hungrily. "But, Jenny, you'll have to help a lot."

"You'll pwomise, then?"

"I pwomise," said Skippy, falling into the lisp and now enjoying himself.

He extended his hand and profiting by the solemnity of the moment held Miss Tupper's fingers with the softest of thrills.

"BUT the gambling?" said Miss Jennie, disengaging her hand.

"That's another promise," said Skippy, taking her hand again. "I promise for the space of one year, never to sit in a

"I've watched that coot do some queer things," Snorky thought, as Skippy searched the Bible, "but I'll be jiggswiggered if I can figure out just what he's up to now."

“Golly, what a life I’ve been leading,” said Skippy. “Barrooms and gambling dens, dark lanterns, hold-ups——” game of poker for money, never to shoot craps with Tacks Brooker or Happy Mather. . . .”

“Ith thith nethethawy?” said Miss Tupper, blushing and seeking to free her hand from the not too painful embrace.

“I want to be sure of everything,” said Skippy, retaining tight hold. “Never to frequent race tracks, that’s a promise, too, or to bet on the ponies, or to go into pool rooms . . .”

“That’s quite enough,” said Miss Tupper, glancing nervously up towards the veranda.

“But I haven’t promised to give up drinking and all that sort of thing,” said Skippy enthusiastically.

Miss Tupper in whom a slight suspicion was beginning to grow as to the exact motives back of the sudden conversion, hesitated, but finally put forth her hand a third time.

“I promise,” said Skippy, drawing a deep breath and sailing away on perfumed clouds to an invisible choir. “I want to make this something terrific; it’s the most important, you know. I promise for the space of one year—so long as you care enough to answer my letters, that’s only fair, you know—I promise never to touch a drop of beer or ale, or whisky, or rum, or brandy, or sherry, or port, or . . .”

“Alcohol in any form,” said Miss Tupper, the color of the rambler and again looking at the veranda.

“In any form. So help me God,” said Skippy, slowly.

“There,” said Miss Tupper, somewhat thrilled herself.

Skippy, indeed, would have sworn to anything just for the look that lighted up the velvety eyes in the joy of salvation. It is doubtful if he even heard half of the program for his future existence as outlined by himself.

There was something irresistible in the softness of her eyes and the fascinating lisp. He was face to face at last with a good influence. He had met, not the type of girl that men play with lightly or madly for a month or a day, but a woman, the kind rough, coarse men look up to as to a polar star, the kind of woman you think of winning after years of struggle, that keeps men straight and their thoughts on higher things, the kind of woman that pulls a drunkard out of the gutter, reclaims him and makes a genius out of the wreck. He would be saved by her, he was bound he would—no matter what sacrifices he would have to make to keep in proper sinful condition.

Snorky Green had experienced so many shocks in his intimate contact with his chum’s imagination that he had come to believe the future could hold no surprises for him. But that evening Skippy after a long searching through bookcases asked with a worried air:

"I say, Snorky, where do you keep the Bible?"

"The—the Bible?" said Snorky faintly.

"Sure, the Bible."

Snorky's first thought was that Skippy must be the victim of a secret malady and ready to make his will. His next was even more alarming.

"You're not thinking of anything rash are you, old horse?"

"What the Sam Blazes are you driving at?"

"Thought you were looking up the marriage service," said Snorky facetiously.

"Shucks, no. Nothing of the sort. I just . . . I just want to look up a reference."

"What reference?"

"It's of a personal nature, very personal," said Skippy.

After an hour's search Snorky finally procured a Bible from the cook and watched Skippy turn through the pages in a perplexed manner.

"I've watched that coot do some queer things," he thought, scratching his ear, "but I'll be jigsgwigged if I can figure out what he's up to now."

At the end of a half an hour, Skippy looked up nonplussed.

"Where do you get the ten commandments, anyhow?" he asked in great perturbation.

"Why, it's in Genesis, isn't it?"

"Naw, I looked all through that."

"How about Solomon? He was wise to everything."

"Who was the guy who went up to heaven—perhaps he got 'em—"

"Let's ask the cook."

Which was done.

"Now what in the Sam Hill has Skippy to do with the ten commandments or the ten commandments with Skippy?" said Snorky, observing the extraordinary concentration on his chum's face as he considered them carefully, one by one. "Perhaps the heat has hit him and he's going in for religion."

THE true explanation of Skippy's eccentric taste was a perfectly simple one. No sooner had he departed from the lovely presence of Miss Jenny Tupper with only the vaguest idea of what he had pledged himself not to do, but with the liveliest and most disturbing memory of the bewildering effect of the softest of hands, than he had bitterly repented the prodigal manner in which he had thrown his opportunities away.

"Why the deuce didn't I save something out?" he said to himself angrily, with a sudden recollection of moonlight nights to come. "My aunt's cat's pants, but I certainly went to sleep!"

From the parsonage to the Green's, from the soup to watermelon, but one idea obsessed him; how was he to find something else to swear off?

Then he had thought of the Bible and the ten commandments, with much resulting perplexity to Snorky.

"Well, I'll be eternally dog-switched!" he said, all at once. "I never would have believed it!"

"Believed what?" said Snorky, who was waiting patiently.

"Say, these are the ten commandments, aren't they?"

"Sure, they are!"

"Genuine, bonafide, patent applied for, no imitations, only original ten commandments?"

"Keerect."

"Well, do you know there isn't a thing in them about cigarettes, or booze or penny ante? Not a word!"

"Honest?"

"Fact!" said Skippy whose real irritation was caused by the fact that the ten commandments did not afford him any suggestion in his new predicament.

Snorky slapped his shoulder with a resounding whack.

"I'm on."

"Ouch! On to what?"

"Own up! I'm in the same box, too," said Snorky with a smirk, meant to be enlightening.

"You mean?"

"Sure, Margarita's trying the reform racket on me, too!"

"Oh, she is?" said Skippy, who did not like sharing the honors of a stellar rôle.

"Yep, and you must have been laying it on strong, for Margarita's been asking all sorts of questions about you."

"Snorky, go the limit . . . make it strong and stronger," said Skippy brightening up.

"I get you," answered Snorky, who saw possibilities. Skippy took a few steps towards the door and reflected.

"There are some things, though . . ."

"Don't worry . . . trust me."

"Well—don't get rash."

"Keep on trusting me," said Snorky with an airy wave of his hand that was most satisfying.

Something in the repetition struck Skippy where he was the weakest, in that wholesouled faith which should sanctify the friendship of a lifetime. The more he considered it the less he liked it.

"I have made a mistake," he said to himself, frowning. "Snorky has no sense of discretion."

MISS JENNY TUPPER at the end of a week acknowledged to herself with an uneasy sense of her own shortcomings that the task of keeping Mr. Skippy Bedelle in the straight and narrow path was one beyond her limited experience. It was not that she had lost confidence in her own efficiency, but that she anxiously asked herself if she could afford the time and the effort.

Skippy was all for the better life and yielded at once to her suggestions. The trouble was in his staying out, as it is colloquially expressed. Each evening the cure was complete, but each morning the conversion had to begin all over. The hold that his past life had taken over him was simply staggering and the hankering for the excitement of the gambling table or the struggle against the narcotic tyranny of the demon cigarette was such that at times she had to sit long moments holding his storm racked and shaking hand while he fought bravely against the maddening appetite! And after a week of the closest personal attention, he had only cut down the allowance of cigarettes to seven a day!

Now Miss Tupper was upright and God-fearing and self-respecting and though there was a difference of three years all in her favor, she, unlike some of her sex, scorned the use of her personal attractions, simply for the sake of a personal vanity or even the curiosity of a collector of male scalps. She was in a moral quandary of the most metaphysical complexity. What should she do; shirk her evident moral responsibility and allow a bravely battling human soul to sink into iniquity, or continue and permit a most susceptible youngster to immerse himself deeper and deeper in a hopeless passion?

Each day she came to the task of regenerating Mr. Skippy Bedelle resolved to conduct the proceedings on the grounds of the strictest formality and each evening she admitted to herself the failure. Yet could she honestly blame herself? She gave him her female sewing-society pin to wear not as a personal token but solely as a daily reminder of the promises he had made to himself. She gave him a tie, a colored handkerchief and the sweater she had just finished for another destination.

But each was given as a reward and marked a triumphant progress in his fight to acquire a final mastery over himself. When, however, Skippy brought up the question of a photograph, a crisis was reached.

"I have never, never given my picture to any man," she said firmly, and the absence of sibilants made it doubly impressive. "And I never, never will. Bethides, you know I would have to tell my mother."

THEY were sitting in the summer house at that romantic hour when the first day stars arrive with the mosquitoes. It was always at such moments that the craving was strongest. She had begun by holding his wrist in a strong, encircling clasp, but the sight of his twitching contorted fingers had been too much for her sensibilities and her hand had slipped into a more intimate clasp in her effort to help him.

"After all, he's only a boy," she had said to herself.

"Jenny, how can you—don't you—do you realize all I'm doing—just for you?" said Skippy, whose voice at such moments was not under control.

"No, no, you ought to do it for yourself, because it is the right thing to do, because it will make you feel stwonger and finer and you'll really be so much better."

"Nope, it's you or nothing."

"Jack, you muthn't thay thuch thingth. I muthn't let you!"

"It is the first time I've ever cared what became of me," said Skippy lugubriously. "You don't know what that pin means to me—you never can know."

"But . . ."

"Do you realize what I'm going back to? Old associations, old habits and a long, long fight! And [Continued on page 137]

Who's To Blame in IRELAND?

By Frazier Hunt

I did not think there was such a place left in the world as this Medieval Black North of Ireland, writes Frazier Hunt from Belfast. The hate of 300 years is here today—so cruel that one doubts if one's eyes see, and if one's ears hear correctly

IF THE South of Ireland can be called "The Country of the Young," the North can be rightly styled "The Country of the Old." If one is the land of dreamers and youthful sentimentalists and radical half-hysterical idealists, the other is the breeding ground of unimaginative, intolerant, religious Die-Hards.

I did not think there was such a place left in the world as this medieval "Black North." To live here even for a few days is to live in the brutal heart of the seventeenth century. The persecution, the intolerance, the cruel hate of three hundred years ago is here today—only the modern weapons of inquisition and punishment are more effective and more certain.

As I write in my hotel here in Belfast, I can hear sporadic rifle firing down the street. Lorries, steel-caged and bomb-proofed, filled with either British Tommies in khaki or Orangemen Specials in black uniforms, dash madly by.

Terror and death are in the air, just as hate and fear are everywhere. Not a day, not a night passes, without some hideous crime committed in the name of religion; some harmless old woman killed in her bed; some policeman shot by a gang of religious gunmen; some innocent workman, returning to his home, blown to eternity by a bomb bearing the hallmark of a church of God.

It is a reality so cruel and so awful that one doubts if his eyes see and if his ears hear correctly. It is beyond belief that such ignorance, such hate and such intolerance could live and fatten in this twentieth century of wisdom and experience.

There is a great religious war here and more ghastly and more inhuman than even this battle of rival Gods, is the use of religion by shrewd conniving men to break the growing hopes of sweating workmen. Poor ignorant fools have been set at each other's throats under the spell of religious hate. The faiths of common men have been bought and sold and they have been sent to death for purely political and economic ends. Since the days of the "Ulster Plantations," three hundred years ago, this tragic North has been a pawn on the chess board of British-Irish politics, to be used for conquest or revenge whenever it suited. It is still being used today, and men, fired by the magic cause of religion, are still sent forth to fight the battle of dollars and cents. It is a religious war; it is an economic war; and it is, as well, the last mad attempt of the old conquering Ascendancy to preserve its power and privilege in Ireland.

But I am getting ahead of my story. After all, what one has to say about the Black North must be looked upon as purely a background to judge the surprises and uncertainties of the future. If it were anything else but a background study, it would have to be a prophecy—and unless one were wholly mad, one would not care to risk a prophecy about this North that for three hundred years has learned nothing and forgotten nothing—and one might add, forgiven nothing.

It is a grim, determined land where the speech and the dress and the heart and the soul and everything is different from the warmer, more friendly, South. Little of the tolerant sunshine of the outside world has come into these hard northern hills. Outside Belfast, it is the North of three hundred years ago; its Scotch Presbyterians, and its English High Church settlers, squat in their hills and valleys, have remained unconscious of the winds of tolerance that have been blowing over the rest of the world; today they pray as long and hate as hard as they did when their brothers fled to America to escape the religious persecutions of a dozen generations ago.

It is a rugged, hilly country, this Ulster, and its inhabitants are rugged, hilly people. Of all the settlers and soldiers and conquerors who have come to Ireland from the British Isles, they alone have refused to be Irishized. Whereas in the South the thousands and tens of thousands of English settlers and soldiers have intermarried with the native Irish people, losing their nationalism, their religion, and their accent, here in the North the Scotch and English settler holds tightly to his religion, his customs, his speech—and his hate.

But one must be tolerant even with intolerance, and after all, these Northerners have often felt the iron heel of oppression—and today they still believe they are the underdogs of Ireland. Isolated in their hilly farms, the small Scotch tenant-farmers were welded together in the white heat of oppression, first by the English government and then by the English Church. In 1869, full religious freedom came; and in 1880, the Land Laws gave them new life and broke the worst of the economic inequalities. During the long fight of the South for Home Rule, they enjoyed the rôle of an Irish minority standing against any break in the union with England.

Now they still find themselves in the minority, with their religious narrowness and intolerance strengthened by the idea of a possible oppression by the Southern majority. They are of the strange breed that thrives on the unconscious sensation of a righteous stand against any coercion, real or imaginary.

I got my first full taste of this medieval North in a small Ulster city near the Southern border that boasts of being the seat of both the Catholic and the Church of Ireland hierarchies. On a great hill at one end of the town stands the High Church Cathedral, and at the other on a half mountain a magnificent stone and marble Catholic edifice rears its head.

I AM NOT quite correct about that "silent defiance." As one of the principal Protestant citizens of the city explained to me in high glee, the Catholic had installed chimes of forty-eight bells to drown out the eight bell chimes of the Church of Ireland. But ha! ha! they had miscalculated, for their bell hymns were easily overshadowed by the booming chimes of the Protestant Cathedral.

To religiously tolerant and far away America, all this is of very trifling importance—but not here in the Ireland of the seventeenth century. Religion is life here—hard, cruel, uncompromising, intolerant, belligerent.

"Compromise?" an educated and important citizen of this border town snarled at me. "Compromise with those brigands of the South? Never as long as we've an ounce of strength left in our bodies! We shall never join with them. They'd simply make a milk cow out of us. We'd have to keep their inefficient political government going for ever. We'll die fighting them first."

This was a "leading citizen" talking. I suggested the name of Cromwell.

"There was the man for them," he answered. "The Catholics started that business by their massacre of Protestants in 1641. But Cromwell showed them how really to do it. He'd attack a city and put every captive to death. Then before the dead were cold he'd move on to fresh conquests. With blood and sword, he swept through the South. . . . But he didn't give them enough. There were too many of them left. He should have killed them all."

He half chuckled, half grunted, to himself. We had been walking about the city and were at the door of my hotel as he finished. Then he added this tender bit:

"By the way, tomorrow is Sunday, and if you'd care to go to church, I'll be happy to call around and get you."

I wanted to laugh in his face. I really didn't even smile—I only told him that I didn't go in so very strong for that.

1. Ulster Specials, composed of civilians banded together for the protection of Ulster, one of whom told Frazier Hunt: "Let them Papes come over! We're ready for them and we're going to defend ourselves."

"Well, religion is very strong here," he went on. "We're all regular churchgoers."

Four times on Sunday the children in these villages in the Ulster country are sent to their churches. In their schools and their streets and in their homes—and one might add in their churches—they are taught the cruel, stupid intolerance, hate, and fear that the innocent children of three centuries ago were taught.

Somehow you don't have this same intense, ever-conscious feeling of religious intolerance in the South. After all, the revolt of the South against British rule was pretty much of a nationalistic problem, a racial question. So overwhelming are the Catholic majorities in the southern counties, that one does not feel so strongly the religious grip. There is unquestionably a certain amount of it there—bitterness and intolerance—but it is less cruel than in the North.

"I'm a Protestant," a man I had supper with one rainy night in a little hotel in Killarney admitted to me after I had explained that I had divided my own Sunday School days between Methodist and Presbyterian churches. "I'm a South of Ireland Protestant and I must admit that I have never been interfered with, never discriminated against, and never felt the slightest touch of religious repression of any kind. Of course, we Protestants in the South are so much in the minority that we very distinctly mind our own religious business—we're not kicking up a row or raising imaginary issues. We go about our lives our own way and no one ever bothers us the slightest about our religion."

"How about the English Protestants here whose country houses have been burned and sacked?" I asked.

"That's nothing really to do with religion," he explained. "That's on account of their big grazing farms, or for some political reason—absolutely not connected in any way with religion."

That conversation is a fair sample of dozens I had with Protestants I met in the South. I remember now talking with a laborer in one of the market towns. I said something about religion and purposely added that it seemed to me that all the English-Irish differences were basically religious ones.

"You're wrong, sir," he answered. "We don't bother about a man's religion here—a good man is a good man and a bad man is a bad man. And there's no end of good men right here in this market today who are Protestants. There's a bunch of them standing over there. They're fine people: they help each other out and are honest men. We don't worry any more about religion in this part of the world, I assure you."

That was in the South. Along the border that separates the six Northern counties from the twenty-six of the South and West, it is different. Here there is intolerance and bitterness on all sides.

C. Surely the premiership of Ulster is no sinecure. Sir James Craig in that position has been a very busy man between Lloyd George and the Griffith-Collins' faction.

Of these six counties, with a population of 1,250,000, there is an estimated Catholic population of 407,000. As a result of the Treaty pact signed in December, 1921, the Free State was to include the Ulster Counties only with their consent. If they voted against the union, the six counties were to continue the Northern Government of Ireland with its separate Parliament and with adequate representation in the British Parliament.

The boundary question was immediately brought forward and the British Government arranged that a Boundary Commission should be appointed to settle all boundary controversies and map out the two new states. Within the Ulster counties, there are many communities and districts that are predominantly Catholic and it is the contention of the Provisional Free State Government that these Catholic majorities should be included in the Free State territory. It is quite as strongly the determination of the Ulster Protestants that they shall not be so included.

As I write, news comes of the signing of a new South Irish-Ulster pact in London that offers hope of a settlement of the innumerable difficulties between the two sections—but no one knows what will be the actual outcome. Even if this were a newspaper cable to be read the morning after it was written instead of a magazine article to appear weeks later, one would have to protect any opinion on this last of the religious wars with the statement that the Ulster border and the City of Belfast constitute a powder magazine that may explode at any moment.

I drove down to the border in the very heart of the bitterest sections. It was almost like visiting a momentarily quiet sector on the Lorraine front. There had been some little sniping by Southern Irish irreconcilables during the morning but everything was now quiet. "Let 'em come over!" one of the Ulster Specials said to me, "we're ready for them—a lot of hired murderers and cut-throats. They bluffed the British Government, but they're not going to bluff us. Ulster belongs to us, and we're going to keep it. We've been thrown down by Lloyd George and lied to and deceived, but we're going to protect ourselves."

It was the real spirit of Ulster talking. Nowhere was there the slightest idea of compromise, or apparently the slightest wish for compromise. For generations, these people had been fed on hate.

I stopped a farmer on the road coming back from the border, and I found him just as determined as the soldiers.

"These Catholic trouble makers have got to get out of this part of the country," he affirmed. "We'll have to clear them out. The Protestants are quiet and law abiding but not these priest-ridden Catholics. One of my own neighbors was killed last week as he was feeding his stock. They want [Continued on page 128]

A New Novel by the Author of
"The Wild Goose"
and "The Penalty"

The Better Wife

By Gouverneur Morris

Illustrated by Henry Raleigh

Q. This is the first Mrs. Highland. She made out a splendid case for herself. Looking like a sorrowing-angel she talked in a sorrowing-angelic voice. She thought it no reproach to have fallen out of love with a completely loving and faithful husband. So without further ado, she obtained a Reno divorce

THERE was no other man—the first Mrs. Highland was sure of that; just as sure as she was that she wanted a divorce, with the custody of the two boys—and alimony. It was quite by accident that her husband, who loved her, discovered that Harry Fisher was her "heart's dearest." It was no accident, however, that he vented his rage upon the man. After that he made no objection to a divorce and when the decree was granted, he lost himself in drink. Sober once more, he discovered, to his horror, that he had, while unconscious of his actions, married again, and this time to a woman no one could call "good." At first blush, there was nothing to do but abandon her. The rub lay in the fact that to Bud Highland, the marriage vows were sacred. So in bitterness of soul, he accepted the obligation. For himself and for his wife, Bud wanted to escape from old scenes and old friends; so he made hasty preparations to go into the Far West. For the girl to whom he was tied, Bud's feeling was one of revulsion, just touched with pity. These thoughts were in his mind, as after a couple of hours' absence, he returned to his apartment and to his new, sick, unattractive wife.

Q. A synopsis which tells how Bud Highland, divorced by a good woman, married a bad one

WHAT should Bud Highland's first word be to his new wife? He little thought that it was to be a compliment—but that was exactly what it had to be.

She had done her hair differently, very smoothly and evenly. It was an excellent way to do it. It was the kind of hair that resents being made smooth and even. It wasn't curly and it wasn't straight. The two side horns into which part of it had been formerly twisted no longer offended.

The simple new dress, dark blue it was, became her—so nicely that it might have been made for her. Now in addition to the new neat look of her head, and in addition to the simplicity and becomingness of the dress, there was, or perhaps there seemed to be, a new look in her eyes—softer and less troubled.

But no; in such a small number of hours a real new look was out of the question. Rather she had a changed look; her eyes had in them less of their old look.

Bud Highland complimented her head and her costume. He said he hoped she would always do her hair like that, and he told her there was no doubt at all about blue being her color.

Of the new look in her eyes he made no mention. That, he felt, would have been personal, and he had no mind to be personal in his attitude or speech.

She had done more than burn old things and don new ones. She had folded and hung up scattered things. She had folded the bath mat and hung it over the rim of the tub. She had squeezed out the big sponge and put it in the sun to dry. She had swept the hearth. She had made the bed.

Upon the pillow nearer the wall, she had laid a folded nightgown; upon the other pillow, a suit of heavy silk pajamas.

Trouble, for a few moments lightened by the witnessing of so much intuitive neatness and sense of order, became heavy again as Bud thought of the future.

There wasn't so much as a sofa in the sitting-room. If a fellow had to sleep in those rooms, and there was a lady present who required a bed to sleep in, that fellow would either have to break his back and his patience in the Morris chair, or curl up on the floor.

Time passed. Then together they went to dinner. If people looked at the couple, they soon looked away, or lingered a little

C. This is the second Mrs. Highland.

Bud acquired her under circumstances that were vague to him, but he had promised to cherish her and he remembered that he had told his first wife: "If I had given my word to a woman and she wanted me to keep it, I'd keep it even if I found she was vile and I got to hate her. I'd keep it and you know it."

over the man. He was handsome. He must be frightfully powerful with those shoulders! Look how thick he was through the chest! The woman? Some relation likely. Delicate. Downright sick-looking. T. B., most likely.

AFTER DINNER, they saw a screen show at the Rialto. The heroine was a fallen woman. It was not until after marriage that the hero found this out. He forgave her. He said, "Let him who is without sin," etc.

Highland thought the show in very questionable taste. It's all very well, he thought, to make a fallen woman noble and all that, but it's ridiculous to make her more noble than a woman who hasn't fallen. But, thank the Lord, the soul-moving piece was followed by Charlie Chaplin and Highland laughed so hard that he forgot all his troubles, and between the two shows there were some travel scenes of the Far West.

Then they went home.

"I think," Mary said, a few minutes after they had reached home, "if it's all one to you, I'll turn in."

"Do you good," Highland applauded her decision. "What you need is sleep and food. I have letters to write—to tell some people I am married. Good-night."

He perceived then, that she was not going until she had said something or other, and that either the subject or the choice of words in which to broach it halted her. Presently she said: "I don't just know what to call you."

He was able to solve that perplexity. "I like Bud better than Charles," he said.

"You've said we'd travel until we found a good place to stay. There's such a thing as taking potluck and being good sports about it," she added. "And there's such a thing,"—was it possible that a note of wistfulness had crept into her voice?—"there's such a thing as for people who've made up their minds to live together trying to be good pals."

"That's all right," he said. "Sure."

In those moments, when she was falling softly asleep, were there ripening in her subconsciousness any of the spores from which nightmares spring? Had the horror of her former life, was remorse for the way she had lived, ever going to bother her? Of that horrible way of life, she had, indeed, a horror. But there was no seed of remorse in her. She would live to wish that she had let herself starve to death sooner than follow along the only way that led to food and shelter. Regret, poignant, she might feel because it had been that way which lay open to her and not some clean way. But remorse, no. Fate had not even pretended to play with her before striking her down.

The remorse was in the other room. No one had forced Highland to marry the woman he had married. He had not been starving, roofless, and in despair. He had been in no sharp and deadly predicament from which there was no escapement save through such a marriage. He had not been flung neck and crop into slime. He had plunged in and, of his own free will, wallowed. He had been no paper-weak objective of relentless fate. He had been drunk, that was all, and he must take the consequences.

He wrote three letters and tore them up.

He looked for a long time out of the window, his forehead pressed against the cool glass. It was raining quietly. There were misty halos about all the lights.

There had been a time, not long since, when he could look any one in the face without fear or shame. Without shame, he could look no one in the face now. It is not true that confession is good. It is horrible. It is the feeling of having confessed that is good.

A fine example he had set for his boys!

He remembered telling his wife, his former wife, that is, his real wife, and telling her more than once, often in fact, that it was not good for boys to grow up without their fathers. They needed his example, he had told her. In telling her, he had been sure that it would never be in his power, even, to set them any example other than of kindness, decency, right-mindedness—horse-sense.

Such an example would not have been minded if only they would have grown up saying to all who asked, "Father was killed in the Argonne."

Bad enough to know that their mother had divorced him; for now, learning what he had done, they would conclude what manner of man he really was, and know that mother had been right to throw him aside. They would never believe, now, that all his married life he had been a decent man, and a pure man. Stupid—yes—yes; but decent, and straight and faithful.

It was not the damage that he had done to himself that was now first in his mind. But the damage he had done them—to the name they bore, and to the spotless ideal they had of him.

AT TEN o'clock the next morning, he was at his doctor's office; the same doctor who had been called in to dress the painful hurts of Mr. Harry Fisher.

Bud and the doctor had been schoolmates, and afterwards college mates. Dr. McMahon had been a fine athlete. They knew each other for clean livers and clean thinkers. McMahon would be cruelly hurt by what Highland had to tell him, but in spite of that, he must be told.

The surgery was an efficient-looking place in plate glass and spotless enamel. There was a fine, clean-shining of steel. McMahon had a keen, sharp Scotch face. He didn't look thirty-eight. He hadn't turned a hair.

"Dean," said Highland, "those people out there," he waved his hand back towards the waiting-room, "will have to wait. Miss Rogers slipped me in ahead of 'em. I've got a new wife, Dean, and I want you to look her over. I wouldn't wonder if she had T. B."

The look in Highland's face forbade the conventional congratulations which his friend had been about to offer.

"Be very thorough, will you? If there's anything the matter with her more concrete than dissipation and starvation, I want to know. When I learned that I had been divorced, I got drunk and married a woman of the town."

Neither of the men cared to look at each other.

"She has no physical attraction," pursued Highland, in a gloomy voice. "She has no attraction whatever, unless—well, unless she was meant to be decent as women go and got in wrong. I married her, because in my drunken heroics, I imagined that it would be a fine and noble thing to do. She admits that. Otherwise I should never have known why I married her. She had the flu last winter. Her looks, if she ever had any, have gone to glory. She was down, out, and desperate and she played me for a sucker and won out. I'm going to do the best I can for her. Drunk or sober, a promise is a promise. . . . Oh, how can a man make such a fool of himself. . . . I'm going to play the game."

"We're going West. I'm all through round here. We're going to try to get her to looking a little more like what she ought to look at her age. . . . She didn't lead the life because she liked it. You haven't got anything in the shape of a pill, have you, that makes a man feel that all is for the best in this best of all possible worlds?"

"Bud," said McMahon, "this hits me hard. When do you go?

I'll sure miss you. But you know that already, I'm sure." "We're leaving Monday—day after tomorrow. It's hard to make a clean getaway. Things keep turning up. I've got to have a tooth plugged for one thing."

"Didn't believe you had a filling in your head."

"I had two, and one of 'em's come out."

"Where'll you go?"

"Chicago first, and then to whatever place you think will do my wife the most good in the least time. Wish you'd tell her that I have an enlarged heart, and that if I'm crossed about anything, I'm liable to drop dead, and that what little income I have is from a trust fund and goes to the boys at my death. . . . If she knew that and believed about the heart being flimsy, maybe it would help her to keep from starting anything. Of course I don't mean it. I'm only trying to joke. How's your Missus? Good! And the kids?"

"Lucy has got to have her tonsils and adenoids out. And I tell you I'm dreading it. It's the bulkiest kind of operation for other people's children; does 'em good and serves 'em right. But Lucy's different." His eyes twinkled. "Bill writes me that he's been made substitute catcher on the team, and that if Fletcher doesn't buck up, he, Bill, will catch the Groton game. Pretty good for a fourth-former."

"How old is Bill?"

"Fifteen; but he's got a wing on him like an ichthyosaurus."

"Say, look here, Dean, don't keep her waiting too long, will you? She's nervous as hell about coming. She knows that you're my friend, and she's afraid of you."

"Oh, shucks! I'll tell Miss Roberts to trot her right in. Old man, ought you to see this business through? Buy her off."

Highland shook his head. "A contract is a contract," he said. "You and you old code! When will she come to see me? Make it two o'clock this afternoon if you can. I can give her all the time she needs then."

"You'll drop me a line?"

"Ah right."

With no further words, they shook hands and parted. They had been life-long friends. They never saw each other again.

There was nothing the matter with Mary. "All she needs," McMahon wrote, "is to be built up. Keep her out of doors, and give her three good meals a day." He had added in one line of postscript: "Have her tonsils out when she's up to it." In another, "I think she'd cut off her hand to please you. Good-luck to you both."

"How did you get on with McMahon?" Highland asked her. "He's the other man that isn't plumb rotten," she said. "There's just him and you."

IT WOULD be easy enough to correct her manners into the channels which he approved, if her imitativeness in the matter of eating soup was a true indication of her good will. It would be more difficult to get her to talk right. She had some grammar, it is true, more perhaps than the average of better-stationed persons, but she had an intonation that seemed a chronic defect, like badness or catarrh, and that overbore the quietness and not altogether unattractive quality of her voice.

An intonation cannot be dealt with on print or on the screen, or on canvas or in clay. The reader must gather that, though her lines may sometimes read like the lines which a lady might speak, they were not spoken as a lady would speak them. Had she been pure as the snowball, she could not yet have passed muster among those who had been her husband's friends, any more than Highland's first wife could have seemed anything but an exotic among such people and surroundings as those from which the second Mrs. Highland had sprung.

But the reader will say that the first Mrs. Highland, since she had so flimsy a notion of right and wrong, of contracts and obligations, was "no lady," either. No more she was in that category. But to the eye, and to the ear, and to the casual observer, she was a gentlewoman in the best sense.

Good-breeding is a matter of derision and disqualification in the best of republics, except as the principles may be profitably applied to Pekinese dogs, hogs, horses, pullets, and so forth. But we might do worse, by way of experiment, than to apply to our candidates for public office the same good sense and open-mindedness with which the prizes are distributed at our county fairs. The average Board of Governors of a gentleman's club might advantageously be tried out as a cabinet. For it is undeniable that a gentleman's impulses to do right, however sadly he may fall into temptation and byways, are stronger than the same impulses in him who is without breeding.

C "Wyoming has taken a sort of shine to me," Mary told Bud. "But her mother wouldn't let her associate with me if she knew about me. Still I'm not bad. I like flowers and birds just as Wyoming does."

C Bud taught Mary to ride and soon the change in her appearance attracted attention. "I thought she was ugly as a mud fence when I first seed her," said McGrégor, "but she's perkin' up."

Your gentleman has everything to lose and nothing to gain. May we have such men for servants in the difficult years to come, and may we live down the disheartening doctrine of Jefferson, who himself a gentleman born and bred, declared that all men are equal. Men have but one equality. They are equal in this: that no man has ever yet been known to feel remorse for the inconvenience he gave his mother in being born.

IN CHICAGO, they heard of a Wyoming ranch which took a few boarders, and on learning by telegram that there were rooms to be had, they decided to give the place a trial and see what it could do to build up Mary and to help her regain the long lost health and cheerfulness.

The room-clerk who had been their informant had taken his wife there over a vacation. She wouldn't be happy till they could go again. She had ridden astride, and caught fish, and camped out. Her health had improved wonderfully. So also her courage. She had gotten so she dared to pat a cow, with only a fence between them and she had lost all of her fear of pigs and chickens and she thrilled at the thought of going back again.

It had occurred to Highland that a woman who isn't physically fit ought to be trained on the same lines along which men who are out of condition are brought into good shape. Food and rest and peace and quiet were not all she needed. Until idleness and opportunity should urge her into some steady occupation, it would interest and amuse him to see something of her lost youth returned to her.

She was weak as a cat when it came to lifting things, or gripping, and a few blocks of quick walking distressed her lungs. But for strolling, dawdling, looking in at shop windows, she had a prodigious endurance—but it was the endurance women always have regardless of their condition.

If he could have read her mind, he would have known that she wished very much to please him, or, if it was out of the question to please him positively, to please him negatively by not displeasing him.

THE RANCH house was low and long and paper thin. One wondered how the thirty-and-forty below zero winds were kept out in winter. They had been assigned to two smallish rooms, on the ground floor, at the extreme south end of the ranch-house veranda. The rates were so low that they could afford a room apiece and so be fairly comfortable.

But Mary thought it would be much more sensible to put up with a little antipathy—and to put the two narrow beds in the inner and darker room, and to use the other for a sitting-room. But she dared make no such suggestion. Peace and three meals a day had been the conditions which she had laid down. She had not looked for affection but for tolerance; she had struck for necessities not luxuries.

She accepted the larger and sunnier room without question. She had learned already that any extra comfort at her expense would have been real discomfort to her husband. He was "old fashioned," and conventional, in spite of that awful debauch that had made them one and inseparable.

That in public he should be most courteous and punctilious towards her was understandable. But she had no past associations upon which to base any understanding of why he should carry the same courtesy and punctiliousness into their privacy. In taking advantage of his drunken state, she had done him an irreparable wrong. Perhaps he had not been on any very exalted height in the world; but there had been respect for him and much that was precious, and she had dragged him down from those heights and hurt his self-respect.

McGregor's boasted a large lounging-room which the guests shared in common with their host and his wife. There was a large fireplace and upon the floor the skins of bears and wolves. Rustic furniture, made of branches with the bark on, and in some cases most ingeniously of elk-horns, all the work of McGregor himself, abounded. For torturing the human frame, the chairs and settees exceeded anything ever devised by the old Spanish inquisitors. The comfortable places were nearly always all taken by somebody else.

There was a girl from Petersburg who wore all the things that cow-girls wear in the movies, and was nearly always at the only writing table addressing postcards, with a photograph of herself on them, to her friends and admirers at home. Her undersized parents, whom she bullied, both took after their daughter in the matter of expropriation; and nearly always might be seen in firm occupancy of the two comfortable chairs the room boasted.

There was a young doctor getting over the flu; three quiet and elderly men upon a fishing excursion; and a bouncing mother with three small and rambunctious boys. To these, add McGregor, Mrs. McGregor, "Strong" McGregor, "Flora," and "Wyoming" McGregor and you have a room full.

Here was no opportunity for learning, reading or even for quiet conversations. Suppose there came a rainy day? Highland was a good mixer and no snob, but he shuddered. He found himself resenting the fact that he had so little opportunity for a private word or two with his wife.

A private sitting-room, if it could be had without hurting the Jeffersonian feelings of the McGregors, would make them wonderfully more comfortable. But it was doubtful if he should attempt to afford one, and upon inquiring, he learned that there was

Q "Isn't love wonderful?" Wyoming asked, and Mary told her: "When a man loves you and you love him, it's sweet and safe and nothing bores or frightens you and nothing counts but just you and him."

none to be had. "Good Lord," he said to himself one day, "why not be practical?"

He asked Mary if she would mind. If she would, why of course, it wasn't to be thought of; but there was such a thing as people who have to live together trying to be good sports about it, so why not move her bed into his room, and make her room into a sort of sitting-room? McGregor said it would be all right and to fire ahead.

"Why, no," she said, "I don't mind if you don't. It seems better sense. Anyway I don't care much about being all alone on the ground floor with the window open, and the coyotes barkin' around all night long."

So the rearrangement was effected.

He had thought that any crowd in any old sort of place would be superior even to the most luxurious surroundings if his new wife had to be in them. But this was not true. He preferred her company in the little sitting-room to the McGregors and their guests in the big room.

Except for the fact of her existence, she did nothing to bother him. If she was bored, she did not show it. If she was dissatisfied, she made no complaint.

Her training began. It amused him, and the fact that he cared to take any trouble with her whatever pleased her.

THE MORE he recalled his own training days, and the methods of his trainers, the more interested he became.

"Of course, you get out of breath," he would say. "You have no room in your lungs. Stand up straight."

When they walked, he watched her.

"Make your stride from here, and don't turn your toes out so far. Hold your head up and your shoulders back."

One day, he picked up a flat stone and made her walk with it balanced on the top of her head.

That made them both laugh. It was the first time they had ever laughed together at anything that was in their own lives, and not outside of it, like Charlie Chaplin.

In the morning and at night, he made her do deep-breathing exercises, and all manner of calisthenics.

In the beginning, she acquired assorted lamenesses here and there. She thought for a time, though she made no complaint, that she had injured her spine. But all she had done was to start the flabby muscles growing.

She was only twenty. She came along very fast. They borrowed a divided skirt from Miss Wyoming McGregor, and he taught her to ride.

"Bud," said Mr. McGregor one day (it was his practice to find out his guests' first names and call them by them—he would have Georged or Alberted a Bishop on first meeting him), "that air wife o' yourn's takin' on flesh. First time I seed her I thot she was ugly ez a mud fence, but damned if she ain't perkin' up."

She was indeed. She had a coat now of clear brown tan with a certain rosiness beneath. The look of one who hunts and is hunted was seldom in her eyes now. She was so young and feeling so much better that it is possible there were whole moments in which she forgot that her life was behind her.

The changes in her appearance were by no means magical; to Highland, they were negligible. But if he had seen her, well, that first time, and not again till now, it is doubtful if he would have recognized her.

Various problems confronted her; of their nature he remained for some weeks ignorant. Then she told him.

"Wyoming," she said, "has taken a sort of shine to me, wants me to do things with her, and I don't know how you want me to be with people. She's a sweet, good girl, and you can bet her mother wouldn't let her associate with me if she knew about me."

She hesitated a moment and then said: "Honest to God, I don't believe I feel a bit different from the way she does. I like flowers and birds, too. And she says I can help her skim the cream off the milk. And she said if you'd buy me some wool, she'd teach me to knit a sweater."

It was as if someone had laid a hand on his shoulder, and said, "Here, pay attention. This is pathetic. Look in her eyes. Can't you see she's half starved for the things that most girls of her age just naturally have? For sentiment, for ideals, for pipe-dreams. . . . Can't you fling the poor dog a bone?"

Her eyes filled suddenly with tears. "I'm not bad," she cried, "When you throw your clothes on the floor I like to pick them up and fold them. . . ."

She didn't say those words, she cried them, and then she cried and cried and Bud had no comfort for her.

Have you ever thought on beholding Romeo climb to the balcony and take the fair Juliet in his arms, that perhaps she earns more salary than he does and he gets better press notices than she does, and that they hate each other like poison? Yet, if the salaries are to go on, and the press notices are to go on, they must climb and kiss night after night as if they adored each other and knew nothing of hatred.

"Why, you poor little trout," said Highland, and with the gesture of a man who is fond enough of his wife to put his arm around her. "There—there."

There was no reason why she shouldn't play around with Wyoming. Knowing how to skim milk and to knit might come in handy some day. They might decide to have a little ranch of their own. Now wouldn't she please stop crying? She was getting to be so nice looking, everybody said that! He's had more compliments for her, but if she didn't stop crying she'd make herself look like thirty cents, and every one would think he'd been a brute to her. She didn't want people to think he'd been a brute to her, if he hadn't, did she? But perhaps he had. In that case why go ahead and cry. He was too old for her. She needed people of her own age to play with. He understood perfectly. She had done well. Damned well! If any one asked him what sort of a wife she'd made him, he'd have to tell the truth. He'd have to admit that so far as it lay in her power she had been a good wife to him. Now would she stop crying and wash her face; or did she want him to hold her and wash it for her?

Rare times they had together, she and Wyoming! Wyoming was a good girl, and a sweet girl. Flora was in love, and to be married in the spring. He was such a dandy man, and doing so well. Everybody thought the world of him. But Wyoming herself had never even had a mash on anyone; but she guessed that if she ever did fall in love, she'd stick to him even if he beat her, and held up trains, and had been in prison.

MARY had never been in love either, for that matter. It's only your Juliet who falls in love before she's fifteen. Now she longed to let herself go, and be just what she felt, a young girl, just Wyoming's age. As some men are tempted by drink, so Mary was tempted to tell Wyoming that she had never been in love either. She wanted to put heads together with Wyoming and imagine what being in love would be like.

But to have made any such confession would have been an insult to her husband and a betrayal of trust. So she felt bound to assume an age and condition which she did not feel, and to assume the wild, generous, reckless, delicious, nonsensical knowledge that she had never had. Wasn't love wonderful, Mary? It was the most wonderful thing in the world, Wyoming. It—it was like being up on a hill, bareheaded when the wind blows. It was like the way a kitten feels, when it purrs and there is still some cream on its whiskers to be licked off. It was like the way a dog feels when he's been alone all day and hears his master coming and can't wait till he's in sight.

"When a man loves you and you love him it's so sweet and safe being together, and nothing ever bores you or frightens you, and nothing else counts but just you and him. You'd always thought you wanted jewels and automobiles, and you find you never had at all. And love? It wiped all your meanness away, all your crankiness. If you still wanted things, it was not for yourself you wanted them, but for him. . . . Oh, Wyoming, you are just a child! You don't know what you are talking about! How could there be anything terrible about love? Or anything low and awful, when it's the very purest thing there is?"

Wyoming was going to be a better wife for having known Mary. Mary was going to be the happier, because by the sheer weight of pretending and imagining, she had broken down the dark walls that had surrounded her adolescence, and seen a vision of the truth.

They would have stayed with the kindly McGregors till the first snows came to drive them away, if it had not been that one day McGregor asked Highland if he knew a fellow in New York named Jonathan Bell, and of course Highland did, because Jonathan Bell was such a famous all-around sportsman that everybody knew him. Yes, Highland did know him, why? Nothing, only he'd written for rooms, he was going to make McGregor's a base for big-game trips into the mountains.

They had to go of course, then. Bell would be along in a few days. He would know all about Highland's marriage. He wouldn't mean to, but he might possibly let something slip.

"But they'll tell him we've been here, and he'll tell McGregor about us, and Wyoming will [Continued on page 118]

Remember Lapidowitz?

It has been quite a while since Bruno Lessing put this most human of all Jewish characters into fiction and Leone Bracker's pictures made him familiar to every magazine reader.
Here is the old combination once again,
and funnier than ever

Lapidowitz Dines Out

By Bruno Lessing

Illustrated by M. Leone Bracker

THIS story begins in two places, at the same time. This may seem, at first blush, a violation of the law of matter. But, having nothing to blush for, we shall endeavor to explain the mystery to your satisfaction.

At 2:15 of a Thursday afternoon Milken, the husky owner of Milken's Café on the East Side, threw Lapidowitz out of his place. At the same moment Mrs. Moritsky of East Seventy-second Street hired a new cook.

Astrologers would probably be able to drag in a third place by proving that the constellation of Alakazam was in conjunction with the planet Tabasco and that, therefore, all that happened could not possibly have helped happening. Be that as it may, starting a story in two places is bad enough.

Milken had been dozing in a chair in the corner of his café when Lapidowitz entered and woke him.

"I need five dollars," said Lapidowitz. "Will you lend them to me?"

It had taken Milken fully half a minute to rub his eyes and become thoroughly awake. And then he had addressed Lapidowitz in these words—the translation is expurgated:

"You dirty schnorrer! You big bum! You've been coming in here for a whole year and sponging on me and you never paid back a cent. You're too lazy to work and you're too dishonest to even tell the truth. And now you have the cheek to wake me up out of a sound sleep and ask for money. Here is what I will give you."

When Lapidowitz picked himself up from the spot on the sidewalk on which he had landed, it was without the slightest feeling of resentment toward Milken. He merely felt heart-broken that Milken had misunderstood him. So he went home and wrote Milken a letter which was delivered at once. "Little did you know what I wanted those five dollars for," he wrote. "I know a lady with five children who is starving and I wanted to get her something to eat. Now she will have to go hungry. I will never enter your place again. You have broken my heart. After so many years of friendship it is too much to be endured in silence."

And then he added a postscript.

"Could you make it two dollars?"

The story of the starving woman was a pure invention. Lapidowitz merely wanted Milken to feel badly.

LAPIDOWITZ had found an opportunity of buying a news-stand on a street corner for fifty dollars. The owner insisted upon receiving five dollars on account but was willing to wait a month for the payment of the balance. The news-stand appealed to Lapidowitz because he had figured out a scheme of employing a small boy to run it who would relieve him of all the work and hand him the profits each week. Many a greater financier has been attracted by such a scheme.

Moritsky was giving a reception and supper that night. His wife, who was Hungarian, telephoned to his office in the afternoon and unburdened her agitated mind.

"The cook left this morning and I sent to the agency for a new one," she said. "She just came. She got fine letters of reference what says she is a beautiful cook. Only she's from Lithuania and she can't talk a word of English or German or Hungarian. What shall I do?"

"Why don't you hire a cook you can talk to?" demanded her husband. Mrs. Moritsky shrugged her shoulders—which Mr. Moritsky, at the other end of the telephone, failed to observe.

"It's too late now," she replied. "The agency ain't got any more and the things is coming in from the grocery."

"Can't she go ahead by herself?"

"How could she?" asked Mrs. Moritsky, extending her palm, helplessly. "I want the garlic in the spinach cooked only half an hour and the currants in the pancakes—not the raisins—and the sauce for the strudel got to be——"

"Say," cried her husband. "I got customers in the office. D'ye think I got time to listen to a cook-book all day long? Telephone down to Milken's Café and tell him to send up somebody what talks good Lithuanian Yiddish who can be a interpreter. And don't bother me. Good-by!"

And so it happened that just after the boy had handed Milken Lapidowitz's letter and Milken was grinning over its contents, the telephone bell rang.

"This is Mrs. Moritsky," said a female voice, and Milken, recognizing the name, placed his hand upon his chest and made a profound bow. "Could you send up anybody what can talk to a Lithuanian cook and tell her what I want? We're giving a party tonight and it's very important. I'll pay five dollars to anybody what will help out."

As long as it was not his own money that was involved, Milken felt generous toward Lapidowitz, in consequence of which the boy brought back a message to the schnorrer to hasten to Mr. Moritsky's house in East Seventy-second Street where he would find five dollars awaiting him.

The name of Moritsky impressed Lapidowitz. He knew it well and he had often felt that if he were on sufficiently intimate terms with the prosperous merchant to discuss financial matters, Moritsky would be good for, at least, fifty dollars at a time.

MRS. MORITSKY gazed rather dubiously at the imposing figure that presented itself as interpreter. She had not expected a man with a beard and a silk hat.

"Could you speak Lithuanian Yiddish?" she asked, somewhat dubiously.

"Lady," said Lapidowitz, drawing himself to his full height, "Mr. Milken said you was going to give me five dollars for making a translation. For five dollars I could talk Chinese Yiddish and get myself understood."

A few minutes later he found himself gazing upon a stout, perspiring but not unattractive-looking cook.

1. Moritsky stared at the schnorrer suspiciously. "Who are you?" he asked. "My friend Milken sent me up to be an interpreter by the cook," Lapidowitz explained.

C. "A cook what is a cook," said Lapidowitz, "could hold up her head with lots of them bum ladies."

"Ask her if she knows how to cook a strudel," said Mrs. Moritsky speaking to the grand Lapidowitz.

"Lady," said Lapidowitz, reproachfully, "couldn't you tell by her face that she's a fine strudel cooker? Anyway, just to satisfy you, I ask her."

He turned to the cook who was admiring his silk hat.

"What a fine pair of eyes you got," he said, in Yiddish. "What's your name?"

"Tina Dobrovitch," replied the cook, with an amiable smile.

"Well, Tina, the old girl wants to know if you can cook strudel. I told her it was an insult to ask you."

The expression of the cook's face as she turned to Mrs. Moritsky convinced her on the instant that Tina could cook a strudel as never strudel was cooked.

"Good," said Mrs. Moritsky. "I got to go and dress now and look after everything. Here is what I want her to do for supper," continued the hostess.

Lapidowitz carefully listened to her instructions and jotted down a few notes as a reminder.

"You needn't worry, lady," said he. "I'll take charge of the cook and the kitchen. Everything will be all right."

The moment that Mrs. Moritsky left the kitchen he turned towards the cook and smiled: Lapidowitz had a winning smile.

"Could you cook a steak or a chop or something like that for me?" he asked. "I didn't have no lunch today."

Tina fairly beamed upon him. It was the first time in her life that a tall man with a beard who wore a silk hat had ever asked her to cook for him and the subtle flattery of it appealed to her as a woman and as a real cook.

"Come and see what is in the ice-box," she said, "and I'll cook anything you want."

Lapidowitz, after a careful scrutiny of the ice-box's contents, selected a couple of fat and tempting squabs.

"You better broil them," he said. "It's the quickest."

While Tina busied herself with her task Lapidowitz sprawled out in one of the kitchen chairs and took hasty stock of the possibilities of the situation.

"Are you married, Tina?" he asked. She blushed and shook her head.

"Neither am I," said he. "Just keep that in your mind. Tina. You ain't married and I ain't married. Nobody can ever tell what could come out of such a situation. I ain't saying 'yes' and I ain't saying 'no.' I just want to give you a chance to think about it. You never know what could happen. I got a great reputation on the East Side, but I ain't proud. A cook what is a cook could hold up her head with lots of them bum ladies."

LAPIDOWITZ did not trouble himself to tell her just what kind of a reputation he had. Tina was greatly impressed. When the squabs were cooked to a turn she set them before him and watched him as he devoured them.

"Tina," he said, wiping his mouth with the back of his hand, "you certainly are a great cook. If I could raise a few hundred dollars you and I could start a restaurant what would create a sensation. You would be cook and I would be cashier."

"I would love that," said Tina. "Could I have other girls to help me? They say it's hard work in a restaurant."

"Maybe," replied the schnorrer. "But in the beginning I wouldn't let anybody cook but you until we got our reputation. Then we could sell out. What kind of a man is this Moritsky?"

"I don't know," said Tina. "I just came."

"That's so, you don't know any more than me. Well, we'll just stick together. You do what I say and I'll do what you say. Now go ahead with the supper. I want to go upstairs and see what kind of a place they got."

The "place" made a profound impression upon Lapidowitz. True, a connoisseur in interior decoration would have been pained by Moritsky's fondness for red plush, highly colored carpets, glaring wall paper and highly polished black walnut furniture, but, then, Lapidowitz was not a connoisseur in interior decoration. The parlor and the library seemed to him to be the acme of luxury in furnishing.

"Two thousand dollars if it cost a cent," he murmured, gazing about him. He heard the door bell ring and, presently, an elderly man with wavy white hair entered the room.

"I guess I'm early," he remarked. "But I didn't have anything else to do so I thought I could just as well kill time here. Is Mr. Moritsky home yet?"

"Not yet," said Lapidowitz. "I'm waiting for him."

"I'm Meyer Mandelbaum," explained the visitor. "Ladies' underwear. But my son runs the business."

"My name is Lapidowitz," replied the schnorrer, and they shook hands.

"What line?" asked Mandelbaum, with the merchant's curiosity as to the other's business.

"Oh, just one line after another!" explained Lapidowitz. "Just now I'm interested in news-stands. I got a good thing for anyone what cares to go into it. For fifty dollars I could buy a news-stand over on Delancey Street——"

"It looks like it's going to rain," observed Mandelbaum, strolling away.

"Would fifty dollars make a lot of difference to you?" asked Lapidowitz, following him. Mandelbaum turned and looked him over carefully from head to foot.

"No more than a pair of eyes or a lung or a liver," he replied, icily. "If Mr. Moritsky is a friend of yours, he could easy lend you fifty dollars."

AT THAT moment Moritsky entered and greeted them.

"Hello, Mandelbaum," he cried, cheerfully. "You ain't taking any chances on being late. How-de-do," to Lapidowitz. "A friend of Mandelbaum's?"

"I never seen him before," said Mandelbaum, quickly. "I thought he was a friend of yours."

Moritsky stared at the schnorrer.

"Who are you? How did you get here?" he demanded.

"My friend Milken sent me up," explained Lapidowitz. "He said you wanted an interpreter by the cook."

"Oh, I see!" said Moritsky, good naturedly. "That's all right. Just make yourself to home and if you don't see what you want ask for it. But I guess maybe you'd better go down in the kitchen."

"Could I talk with you on a matter of business for a minute?" asked Lapidowitz, with an ingratiating smile.

THAT steeley look which, it seemed to the schnorrer, always came into wealthy men's faces when he mentioned money to them, came into Moritsky's countenance.

"Business?" he said, sharply. "I never talk business at home. I only samoos about it," and he, too, wandered away.

"For fifty dollars, which I could pay back to you on the instalment plan," began Lapidowitz, when Moritsky interrupted.

"Just wait a minute while I telephone," he said. He went upstairs to his bedroom and called up Milken.

"Say, what kind of lunatic did you send up to my house to talk to the cook?"

"You mean Lapidowitz?" said Milken's voice. "I thought you knew him. Down in this neighborhood everybody knows him. He's just a plain schnorrer."

Schnorrer! Moritsky promptly hung up the receiver. His mental vision of the beggar, the social outcast, the hopeless, helpless scamp depicted by the word "schnorrer," was perfectly clear. He returned to the parlor and strode towards Lapidowitz with a mien and an air which instantly convinced the schnorrer that Moritsky now knew all about him.

"Go down to the kitchen and stay there," he said. "If I want to tell something to the cook I'll come down."

"What's fifty dollars to a rich man like you?" asked Lapidowitz. "I'll have five dollars to pay cash and the rest——"

Moritsky pinched Lapidowitz's coat sleeve gingerly between his thumb and forefinger and led him out into the hall.

"Go downstairs to the kitchen before I kick you down," he said. Lapidowitz went downstairs to the kitchen.

"Tina," he said, "there ain't no hurry about the supper. They don't know whether they will want any or not. I'll tell you when to start cooking. Do you know how to cook eggs with raisins—like a pudding?"

"Sure I do," said Tina, proudly. "In my last place they was always crazy about them and I made one every week."

"Let's see how you do it," said Lapidowitz, calmly. Within ten minutes, the cook set before him the tempting dish known to epicures as kaiserschmarn, in regard to which—if one had time—several chapters interesting and intense, could be written.

"Now listen to me, Tina," said Lapidowitz, when the last morsel had vanished from the plate. "That man will be coming down here soon and try to make trouble. But don't you bother about him. I'll take care of everything. You do just what I tell you and I'll see you get something extra. Remember, you ain't married and I ain't married. Just keep on thinking about that."

The guests had begun to arrive. Mrs. Moritsky, in a wonderfully colored evening gown—it combined most of the colors of the rainbow—was standing upon the threshold of the parlor greeting each arrival, when a maid approached her.

"Could I talk to you for a second?"

"I'm terribly busy now," said the mistress, frowning.

"Oh, all right!" said the maid. "Only I don't think there is going to be any supper tonight."

"What's the matter?" asked Mrs. Moritsky, in alarm.

"The cook is playing cards with that man with the whiskers down [Continued on page 131]

1. "I need five dollars," said Lapidowitz. "Will you lend them to me?" "Here's what I'll give you!" cried Milken—and he threw the schnorrer quietly into the street.

PROHIBITION Has Made Good

By Woods Hutchinson, M.D.

JUST wait, said the ever present skeptics, until you begin to count the cost of prohibition, then it won't seem such a good thing. We have waited and here is the first definite accounting

IN THE past two tempestuous years, the numerous false wigs and masquerading costumes of the Alcohol Problem have been stripped off, one after another.

Alcohol isn't and never was a food. It isn't essential to health, or needed as a medicine. It isn't necessary as a source of revenue. Its taboo does not and will not paralyze business, or throw any body of men out of employment, or ruin any class of fruit growers or farmers.

The simple, sole, central and final problem to which we have at last come down squarely is, "Can we stand the jolts of life's highway without a narcotic shock-absorber? Can we do without a pair of rose-colored, spirituous spectacles for occasional wear?"

Alcohol is not a food, for the simple and sufficient reason that, to put it very crudely, it is some thirty times as poisonous as it is nourishing. The utmost amount of it that we can possibly burn clean and turn into heat or work in twenty-four hours is two ounces, while our body gas-engine demands the fuel value of sixty-four ounces of alcohol (that is, two quarts of alcohol or five quarts of raw whiskey) every day to keep it running properly. So that if we undertook to live on alcohol we should have to take our choice between starving to death, if we limited ourselves to one-thirty-second of a ration, which we would utilize without injury, or speedily dying dead drunk (in technical terms, of "acute alcoholic intoxication"), if we attempted to engulf our five bottles of whiskey daily.

What a joke alcohol really is, in the way of food, may be glimpsed from another point of view in the light of our recent experiences. The steady soakers and habitual drunkards at one end of the social scale and the feather-wits who love to consider themselves fast and fashionable, dwellers in the land of Lobsteria and baskers in the glare of White Lights, at the other, probably drink almost as much as they did before the drought. But the overwhelming mass of the ninety per cent of decent hard-working, self-respecting citizens all over the country are consuming at least fifty per cent and probably nearer sixty-five per cent less than they did before the Constitutional Amendment.

The net result, even after allowing for all the attempted consumption of home brew high explosives, is that less than a third as many tons of good, wholesome, nutritious grains, fruits and roots are being turned into alcohol as formerly. As only about one-fourth of the total food value, or fuel energy of the barley, corn, apples, grapes, etc., distilled, is recovered in the form of alcohol, this means that thousands of tons of nourishing bread and cereals and appetizing and refreshing fruits are placed upon the markets and in the grocers' windows for use upon our tables, without extra charge.

In other words, even supposing—which is far, far from the truth—that all the alcohol produced was consumed well within the two ounces a day limit of clean combustion, the nation has gained four times as much food value as it has lost, by wiping out the alcohol industry.

The quality of this saving has been even more important than its quantity, for the amount involved is so great that the law has practically placed fresh fruit free, on every table in the land every day in the year. What that means to the health, welfare, and comfort of children can scarcely be over estimated in the light of our recent discoveries of the priceless, life-giving value of those growth-foods, known as vitamins. These are abundant in fresh fruits and fruit juices, but are totally destroyed and lost in the processes of fermenting and distilling.

CAREFUL and thorough researches in the laboratory, undertaken in a last despairing attempt to discover and prove some point of value and wholesomeness in beer and wine, have utterly failed to disclose even a trace of vitamins in the sparkling cup.

This satisfactorily explains the apparent paradox that the California wine-grape growers who, when the prohibitory law was first passed, were on the point of digging up their vines and putting down their land to some other crop, instead of losing their market and facing financial ruin, have had, and still have, the keenest demand for all the grapes they can possibly raise at the highest prices that they have ever known.

The farmer, or merchant, or working man has simply taken the money that he had formerly spent upon wine and beer for himself, and applied it to buying grapes and apples and oranges and butter and milk and ice-cream and green vegetables for his wife and children.

No wine ever yet vinted is one-fifth as "strengthening" as the grapes out of which it is made, having lost all its vitamins and much of its iron; no beer however cooling and comforting one-third as nutritious as the barley which was destroyed to brew it; no bitter ale or stout is half as good a tonic and digestion-improver as the malt and hops which have gone into it, or the clear, fresh, bitter of grape-fruit or lettuce, or green chicory. Indeed, these fresh fruits and green vegetables and crimson tomatoes and golden carrots and cabbage and alfalfa, with their heavy charge of vitamins, have been found to be the only real appetizers, Nature's own digestive tonics and stomach bitters.

One of the most heart-broken and genuine outcries of distress and dismay that rose towards the sky when the shadow of the Great Drought began to threaten was the bitter plaint of those worthy mothers in Israel who simply couldn't see how they were going to get along without a big bottle of "good old whisky" on the top shelf of their home medicine chest. The very idea of trying to keep house without it, especially in country districts, miles away from a doctor, was like going to sleep at night with the door unlocked, or having a funeral best parlor without a family Bible.

YESTERDAY

By John Sloan

One of the most significant and revealing results of the new law and as unexpected as it was interesting, was a finding recently reported in our great national medical paper, The Journal of the American Medical Association.

Careful inquiry was made covering 112,000 practicing physicians scattered throughout the Union, with the startling result that of all this number of busy doctors, in active practice in great cities, in state capitals, in industrial centers, in country towns and in rural districts, only 33,379, less than one-third, had thought it worth while to take out their permits to prescribe whisky or brandy for medicinal purposes. A more impressive proof of the light esteem in which alcohol is held for remedial purposes could hardly have been imagined.

The number of physicians covered is the total licensed to practice medicine in the twenty-four states which permit doctors to prescribe whisky or brandy; the remaining states by local laws forbid absolutely either the writing or the filling of prescriptions for whisky or brandy.

One statement can now be made with absolute sureness, and that is that all over the country has occurred a most unmistakable and striking decline in the general death rate from all causes, until it has now reached its most triumphant low-water mark in all recorded history.

Just as a single illustration to serve as a type of all the rest, the death rate for the entire United States has fallen in the last three years from 14.2 to 12.3 per thousand, or a saving of over 200,000 lives per year. Certain of our great cities, New York for instance, have actually, in some of their monthly rates, fallen below twelve and gone down well towards eleven per thousand.

It is true that this downward trend of the death rate was under way before prohibition and therefore we can not claim that the improvement in public health, which has accompanied the years of drought, has been solely or even chiefly caused by the lessened use of alcohol. Yet it is also true that this downward trend of the death rate has been distinctly accelerated since the adoption of prohibition.

SO THAT as far as any lowering of the vigor and vitality of the nation from deprivation of our customary daily glass of wine and beer is concerned, we can bluntly and positively say that the three years have not yielded one shred of evidence in its support.

For example, the disease which has shown the greatest falling off in its mortality, is tuberculosis—a disease, the chief and almost only weapon against which is abundance of good food, good housing and sleep in the open air. Saving the money which had been worse than wasted on alcohol and applying it to the four or five times as much health and nutritive value which it would purchase in the form of good food, better housing and clothing and sleeping porches, to say nothing of country and sea-side vacations, and basket suppers in the parks, has already cut down the death rate from this dead malady nearly twenty percent and saved the nation tens of thousands of lives.

Almost unanimous reports from public school teachers, school and district nurses, welfare workers among the poor, intelligent police chiefs and heads of charitable organizations, show that never, in all their experience, has there been so striking an improvement in the feeding, the clothing, the general comfort and welfare of school children as within the last two years.

Children are making better progress in their studies, not only because they are better clothed and fed, but because they come to school less tired and exhausted by the various kinds of wage-earning jobs and errands, which they are no longer obliged to undertake now that fathers turn over four-fifths of their wages

— AND TODAY

By John Sloan

to the mothers instead of drinking up half or even two-thirds of them in the saloons.

One of the most surprising fiascos of all the brooding prophecies of evils sure to be brought down upon us by prohibition was that concerned with the use of narcotics.

We happen to be in an unusually favorable position to get at the facts of this problem because of the Harrison law and other similar state laws, requiring rigid recording and reporting of all narcotic drugs prescribed or sold.

The first six months went by without any change in either the number of drug addicts or the amount of narcotics consumed. This was explained on the supposition that all habitual users of alcohol to excess had been warned so far in advance that they had been able to lay in private stocks.

But a year passed with still no change and finally it dawned upon us that the cutting off of alcohol had not made the slightest increase in the number of so-called "dope fiends."

To take a few representative samples! In Milwaukee at the city Emergency Hospital, while the number of alcoholics treated fell from 258 in 1917 to 171 in 1919, the cases of drug addictions had increased from seventeen to twenty-one, all old habitués.

In the chief and best-known private sanatorium for the care of alcoholic and drug addicts in New England, that of Dr. Frederic Taylor, in Boston, the number of morphine users, etc., had remained the same and all of them had contracted the habit long before prohibition.

The Department of Health of Los Angeles reports that of 500 registered drug addicts on their lists only three claim to have acquired the habit since the prohibition law went into effect.

The Health Commissioner of Denver reports that the use of drugs and narcotics has not increased since the amendment.

The Judge of the Municipal Court of Portland, Oregon, after carefully studying the cases of narcotic indulgence brought before him, declares that prohibition has had no appreciable effect upon these cases.

This gratifying state of affairs exists to this day as attested by scores of reports from every part of the country. The only exception is in the City of New York, where the known habitual victims of the drug habit have slightly increased in number.

Recently, I attended a meeting of a national medical association, whose delegates represented something like 40,000 physicians scattered all over the United States. I took the opportunity to put the question, "What do you think about prohibition? Does it work, and if so, how?" to about thirty or forty of the leading men from various sections of the country.

It has been my own estimate that the actual amount of liquor consumed by the whole community had been cut down fifty percent to sixty-five percent; to my surprise, however, the lowest estimate of reduction, advanced by those men of thirty to fifty years of experience, was eighty percent and some ran as high as ninety-five percent.

Here in this country we have something like seventeen million souls fully fifty percent if not seventy-five percent of whom have been in the habit of using alcoholic beverages as regularly and as habitually as we use tea, coffee, or milk. The first reaction of these Italian, Slav, Hungarian, Greek new-come citizens was naturally one of bewilderment and dismay. What would they do, how could they live without their good wine, their strengthening beer, their consoling whisky?

Many of them promptly dug up ancient recipes, or consulted the grandfathers and grandmothers of their little cluster and proceeded to manufacture their own supplies by home brewing and vinting, with fair success and satisfaction. But there was nevertheless a deep and disturbing sense of real grievance over what they felt was a wanton blow at their personal liberty and at the happiness of themselves and their families.

But it was not long before a change came over the vision of Pietro and Alessandro and Eleutheros.

"Da wife say she lika da law, more mon for eggs and butter and fruit for da bambini, more shoes for da ragazzo, more pretty dresses for Maria Annunziata to wear to high school. Me, I don't like eet, but—I get less headache, maka more mon, buya da house and lot sooner, taka da wife and children to da movies instead sit round in da saloon."

TODAY it would hardly be too much to say that there is no body of opinion of the same size more solidly and loyally behind the new law than that of our latest-come and newest-born citizens, whose eager devotion to the flag and to what they believe to be the ideals and the standards of America, put many of our Pilgrim or blue bloods to the blush.

One of the aspects of the problem into which very careful inquiry has been made both in person and by letter, is the effect of the new law upon strikes, lockouts, picket riots and labor difficulties generally. Three facts seem to stand out fairly definitely and positively.

First, that the men when deprived of their accustomed means of enjoyment and exhilaration were a little more ready to resent what they regarded as infringements upon their rights.

Secondly, when they did strike, they were more likely to be upon sound and reasonable grounds, and so with a better chance of winning.

The number of strikes and lockouts in this country since prohibition has not only been no greater, but distinctly less, than in European countries which have no prohibition. And such strikes as have occurred have been most gratifyingly freer from rioting, bloodshed and loss of life than in pre-prohibition days.

As to the influence of partial alcohol-free conditions upon crime, this has been in part obvious and just what might have been expected and in part rather eyebrow-raising. Naturally, there has been a marked falling off, first in plain drunks, second in drunk-and-disorderlies, and third in assault-and-batteries; of what might be called casual and even convivial misdemeanors.

Offences which, though sometimes grave, are not committed with premeditation and malice aforethought come next. The percentage of reduction in these groups runs fairly even in the reports from all quarters and sources, about fifty percent to sixty percent, and as these three great groups, drunk, drunk-and-disorderly and assault-and-battery make up something like four-fifths of all crimes, there has been a well marked thinning of jail populations and lightening of the work of our police courts.

Many jails have been not merely emptied, but closed for lack of "patronage" and in several states, it is being urged that all criminals from county and municipal courts be taken care of in State penitentiaries, and the local jails, prisons, and workhouses converted to other uses.

A SIMILAR and parallel falling off has occurred on the medical side in the number of cases of acute alcoholism received at our great hospitals and of alcoholic insanity at our public asylums. But the most striking diminution of all has occurred in the cases of delirium tremens, which have fallen off not fifty or sixty but eighty to ninety percent and in some cases disappeared entirely.

In Boston, for instance, there were 20,000 fewer arrests in the first year following prohibition.

In Milwaukee, the number of drunk and disorderly arrests have fallen from 1,620 to 731 since the law, and the total of arrests from all causes from 4,800 to 1,950.

In a very thoughtful and able summary of the situation, the Municipal Judge of Portland, Oregon, Judge Rossman, states that barely three to five percent of the men brought before him for drunkenness are under thirty and the remainder had acquired their thirst long before the law. That the habitual drunks are coming in less frequently and that very few young men are becoming confirmed drunkards. "In fact it is so rare for a young man to be arrested on a drunk charge that it always evokes attention."

That in spite of the crime wave in the reaction following the war, prohibition has a materially lessening effect upon crime.

In Portland, Maine, the total number of arrests for all causes has dropped from 6,459 in 1917 to 1,624 in 1920.

In the great Philadelphia General Hospital, the cases of alcoholism have dropped from 2,326 in 1918 to 808 in 1920.

In Cleveland, the deaths from acute alcoholism have fallen from seventy-seven in 1917 to eleven in 1920.

But in the remaining ten to fifteen percent of serious crimes assault-with-intent-to-do-great-bodily-hurt, assault-with-intent-to-kill, burglary, hold-ups and homicide, there has been, in many quarters, a distinct increase, ranging from twenty percent for burglary, to fifty percent for hold-ups and homicide.

In other words, crimes which require courage and vigor of a certain sort and a distinct amount of more or less intelligent planning in advance have shown little or no diminution, because the absence or shortage of liquor has kept this class of criminals' eye and hand steadier and brain clearer to carry out their nefarious designs.

Unfortunately, the cutting off of the criminals' supply of liquor seems to have produced no similar vivifying and strengthening effect upon the intelligence of the police. The net result, because of this regrettable situation, has been rather disconcerting to the community at large.

ODD straws which have floated in during the course of this study and which are not without significance, are statements from several large employers of labor that there is a falling off of accidents in their mills and factories and a diminution in the amount of valuable raw material wasted or spoiled. Also there has been an increase in bank deposits of from $1,300,561,000 to $1,736,322,000 from 1917 to 1920 in Milwaukee.

There has been an astounding increase in the number of eating places in many communities, lunch counters, dairy lunches, food shops, soda-water fountains, and ice cream parlors. In one of the boroughs of New York City the number leaped from 2,000 before the "dust-storm" to 14,000 one year later, showing that people are both amusing themselves and eating instead of drinking. No kind of poison that the human stomach can brew unaided and at short notice out of pure, wholesome food can rival alcohol in toxicity for a moment. It takes weeks and a mash tub or still to do that.

Incidentally in this connection alcohol did great harm not only positive but "negative" to the thirsty laborer, or perspiring citizen in the dog-days. When you perspire freely you sweat out through your skin gallons of water per day instead of the ordinary pints, and you must pour into yourself equivalent amounts of water or suffer serious "drying" and general damage to your system.

A "glass of cool beer" prevents this balancing precisely because by its narcotic effect it quenches thirst long before a proper amount of water has been taken. If you drank enough beer to really physiologically quench your thirst and make good your perspiration loss, you'd be dead drunk.

Furthermore, these ice cream sodas and fruit sodas and egg-shakes and milk-shakes contain substantial amounts of real food, and are often accompanied by cakes, cookies, doughnuts or sandwiches. It is positively comical though profoundly cheering to watch the huge amounts of these "pink tea" refreshments consumed nowadays by great husky coal-heavers and teamsters and ditch diggers, because they find they can work better on them. I saw one strapping expressman down two huge ice-cream sodas one right after the other, and the druggist told me he often took five or six in the course of a day.

FINALLY we come to the last, and in ultimate analysis, most fundamental problem of the alcohol habit. Can we face the trials of life without alcohol's consolations and illusions?

In the words of Wallace Irwin's famous Japanese schoolboy, "Answer is Yes!" But as to just how, the answer, it must be admitted, is still open.

To what agencies and influences can we look to dull the wire edge of the Weltschmerz, to benumb us to the grim clutch of circumstances, to rose-color the gray, monotonous drudgery of every-day toil, to give us a hope of better things to come, even if only a temporary gleam?

It is urgent that some great public agency, Church, Y. M. C. A., K. C., Y. M. H. A., the municipality, or the State should take over and intelligently study and administer the whole problem of recreation, of social pleasures, of music, the drama and the creative arts and crafts. Why not have a Commissioner of Happiness, as well as of Health, in the Department of Public Welfare?

There is no need for any elaborate apparatus or equipment. The one keenest, most constant, never-failing, undying interest people have is just their interest in one another. The favorite study of mankind is man.

PLAY of the Month

When you read the Play of the Month you do not have to wait until next season for a traveling company to bring you the dramas New York is enjoying this season.

© Strauss-Peyton

KIKI

David Belasco's adaptation from the French of André Picard

EVEN the star of a music hall insists upon the right to be temperamental and Paulette D'Avril, of the "Folies Monplaisir," was all of that. As a result, the rehearsal had ended in a row and stage manager Joly was in a bad temper. The fact that Paulette had been divorced by the music hall manager, Victor Renal, did not make things any better—particularly as Renal, more than half inclined to make it up with Paulette, had become jealous of the squeaky voiced tenor. That certainly had something to do with the trouble.

Anyway, at the curtain's rise Joly came in demanding to see Renal. Brulé, once Renal's trench companion and now guard of the back door, answered laconically.

Courtesy of David Belasco, Producer.

Lenore Ulric, herself, and in her impersonation of the irrepressible Kiki—the bewildering product of the Paris music halls—in which she has created a new stage character.

When a little later Renal, who had "run out of the place as though someone had set him on fire," entered he told Joly he would have to let Paulette go. The talk was interrupted by a fight outside between two girls—one of them the "little insect who wears a long feather." Joly discharged them both. Renal, later, told Brulé, emphatically, "out of the theater Paulette goes today." In order to put his threat into execution, he sent for the star and while waiting for her appearance, Brulé was left in charge. But Brulé's authority was outraged for into the office my legs in 'em for the first time today. He ought to pay for 'em. The big—(suddenly spies rip in waist) Oh, my God! He's torn my waist—see?

RENAL—I see. It's a pity. But you shouldn't have got into a fight with my back door-keeper. It's not done in this theater.

KIKI—You mean music hall, don't you? My skirt, my nice new skirt. It's a damned shame. Got a pin?

RENAL—Here's one. I suppose you have something very important to say to me.

KIKI (pinning at her skirt)—You bet.

RENAL—Then be quick about it. I'm in a hurry.

KIKI—I've got to pull myself together a little first, ain't I?

RENAL—I have an important engagement.

KIKI—This is important, too.

RENAL—So I see. Who are you anyway? What's your name?

came the girl with the long feather—Kiki; and she refused to leave until she had seen the boss. Brulé was not to be trifled with and at last he picked the girl up to carry her out, a job by no means easy, and at that moment Renal entered and, took charge of the situation.

RENAL—Brulé, can't you do that in some other place?

BRULÉ—Why, Victor, it ain't what you think at all. This girl got in and she won't go out. I'm just putting her out—won't take a second.

KIKI (very angry at Brulé)—Big animal of a cooking stove! Do you know what he's done? He's broken a bone.

RENAL—A bone?

KIKI—In my stays. And my nice new skirt. No one would believe I just bought it. And my brassiere is busted—I can feel it. I'll bet my new silk stockings are full of runs, and I had

C. "Say! Can't change your mind and engage me, can you?" Kiki asks.
"No, but I'll take you home with me," Renal (Sam B. Hardy) answers.

Now I want you to get this. I've got any number of rich friends who are crazy about me—you never saw anything like it. They want to boost me ahead—back me. But I say, let up—nothing doing. I hate pull. Ain't I right? Now, I—

RENAL—Hold on. I don't want to hear the story of your life. I told you I was in a hurry. Run along—vamoose.

KIKI—Say—I must say you ain't very polite.

RENAL—Well, if you're so sensitive—

KIKI—I'm not. Or I wouldn't have let you get so familiar with me—

RENAL—Familiar! Holy—

KIKI—I let you
(Continued on page 104)

Q. "Why, Victor, it ain't what you think at all," Brulé (Thomas Findlay) the stage doorman explains. "This girl got in and she won't go—I'm putting her out—it won't take a second."

KIKI—Kiki.

RENAL—What?

KIKI—Kiki, I'm telling you. Of course, that isn't my real name.

RENAL—No, I didn't suppose it was.

KIKI—Can't tell you my real name—it might lead to complications.

RENAL—Really? Then don't. I hate complications and I'm busy. What are you doing here anyway?

KIKI—You ought to know. I'm engaged in your sheebang.

RENAL—I'll have you know this place is not a sheebang.

KIKI—Anyway I'm in the Review. I've several parts.

RENAL—So you're in the chorus. Well, what do you want, dearie?

KIKI—I've got a complaint to make. I've been very unjustly treated in this house. And as they told me you were a square man—

RENAL—Oh, they did, eh?

KIKI—Yes. Everybody said so. They said, "The boss is a kicker, he's very disagreeable, but he's square—nobody can deny that—he is square."

RENAL—I think I am. However—

KIKI—We'll see. To begin with I'd like you to know I don't have to do this kind of work—sing in the chorus—not for money. I'm an artiste. I want to work up—get a few lines to say—

Q. "Isn't it better," Kiki asks, "to have someone to think about all the time than no one at all—even if it does keep you awake nights worrying?"

An American's Masterwork

C This Figure Half-draped, by Abbott H. Thayer, recently sold for $40,000, one of the largest prices yet paid for a painting by an American. The exhibition of Thayer's pictures at the Metropolitan Museum of Art definitely fixed his standing in the front ranks of native artists.

Abbott H. Thayer, from a portrait painted by himself. Thoroughly modern and imbued with the creative spirit, he was in no sense an imitator. Childe Hassam said of Thayer's Figure Half-draped, "paint can go no further in portraying the human form."

The Rise of Abbott Thayer

By Gardner Teall

A FEW weeks ago the American press announced that a New York art collector had paid $40,000 for Abbott Henderson Thayer's "Figure Half-draped." To artists and art-lovers, Abbott Thayer's work was well known, but Fame had not at the time of his death carried his name to the great public at large.

But now the great Memorial Exhibition of Abbott Thayer's work at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York has brought thousands of lay-folk to an appreciation of this master. His canvases are to be found in many public galleries and in numerous important private collections.

While Thayer's production was not large, American art is fortunate in having as much as it has from his brush. We have had no painter who excelled him in seeming to catch in his canvases the spirit of his subject. Thayer had little to do with the story-telling in his pictures; his concern was to convey to others the emotion their creation stirred in himself, if, indeed, he gave any particular thought to "others" in this connection.

I like to recall his own words on the subject of the artist's way of painting, as he wrote them in an article contributed the year before his death to the International Studio: "Every great work of art," said he, "has its birth essentially in one and the same manner. The artist, as he sees it taking clearer and clearer shape on his canvas or in his clay, begins to work by the light of the splendor of the being to which he feels he is giving birth. In this state he becomes empowered to complete his birth unerringly, to put in place all its details with a purity of harmony and balance that utterly transcend all powers that even he possessed before this exaltation reached him its hand."

Abbott Thayer was a clear thinker. He was a clear painter; that is to say, there can be no mistake as to the character which he portrays. Of his masterpiece, "Figure Half-draped," Childe Hassam said that paint could go no further in portraying the human form than we find it doing here.

Through all his progress of accomplishment, Abbott Thayer did not change the technique acquired in his early years. It was developed but not revolutionized. Through all these years his interest in natural history increased and finally absorbed much of his time. Some have thought it a pity that his every moment was not given to painting. I do not feel that way about Abbott Thayer's work in natural history.

The most conspicuous instance of Thayer's scientific researches is his discovery of the law underlying protective coloration in animal life, and his researches and conclusions in this field were published first by the Government in the Smithsonian Institution Reports.

U. Drawn by F. Strothmann

Whiskers for Women

By Walt Mason

U Will the Sage of Emporia dare go back to Kansas after this?

UPON a golden afternoon, long ago, I was walking down the main street of a Kansas town, filled with fresh country buttermilk and good will towards men. I was smoking my favorite meerschaum pipe, a magnificent piece of bric-a-brac, presented to me by the Crown Prince of Switzerland when I was last in Yurrupe. I had devoted the best years of my life to the coloring of that pipe, watching and gloating over it like a mother over her firstborn; and at last I had brought it to such a glorious fruition of color that other smokers were always breaking into my house, determined to steal it.

I was just rounding the corner of Main Street and Hayseed Avenue when I encountered an elderly woman of rather stately, but grim and resolute aspect. She carried a green umbrella and, before I realized that she was on the warpath, she used that weapon to knock the priceless pipe from my mouth, and send it in worthless fragments to the sidewalk.

A crowd assembled in the twinkling of an eye, as crowds do assemble whenever it is possible to witness human humiliation. The elderly woman reared up to a great height, and waved her green umbrella, and made a speech in which she insisted that smoking is responsible for most of the misery and degradation in this world. If fathers didn't waste their money for tobacco, children would wear better shoes to Sunday school.

There was nothing I could do except to stand by and wear a sickly smile; and people who witnessed that smile say it was the saddest thing they ever saw. It haunted their dreams for months, it was so clammy and ghastly, so suggestive of vampires and charnel houses.

The dauntless female was Mrs. Carrie Nation, who enjoyed a widespread fame in her day, but who is already nearly forgotten, reformers are coming up so fast. In Kansas, Mrs. Nation had several strong-arm followers, industrious old ladies who went around with hatchets, breaking windows, cracking stone jugs, and knocking men's hats off. It was generally admitted, even by those who didn't admire their methods, that they had the courage of their convictions; but since the day of martyrdom when I lost my pipe, I have given the matter much consideration, and am inclined to question the courage of these militant females. They took advantage of their sex, as women always do and as a result escaped unhurt.

HAD a man come along and knocked my pipe into flinders with his umbrella or golfstick, I wouldn't have been seen standing there in a dazed condition, wearing a hectic smile calculated to make strong men weep. Ah, no. There would have been a gorgeous scrap a Homer might have taken as the basis for an epic; and when the scrap was over, it would have taken the street gang three days to put the pavement back where it belonged, and straighten up the telephone poles, and reset the street railway. Even if I had emerged second best from such a combat, I should have gone to the hospital with my hands full of my foeman's whiskers.

There are many male reformers, earnest and militant men, who are bound and determined to send tobacco where John Barleycorn lies, with the mocking bird a-singing o'er his grave. But we don't hear of any of them going round knocking the pipes out of men's mouths, and we never will.

Mrs. Nation and her followers thoroughly understood that if any rude men violently opposed their operations, the rude men would probably be horsewhipped or tarred and feathered by their fellow citizens; for chivalry runs strong in Kansas, although it is gradually oozing away, and it would be hard to predict the attitude of men fifty years hence, if another Mrs. Nation appeared.

The other day the police judge at San Diego sentenced a cultured and refined matron to jail. She had caused a serious automobile accident by pulling a boner for which there was no excuse.

"If I had my way," said the weary jurist, when he had pronounced the sentence, "no woman would be allowed to drive an automobile on the public streets."

I have long believed that every car driven by a woman should be preceded by a brass band, so all the world might know she's coming. Or there might be a calliope attachment on the car, playing the "Dead March" from Saul. Something should be done to protect the public from the woman driver. Of course there are women who drive as well as the most expert men, but in general they learned when young and have handled cars for years. The indictment against the average woman driver is that she doesn't care a hoot for the rules of the road.

The other day I was going to turn to the left and stretched out my hand, all glittering with Hope and Koh-i-noor gems, as a signal to anyone behind. I kept my hand extended until my arm ached, so there might be no mistake, for I am one of your cautious old boys who keep the motto, "Safety First," pasted in their hats; and as I was making the turn a woman came slamming up in a car that looked like an old concertina, and she tore off my best fender, and broke a wheel, and sprung an axle, and shook her fist at me and yelled, "Why don't you look where you are going?"

LATER, when our stormy passions had settled down, and we could discuss the accident calmly, she admitted that she was trying to read a fashion magazine, and adjust her back hair, and keep her car on the road, all at the same time, so she didn't see my signal, and, in fact, didn't know I was on the road until her car was wrapped around mine. She had been driving a car for two or three years and didn't know what any of the signals meant; she had seen people putting their hands out of car windows, but it all looked like silly affectation to her; like a vulgar attempt to attract attention.

Women now are busy in every field of human activity, demanding their rights and opportunities in full, and only alluding to their sex when they want to put something over, or when they are in a tight place and need some good excuse. There is no doubt that the old time chivalry of the men is wasting away. I see its decline in my own home. One night recently, my Aunt Dorcas came to my bedroom door and announced that there was a burglar down stairs.

"Let him burgle," I said; "there's nothing down stairs worth taking, except that 'Yard of Roses' chromo in the kitchen, for after paying my income tax I soaked everything that wasn't bolted down, as you well know. So go back to bed and forget the burglar."

"Get up this minute and chase that burglar off the premises," my aunt cried.

"Do your own chasing," I said. "When I did the voting for this outfit I cheerfully assumed all the responsibilities; on three separate occasions, I tackled burglars, and twice was shot up, and once black-jacked. Now that my grandmother and aunts and nieces are all voting, they'll have to take turns at suppressing the wave of crime."

I wonder how the girls like their glorious independence, as far as they've gone. Now they can vote, and run for office, and serve on juries, and have a joy ride generally; are they as happy as they thought they'd be? I used to think it would make politics a lot more interesting and attractive when pretty women began running for office, appealing to the intelligent voter for his support and influence, without offering him a drink of hair oil or a packing house cigar.

I had an idea such candidates would babble pleasantly of fox trots and ice cream, and avoid all such wearisome topics as public economy and principle in politics. It would be a real pleasure to vote for a bright and pretty girl who knew how to wear a hat.

W. C. Politics and Pies

WOMEN now, in restless legions, swarm throughout our native land; in all eagle-guarded regions, girls triumphant take their stand. Woman's sphere has been extended till its bounds most widely lie; now her servitude is ended, can she make a decent pie? Well I know that she can wrangle with our statesmen in debate, shoot our laws from any angle, make the income tax look straight; for on deep things, she is posted, she is stuffed with useful lore; but are ducks and beef ribs roasted as they were in days of yore? Can a woman save the nation from disaster and despair, and maintain her lofty station framing up the bill of fare? Will she make our flag a winner, save the country when it skids, or provide a good boiled dinner for the Old Man and the kids?

Clare Mason

but I believe that in a hundred years a majority of the women statesmen will be wearing whiskers.

Our moralists and reformers are insisting that the breaking up of the American home is responsible for most of the evils now prevalent. I greatly fear the advent of the girls in politics will hasten the work of breaking up the home. True, much evidence is presented, calculated to reassure us. Every now and then we see a picture or a story designed to convince us that woman can take her share in public affairs, and still be the gracious mistress of an ideal home.

The other day I saw the picture of a large lady who had reared nine sons and as many daughters, and yet had successfully run the town shooting gallery and served three terms as chief of police. The fact that such pictures and stories regularly appear indicates that propagandists are at work, and somebody realizes the weak point of this suffrage business.

How do the girls like it?

In the country where I am living now, there have been three or four famous murder trials in as many months. They were long-drawn, wearisome affairs. There were several women on each jury. Day after day, these women had to sit in stuffy courtrooms and listen to testimony that set their teeth on edge; testimony having to do with all that is low, base, and unprofitable in human nature.

At night, they were locked up like prisoners, and in the morning, they had headaches and unspeakable tastes in their mouths, and their noses were red, and their hair wouldn't stay up, and they had to listen to a lot more testimony designed to convince them that human nature is the foulest thing under heaven.

When the various trials were over the women were bitterly condemned, because no verdict was reached in any of the trials, and the prisoners all have to go through the mill again. The girls were pitiable objects when they left the jury box; exhausted, their nerves wrecked, their patience worn out, most of them had to be lifted into hacks, and comforted with flagons, for they were all in, worn out by jury duty.

I had posted myself at the courthouse door to ask them how they liked their glorious independence, but when I saw the shape they were in, I concluded to can the catechism.

But I keep on wondering how they like their freedom and independence, after giving it a fair trial.

Vandemark's Folly

By Herbert Quick

A BOY, undersized, overworked, and wretched, sat on a stump near the Erie Canal and watched the tow boats go by. It was there his step-father, John Rucker, found him. "I'll learn yeh to steal my time," he said, and holding the boy the man beat him so that welts rose on his back and shoulders. But before the beating was ended Jacobus Teunis Vandemark found his first friend in Captain Sproule of a canal boat. He knocked Rucker down and taking the whip beat the fallen man. So goes the story, epitomized, in the first pages of Mr. Quick's novel of pioneer life, and the great migration into the Mississippi Valley—the wild prairie region.

Little Jacob, of course, could not go home after that so he went with the Captain and began his life as a driver on the

LOTS of you folks are too busy to do all the reading you would like to do, but if you read this one department in Hearst's International in the course of a year you will have read twelve books so carefully selected that you can well lay claim to a liberal education in current literature tow path. It was a long trip to Buffalo and back and when Jake reached home, eager to see his mother, he found that she and John Rucker had disappeared, gone West, leaving no address. He learned that his mother had come into her inheritance which had been tied up by a lawsuit; but it was only after three years of incessant inquiry that he had trace of her and followed to Madison, Wisconsin. But the eager-hearted youngster had arrived too late. His mother was dead.

Through the trickery of John Rucker, assisted by a dishonest lawyer, Jake received as his portion of his mother's estate, a section of land in Iowa near Monterey Center, and a team and covered wagon. So in the spring of 1855, the boy set out overland for the far-away section of land and the township later to be known as Vandemark, long after the boy became a man and the pains he had suffered were forgotten.

© Courtesy of Bobbs-Merrill Co., Publishers. Mr. Wyeth's illustrations, courtesy of The Ladies' Home Journal and the Curtis Publishing Company.

On that trip he met most of the people with whom he was to be associated in later life, and so you are cautioned to place them, carefully, now. There were Doctor and Mollie Bliven, fleeing into the wild West to escape Mollie's outraged husband; there was Rowena Fewkes, with her chinless brothers and her mother with no collar bones; there was the strong, likable villain of the piece, Buckner Gowdy, and his sister-in-law, Virginia Royall—the beautiful, terrified Virginia; there were Elder and Grandma Thorndyke, and at the very end of his journey, Magnus Thorkelson. Virginia Royall's sister had died on the trip and after a little, unable to endure the attentions of her brother-in-law, Buckner Gowdy, Virginia fled and so came by accident to Vandemark, whom she had met at the time of her sister's death and who had been kind to her.

I MADE camp (Vandemark says) a few hundred yards from the road by a creek which ran bank-full but clear. I was still in sight of the road and the twilight was settling down gradually; the air was so clear that even in the absence of a moon, it was long after sunset before it was dark.

A pack of wolves just off the road and to the west began their hellish concert over some way-side carcass—just at the moment that a woman came in sight. She appeared in the road where it came into my view twenty rods or so beyond the creek and on the other side of it.

I heard her scream when the first howls of the wolves broke the silence; and then she came running, stumbling, falling, partly toward me and partly toward a point upstream, where I thought she must mean to cross the brook—a thing which was very easy for one on foot, since it called only for a little jump from one bank to the other. She seemed to be carrying something which, when she fell, would fly out of her hand, and which, in spite of her panic, she would pick up before in her fright she ran on again in her effort to escape from the wolves.

She came on uncertainly, but always running away from the howls of the wolves, and just before she reached the little creek, she stopped and looked back, as if for a sight of pursuers—and there were pursuers. Perhaps a hundred yards back of her, I saw four or five slinking dark forms; for the cowardly prairie wolf becomes bold when fled from, and partly out of curiosity, and perhaps looking forward to a feast on some dead or dying animal, they were stalking the girl, silent, shadowy, evil, and maybe dangerous. She saw them too—and with another scream she plunged on through the knee-high grass, fell splashing into the icy water of the creek.

"Don't be afraid," said I running up, as she scrambled out of the shallow creek, "I won't let them hurt you—I won't let anything hurt you."

"The wolves!" she cried. "The wolves!"

"They are gone," I said. "They are all gone—and I've got a gun. Don't you be afraid."

"Oh! Oh!" she cried: "Keep them away! Keep them away!"

She kept saying this over and over, sitting on the ground and staring out into the darkness, starting at every rustle of the wind, afraid of everything. It was a long time before she uttered a word except exclamations of terror, and every once in a while she broke down in convulsive sobbings. I thought there was something familiar in her voice; but I could not see well enough to recognize her features, though it was plain that she was a young girl and sadly in need of friends.

"The wolves are gone," I said; "I have scared them off and now you have nothing to fear."

"Don't let them come back," she sobbed. "Don't let them come back!"

"I've got a little camp-fire over yonder," I said; "and if we go to it, I'll build it up bright, and that will scare them most to death. They're cowards, the wolves—a camp-fire will make 'em run.

Q. The prairie fire, from which Vandemark rescued Rowena, is the most dramatic scene in the book. Drawn by N.C. Wyeth and reproduced through the courtesy of the Curtis Publishing Company and the Ladies' Home Journal.

Let's go to the fire where you can get warm and dry."

She made an effort to get up, but fell back to the ground in a heap. I was just at that age when every boy is afraid of girls; and while I had my dreams of rescuing damsels from danger and serving them in other heroic ways as all boys do, when the pinch came I did not know what to do; she put up her hand, though, and I took it and helped her to her feet; but she could not walk.

Summoning up my courage I picked her up and carried her towards the fire. She said nothing, except, of course, that she was too heavy for me to carry; but she clung to me convulsively.

"You are the boy who took care of me back there when my sister died," said she as I carried her along.

"Are you Mrs. Gowdy's sister?" I asked.

"I am Virginia Royall," she said.

She was very wet and very cold. I set her down on the spring seat where she could lean back, and wrapped her in a buffalo robe, building up the fire until it warmed her.

"I'm glad it's you!" she said.

PRESENTLY I had hot coffee for her, and some warm milk, with the fish and good bread and butter, and a few slices of crisp pork which I had fried, and browned warmed-up potatoes. There was a smear-case too, milk gravey and sauce made of English currants. She began picking at the food, saying that she could not eat; and I noticed that her lips were pale, while her face was crimson as if with fever. She had had nothing to eat for twenty-four hours except some crackers and cheese which she had hidden in her satchel before running away; so in spite of the fact that she was in a bad way from all she had gone through, she did eat a fair meal of victuals.

I thought she ought to be talked to so as to take her mind from her fright; but I could think of nothing but my way of cooking the victuals, and how much I wished I could give her a better meal—just the same sort of talk a woman is always laughed at for—but she did not say much to me. I suppose her strange predicament began returning to her mind.

I had already made up my mind that she could sleep in the wagon, while I rolled up in the buffalo robe by the fire.

SO THE two children, neither over sixteen, were thrown together. For days they hid themselves in a grove of trees to escape the people in search of Virginia. When they resumed the slow trip westward, there were narrow escapes and near hysteria on the girl's part. Once they were questioned by Elder and Grandma Thorndyke, who innocently, were trying to aid Gowdy in his search for Virginia. At Waterloo, Iowa, the two went to church and at the door came, for the second time, face to face with the Thorndykes.

Escape was impossible and common sense breaking through, the young people agreed to separation and Jake went on West alone.

At last the long journey ended and the boy drove into the town nearest his land. The local surveyor was pointed out to him and joined by Magnus Thorkelson, who was also a new arrival, the three set out for Jake's section of land, the surveyor, Henderson L. Burns, going in front and shooting plovers and prairie chickens by the way. Thus the three of them came at last to the big marsh to be known as Vandemark's Folly.

HENDERSON L. looked at his memorandum of the description of my land, looked about him, drove off a mile south, and came back, finally put his horse down the hill to the base of it, and out a hundred yards in the waving grass, that made early hay for the town for fifteen years, he found the corner stake driven by the Government surveyors, and beckoned for me to come down.

"This is the southeast corner of your land," said he. "Looks like a mighty good place for a man with as good a shotgun as that—ducks and geese the year round!"

"Where are the other corners?" I asked.

"That's to be determined," he answered.

To determine it, he tied his handkerchief about the felly of his buggy wheel, held a pocket compass in his left hand to drive by, picked out a tall rosin-weed to mark the course for me, and counted the times the handkerchief went around as the buggy traveled on. He knew how many turns made a mile. The horse's hoofs sucked in the wet sod as we got farther out into the marsh, and then the ground rose a little and we went up over a headland that juts out into the marsh; then we went down into the slew again, and finally stopped in a miry place where there was a flowing spring with tall yellow lady's-slippers and catkin willows growing around it.

After a few minutes of looking about, Burns found my southwest corner. We made back to the edge of the slope, and Henderson L. looked off to the north in despair.

"My boy," said he, "I've actually located your two south corners, and you can run the south line yourself from these stakes. The north line is three hundred and twenty rods north of and parallel to it—and the east and west lines will run themselves when you locate the north corners—but I'll have to wait till the ground freezes, or get Darius Green to help me—and the great tide of immigration hain't brought him to this neck of the woods yet."

"But where's my land?" I queried: for I did not understand all this hocus-pocus of locating any given spot in the Iowa prairie in 1855. "Where is my land?"

"The heft of it," said he, is right down there in Hell Slew. It's all pretty wet; but I think you've got the wettest part of it; the best duck [Continued on page 123]

The Bookshelf OF THE MONTH

MR. PROHACK, by Arnold Bennett, subtly satirizes hard-headed opposition to luxury-loving extravagance. At the moment of making serious retrenchments in the effort to stretch his salary, Mr. Prohack inherits half a million and becomes an uncreative spender. His son, developing financial genius, piles up a fortune and goes in for high rentals and a yacht. Inevitably, Mr. Prohack is bored with idleness and takes charge of a paper mill with the reflection, "Someone ought to be economic and productive. It will kill me, but I'll die producing."

THE EVERLASTING WHISPER, by Jackson Gregory, comes to Mark King from the mysterious mountains. There unfolds then the story of an opportunist in marriage and a disciplinarian in matrimony who, with his weak child-wife, struggles through an implacable Far Western snowstorm. King's efforts are crowned with the acquisition of fabulous wealth, the violent removal of his enemies, and the taming of the ignorant society girl whom he had hastily, not to say thoughtlessly, wedded.

OUTWITTING OUR NERVES, by Josephine A. Jackson, M.D., and Helen M. Salisbury, dispels the popular belief that "nerves" mean depleted cells. Other American credo that the book upsets are: eight hours sleep are essential; overwork leads to nervous break-down; a carefully planned diet is necessary; our nerves can't stand the strain of modern life; brain work is very fatiguing. Daring assumptions, these, but the authors submit substantiating data.

SAINT TERESA, by Henry Sydnor Harrison, describes a rich young woman's fight for her anti-war convictions. Incidentally, she is an individualist to whom the newspapers refer as "the one who hates love." Dean Masury's eager efforts in behalf of the Allies, develops between these two, the contest that makes the book and leads, after he has suffered some rather rough usage at the hands and teeth of Teresa, to the girl's capitulation to love. Nothing, however, shakes her horror of war.

A SCIENCE of the Month

YOU can understand only that which is clear.
That is why you find here a scientist and a popular writer collaborating to tell you briefly of today's problems and accomplishments in the world of science and invention

A Salamanders and frogs fed on thyroid extract quickly change from the gill form into animals with legs; proving that growth is speeded by the thyroid treatment.

What Your Glands Are For

By James Hopper and E. E. Free

WE HEAR a good deal these days of "glands" and "hormones" and "endocrines." The term "monkey gland" is batted about jocularly. In a certain prison, we hear, a gland has been taken from a prisoner just dead, and placed in another prisoner, alive but senile. Other experiments of the kind are told of in the newspapers. What happens afterwards slips off somehow into vagueness and fog. Does the senile prisoner, reglanded, become young again? The papers seem to get tired of the subject before giving us the answer.

The truth is that, of late years, the scientists who study human and animal life have been much interested in certain organs that had been neglected heretofore as being of little importance. These organs are the so-called "ductless glands."

Everyone knows what a gland is. The liver is a gland. It produces substances needed by the body and discharges these through ducts. The salivary glands discharge saliva through ducts, the tear glands give up through ducts the tears which lubricate the delicate surface of the eye.

But the glands that at present are drawing so much attention possess no ducts. Perhaps this is why they were abandoned for so long. They have been misunderstood organs. Because they had no ducts. Just as a poet by some people is considered of no use because he hasn't a pick in his hands. Up to a few years ago, modern science regarded the ductless glands as atrophied and inert remnants of organs once useful. This is still believed of some glands. The pineal gland, for instance, which lies inside the skull, may be what is left of a third eye which we sported away back in the evolutionary past.

But of others, scientific opinion has radically changed. Instead of being negligible and useless, these ductless glands are now known to possess an importance almost weird. Ductless as they are, they secrete, directly into the blood, substances of concentrated strength which despotically rule the body—and perhaps the mind. They are small organs, too; and the discrepancy between their size and the power that lies in them is something that causes wonder.

The pituitary gland lies in a depression of the skull, just below the brain. It is seldom larger than the rubber end of a pencil, yet it is known to control, through its secretions, the growth of the skeleton, and of the body generally. Over-activity of this gland will produce a giant; under-activity, a dwarf.

The thyroid gland lies in the neck, next to and across the wind pipe. It is larger than the pituitary, but still small. Its secretions have been isolated and purified by Kendall of the Mayo foundation, and is named thyroxin. That gland is believed to control the production of energy in the body, and the utilization of foods. Too much thyroid means nervousness, instability, over-energy; it means thin, highstrung people. Too little thyroid, and you have an apathetic and sluggish person. Complete lack, means an idiot; that kind of an idiot known as a cretin.

THERE is an author who has written of the great Napoleon in the light of this modern gland knowledge. To this author, Napoleon was merely the result, we might say the puppet, of an unstable pituitary and over-active thyroid. These were the masters that ruled him; these glands, through their over-abundant secretions, over-stimulated his brain to the terrible devastating energy that plowed and replowed Europe.

Then there are the two adrenal glands, each as big as the end of a thumb. One of the secretions of the adrenal has been isolated and determined chemically. It is called adrenalin, and is a common drug used by physicians. Adrenalin raises the blood pressure, and constricts the small blood vessels so that it reduces bleeding.

The adrenals within your body have probably helped to save your life when injuries might have let you bleed to death. But they also possess you in other ways. Strong emotions, fear especially, release increased quantities of adrenalin into the blood. The response of the body to this is remarkable. Nerve action is quickened. The liver discharges sugar into the blood—and sugar is that form of food most easily available for the muscles. At the same time, the small blood vessels are all tightened so that bleeding from wounds may be less serious. The whole body, in fact, at the call of fear, through the action of these small glands, is put into shape for combat. The body, for the time, is like the man-of-war which has sighted the enemy's smoke, whose decks are being cleared, ammunition hoisted, compartments closed, and speed increased.

Deficiency in adrenalin is believed to cause nervous collapse, mental disturbance; in other words, neurasthenia. But an emotion, which at first increases the amount of adrenalin in the blood, may be protracted to the point of depleting the supply in the glands—and that emotion need not be fear, but can be another, such as anger, love, hatred, or even patriotic exaltation. The nervous disorders with which many men suffer now who have been through the war may be due to such a deficiency in adrenalin.

C. Slowly the Pacific coast is slipping northward. The stars first indicated this phenomenon, which was verified by astronomers at the Lick and Ukiah Observatories.

C. This creeping of the coast is now believed to precede an earthquake, and through a study of this coastal movement, scientists think they will be able to see a shock coming.

The glands of which most is known are the thyroid, the pituitary, the adrenals, and the interstitials. There are some twenty or thirty others of which little is known as yet, and which may be just as important. It can readily be seen, however, how even the discovery of the functions of the first four would throw the world of thought into excitement. As we are as yet in the midst of this excitement, the subject is one fraught with danger unless treated with great care.

Then, of what are we sure?

Only of the facts that have been learned in laboratories through careful and repeated experimentation on animals. Out of such research have come the facts that we have stated as to the four most important glands. The following account of two experiments will give an illustration of the nature of this work.

The first of these experiments is made on frogs, and similar experiments have been made on salamanders. As everyone knows, a frog in its young life is a tadpole. It is a fish-like thing, breathing with gills and becomes, by a metamorphosis, the more complex air-breathing frog.

In the water in which tadpoles lived, a certain amount of thyroid extract was placed. The tadpoles began to change into frogs much faster than they would have done naturally. They changed into frogs so fast, in fact, that they did so before they could attain their growth. So that the result was frogs the size of tadpoles—little frogs, some of them no bigger than flies!

Then there are the experiments of the Austrian surgeon Steinach on white rats. Steinach closes the duct of one gland, and when this has been done, the interstitial gland, which is ductless, becomes greatly enlarged. From the enlargement of the interstitial gland, thus artificially brought about, remarkable results follow. The rat is rejuvenated. Old, gray, blind rats become once more vigorous and active.

The result, unfortunately, is not permanent. After a few weeks, old age again creeps in upon the rat. Then Steinach produces a second rejuvenation by transplanting into the ageing rat a new interstitial gland taken from a young rat.

It is on the knowledge gained through these experiments of Steinach that the experiments on men are being performed of which the public hears in the newspapers, but the results so far attained have not been conclusive and old age still creeps on.

C. A WHISPER BY RADIO

Wireless waves race around the earth and signals become clearer the farther they go

OFFICERS of the French Navy have discovered a curious fact about wireless signals sent around the earth. These signals are most easily perceptible—loudest, as it were—exactly at that point on the earth which is farthest from the sending station.

Signals, for instance, sent out from the powerful station at the city of Lyons are best heard when the ship receiving them stands at the exact antipode of the city of Lyons. They are much more perceptible at that point than they are when the ship is several thousand miles nearer, only just around the corner, as it were.

The reason for this appears to lie in the fact that the wireless waves bend around the earth, follow the earth's surface. When from the station at the city of Lyons, a message is sent, the waves are shot out in all directions—north, south, east, west and in between. They race around the earth, following its curved surface; and all meet at the antipode of the sending point, reinforcing each other. So that there, as it were, they make the most noise.

This, which happens over great distances with wireless waves, is what happens with sound waves in the whispering gallery, known to every visitor, in the Capitol at Washington. A low whisper, uttered at a certain point in this gallery, sends out sound waves which re-unite at another point, so that at this second point the whisper is heard with startling distinctness.

C. WARNING! QUAKE COMING

Western scientists hope soon to be able to foretell approach of catastrophe

CAN EARTHQUAKES, those most terrible of natural phenomena, be foreseen, and hence be prepared for—evaded, as it were?

Science is beginning to have that hope. It has been discovered that the entire Pacific Coast of the United States is slipping slowly northward.

How was this discovered? There is in California the Lick Astronomical Observatory, and at Ukiah, Washington, another observatory. Observation of the stars from these points showed them slipping southward.

Other observatories, all over the world, were communicated with. They reported that the stars were behaving normally.

Then if the stars were not moving south, the observatories at Lick and Ukiah were moving north.

Successive observation confirmed this. The earth upon which stood these observatories was moving northward.

On August 3, 1903, there was an earthquake. With that earthquake the northern movement stopped abruptly.

Evidently such creepings and such earthquakes are related.

Scientists hope to establish the relation between the two. So that, once they have acquired the data, they may be able to tell the coming of the sharp abrupt movements which are the earthquakes.

C. THE VOGUE OF THE VITAMINE

While lack of this element in food is dangerous a balanced diet supplies all a person needs

EXPERIMENTS on animals have shown that a diet of mere food materials, that is, a diet of pure protein, pure carbohydrates and pure fat, is not sufficient. The diet must contain also some vitamins.

These increase in some way the utilization of the foods—of the proteins, the carbohydrates and the fats. Without vitamins, the foods are not assimilated. The animal becomes undernourished even though fed regularly. In time, it dies.

Three distinct vitamins recognized are called Vitamines A, B and C. Vitamine A is soluble in fats and oils; it occurs in butter, in milk, in animal fats generally. Vitamine B is soluble in water; it occurs in many vegetables and in yeast. Vitamine C is also soluble in water; it occurs in lemons, limes, and other fruits and vegetables.

The vitamine most talked about is Vitamine B. It is this vitamine which some advertised preparations claim to supply. Vitamine B, as we have seen, is present in yeast and in nearly all fresh vegetables.

Science believes that an ordinary balanced diet, containing reasonable quantities of milk, butter and fresh vegetables, furnish plenty of vitamins to the normal human body. Any deficiency in vitamins can be due only to an extraordinarily poor diet, or to the fact that there is something wrong with the body's machinery.

Vitamines have never been isolated chemically. Their extraction out of vegetables, or out of yeast, in order to fabricate medicinal vitamine products, is a difficult operation. The vitamine chemicals—whatever they may be—are easily destroyed.

Q. WHO WILL FIND OUR FIRST ANCESTORS?

While Darwin's theory applies to man his exact line of evolution is a mystery which science has not solved

As to the origin of man, science has this to say.

Man is an animal. He belongs to one group of mammals; he is closely related to the other animals of this group as is shown by his structure.

The evidence for this is two-fold. In the first place, there are in man many vestiges of organs which are prominent in lower animals, and necessary to them, but which have become unnecessary in man. Such, for instance, are the vermiform appendix and the pineal eye. In the second place, man differs from the lower animals only in degree, not in essentials. Man is more intelligent, but animals, also, have some intelligence.

All of the creatures of the animal world, all of the various species of animals, are believed to have originated very slowly, one out of another.

This is the Darwinian theory of Evolution. It has not been abandoned by scientists. It is not even seriously questioned.

The only arguments between scientists as to the evolutionary theory have to do, not with the theory in general, but merely with its mechanical details. For instance, whether the change of one species into another is gradual, by slow, constant, and imperceptible degrees, or whether it occurs by the sharp change called mutation.

Since the theory of evolution is accepted for animal life as a whole, and since man is considered by science to be an animal (whatever else he may be, in addition) it is believed that the theory of evolution applies to him. It is believed that man has developed out of a lower form.

The exact line of man's evolution is not yet known. His direct animal ancestors have not been discovered. Much evidence tends to place his beginnings in Central Asia.

Man is not believed to have originated out of any of the existing species of monkey. The modern apes and monkeys, and all known fossil apes or pre-men, are thought to be collateral relatives of man, not his ancestors.

The theory of evolution applies as yet to man only as to his body and his bodily mechanism. It says nothing on the problem of human personality. It is neither favorable, nor is it opposed, to the hypothesis of a spiritual personality—of a personality independent of the body, independent of the brain or the physical intelligence that is man's.

Q. BEFORE EGYPT KNEW ETHER

Surgeons of Cleopatra's day used a club on patients in place of anaesthetics

THE use of anaesthetics in surgical operations is not a modern invention. Surgeons of by-gone days, surgeons of Egypt and China and India, knew of anaesthetics and used them thousands of years ago.

They trephined skulls, they amputated arms and legs, they performed the Caesarian section, and they did all these things with the help of anaesthetics.

Those ancient masters of surgery were without the very valuable chloroform and ether of modern times. They most commonly used vegetable drugs, such as morphine and hasheesh, or alcohol. The leaves of plants containing cocaine were preferred by the ancient races of South America.

The surgeons of ancient Egypt, probably the most skilful of antiquity, had a method of their own at once more direct and spectacular. They hit the patient on the head with a club, and operated while he was "out" as a result of the blow.

Wooden blocks were fitted to the head to save injury to scalp and skin, and the mallet which hit the block was also of wood.

The art of hitting just hard enough and at exactly the best point was a delicate one; and, no doubt, the expert at this scientific black-jacking was as much respected in ancient Egypt as is the skilled anaesthetist today in New York or Paris.

Q. A plate from Haeckel's "Last Word on Evolution," which shows man's similarity to and difference from the bony structure of the four great apes.

Q. Is the Piltown Man, reconstructed from remains found in England, a further proof of Darwin's theory of evolution? Scientists believe this creature lived several thousand years before the historical period and describe him as one of the earliest of the True Men.

☞ MAKING IT HOT FOR THE SUN

Man has developed a heat of 50,000 degrees compared with sun's 10,800

MAN lately has produced artificially a degree of heat greater than five times the heat of the surface of the sun. This, of course, as yet has been done but experimentally, in a scientific laboratory on a small scale.

It is done thus: A tremendous charge of electricity is abruptly released through a wire as fine as the filament of an electric lamp. Of course, the wire immediately "burns out" as it does in any electric globe if the electric current is too strong.

In this case, however—with the tremendous charge used—the term "burns out" is too mild. The wire really explodes. It explodes with an explosion more violent than that of an equal quantity of dynamite. The heat reached in the wire at the instant of the explosion is computed to be somewhere about fifty thousand degrees Fahrenheit.

The heat of water boiling is two hundred and twelve degrees. The white-hot core of a blast furnace making iron is about 2,900 or 3,000 degrees. At 2,800 degrees, iron runs like water. Tungsten, which is used for lamp filaments, is that metal which best resists heat. Yet tungsten melts at about 6,000 degrees.

ELECTRIC ARC — 6728

The heat of the surface of the sun is believed to be about 10,800 degrees. That of the whitest stars is probably thirty thousand or forty thousand degrees at most.

☞ BOTTLING THE ARC-LAMP

By filling sealed glass globes with neon gas old-time street lights are made efficient

EVERYONE remembers the old-fashioned arc-lamp, with which, in the beginning of the electric age, our streets were lighted. It is now gone almost as completely as the dodo, and has been generally replaced by the less powerful incandescent lamp.

Why? Because the carbons used in the arc-lamp wore out too fast. You remember how often, in the old days, the electric light man went through the streets, and climbed up a long ladder to the lamps, or brought them down to him with a chain. He was changing the burned out carbons for fresh ones.

Now the arc-light bids fair to make a spectacular come-back. It is a new arc-lamp in a bottle. The metal terminals which take the place of the old carbons are within a sealed glass globe, and that globe is filled with the rare gas called neon. The metal terminals, in this bottle filled with neon, do not wear out; the neon protects them. This new lamp gives more light, with less electricity, than any other kind of lamp now on the market, and it will work on the same kind of light-circuit as that which now makes your incandescent lamps glow.

☞ Man, constantly probing Nature's laws, has succeeded at last in out-doing Nature, and has developed a heat more terrific than that of the sun.

☞ A BILLION YEARS OF LIFE

Radio-activity leads science to put back enormously, the first appearance of living things on earth.

SINCE the discovery of radio-activity, scientists believe the earth to be much older than had been believed before. Former estimates of geologic time, of the age of the oldest rocks, have had to be much increased in the light of the new knowledge.

Former estimates were based on the time required for the earth to cool from a molten state; they gave an age of not over fifty million years. But radium has upset these calculations. Radium gives out heat. The radium in the rock of the earth gives out enough heat, scientists think, to make up for all the heat which the earth loses into space. So that calculations based on the cooling of the earth cannot give a measure of its age.

But radium itself—or radio-activity—now gives us that measure. The element uranium changes slowly into lead and helium. Scientists know just how much lead and helium will be produced per century by an ounce of uranium. Accordingly, if we can determine the amounts of uranium, lead and helium in any rock, we can find the age of that rock.

The more reliable calculations which have been made in this way give for the oldest known rock, ages estimated from 700,000,000 to 1,500,000,000 years. An intermediate figure of one billion years is probably not far wrong. Since these oldest rocks contain evidence of life, we can say that Life, upon this earth is a billion years old.

It is true that estimates made in other ways—such as those based upon the supposed rate of rock formation in the sea—are shorter—so short as to give 70,000,000 to 150,000,000 years. But the estimates based on radio-activity are believed to be more nearly reliable.

Perhaps you may think your business is not affected by the condition of our foreign trade, but you will think differently after you read this common sense business article

Your Payroll and—World Trade

By James H. Collins

C. James A. Farrell, of the United States Steel Corporation, lays emphasis upon the importance of foreign trade to the domestic prosperity of capital and labor.

HUNTING a job in a "flivver"? Yes, that is the way the automobile mechanic does it in Detroit, making the rounds of the factories in a little old bus that he has salvaged and tuned up for his own use. Why not? But everywhere, for a year or more, the answer has been, "No, nothing today."

Ask this automobile mechanic if he has any interest in the investment of American money abroad, and he will say, "What, me? I'm investing every dollar I get hold of in groceries!"

Yet as nearly as it can be estimated—for Uncle Sam has neglected this kind of census figures—our export business in automobiles, motor trucks, tractors, tires and sundries keeps from twenty-five to fifty thousand people in wage and salary jobs when the exporting is good.

There are business men and economists who believe that the job hunter in the flivver is out of work because our export trade in automobiles has been bad—that falling off in export trade is the chief cause of the business depression we have been passing through, and of unemployment.

"We have got to have foreign trade—it is a necessity," maintains William C. Redfield, formerly Secretary of Commerce, and for years active in encouraging greater export interest among American manufacturers. "Half the wheat raised in this country is sold abroad, about half the copper, a very considerable portion of the coal, two-fifths of the cotton, and twenty to twenty-five per cent of our manufacturing output. What would the copper miners, the farmers, the cotton workers of the South, the oil producers do without markets abroad for their surplus? A very definite part of this depression is due directly to lack of export trade. We can never have full-blooded prosperity without it."

Other authorities pooh-pooh the suggestion that lack of jobs is due to lack of export trade. "Why, it's hardly ten per cent of our whole business!" they say. "Get busy at home, and there will not be enough workers to supply our own demands." That sort of opinion usually comes from an inland banker or manufacturer. The business man who insists that there is a close connection between export trade and prosperity is usually near the sea-board, a business man who can see the wheels go around.

But there is something more than opinion about this connection between export trade and employment. Hard business facts are pointed out by William C. Potter, president of the Guaranty Trust Company of New York. His bank is one of the most active in our new world finance.

We invested $300,000,000 in foreign securities during the first three months of this year. If foreign borrowers had simply come and got the money, and taken it away, some of our immense stock of gold would have gone abroad. But there was no outflow of gold. "The conclusion is inescapable," says Mr. Potter, "that if a period of heavy purchase of foreign securities has not resulted in an export of gold, the proceeds must have been expended here by someone, either in the purchase of American goods or for the payment of foreign purchases or invisible items."

In other words, that money, $4,000,000 a day, was spent for automobiles, steel, wheat, cotton and other American products, and the recent improvement in employment and farm prices is a tangible effect, and another definite fact. In April, our foreign investments doubled—we lent $200,000,000 abroad.

News of bond flotations is really interesting nowadays—if one reads it with a little imagination. Two or three times a week, there are reports of American money being lent to foreign governments, states, cities, railways and industries. There is news of the American dollar going to work all over the world, and making American jobs at home. Follow these dollars to the countries where they are invested. They are almost invariably spent for improvements of some kind. A new railroad is built, an old one gets more locomotives. A dangerous harbor is made safe for shipping, a new factory is established or an old one enlarged. Some of the money goes to workers in that country as wages, with which they can buy more food, which our farmers supply. Some of it comes to this country for machinery, or raw materials.

The nation that lends money to other [Continued on page 102]

II. Emma-Lindsay Squier's Story of an Indian's Sacrifice—Continued from page 60

The Hidden Trail

suddenly with the light of avarice. To-night! To gaze upon the hidden secret of Charles Walk-On-The-Hills's wealth! To see with his own eyes the white quartz with its veins of dull gold, to pry with his knife some of the gleaming metal from its retreat—

Yet his mind counseled caution. The old Indian hated him, might trick him.

Then he laughed silently for the holding of such a foolish thought. The old man was feeble, and should go unarmed. He, the Panther, would carry both knife and rifle. Athwart the dark ugliness of his mind, another thought came creeping, like a red poisonous serpent. He would himself blaze trees along the trail as they went so that he could find his way back to the cabin—alone. When once the secret was in his hands, the Indian should die.

"Bien," he said at length, "we go."

He had no fear of First Bird attempting flight in his absence. She would stay with the man she loved, and he lay unconscious.

Indian Charles busied himself with lighting a lantern, and with sorting out some dried berries from a box of herbs and roots that sent out a faint smell.

"They give me strength on trail," he said in explanation, but Hugo, the Panther, did not heed. He was looking at First Bird with cruel, crafty eyes.

"Ma petite, play me no tricks," he was saying warningly. "Ef you are gone when we come back, de ol' man your father dies. Hees life is in my hand—you know dat?"

She nodded slightly, but her eyes were filled with contempt.

When they were ready, First Bird rose from beside the bed. She tried to speak to her father, but tears came, and she fought them back.

Charles Walk-On-The-Hills saw this and spoke to her, in the Micmac tongue.

"Do not be afraid, my daughter. The loon will call tonight, and then your heart shall guide you."

Hugo, the Panther, listened suspiciously. But First Bird's face was blank, and the old man at the door looked back.

"It is the last day of the moon," he said gravely, and went out into the night followed by the victorious Hugo.

THEY went slowly, the burly trapper and the Indian, for Hugo, the Panther, paused frequently to slash with his knife at the bark of trees, blazing the trail against his return. For one hour, then two, they went through the woods, where in the flickering lantern light the ghostly birches stared at them, the dark oaks shook their leaves in sleepy petulance, and night birds, disturbed in their slumber, uttered drowsy questioning notes.

They came at last to where a screen of hemlock trees threw a network of branches in the path of their advance. Charles Walk-On-The-Hills pushed through them, and Hugo Panther crashed after him, the stiff boughs scratching at his face and hands. They were in a narrow ravine, where on either side walls of rock rose steeply. But Indian Charles did not stop.

Along the dried bed of a small stream, he led the way, and when before them another clump of hemlocks barred the way, he turned abruptly to the right. For the moment he disappeared and it was as if the rocky wall had swallowed him up. But Hugo Panther, leaping after him, saw that there was a narrow opening in the face of the rock, guarded on all sides by steep rocky walls, and ahead of them was the yawning blackness of a cave unseen, till now, by a white man.

"Him there," said Indian Charles.

Hugo Panther caught his breath in a sharp hiss. For in spite of the precautions he had taken, he had been afraid, had half doubted the existence of a gold mine. But it was here, there could be no doubt. The opening was higher than a man's head and twice as broad as his own massive shoulders. Two huge boulders stood like drunken sentinels at the entrance to the strange cavern, leaning towards each other stiffly, and from behind them, small hemlock trees peeped out, like frightened children taking refuge in the shadow.

"Come in," said the old Indian, and led the way into the cave, where the blackness fled in fear from the lantern's light.

THEY stood in a small circular chamber of stone, and around them the walls were white. The snowy quartz flashed in the yellow light, and vague shadows tossed about on the walls and ceiling, like earth spirits awakened from sleep.

Hugo, the Panther, snatched the lantern from Indian Charles's hand, and held it close to the wall. Forgotten were his fears, forgotten was caution. He was drunk with the passion of possession. For in a zig-zag line that ran the length of the shining walls of quartz, was a dull yellow streak, a vein of pure gold—richer than Hugo had ever dreamed.

It was his! It would make of him an emperor. It would give to him all the things for which he lusted. The cave was his, with its inexhaustible wealth!

In a frenzy of avarice, he set the lantern down and hacked at the shining metal with his knife. Hacked and pried, grunting like an animal. He must have it in his hands—feel it in his fingers, he must gloat over the yellow roughness of it—

He did not see that Indian Charles had moved quietly to the entrance and had drawn forth from a receptacle in the rock something long and thin like a coarse string. He did not see the old man stoop and bury something under a small handful of earth, while a match sputtered in his hand. He only knew that suddenly Charles Walk-On-The-Hills had reached for the lantern, that before he could spring at him, the light had been dashed out against the rocky wall.

He hurled himself forward in the darkness towards the opening. In that instant, there came a deafening roar; hard, rocky fists beat upon him; he was flung to the floor with sickening force, and there was a choking smell of dust and smoke. He lay for a moment stunned, gasping, panting in hard sobbing breaths. From somewhere far away, he heard the faint rattle as of dislodged stones hurtling down a steep slope. A numb heaviness gradually made itself felt through his body. He tried to move, but the weight of his limbs turned suddenly to jagged pain.

Then there came, from out of the blackness, a low guttural laugh, a sound so unearthly that his blood stood still.

"Frenchman, you live?" There was a note of intense satisfaction in it. Hugo, the Panther, knew that Charles Walk-On-The-Hills was there.

"Yes, dam' you," he groaned. "What has happen? How shall we get out—you shall tell me, you devil, or I—"

"To get out, oh, Mister Frenchman, driver of hard bargains, take him heap more strength than you got. You know him boulders by front of cave? Him fell down across opening when fire powder went off. You hurt?"

Once more came the laugh, but softer, and with a catch at the end and then Hugo heard the Indian again.

"You got him gold mine, Black Panther. I keep my promise. You have him gold too for plenty long time—you not want for air. You have him gold mine all alone, because—" The voice faded as if carried away by a wind, then it came strongly again, and with dignity: "I have set my feet on a hidden trail, I go to him unknown country. I have given into white man's hands the secret of him gold, I not can live longer than the last day of the moon. So I have eaten of the death berries, Frenchman; they are bringing me sleep now, I will be him black loon calling in the night, but the bird of my nest—her safe from Panther's claws."

Hugo, the Panther, called to him but no answer came. He was alone with the darkness—and with the dead.

IN the cabin that stands on the shore of Lake Ketchamakooogie, Scanlon Maverne opened his eyes. It was morning, and a bright light flooded the room. First Bird was near him, and she was putting a great pile of quartz nuggets on a skin. When she saw that he was awake, she rose.

"Your father?" he asked weakly.

"He will not come back," she answered slowly. "Neither he nor—the other. Last night, I heard a loon, and I know—"

Maverne looked at the nuggets piled on the skin, at the clothing and simple household utensils that she had put upon the floor as if to make them into bundles.

"You are going away?" he asked.

"Yes," she said.

"With me?" He held out his hand and she laid hers in it. "Are you willing to follow me?"

"I follow my heart," she said as he drew her down to him.

Deadly enough is the female of the species and more deadly than ever when defending her young. The discovery was made by a kidnapper in "The Sting," by Richard Washburn Child. Hearst's International for August.

The Right of Way to Tire Leadership

A year or so ago, the American public placed the leadership of the tire business in the hands of the men who make U. S. Royal Cords

THE first Royal Cord Tires were made and sold in 1916. No cut-and-dried story could possibly account for their position of command today—earned in a short six years.

It mostly comes down to the car-owner as an out and out human being. Forget him as a mere tire customer and consider him as a personality. With an inborn instinct for quality. With a pride in demonstrating his quality beliefs.

How many tire manufacturers, would you say, have even guessed that American car-owners were shifting so fast to better tires?

* * *

Certainly U. S. Royal Cords have proven this fundamental thing—

For every low-grade tire made there is arising some motorist with a fine, human indifference for it.

He and his kind have become out and out loyalists of Royal Cord Tires—as representing the highest expression of their demands.

The makers of United States Tires urge upon everybody—manufacturer and dealer alike—a new kind of competition.

Let us compete for more and more public confidence.

Let us compete for higher and higher quality.

Let us compete for still more dependable public service.

United States Tires
are Good Tires

Copyright
1922
U.S. Tire Co

Multiply this man by a million or more. Then sit down and weigh his tremendous deciding influence.

* * *

Today, for the production of U. S. Tires, there is erected and operating the largest group of tire factories in the world.

The men who make Royal Cords are quality workers and quality merchandisers.

Their spirit of leadership is the spirit of constancy—faithfulness—a simple, understandable policy.

U. S. Royal Cords have come to be the measure of value of all automobile tires.

U. S. Royal Cord Tires

United States  Rubber Company

Fifty-three
Factories

The Oldest and Largest
Rubber Organization in the World

Two-hundred and thirty-five branches

Send for July List of INVESTORS BONDS Paying
7% With Safety

EVERY investor or prospective investor should have the July list of INVESTORS BONDS paying 7% with safety. It illustrates and describes one of the most attractive selections of first mortgage 7% gold bonds ever offered.

INVESTORS BONDS are fractional parts of first mortgages on highest grade buildings and land valued greatly in excess of bonds. They are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, and can be bought on partial payments starting as low as $10.

The Investors Company has underwritten and sold millions of dollars of bonds without loss to any investor.

Write today for this list and other interesting literature. Make your money earn 7% with safety.

Ask for Booklets No. L-122

The INVESTORS COMPANY

BENJAMIN KULP, Pres.

29 So. La Salle Street, Chicago

Mid-Year Investments
Yielding from 5½% to 8%

THE PRESENT DEMAND for the securities of well-managed electric and gas companies is based on the time-tested stability of such investments.

Our annual Mid-Year Circular of investment recommendations contains a number of electric and gas securities yielding exceptionally good returns with a high degree of safety.

A request will bring you this new list of diversified offerings.

Ask for Circular HM 70

H. M. Byllesby and Co.

208 South La Salle Street, CHICAGO
NEW YORK BOSTON
111 Broadway 14 State St.

CAN YOU TELL

AN HONEST BROKER FROM A BUCKET SHOP?

Before making any transaction with a financial house, be sure you know its exact standing and its true character.

We are glad to help our readers in the selection of reliable and honest investment houses.

Financial Department

HEARST'S INTERNATIONAL
119 West 40th Street New York City

(Continued from page 99)

nations for such purposes generally sells them these things.

These leaders in world trade and investment are putting their ability and experience at the service of other American business men through organizations like the American Manufacturers Export Association, National Foreign Trade Council and American Bankers' Association.

As bankers, they finance the foreign securities that mean foreign orders for our products, and as manufacturers who have succeeded in export trade for our products, and as manufacturers who have succeeded in export trade themselves, they are showing others how such business is done.

Not manufacturers alone, but factory, farm, mine and transportation workers have a direct interest in our world investments and trade. For they link directly with the wage-earner's pay envelope and the farmer's grain and livestock check.

"When we lend money to foreigners, why not insist that they spend it in the United States—make it part of the contract?" has been suggested. But American bankers, with the greatest experience in world investment, say this is unnecessary. Our position automatically turns banking connections into trading connections.

Very often it looks as though the money was clean gone when some foreign country borrows here and spends in South America. Yet it is merely coming back by a triangular route.

"The government of Belgium sells to American investors $25,000,000 worth of its bonds, and so establishes in New York a credit for that amount," says Thomas W. Lamont, one of the Morgan partners. "Belgium proceeds to buy in the Argentine (because she can buy more cheaply there) wheat to the amount of the $25,000,000. To pay for her Argentine purchases, Belgium transfers her New York credit to Argentine exporters. Those Argentinos in turn utilize a part of that credit to pay for American manufactures, and a part they transfer to British manufacturers for goods which the Argentine has bought in England. Those British manufacturers in turn utilize that New York credit to pay for American copper which they can get here cheaper than anywhere else."*

"Because it is the sale of the last twenty per cent of production which returns profit," says James A. Farrell, "and because prices of so many of our products are determined in international markets not controlled by domestic conditions, the relation of our foreign trade to our prosperity is far greater than the mere proportion which its volume bears to our total commerce."

Mr. Potter adds, "It is not uncommon for a factory to have a volume of business that will keep it busy for eleven months of the year, and yet not be able to make a profit because the overhead cuts into the margin during the idle time. If a ten per cent increase in volume results in keeping that factory busy for a longer period, profits may result. We must not lose sight of this fact in any attempt to minimize the importance of our present volume of export trade to the general state of each industry in this country."*

*Journal of Commerce, New York, April 24, 1922.

Things You Want to Know About Investments

If you are interested in investments the financial department of Hearst's International offers you a careful selection of authoritative booklets published by leading financial institutions. They contain information of value to the investor—the man who believes in making his money work. Any of the booklets listed will be sent on request without cost. Here are a few of them.

State which ones you want and address:

FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT,
HEARST'S INTERNATIONAL,
119 W. 40th St., New York

Foreign Investments

Chilian Cédulas—8% Bonds Redmond & Co.
Canadian Government Bond Chart Rutter & Co.
The Economic Conference and Foreign Securities Dunham & Co.
Mexican Securities Jerome B. Sullivan & Co.
Russian Government 4% Gold Renten of 1894 Nehemiah Friedman & Co.

Bank & Trust Co. Literature

Shawmut Service The Nat'l Shawmut Bank
Travel Suggestions The Equitable Trust Co. of N. Y.
Trust Service for Corporations Guaranty Trust Co. of N. Y.

Public Utility Securities, etc.

Bonds as Safe as Our Cities Wm. R. Compton Co.
Foundation Investments H. M. Byllesby & Co.
The Giant Energy—Electricity The National City Co.
Time-Tested Underlying Railroad Bonds, 5% to 10% F. J. Lisman & Co.
Electricity in Industry Bonbright & Co.
The St. Paul Situation Rutter & Co.

Real Estate, etc., Mortgages

Building with Bonds American Bond & Mortgage Co.
How Henry Wilkinson Became Rich G. L. Miller & Co.
A Guaranteed Income The Prudence Co., Inc.
"Interest" Cleveland Discount Co.
Investors Bonds The Investors Co.
Washington, the Heart of America The F. H. Smith Co.

Partial Payment Plans—Thrift

$80,000 in 25 Years R. J. McClelland & Co.
The Partial Payment Plan John Muir & Co.
Partial Payment Plans—Thrift "24 Hours a Day" Dunham & Co.
Ten Payment Plan H. M. Byllesby & Co.

General Investment Subjects

Suggestions for Conservative Investments Lee, Higginson & Co.
Non Callable Bonds Hornblower & Weeks
Byllesby Monthly News H. M. Byllesby & Co.
Analysis of the S. S. Kresge Co. Merrill, Lynch & Co.
Getting the Most from Your Money Babson's Statistical Organization
Investment Bulletin Henry L. Doherty & Co.
Investment Recommendations Guaranty Company of N. Y.
Investment Securities Kidder, Peabody & Co.
Investment Securities The National City Co.
The Factor of Safety Spencer Trask & Co.
The Investor's Pocket Manual The Financial Press

[Continued from page 55]

Digitized by Google

C Play of the Month — Belasco's Peter Pan of the Paris Music Halls — Continued from Page 87

Kiki

call me dearie and please notice I haven't called you dearie back.

RENAL—I call all the girls déarie.

KIKI—Well, I'm not like the bunch you've got here. I'm different.

RENAL—Oh, you're a howling swell.

KIKI—You needn't sneer—even if you are the Tsar here. One week's receipts of this sheebang wouldn't be pin money for me. You don't know who I am.

RENAL—But this complaint you were going to tell me about?

KIKI—I've been terribly treated here.

RENAL—But what's happened to you?

KIKI—Joly almost threw me out.

RENAL—Oh, you're the little girl who used her hatpin on—KIKI—Yes, and I landed her one. I certainly gave her one good jab. I got even.

RENAL—This isn't the first time you've had trouble in this house.

KIKI—Yes, it is.

RENAL—I place you now. You were here last season. You had trouble then.

KIKI—No, you've got me mixed up with some other girl.

RENAL—Oh, no I haven't.

KIKI—Oh, I remember now. There was a little trouble. I did give a girl a—a—a—I just smacked her—and she set up a big howl just to be noticed. It wasn't my fault.

RENAL—It strikes me you're vicious.

KIKI—Me? Nobody has a sweeter disposition. I'm gentle as a kitten—but I have to be handled right. I have Spanish blood in my veins. My father was a Spaniard—a grand grandee.

BUT this couldn't go on forever. Renal had sent for Paulette and when Brulé told him she was approaching, Kiki had to vanish, but she resolved to wait and continue her plea to get back her job in the chorus. As she goes, she is seen by Baron Rapp, the chief stockholder in the music hall who has come to help Paulette placate Renal. The Baron, however, is unable to restore good feeling and Paulette is dismissed with the added injunction to "tell the tenor he's fired, too."

As Paulette leaves in a huff, Kiki reappears and though she persuades Renal to give her another chance, Joly is adamant and she stays fired. At that Kiki breaks down, weeps loudly and confesses her poverty and adds: "Say, can't change your mind and engage me, can you?" Renal says, "No—but I'll take you home with me." He does so, and Kiki is installed in Renal's apartment.

Baron Rapp has become interested in the girl, and remains so even after Renal confesses that when he once tried to kiss her she fought and scratched like a mad thing. The Baron, of course, has called for the purpose of trying to patch up the trouble between Renal and Paulette. He mentions the fact that Renal has not answered the star's letters; but Renal did not get the letters and suspicion at last centers on Kiki. In the meantime, the Baron wants to take Kiki to his home and Renal, on the point of going back to Paulette, is glad to get rid of her. But first he wants to know about the letters and so he calls Kiki in.

RENAL—Now I've got something to say. KIKI—That's funny. So have I. I've got something to say to you.

RENAL—Afterwards then.

KIKI—Right away, please.

RENAL—You're in a hurry.

KIKI—Yes, it can't wait. I—I—I— (Adolphe the butler, enters with an old knapsack which Kiki recognizes.) Where did you find that? You've been in my room.

ADOLPHE—I've got 'em, Monsieur!

KIKI—Why, that's my old knapsack.

ADOLPHE—It's where she hides everything she breaks. And here are your letters from Madame Paulette.

RENAL (frowning at Kiki)—Well?

KIKI—It's not true. It wasn't me.

ADOLPHE—Oh, what a liar!

KIKI—Just let me get at you!

RENAL (to Adolphe)—Get out. (to Kiki) You sit down, keep quiet, and don't you dare move. (Renal reads letters.)

KIKI—Takes you a long time to read 'em, don't it? And there's nothing interesting in them, either. My God, that woman writes a rotten hand.

THEIR talk is stopped by the ringing of the telephone. It is Paulette. Renal is again anxious to see her. Kiki does all she can to make the conversation over the 'phone impossible but is silenced. In the end, it is decided Paulette will come to the apartment in five minutes and as Kiki says: "Everything will be patched up. You'll go right back to her." It is a sad outlook for Kiki, but as Renal goes out saying, "Oh, good-by, Kiki. See you again one of these days, Kiddy," Baron Rapp is there ready with his proposal.

KIKI (to Rapp)—So she's downstairs? RAPP (stops her as she is about to follow Renal)—What good will it do to see her?

KIKI—That's so. After all what do I care if they make up? He's nothing to me.

RAPP—Mademoiselle Kiki, I hoped that I might—er—prove to be a good friend.

KIKI—Yes, I heard that you made a bid for me. Would you like very much to be a friend of mine?

RAPP—I'd like nothing better in the world. Renal doesn't appreciate you.

KIKI—Why not? Because I've got good points. Tell me what you like about me.

RAPP—There's a way you have. You're so quaint and unexpected and—er—reckless. Like a girl who isn't quite grown up—but will turn into, oh, what a woman!

KIKI—Oh, I'm like that, eh? Well, you don't find 'em like that ev'ry day, do you?

RAPP—I should say not. And you've got such a nice way—so amiable.

THERE comes a diversion. Brulé has arrived, commissioned by Renal to see that Kiki is bundled off. Rapp is ordered by Kiki to go and get his car to take her away.

Brulé wants her to go at once. She is on the point of going, when Paulette appears, having dropped in to gloat a little over Kiki. The relation between the two is strained from the beginning but at last Kiki, who is convinced that Paulette does not love Renal, blurts out the story of her love for the man who is throwing her over.

KIKI—I'm so much in love, you couldn't possibly understand it. And I'd be just mad enough to go off my head. You don't ask me who it is.

PAULETTE—I want to be discreet.

KIKI—But I'll tell you just the same. It's Victor, the man you pretend to love.

PAULETTE—But, Mademoiselle—I think I'd better go.

KIKI (barring the way)—No, no you don't.

PAULETTE—But really this is ridiculous. If I had known—

KIKI—You wouldn't have come—which would have been better for you (crosses to table and gets paper knife). I'm sorry for you. I'll be guillotined for this—but I don't care. You brought this on yourself.

PAULETTE—This is absurd.

KIKI—I warn you, if you don't give up Victor, I'll poke daylight into you.

PAULETTE—Help! Help!

KIKI—Will you swear? It's your last chance—I'm a daughter of Corsica.

RENAL (enters followed by Rapp and Adolphe)—No, you're not. You're the daughter of a noble Spaniard—and your knife won't cut.

KIKI—Hi-i-hi-i-i (She swoons in Renal's arms. He passes her to Rapp who lets her fall to the floor.)

RENAL—Oh, Paulette, my dear—

DURING the next few hours, Renal resumes business relations with Paulette, but their domestic affairs remain unchanged. Paulette, however, is eager to be, again, Victor's wife. So she uses her key, which she has never given up, to enter Renal's apartment. She comes in on the pretext of showing him her costumes, which she piles on the bed. Renal fails to respond to the ardor of her attack and directly they are interrupted by a commotion in the hall. It is a doctor, Brulé, and Adolphe bringing in Kiki. She has not recovered from her faint of the afternoon, but has passed into a cataleptic state, interesting and baffling to the physician. She is rigid. Renal tries to get the Baron to take the victim away, but he doesn't want a woman that may sleep for two years. Paulette wants her sent to the hospital but Renal objects to this. At last in a temper, Paulette says, "I'm going to the hotel. You better hurry if you're coming along," and leaves him alone with Kiki. Then it becomes obvious to Renal that Kiki has been shamming. For this he bitterly upbraids her, but he is touched by her honest admission that she did it so she would not have to leave the apartment—she was simply playing for time, she wanted to stay because, as she confesses, she loves him. But after her long period of inactivity, Kiki was hungry. So Adolphe brought food and as she ate, she told the rest of her story.

KIKI (eating)—I'm starved. It's queer what a hollow there can be in a tummy.

RENAL—That reminds me of the time I brought you here. I took you out to supper first. Remember?

KIKI—I should say so. I was so empty my clothes lapped.

RENAL—Tell me about your home?

KIKI—It wasn't always the same place. We moved—often. But—it was always—er—a hole around the corner.

RENAL—What about your family?

KIKI—There's one thing I can boast of—my father was married to my mother. Mother's father saw to that.

RENAL—Why did you leave your home?

KIKI—I got a crack on the head. You see, my family got into a way of quarreling about—well, they fought all the time and I got sick and tired of the rows.

RENAL—Really? You got tired of rows?

KIKI—Yes. So one day, when I got that crack on the head, it wasn't the first one either—Anyway, I wanted to travel and see the country.

RENAL—Well, have you seen it?

KIKI—Have I? You bet, I have. It's punk. I took an afternoon off. Nothing but trees and cows and grass. Ah, God, I hate scenery in the raw. And so quiet, so quiet you couldn't sleep. I couldn't get back to Paris quick enough—and a jolly time I've had of it—one jolly time. That night you took me out to supper my dream came true, but not quite in the way I wanted. I thought I was in heaven and then— You ought to have seen yourself that night in the restaurant. Hateful. Horrid. Cranky. You were such a martyr! It's a wonder you didn't check me with your hat. I was just a pick-up.

RENAL—You're not angry with me?

KIKI—No, I tell you. And when you simply can't hate a person, it shows you must like them, doesn't it? Of course, I ought to have gone when I found that I wasn't anything here—but I stuck. What's the reason? I ought to get over it now, sure, but— isn't it better to have someone to think about all the time than no one at all—even if it does keep you awake nights worrying? You can't be happy with them, but could you be any happier without them? That's what a girl's got to think of.

RENAL—Do you mean that?

KIKI—I know you won't believe me, all the same—I love you.

RENAL—Oh, all right (he tries to kiss her and she draws away). Oh, you're beginning that again.

KIKI—No, no. I'll kiss you—I want to—y if I told you something, you'd never believe me.

RENAL—What?

KIKI—Don't laugh at me—but it's true, all the same. I'm a—good girl. You know—I mean—a good girl.

RENAL (takes her in his arms)—I shall end by adoring you. (Knock on the door.) Who is it?

COOK (outside)—The cook.

RENAL—Come in.

COOK—I came down to see if—

RENAL—Put this girl to bed, cook, and take very good care of her—for me.

[Curtain]

Only one-fifth of the buildings owned by the Bell System are shown in this picture.

A Telephone City

Above is an imaginary city, made by grouping together one-fifth of the buildings owned by the Bell System, and used in telephone service. Picture to yourself a city five times as great and you will have an idea of the amount of real estate owned by the Bell System throughout the country.

If all these buildings were grouped together, they would make a business community with 400 more buildings than the total number of office buildings in New York City, as classified by the Department of Taxes and Assessments.

Next to its investment in modern telephone equipment, the largest investment of the Bell System is in its 1,600 modern buildings, with a value of $144,000,000. Ranging in size from twenty-seven stories down to one-story, they are used principally as executive offices, central offices, storehouses and garages. The modern construction of most of the buildings is indicated by the fact that the investment in buildings is now over three times what it was ten years ago.

Every building owned by the Bell System must be so constructed and so situated as to serve with efficiency the telephone public in each locality, and to be a sound investment for future requirements.

"BELL SYSTEM"
AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES
One Policy, One System, Universal Service, and all directed toward Better Service

Trade

Mark

THE authorized agents of the Periodical Sales Company, 538 South Dearborn St., Chicago, Illinois, with branches in twenty principal cities, are authorized to solicit, and accept, yearly subscriptions to Hearst's INTERNATIONAL, at the regular subscription price of $3.00 per year.

HEARST'S INTERNATIONAL
119 West 40th St.
NEW YORK

On the Trail of the Sleuths—Continuing from page 18—The Inside Story of

Henry Ford's Jew-Mania

methods against the Jew-baiters was acquainted with the doings of the Ford operators. He thought he would add the authenticity of a document to his narrative. To a Russian, supporting his view of the facts with a few sound and carefully made documents is often one way of helping the truth. And not to Russians alone. Those Frenchmen who forged the documents against the Jew Dreyfus, thought they were patriots. When the United States government finally became convinced that the most important among the "Sisson documents" were forgeries, I noticed no rush to undo the work the forgeries had done.

The next counter-protocol bears the date of March 23, 1921, and lets its imagination run as follows:

"The conversation first turned on the subject of pogroms. E. G. Liebold stated as follows. That he was the secretary and authorized agent for Henry Ford and before he left Detroit he was in conference with Henry Ford and that Mr. Ford expressed his desire to see pogroms at the earliest possible date. He further states that he wished all the officials present at this conference shall get in touch with all the K. K. K. and make arrangements as to when such pogroms shall start in New York City. He further stated that as far as he was concerned he favors pogroms on Jews even tomorrow. The quicker the better. He further stated that he was a member of the Ku Klux Klan. . . . F. H. Creech stated he favors pogroms this year if it possibly can be done. . . . C. W. Smith stated as follows that he saw the time for pogroms long before this and that he favors pogroms also at the earliest possible date and he will organize a group of men to go to a church and steal a Talmud and that if he is caught he will with his group start a pogrom on the Jew."

When Mr. Daniels was shown copies of these fake Protocols, his attention was directed to a paragraph which ran thus:

"C. C. Daniels stated that as far as he was concerned he also approved with Mr. Liebold that pogroms should be started as soon as possible and that we shall kill a few thousand Jews in the United States and especially in New York City and he further stated that he favored pogroms on all of the rich Jew bankers."

Mr. Daniels naturally showed righteous indignation. It is hard for him, or for Mr. Ford, to realize that their victims also feel righteous indignation. Mr. Ford, Mr. Brasol, and Mr. Daniels think I am persecuting them. Persecutors have no taste for being persecuted.

Next month's instalment of The Inside Story of Henry Ford's Jew-Mania will give attention to some of the leading gold bricks collected. President Wilson appears in his secret balancing telephone act with Mr. Justice Brandeis. Hearst's International for August.

John Russell's Story of Love and Hate in the South Seas—Continued from page 25

The Pagan

was very little cheer next instant to encounter Tito herself gliding back almost into his arms. To find their whole plan defeated. To hear her despairing cry: "The sharks, Henry! . . . The sharks are come! Look out for the sharks!"

Between them and the belted dark there passed a phantom—the merest phosphorescent presence through the water. No mistaking that lean, long ghost. No mistaking the cruel wedge of a fin that gleamed at the same time inshore from them. Joranson saw it almost as soon as they did, and his jubilant bellow confirmed it. Here was the sort of amusement that suited Joranson—the sort of punishment he might have planned himself. He dropped his paddle and got to his feet, and as Henry instinctively lifted Tito towards the proa for support and escape from the greatest terror, he slashed at them.

Bleeding, stupefied, Henry blinked up at him. Joranson held a singular object. He had a weapon in his fist; a thing with a wavy blade and a hilt set in colored stones that glittered—glittered dreadfully above them. Henry saw it. Henry knew it. It was the substance of every evil dream he had had since childhood—it was the Malay kris with which Henry Gordon Shoesmith had been slain . . . ! And at the same time beyond the looming figure of the murderer—over yonder on Vitongo shore, between the jungle and the lagoon—at the same time he saw a marble shaft like a pallid, accusing finger in the moonlight; the tomb of Henry Gordon Shoesmith on which was graven, as he knew so well, the letters of that prophetic epitaph—

"Every man's work shall be made manifest."

"Keep off, I tell you! By God, you try your tar-brush tricks on me—try 'em in hell!" With horrible mirth, Joranson slashed once more.

And then it happened; as it was bound to happen. Something snapped in Henry's breast. Some pent reserve seemed to burst and to flood through every vein—some secret spring of his being. He stiffened in the water, tense and tingling, and in a voice which might have recalled—which did recall the temper of that tough old Scotch trader, his father:

"Damn you, Joranson, you big white murdering devil," he said evenly, without a trace of accent. "I'm going to get you."

Laying hold on the proa's thwart, he threw his whole strength backward and simply spilled the little craft over, out-rigger and all. Joranson felt himself going. With a snarl he drove at Henry's throat, point foremost. Henry warded. They met, locked and went under in a spangled smother. The rest was convulsion.

The two went reeling through a dim immensity; three fathoms deep where the shadowy corals lay; back to the surface in a furious spatter of sea-fire. As they rose, Henry called to Tito to take to the wrecked canoe. He had a glimpse of her clinging there—safe. After that he gave himself to the job on hand—exultantly.

With his right arm he hung about the enemy's neck. With the other he fended. He did not strike a blow. He did not need to. All he required was the knife, the pledge of destiny and of victory with which—once he had won it, once he had wrested it from Joranson's failing grip—he could meet and scatter a dozen sharks. . . .

Gordon was there to greet them. Naturally, Gordon was there, vehemently excited from his long, spying vigil on Vitongo strand. "W'at was it? W'at 'appened?" he cried. His sharp little eyes roved from Henry to Tito in stricken astonishment as they stepped ashore, dripping, from the righted proa. "I 'eard something. Where is Joranson? Did you 'ave an accident?"

"Yes," said Henry, quietly. "An accident. The sharks, you understand. . . ."

"You mean they got 'im! Joranson . . . ?" Gordon's tone rose to a squeal of dismay. "But in that case—but if that is so—!" He saw all his schemes ruined—all his hopes of Vitongo overwhelmed in Henry's incredible good fortune. "Ah, no—no," he added, suspiciously. "You let 'im drown. You will 'ave to explain."

Henry smiled. Having done his best to be a half-caste that memorable night—having actually been a white man for a brief, tremendous moment—he was now, and at last, and for time to come, a Samoan. With a contemptuous gesture, he flicked the Malay kris into the sand at Gordon's feet. The quarter-caste snatched it up and clutched it to him . . . "It is very valuable!" he panted.

"Keep it," said Henry, thereby sealing the silence of this smart, blackmailing cousin of his forever.

"But still what are you going to do?" whined Gordon. "We must lay information of some kin'."

"Perhaps," said Henry of Vitongo. "Tomorrow is time enough. For tonight—tu'u ia mo paga." With the girl he turned away. Already they had put aside all troublesome issues; already they were heading back into the night where the soft cymbaling of palm-fronds made bridal music and pigeons murmured sleepy love-notes under the accompaniment moon. "Tu'u ia mo paga," said Henry, which means it is forgotten—it should not count.

He laughed; she laughed; there was only laughter in their hearts as they went, his arm about her waist—not towards the house—not towards the store—but away to the right; where the candlenut tree and its clustering blossoms showed the way to the wild ravine—two frank and unabashed pagans together.

A TRAIN THAT NOBODY COULD STOP!

BEHIND a certain special train which left New York City on Memorial Day, 1910, stood a simple and great idea. The idea was that there is all the difference in the world between the man who owns his own drug store and the man who runs it for a salary.

As Henry W. Merritt, of Wilkes-Barre, himself a veteran drug-store proprietor, puts it: "Neighborliness is the most important thing in modern business, and any business which grows so big that neighborliness is eliminated will never quite give the service it ought to give."

Mr. Merritt, who is a director of the American Druggists Syndicate and who has been president of the National Association of Retail Druggists, was one of three men who sent this special train zig-zagging on its triumphant way across the continent.

Today, when the man on the street knows how great this co-operative organization is, it's hard to believe that the A. D. S. ever faced any problems.

TODAY . . . when three thousand drug products and accessories with the A. D. S. label go into millions of American homes . . . when twenty-six thousand druggists and physicians form the solid bulwark of its democratic organization . . . when the Long Island plant, covering more than twelve acres of floor space, is only one of four big manufactories and laboratories in four different states . . . when this—the biggest organization in the world of retailers who own their own manufacturing business—is capitalized cleanly at $10,000,000 and has a volunteer line of credit from leading New York banks of $1,500,000.

But yesterday, and the day before, there were troubles. Even in 1910, when the A. D. S. had got past its infant stage, when five thousand dollars were in the treasury, when the "line" had been increased from the original six remedies to include several "bulk" items and rubber goods, there were severe problems.

The main problem was how to increase the organization. For everything was ready—except a large membership. With only 4,600 members, the machinery was barely moving. With 10,000 it would be running mightily in high gear.

"I joined the A. D. S. myself, and I have labored ever since, with all my power, to get others to join. The vision I saw has apparently been seen by others, for never have I witnessed such enthusiastic growth." —HENRY W. MERRITT

THREE men got together. They were Henry W. Merritt, Charles H. Goddard, then Secretary of the A. D. S., and Dr. William C. Anderson, Dean of the Brooklyn College of Pharmacy.

On Memorial Day in 1910, as a result of this little meeting, two special cars were attached to a train leaving New York. One car was filled with samples and supplies of A. D. S. products. It had show cases, shelves, display material. . . . The other car had eight men.

Weaving, twisting, zig-zagging its way across the continent, this special train visited fifty-two cities in forty-two days, drew into its silver web of public service the progressive druggists of the country—the entire 6,400 of them—necessary to make the coveted 10,000 members of the A. D. S.

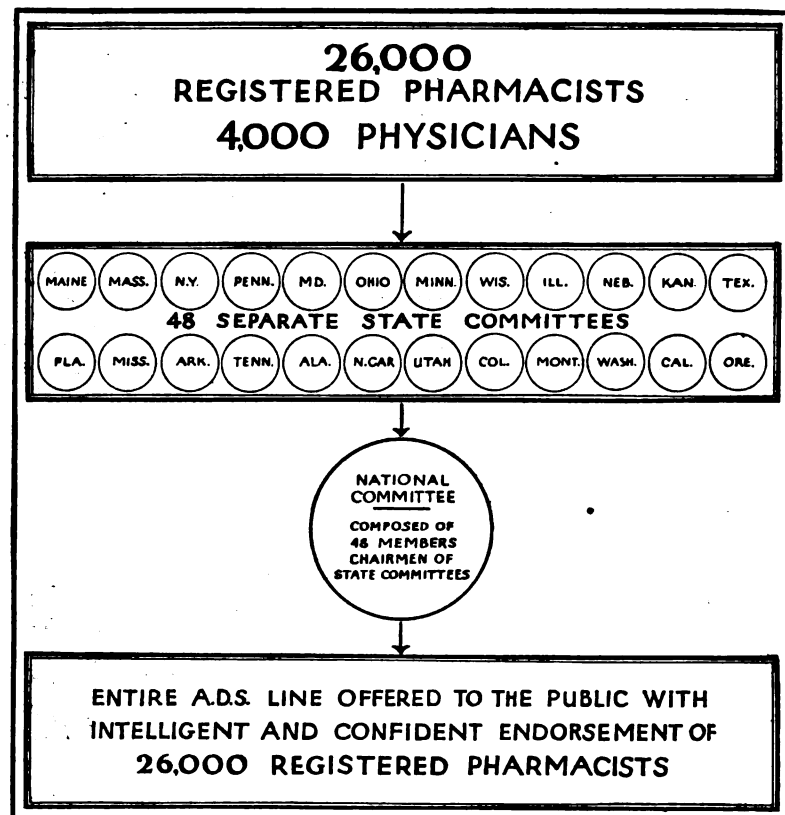

Chart showing the way the vast A. D. S. organization secures and judges the best medical formulae in the entire United States

TO Henry W. Merritt this was the greatest adventure of his life.

"It was not only amazing in its daring, in its romance, and in its remarkable practicality," he says, "but it taught me a lesson I shall never forget. It taught me that I was not merely the proprietor of a drug store, but a public servant." And Mr. Merritt is right as usual. This trip indicates dramatically the four big things the A. D. S. stands for.

First, Democracy.

FROM city to city the train travelled, stopping on a siding while Mr. Merritt and his men brought druggists—busy men who would leave their stores only for an unusually important affair like this—to the special cars. There it was explained to them that the A. D. S. is the only organization of its kind in the world—the only organization of retail druggists who own their own manufacturing plant.

It was explained to them that no man or group of men controls the organization, that every individual member has as much to say as every other member.

They were told about the manufacturing plant and about the great hopes which the A. D. S. had for the future—hopes which today have been realized in the four great plants and laboratories.

Second, Public Service.

This was the particular function of Henry W. Merritt, for—well, let him tell it in his own words.

"I WAS called sales manager," he tells you. "I merely organized the men in each city and saw to it that druggists were got to join and give their initial order of A. D. S. goods. And I made a talk. I hadn't intended to, but the more I saw how great a service the average druggist was giving in his locality and how little he was appreciated, the more I realized how important it was to make him conscious of himself and to help make his business easier and more substantial.

"In one drug store, for instance, the proprietor confided to me that he did more of a doctor's work than the average physician. People came to him for aid—people with stomach trouble, headaches, sore throats and colds, rheumatic pains. He was modest and very cautious in his recommendations. He spent more time telling them how nature would cure them than in selling them drugs. As I stood there, a score of people interrupted us to ask for postage stamps, for telephone slugs, for a city directory, and so on. Without for a moment losing his smile of good will, the proprietor served them all.

"It came to me forcibly that never in the world will big business, machinery and large scale organization create a substitute for the wholesome, personal good will of this friend of the community. And in that moment I saw the fallacy of the chain-store movement. For that movement, with all its advantages, substitutes a clerk for the proprietor. In other words, it substitutes a cog in the wheel for a human being. And I saw that the A. D. S. solved this one big problem, for it kept the proprietor in human contact with his customers, and at the same time it gave him all the advantages of large scale production. And of course it gave him the finest drug products in the world to sell at prices no higher than those of chain store competitors.

"IT WAS an inspiring thought, and it interested me seriously in the future of this great organization. You can't go into the future of any living thing without consulting its past, and I had studied, in a sketchy way, the past of the co-operative movement.

"I HAD viewed the whole co-operative movement in industry with a great deal of interest. I had studied the history of the movement and could see that it was rising to greater and greater power, so that soon all civilized humanity would share its benefits.

"I had gone into the beginnings with Robert Owen, Fournier, the Rochdale Pioneers, Herr Raiffeisen, and the Syndicats Agricoles—the eighteenth and nineteenth century beginnings in England, France and Germany.

"I had seen how swiftly America came into the movement—from the old Boston Buying Club to the modern agricultural and industrial nation-wide co-operative movement. And then I came to a study of the modern chain store movement. There I had my first moment of hesitation, of doubt.

"For I am, first, last, and all the time, a druggist—a proprietor. I know that never will science invent a substitute for the human heart, for the friendly hand, for the neighborly and understanding mind. . . And here I saw clerks where before there had been friends, machinery where before there had been kindly human beings.

"It seemed to me that the greatness of the chain store movement was yet to be discovered.

"It has been. As soon as I heard of the A. D. S., I knew that the human problem had been solved. It had the advantages—all of them—of the chain store movement. Fine products. Large scale manufacture, so that prices were low. Swift and large scale transportation, so that products were always fresh. At the same time it kept the actual owner in his own store.

Among the most popular of all the 3,000 A. D. S. articles is CHLOR-E-DIXO tooth paste

"I joined, and I have labored ever since with all my power to get others to join. The vision which I saw has apparently been seen by others, for never have I witnessed such an enthusiastic growth as that of this great public service organization."

That Henry W. Merritt's faith was justified is proved by the success of the A. D. S. today. For today A. D. S. products go into ten million American homes; today there are twenty-six thousand A. D. S. members; today the A. D. S. is capitalized at $10,000,000 and has a voluntary line of credit from New York banks of $1,500,000; today the A. D. S. manufactures more than three thousand different drug products and accessories.

But the growth was not as easy as one might think. The early struggles of the organization, when opposition and hard luck came from every quarter, were told in speeches during the trip by Charles H. Goddard.

Mr. Goddard told also how the organization might grow to greatness. (Today, when most people would be satisfied, he still predicts ten times the development which already has come.)

An illustration of the soundness of Mr. Goddard's faith was brought vividly to Mr. Merritt's attention during the trip.

"I had an aunt in Denver," he says, "and when we arrived, I was so tired—for we had been living, eating and sleeping A. D. S. for weeks—I decided to slip away from the party for a few hours and call on Aunt Sophie. As soon as I saw the dear old lady, she asked about her niece. 'Ethel is happy and well,' I told her, 'except for a quinsy sore throat which she had when I left Pennsylvania.' My aunt dashed out of the room and returned with a package. 'Here's the best thing in the world for her throat,' she said. I looked at the package. It was A. D. S. Bronklets. And that was in 1910!"

Third, Science to the Highest Degree.

In the Formula Idea, the A. D. S. has developed the finest method for drug manufacture known to the world. Dr. Anderson, Dean of the Brooklyn College of Pharmacy, and head of the A. D. S. National Formula Committee, told about it in his speeches. The A. D. S. had, in every State, a State Formula Committee. This committee received from each pharmacist in its state the best formula for combining drugs he had developed in his experience. From among these the committee selected the best and passed them on to the National Formula Committee. From the best formulas selected by the National Committee, after every modern test was put to them, were selected the formulas from which A. D. S. products were manufactured.

An artist's impression of A. D. S. plant at Long Island City—one of its four chief establishments

When Dr. Anderson told druggists of this, they responded with enthusiasm which today the greater organization still retains.

There was one old-timer who came up to the special car of the A. D. S.

"I was born in the drug profession," he told them, "and I expect to live out my life in it. I'm for progress, but I'm not for cold-blooded division of human functions. My store is a sort of home to every customer. It is a place not only for telephone calls, postage stamps and the use of the directory, but it is a place of advice. I spend fully half of my time telling people that nature will cure them, and the other half of my time I spend trying to give them drugs which will help nature to do its work.

"A matter like this is very important to me. I can't believe in a system which sends me out of my own store and changes my relationship with my customers. For it isn't good for my customers. And yet I do want to be modern, to have the finest products, to be able to charge the lowest prices.

"Your system gives me all these advantages. And in addition to that I can have some say in the manufacture.

"For, believe me, in my years of experience I have developed several formulas which are better than those of any drug manufacturer. For years I have tried to find a way to give the general public the benefit of these formulas. Now, with the A. D. S. organization, with its splendid Formula Idea, I can function more happily and efficiently than ever before."

Fourth, the Value of Ambition.

GREAT as the A. D. S. is, it is only in its infancy. This is not merely a belief of men like Mr. Goddard and Mr. Merritt—it is the faith of the great majority of the twenty-six thousand A. D. S. members.

"I go about here and there in the country," says Mr. Merritt, "and I find today the same sturdy pioneer spirit that I found on that trip in 1910. Then every member, whether he joined a day before or at the beginning five years ago, felt that with his co-operation, with his steady, concentrated effort, the A. D. S. would grow almost to unlimited service.

"Today they ask me, everywhere, whether the A. D. S. can stand more growth. And I tell them that if they will continue to concentrate their orders as they have been doing, we can, with hardly an increase in our labor or machinery costs, manufacture $50,000,000 worth of drug products and accessories a year.

AND, I tell them, this will be at such a saving in costs that the price of these products—products acknowledged to be the purest on the market—will be reduced fully one-third to the public.

"Such a healthy financial and producing organization is a phenomenon, and as our members are growing in the realization of our own possibilities, they are co-operating more and more intensively to make us of still greater service to their customers and ours."

Charles H. Goddard, who was secretary at the time of that famous flying trip across the continent, and who is president today, has gone into fascinating detail as to the possibilities for growth.

This detail is dramatic in its interest, and its essentials are of vital moment to every American who uses, in one way or another, the service of the drug store—which means every man, woman and child in these United States.

The whole plan—staggering in its implications—began with the purchase of the first big plant by the A. D. S. in 1911.

In itself it was a daring stroke.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Old Hardhead

[Continued from page 41]

threatened to call balls on him at once. "Yep," muttered Donovan to one of the veterans on the bench, "the boys are in shape, all right."

They walked back to their positions, glaring at each other all the while. By dint of more conferences and arguments, they succeeded in striking out two batters in succession.

The crowd in the meantime was in a sweat. The coming situation was too tense for wild applause. Sensing what was about to happen, the fans sat back in silence.

Home Run Thorpe, the slugger of the Grays—of the league—was up next.

A long hit by Thorpe would break up the game, and there was always danger of his making it. To strike him out—well, the fans waited uncomfortably.

This situation did not appear to bother De Forrest and the Jabber in the least. Immediately they went into a wordy and heated conference.

Nobody ever knew whether they agreed or not, but they did manage to slip two strikes over on Thorpe before he had taken his bat from his shoulder. This put the crowd in an uproar.

Obviously there was but one thing to do, and they did it without argument. They wasted three in the hope that the slugger might get impatient and snap at a bad one. But Thorpe didn't fall for it. He stood there, calm as you please, until the count stood two and three.

"I'm telling you," said McGarr, throwing down his mask and walking half way to the pitcher's box, "that he can't hit a curve that is low and inside."

Nobody heard De Forrest, of course, but the fans knew that he didn't agree with what McGarr had said. He shook his head.

"I've studied him for years, and I know," reiterated the Jabber. "You are only a youngster—what do you know?"

"Youngster, yes," said De Forrest, "but I'm a pitcher. You're a catcher. This fellow's weakness is a fast high one."

"Why, you big boob, he'll knock that out of the lot. Give him a low one inside. Ask Donovan what he thinks."

They both turned to the bench, but Mike wouldn't look at them.

"I'm going to pitch as I please," declared De Forrest, "and you know what that means. I've had enough of you."

THERE was poison in De Forrest's voice, and there was poison in his thoughts. Everything, the game—maybe the pennant, depended on this one pitch.

"Enough of me, eh? If it hadn't been for me, you'd still be in the bush league. Who made you a pitcher? Answer me that! Have you ever been right in an argument in your life? Oysters ain't fish, eh? . . . Low curve inside, I say!"

"I'll win this one, all right," retorted Dean, thoroughly angered. "One of us'll be killed or cured."

If ever there was a chance to resort to that Napoleonic emergency of which De Forrest had dared to think, this was it. Yes, he recalled, the Lord loveth them that he chasteneth—why not I?

Back and forth they argued until the

KOTEX

Traveling or at home—

"KOTEX is almost indispensable. So far ahead of other sanitary pads—it seems odd now to think of birdseye and old fashioned make-shifts. . . . No embarrassment buying them either—one need only say, 'A box of Kotex' . . . A great convenience, being so very easily disposed of. . . . Cool in warm weather and comfortable at all times. They make it safe to wear the lightest summer frocks."

Druggists, drygoods and department stores everywhere sell Kotex by name. Just around the corner, downtown, and in vacation centers.

Keep Kotex always on hand—ask for it by name.

REGULAR SIZE, 12 IN BOX HOSPITAL SIZE, 6 IN BOX
(Additional thickness)

If not yet familiar with this wonderful new sanitary pad that has won women's favor like a "best seller," let us send you a sample Kotex, in plain wrapper, free, on request to Alice Wayne, care of the Chicago Office.

Cellucotton Products Co., 166 W. Jackson Boul., Chicago
51 Chambers St., New York      Factories: Neenah, Wis.

INEXPENSIVE, COMFORTABLE, HYGIENIC and SAFE — KOTEX

spectators were in a rage. The opposition was storming at the umpire.

"Go on and make 'em pitch," the Grays demanded. "Fine chance we'd have of getting away with that!"

Home Run Thorpe stood there, not a muscle moving.

The umpire finally ordered play to proceed or he'd forfeit the game.

De Forrest was beginning to nod his head to McGarr. He had made up his mind on something. From where we sat, his face suddenly looked drawn and hard.

The Jabber, smiling over what he felt a moral victory, donned his mask and squatted to receive the pitch.

There being three on bases and two out, De Forrest did not have to watch the runners. He could take a big wind-up.

As De Forrest started his big wind-up all three Gray runners started in motion. If the batter struck out it would make no difference, anyway. If he hit safely all might score. Putting all he had in the throw, De Forrest cut loose.

McGarr set himself to one side and reached low for the ball.

But it was not a low curve inside!

Dean had hurled the fastest ball he had in his kit. And it was breast-high—two feet from where McGarr had expected it.

Thorpe took a furious swing and missed. A yelp—more like a bark—started from the crowd, and stopped.

De Forrest had made his Napoleonic stand—had deliberately crossed the Jabber; had stood firmly on his belief.

The ball hit McGarr squarely on top of the head. So great was the speed of it that the ol' pill, as Jabber called it, bounded upward and over the top of the grandstand. The batter and all three runners scored.

In the stands and on the field there was a mild form of riot. Enraged by the sudden change in fortune, fans jumped up and down, howling, wanting to do something, anything—they knew not what.

PLAYERS rushed around the umpire clamoring something that even we knew not what. We couldn't get a decision.

Finally the umpire held up four fingers. The runs all counted!

"What'll I score it?" the scorer demanded to know.

That stopped us all for a moment. We argued back and forth, hotly, forgetting about poor Jabber lying there, knocked out. Players were trying to revive him.

"The only thing I can figure," said Dryden, dean of our corps, "is to score it—well—well—a strike-out, a passed ball a wild pitch and—"

"Yes, it's all of those things," admitted the scorer, "but I've got to call it one thing—not a dozen."

"A home run is the only thing you can call it," said the umpire when we appealed to him. It was so recorded, the official rules never having contemplated a situation like that.

Then we turned to see about the Jabber. He was still unconscious. Mike Donovan and the club doctor were leaning over him, pouring water on his head and working his arms up and down.

McGarr opened his eyes.

"Where's Dean?" he asked.

De Forrest crowded in beside him. McGarr motioned for him to lean over and put his ear to his lips. The stronger-than-words argument had gone home.

"You win that one, Dean," he mumbled, his fingers wandering over the lump on his boasted hard head. "I'll say he didn't hit a fast one, breast high."

Truly a great monarch had fallen. Team mates gaped open-mouthed at what they had heard.

"But I always told you the Jabber was a game guy," De Forrest declared.

¶ Frederic Arnold Kummer's "What Would You Have Done?" Story—Continued from page 51

Woman to Woman

done to anyone—neither to you, nor to him."

"You think not?"

"Why should there? You were led into the affair quite innocently. Were you to acquaint the man who loves you with the circumstances now, I am sure that if he cares for you as deeply as you say, he would marry you in spite of what has occurred. But it is never safe, my child, to trust in forgiveness granted under such circumstances. No matter how he might feel now, in the years to come he would remember, and in the end unhappiness would almost certainly come to you both. That is human nature."

The girl, who had listened to every word with avid attention, gave a little shudder. "Then you advise me not to tell him?"

"Yes. That seems to be best. I am the last person in the world to advise or countenance deceit, but the circumstances are unusual, and sometimes it is the part of wisdom not to tell too much."

"But—if he should ever find out."

"Who could tell him? No one but myself and the members of our League; and to us such matters are sacred. Our lips are sealed. You have nothing to fear."

"I am glad to know that you feel that way, Mrs. Dexter," Pauline said, regarding with somber eyes the older woman. "You were the only person in the world to whom I could come for advice. No one else knows my story, and I did not wish to tell anyone else."

"Of course not, my child. I am only too glad to be of help to you. It is the duty of our League to look after the welfare of our girls. In fact, I consider it a compliment that you have come to me in this way. It shows that in helping you to do right we have made no mistake. As I have said before, I see no possible reason why you should not marry this man, if you want to, whoever he may be."

Mrs. Dexter finished this speech rather enthusiastically, and her manner, as she looked at her companion seemed to denote a desire for equally enthusiastic approval.

None came. Pauline West looked at her with her large and tragic eyes in a manner that was distinctly disconcerting.

"It is true, Mrs. Dexter," she said steadily, "that there was no one in the world but you to whom I could come for advice in this matter, but I have not yet explained why that is so. The fact that you knew my story was one reason, of course, but there is another."

"Another?" Mrs. Dexter's enthusiasm disappeared, swept away by a flood of questions, doubts.

"The real reason, Mrs. Dexter, is this: The man who has asked me to marry him is your son Royce."

The words were spoken in a tone even lower than those which the girl had been using, for sorrow and a certain fear gripped her heart, but to Mrs. Dexter they sounded like the crackle of near-by thunder.

"Royce!" she exclaimed harshly. "My son!" She rose and went towards the girl as though she would have liked to take her by the throat and throttle her. "How dare you! How dare you!"

"How dare I what, Mrs. Dexter?" Pauline West's voice trembled pitifully.

"How dare you come here and tell me such a thing! It is insulting!"

"I came because I thought it was the right, the honest thing for me to do."

"So this is the thanks I get for saving you from the gutter! Oh!"

"You have told me," the girl went on quietly, "that you see no reason why I should not marry this man, whoever he may be. I had to know how you felt, on that point, before I could tell you who he was, for I realized that otherwise you would not tell me the truth. I did not come here to trick you into any admissions. I did not have to come at all. Royce would have married me, a week ago, if I would have let him. I met him, last month, at your sister's in Boston. He has proposed to me half a dozen times, but I refused to give him any answer. I wanted to see you.

"You mean to accept him, I suppose." Mrs. Dexter had recovered her composure. There was a dangerous gleam in her eyes.

"I must, Mrs. Dexter. I love him."

"Then I shall tell him the truth."

"You can not do that. You promised not to tell anyone."

"That makes no difference now. I am fighting for my son's happiness. You are not a fit wife for him and you shall not marry him if I can prevent it."

"Why am I not fit to marry your son, Mrs. Dexter?"

"Because you are—because of that affair you had—with another man."

"You believe, then, that I am an immoral woman?"

"It makes no difference what I believe."

"But, knowing all this, you said I could marry any man I pleased."

"Perhaps I did. This is different. We are speaking of my son, now."

"Is he so much better than any other man? Is that what you mean?"

"He is my son."

The girl went to the window and gazed out into the street for several moments in silence. Presently she turned, spoke.

"You pretend to save many women from the streets, Mrs. Dexter, you and your associates. You pride yourselves on making good women of them. You did not have to make a good woman of me, for I have never been anything else. I loved Jim Woodward. We came from the same town, and had grown up together. He was a splendid man. When he found that he was about to go abroad with his regiment, he came to say good-by to his people, to me, and he asked me to marry him, before he went. He had a premonition that he would never come back. I agreed. It was arranged that we were to be married in New York the following week. He was to get the license, and I was to meet him that afternoon. He forgot, or did not know, that I had to go to the license bureau with him. When he found it out, I was on my way to New York. My train was due half an hour before the bureau closed. He was waiting, with a taxicab, to drive me from the station to the City Hall. My train was half an hour late."

"I know all that," said Mrs. Dexter.

"I feel you must have forgotten, or you could not be so bitter. We tried New Jersey next, only to find that licenses there, to non-residents, are not good immediately."

"You, Mrs. Dexter, would never have known anything about me, had it not been for my child. I did not return home. My people thought I had been married, and I did not undeceive them. I worked very hard in New York, as long as I was able to work, for I knew Jim would come back and marry me, some day, if his life were spared."

Mrs. Dexter shook her head impatiently. "All this is beside the question. I shall tell Royce the truth."

"You have no right to destroy his happiness, and mine, by making use of the knowledge you possess."

"He must know the truth."

"Then at least let him hear it from me, first. I think you owe me that much."

"No. I don't trust you. I shall write him fully tonight."

"That will not be necessary. He will be here in a few moments."

"Here?" Mrs. Dexter stared.

"Yes. We came down from Boston together. I told him I must speak to you first, because you had been very kind to me, helped me to get a position. He did not want me to come to you alone, but I insisted. I begged him for half an hour. The time is up. When he comes, you can tell him." She spoke very quietly, very hopelessly, as though everything had been settled. Her calmness contrasted strangely with Mrs. Dexter's agitation.

The few leaden moments during which the two women silently faced each other rolled their weary way across their hearts, and Royce came. He kissed his mother hastily, yet with evident affection, then went up to Pauline and took her hands.

"Have you told her, dear?" he asked.

Pauline nodded, unable to speak. Mrs. Dexter pointed to a chair.

"Sit down, Royce," she said, in a voice so ominous that the young man wheeled upon her in surprise.

"What's up, mother?" he asked, looking for a moment into her eyes.

Pauline glanced up at him, unsmiling.

"Your mother has something to say to you, Royce," she whispered.

Mrs. Dexter said, "I suppose this girl has told you that I sent her to Boston, interested your Aunt Laura in her?"

"Yes, I have heard so. What of it?"

Can a woman bear the burden of knowing her husband is a criminal? And if the crime is murder? That is the question in "Paul and Ruth and Solomon" by Donn Byrne, and the situation makes a story of a good wife's dilemma, which involves her dare-devil husband, that you will not soon forget. See Hearst's International for August, ready July 20th.

"Perhaps you do not know that the society of which I am president rescued her from starvation, took care of her baby, until it died—"

"Her baby!" Royce Dexter's face was ashen as he turned to Miss West. "Pauline—you were married before?"

"That is just the point," observed Mrs. Dexter dryly. "She was not married."

Pauline West drew in her breath sharply, with a queer, despairing sigh.

"Pauline!" Royce groaned. "It isn't true."

She was unable to meet his horrified gaze. Her eyes sought Mrs. Dexter.

"At least," she said, "you might have told him all the truth." There was a note of infinite weariness in her voice. "Yes, Royce, I was in love with a man, two years ago, before I met you. We were to have been married, just as he was sailing for France. An accident prevented. He was killed at St. Mihiel. That is all."

"Why didn't you tell me?" he demanded.

"I didn't know what to do." Her courage was beginning to break, now, and with it her voice. "That is why I came here—to ask your mother's advice. She gave it to me; advised me to say nothing; told me that I might marry whomever I pleased. When I told her that you were the man I loved, she became furious, said she would stop our marriage by telling you the truth. Perhaps it is just as well. We could never have been happy, with a thing like that between us. I was never meant to be happy, I guess."

Pauline rose and went up to him. "I want you to remember, Royce," she said, her voice like the rustling of dry leaves, "that I told you from the first I was afraid, and begged you to give me up. Even when you insisted that I marry you at once, I refused. You should have listened to me then. Now you must listen to me. You must give me up. We need never see each other again. Good-by."

"Pauline!" Royce said gently.

Mrs. Dexter, who had been watching him very closely, interposed herself between him and the tottering girl.

"You must let her go, Royce," she said. "You must never see her again."

Her words checked the girl at the threshold. Anger stopped her tears.

"Perhaps you are right, Mrs. Dexter!" she cried. "Perhaps I am not fit to marry your son; and yet I think I am as good as he is—as any man is. Can he say that he has never done an immoral thing in his life? It isn't fair, Mrs. Dexter, to have one law for men, and another for women."

"Be quiet!" Mrs. Dexter cried. "How dare you say such things about my son?"

"Because they are the truth. Not any more about him than about any other man. There's no use in saying anything more," she went on, with sudden weariness. "Only women are immoral. Men are just—men."

Once more she turned away.

This time, however, it was Royce who stopped her. He took her in his arms.

"Pauline—dear girl!" he whispered, "I will not let you go. I'm going to marry you in spite of anyone in the world."

"Royce!" Mrs. Dexter's voice was almost a scream. "What can you be thinking of? Are you suddenly mad?"

New Millinery For Mermaids

PARIS itself comes to Kleinert's for Bathing Cap styles. Each season Kleinert's bring out original and becoming designs with motifs and colors to harmonize with the smartest bathing costumes. Gay flowers, bead ornaments, buckles—all the whimsies of fashionable millinery grace these waterproof caps and hats.

There are rubber bandanas too, and sashes, to add chic and comfort—just be sure they bear the quality mark Kleinert's—to guarantee their style and durability.

All beginners—especially youngsters—should have a Kleinert's Rubba Float. It's an air pillow, just the right shape, and guaranteed airtight, whether wet or dry.

Kleinert's

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

I. B. KLEINERT RUBBER CO.
Dept L, Box 181, Sta. D., N.Y.C.

Canadian Office:

84 Wellington St., West, Toronto.

Send for Kleinert's Book of Better Ways—a new little book about gifts and handy articles like household aprons, bibs, tourist cases, etc. Free for the asking.

KKKKKKKKKK

Upton Sinclair's Novel of the Figure from the Stained-Glass Window — Continued from page 13

They Call Me Carpenter

Carpenter did not say whether or not he knew the big man.

"They come to me always, the peecture people; to me, the magician, the depute of the god of beautee. Mary Magna, she comes to me, and she breengs me her old grandmother, and she says, 'Madame,' she says, 'make her new from the waist up, for you can nevair tell how the fashions weel change, and what she weel need to show,'" exclaimed Madame Planchet.

I knew by now where I was. I had heard many times of Madame Planchet's beauty-parlors. I sat, wondering; should I take Carpenter by the arm, and lead him gently out, or should I leave him to fight his own fight with modern civilization?

Madame turned suddenly, drew me apart, and said: "Meester Billee, tell me somet'ing. Ees eet true that thees gentleman ees a healer? He takes away the pains? He makes you not to suffer?"

"He did it for me," I answered.

"I have an idea; eet ees a wondair." She turned to my friend. "Meester Carpenter, they tell me that you heal the pains. I think eet would be a vairy fine thing eef you would come to my parlors and attend the ladies while I give them the permanent wave, and while I skeen them, and make them the dimples and the sweet smiles. They suffer so, the poor dears, and eef you would seet and hold their hands, they would love eet, they would come every day for eet, and you would be famous, and you would be reech."

MADAME PLANCHET so far had not heard the sound of Carpenter's voice. Now she forced him to speak, but she did not force him to look at her. His gaze went over her head, as he recited:

"Because the daughters of Zion are haughty, and walk with stretched forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet; therefore the Lord will smite with a scab the crown of the head of the daughters of Zion, and the Lord will discover their secret parts."

"Oh, mon Dieu!" cried Madame.

"In that day the Lord will take away the bravery of their tinkling ornaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon, the chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers, the bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the headbands, and the tablets, and the earrings, the rings, and nose jewels, the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping pins, the glasses, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the veils. And it shall come to pass that instead of sweet smell there shall be stink; and instead of a girdle a rent; and instead of well set hair, baldness; and instead of a stomacher a girding of sackcloth; and burning instead of beauty."

At that moment the door was flung open, and Mary Magna came in.

"My Gawd, will you look who's here! Billy, wretched creature, I haven't laid eyes on you for two months! Do you have to desert me entirely, just because you've fallen in love with a society girl with the face of a Japanese doll-baby? What's the matter with me, that I lose my lovers faster than I get them? Hello, Planchet, how's my old grannie making out in your scalping-shop? And—why, what's this? For the love of Peter, somebody introduce me to this gentleman. Is he a friend of yours, Billy? Carpenter? Excuse me, Mr. Carpenter, but we picture people learn to talk about our faces and our styles, and it isn't every day I come on a million dollars walking round on two legs. Who does the gentleman work for?"

Mary Magna stopped long enough for her to stare from one to another of us. "What? You mean nobody's got him? And you all standing round here, not signing any contracts? Well, as it happens, T-S is going to be here in five minutes."

Mary stopped again; and this was most unusual, for as a general rule, she never stopped until somebody or something stopped her. But she was fascinated by the appearance of Carpenter. "My good heaven! Where did he come from? Why, it seems like—I'm trying to think—yes, it's the very man! Listen, Billy; you may not believe it, but I was in a church a couple of weeks ago. I went to see Roxanna Riddle marry that grand duke fellow. It was in a big church over by the park—St. Bartholomew, they call it. I sat looking at a stained-glass window over the altar, and Billy, I swear I believe this Mr. Carpenter came down from that window!"

"Maybe he did, Mary," I put in.

"But I'm not joking! I tell you he's the living, speaking image of that figure. Come to think of it, he isn't speaking, he hasn't said a word! Tell me, Mr. Carpenter, have you got a voice, or are you only a close-up from 'The Servant in the House' or 'Ben Hur'?"

He smiled gently. "Mary," he said, "I think you are carrying everything but the nose jewels."

"Nose jewels? What a horrid idea!"

"When you came in, I was quoting the prophet Isaiah. Some eighty generations of ladies have lived on earth since his day, Mary; they have won the ballot, but apparently they haven't discovered anything new in the way of ornaments. Some of the prophet's words may be strange to you, but if you study them you will see that you've got everything he lists: 'their tinkling onaments about their feet, and their cauls, and their round tires like the moon, the chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers, the bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the headbands, and the tablets, and the earrings, the rings, and nose jewels, the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples, and the crisping pins, the glasses, and the fine linen, and the hoods, and the veils.'"

As Carpenter recited this list, his eyes roamed from one part to another of the wondrous "get up" of Mary Magna. You can imagine her facing him—that bold and vivid figure which you have seen as "Cleopatra" and "Salome," as "Dubarry" and "Anne Boleyn," and I know not how many other of the famous courtesans and queens.

Mary had not taken her eyes off Carpenter. "So you are really one of those religious fellows!" she exclaimed. "You'll know exactly what to do without any directing! How perfectly incredible!" At that appropriate moment, T-S pushed open the door and waddled in!

YOU know the screen stars, of course; but maybe you do not know those larger celestial bodies, the dark and silent and invisible stars from which the shining ones derive their energies. So, permit me to introduce you to T-S, the trade abbreviation for a name which nobody can remember, which even his secretaries have to keep typed on a slip of paper just above their machines—Tszchniczklefritsch. If you are as rich as he, you call him Abey; otherwise, you call him Mr. T-S.

He is shorter than you or I, and has found that he can't grow upward, but can grow without limit in all lateral directions. There is always a little more of him than his clothing can hold, and it spreads out in rolls about his collar. He has a yellowish face, which turns red easily. He has small, shiny eyes, he speaks atrocious English, he is as devoid of culture as a hairy Ainu.

"Hello, everybody! Madame, vere's de old voman?"

"She ees being dressed."

"Vell, speed her up! I got——"

The great man of the pictures stood rooted to the spot. "Vot's dis? Some joke you people playin' on me?" He shot a suspicious glance from one to another. "No," said Mary, "he's real. Honest to goodness!"

"Oh! You bring him fer an engagement. Vell, I don't do no business outside my office. Send him to see Lipsky."

"He hasn't asked for an engagement," said Mary.

"Oh, he ain't. Vell, vot's he hangin' about fer? Gittin' a permanent-vave?"

"Cut it out, Abey," said Mary Magna. "This is a gentleman, and you must be decent. Mr. Carpenter, meet Mr. T-S."

"Carpenter, eh? Vell, Mr. Carpenter, if I vas to make a picture vit you I gotta spend a million dollars on it—you know you can't make no cheap-skate picture fer a t'ing like dat; if you do you got a piece o' cheese on your hands."

"Cut it out, Abey!" broke in Mary. "Mr. Carpenter hasn't asked anything of you as far as I've heard."

"Oh, he ain't, hey? So dat's his game. Vell, he'll find maybe I can vait as long as de next feller. Vot's de matter, Madame. is dat voman o' mine melsted to de chair?"

"I'll see, I'll see, Meester T-S," said Madame, hustling out of the room.

Mary came up to the great man. "See here, Abey," she said, in a low voice, "you're making the worst mistake of your life. This man hasn't been discovered. When he is, you know what'll happen."

"Vere doss he come from?"

"I don't know. Billy here brought him."

"But, Mary, can he act?"

"Act? Heavens, he don't have to act!

He only has to look at you, and you want to fall at his feet."

The great man surveyed the figure of the stranger. Then he went up to him.

"See here, Mr. Carpenter, maybe I could make you famous. Vat you say?"

"I have never thought of being famous."

"Vell, you t'ink of it now. If I hire you, I make you de greatest actor in the world."

I was waiting with curiosity to hear what he would say; but at that moment the door from the "maternity-room" was opened, and the voice of Madame Planchet interrupted us, saying: "Here she ees!"

"My Gawd!" gasped Mrs. T-S. "I'm dyin'! I'm surely dyin'!"

Her husband responded, beaming, "So you gone and done it again!"

Said Mrs. T-S: "I'll never do it no more, I promise you that!"

"Y'allus say dat. Fergit it, Maw, you're all right now, you don't have to have your hair frizzed fer six mont's!"

"I gotta lie down. I'm dyin', Abey, I tell you. Lemme git on de sofa."

"Now, Maw, we gotta eat——"

"I can't eat no dinner."

"Vot?" There was genuine alarm in the husband's voice. "You can't eat no dinner? Sure you gotta eat your dinner. You can't live if you don't eat. Come along now, Maw and git dinner."

T-S went and stood before her, and a grin came over his face. "Maw, it's grand! It's like I got a new girl! Come on now, git up, ve go git our dinner, and den ve gotta see dem night scenes took. Don't fergit, ve're payin' two t'ousand men five dollars apiece tonight, and ve gotta git our money out of 'em." Then, taking for granted that this settled it, he turned to the rest. "You come vit us, Mary?"

"I must wait for my grannie."

"Sure, you leave your car fer grannie, and you come vit us, and ve git some dinner. and den ve see dem mob scenes took. You come along, Mr. Carpenter. I gotta have some talk vit you. And you, Billy? Come, pile in."

T-S's car was waiting at the door.

"Prince's," said T-S to the chauffeur, and the palace on wheels began to glide along. It occurred to me to wonder that T-S was not embarrassed to take Carpenter to a fashionable eating-place. But I could read his thoughts; everybody would assume that he had been "on location" with one of his stars; and, what the hell? Wasn't he Abey Tschniczkelfritsch?

So we came to Prince's, and drew up before the porte-cochere, and found ourselves confronting an adventure. There was a crowd before the place, a surging throng half way down the block, with a whole line of policemen to hold them back. Over the heads of the crowd were transparencies, frame boxes with canvas on, and lights inside, and words painted on them. "Hello!" cried T-S. "Vot's dis?"

Suddenly I recalled what I had read in the morning's paper. The workers of the famous pleasure palace had gone on strike, and trouble was feared. I told T-S, and he exclaimed: "Oh, hell! Ain't ve got troubles enough vit strikers in de studios, vitout dey come spoilin' our dinner?"

The footman had jumped from his seat, and had the door open, and the great man began to alight. At that moment, the mob set up a howl.

"For shame! For shame! Unfair! Don't go in there! They starve their workers! They're taking the bread out of our mouths! Scabs! Scabs!"

I got out second, and saw a spectacle of haggard faces. I saw hands waved wildly, one or two fists clenched; I saw the police, shoving against the mass, poking with their sticks, none too gently. A poor devil in a waiter's costume stretched out his arms to me, yelling in a foreign dialect, "You take de food from my babies!" The next moment the club of a policeman came down on his head—crack. I heard Mary scream behind me, and I turned, just in the nick of time. Carpenter was leaping towards the policeman, crying, "Stop!"

There was no chance to parley in this emergency. I grabbed Carpenter in a football tackle and got one arm pinned to his side, while Mary, good old scout, got the other. When we got hold of Carpenter, we discovered that he wasn't much but skin and bones. We fairly lifted him up and rushed him into the restaurant; and after the first moment, he stopped resisting, and let us lead him between the aisles of diners, on the heels of the toddling T-S. There was a table reserved, in an alcove, and we brought him to it, and then waited to see what we had done.

Carpenter turned to me—and those sad but ever-changing eyes were flashing. "You have taken a great liberty!"

"There wasn't any time to argue," I said. "If you knew what I know about the police of Western City and their manners, you wouldn't want to monkey with them."

Mary backed me up earnestly. "They'd have smashed your face, Mr. Carpenter."

"My face?" he repeated. "Is not a man more than his face?"

You should have heard the shout of T-S! "Vot? Ain't I ready to offer you five hund'ed dollars a week fer dat face, and you want you should get it smashed? And fer a lot o' bums dat von't verk fer honest vages, and von't let nobody else verk!"

"Sit down, Abey!" Maw commanded.

We seated ourselves. Carpenter turned his dark eyes on me. "I observe that you have many kinds of mobs in your city," he remarked. "And the police do interfere with some of them."

"My Gawd!" cried T-S. "You gonna have a lot o' bums jumpin' on people ven dey try to git a dinner?"

"You or someone said that the police would not work unless they were paid," said Carpenter. "May I ask, who pays them to work here? Is it the proprietor of the restaurant?"

"As a matter of fact," said I, "from what I read in the Times this morning, I gather that an old friend of Mr. Carpenter's is interested in this case."

Carpenter looked at me inquiringly.

"Mr. Algernon de Wiggs, president of the Chamber of Commerce, issued a statement denouncing the way the police were letting mobs of strikers interfere with business, and proposing that the Chamber take steps to stop it. You remember de Wiggs, and how we left him?"

"Yes, I remember," said Carpenter; and we exchanged a smile over the trick.

Here the voice of Maw was heard: "Ain't ve gonna git nuttin' to eat?"

So for a long time the problem of capital and labor was put to one side. There were two waiters standing by, very nervous, because of the strike. T-S grabbed the card from one and read off a list of food which the waiter wrote down. Maw who was

Increase Your Store Profits $600 to $5000 a Year!

Get These Money-Making Butter-Kist Facts!

SEND the coupon now. Learn how to add $600 to $5,000 a year profit—new found money—to your business the Butter-Kist way. How to meet high rents and other expenses—make a big profit. Other merchants are adding $2 to $18 a day to cash profits. $50 to $460 a month. $600 to $5,000 a year. They pay entire overhead expense, including rent, from their amazing popcorn profits. This has happened in thousands of cases.

BUTTER-KIST Popcorn and Peanut Machine

Pops, advertises and sells popcorn. Also sells toasted and salted peanuts. You make 60c to 70c profit from each $1 in sales. Three to four times greater per cent of profit than cigar counter or soda fountain. Capacity $1 to $9 an hour—$6 to $54 in 10-hour day. Wonderful success—turns waste floor space into cash for you.

Buy Butter-Kist Goodies

Popcorn, peanuts, etc.—in the trade-marked packages. Look for merchants with Butter-Kist machines. They are good men to know.

Send Coupon for FREE BOOK

It explains how the motion of the Butter-Kist machine stops people; coaxing fragrance makes them buy; toasty flavor brings trade for blocks; stimulates other sales; pays like a little gold mine. It gives new low prices, easy terms, and letters from Butter-Kist owners. Mail coupon now!

Holcomb & Hoke Mfg. Company

World's largest manufacturers of popcorn machines and peanut toasters
2012 Van Buren Street, Indianapolis, Indiana
Gentlemen: Please send me, without obligation, full particulars in regard to the machine checked.

- ☐ Triumph Model Butter-Kist Popcorn Machine. The latest machine—smaller, lower in price.
☐ Grand Model Butter-Kist Popcorn Machine. The large type, recently improved and changed.
☐ Universal Model Butter-Kist Peanut Toaster. Sits on counter—operates by electricity.

Name.....

Business.....

How long in business.....

St. Address.....

City.....State.....

Have you a copy of our book "America's New Industry"?

Have you electricity in your town?

learning the rudiments of etiquette, handed her card to Mary, who gave her order, and then Maw gave hers, and I gave mine, and there was only Carpenter left.

"Vot you vant to order, Mr. Carpenter?" demanded T-S; and I waited, full of curiosity.

Carpenter took the card from his host and studied it. Apparently he had no difficulty in finding the most substantial part of the menu. "I'll have prime ribs of beef," said he, "and boiled mutton with caper sauce; and young spring turkey; and squab en casserole; and milk fed guinea fowl—" The waiter, of course, was obediently writing down each item. "And planked steak with mushrooms; and braised spare ribs—"

"My Gawd!" broke in the host.

"And roast teal duck; and lamb kidneys—"

"Fer the love o' Mike, Mr. Carpenter, you gonna eat all dat?"

"No; of course not."

"Den vot you gonna do vit it?"

"I'm going to take it to the hungry men outside."

WELL, SIR, you'd have thought the world had stopped turning round, so still it was. The two waiters nearly dropped their order-pads and their napkins; they did drop their jaws, and Mrs. T-S's permanent wave seemed about to go flat.

"Oh, hell!" cried T-S. "You can't do it!"

"I can't?"

"You can't order only vot you eat."

"But, then, I don't want anything. I'm not hungry."

"But you can't sit here like a dummy, man!" He turned to the waiter. "You bring him de same vot you bring me. Unnerstand? And git a move on, cause I'm starvin'. Fade out now!"

The proprietor of Eternal City wiped his perspiring forehead with his napkin, and started rather hurriedly to make conversation.

"I vanna tell you about dis picture ve're goin' to see took, Mr. Carpenter. I vant you should see de scale ve do t'ings on, ven ve got a big subje'. Y' unnerstand, dis is a feature picture ve're makin' now; a night picture, a big mob scene."

"Mob scene?" said Carpenter. "You have so many mobs in this world of yours!"

"Vell, sure," said T-S. "You gotta take dis world de vay you find it. Y' can't change human nature, y' know. But dis vot you're gonna see tonight is only a play mob, y' unnerstand."

"That is what seems strangest of all to me," said the other. "You like mobs so well that you make imitation ones!"

"Vell, de people, dey like to see crowds in a picture, and dey like to see action. If you gonna have a big picture, you gotta spend money."

"Why not take this real mob that is outside the door?"

"Ha, ha, ha! Ve couldn't verk that very good, Mr. Carpenter. Ve gotta have it in de right set; and ven you got a real mob, it don't always do vot you vant exactly! Besides, you can't take night pictures unless you got your lights and everyting. No, ve gotta make our mobs to order; ve got two t'ousand fellers hired—"

"What Mr. Rosythe called 'studio bums'? You have that many?"

"Sure, ve could git ten t'ousand if de set would hold 'em. Dis picture is called 'De Tale o' Two Cities,' and it's de French Revolution. It's about a feller vot takes anoder feller's place and gits his head cut off; and say, dere's a sob story in it vot's a vunder. Ven dey brought me de scenario, I says, 'Who's de author?' Dey says, 'It's a guy named Charles Dickens.' 'Dickens?' says I. 'Vell, I like his verk. Vot's his address?' And Lipsky, he says, says he, 'Dey tell me he stays in a place called Vestminster Abbey, in England.' 'Vell,' says I, 'send him a cablegram and find out vot he'll take fer an exclusive contract.' So ve sent a cablegram to Charles Dickens, Vestminster Abbey, England, and ve didn't git no answer, and come to find out, de boys in de studios vas havin' a laugh on old Abej, because dis guy Dickens is some told-time feller, and de Abbey is vere dey got his bones.

"Vell, dey can have deir fun—how de hell's a feller like me gonna git time to know about writers? Vy, only twelve years ago, Maw here and me vas carryin' pants in a push-cart fer a livin', and ve didn't know if a book vas top-side up or bottom—ain't it, Maw?"

Maw certified that it was—though I thought not quite so eagerly as her husband. There were five little T-S's growing up, and bringing pressure to let the dead past stay buried.

The waiter brought the dinner, and spread it before us. T-S tucked his napkin under both ears, and grabbed his knife in one hand and his fork in the other, and took a long breath, and said, "Good-by folks."

For five minutes or so, there was no sound but that of one man's food going in and going down. Then suddenly the man stopped, with his knife and fork upright on the table in each hand, and cried: "Mr. Carpenter, you ain't eatin' nuttin'!"

THE stranger, who had apparently been in a day-dream, came suddenly back to Prince's. "If you'd only let me take a little to those men outside!" he said pleadingly.

But T-S rapped imperiously on the table, with both his knife and fork together. "Mr. Carpenter, eat your dinner! Eat it, now, I say!"

There was another five minutes of silence; and then the picture magnate cried with a look of horror on his face, "My Gawd! He's cryin'!" Sure enough, there were large tears trickling down the stranger's cheeks, and dripping on the bread he was putting into his mouth!

"Looka here, Mr. Carpenter," protested T-S. "Is it dem strikers?"

"I'm sorry; you see—"

"Now, honest, man, vy should you spoil your dinner fer a bunch o' damn loafers?"

"Abej, vot a vay to talk at a dinner-party!" broke in Maw.

Then suddenly Mary Magna spoke. It was a strange thing, though I did not realize it until afterwards. Mary, the irrepressible, had hardly said one word since we left the beauty parlors! Mary, always the life of parties, was sitting like a woman who had seen the ghost of a dead child.

"Abej," said she, with sudden passion, of a sort I'd never seen her display before, "forget your grub for a moment. I have something to say. Here's a man with a heart full of love for other people—and you're trying to turn him into a movie doll! Try to get it through your skull, Abej!"

The great man's eyes were wide open. "Holy smoke, Mary! Vot's got into you?" Suddenly he almost shrieked, "Lord! She's cryin' too!"

"No, I'm not," declared Mary, valiantly. But there were two drops on her cheeks, so big that she was forced to wipe them away. "It's just a little shame, that's all. Here we sit, with three times as much food before us as we can eat; and all over this city are poor devils with nothing to eat, and no homes to go to."

"Looka here, kid," said the magnate, "you know vot'll happen to you if you git to broodin' over t'ings? You'll git your face full o' wrinkles—you already gone and spoilt your makeup."

THERE'S no use trying to bluff me, Abej," said Mary. "You know as well as I do there are hungry people in this city, and no fault of theirs. You know, too, you eat twice what you ought to, because I've heard the doctor tell you. I'm not blaming you a bit more than I do myself—me, with two automobiles, and a whole show-window on my back." She turned to Carpenter. "What can we do?"

He answered: "Here, men gorge themselves; in Russia they eat their dead."

T-S dropped his knife and fork, and Maw gave a gulp. "Oh, my Gawd!"

"There are ten million people doomed to starve. Their children eat grass, and their bellies swell up, and their legs dwindle to broom-sticks; they stagger and fall into the ditches, and other children tear their flesh and devour it."

"Now looka here!" cried T-S, wildly. "I say dis ain't no decent way to behave at a party! You be good and eat your grub, so it don't git vasted, and I promise you, tomorrow I go and hunt up strike headquarters, and give dem a check fer a t'ousand dollars. Vot you say?"

"What I say, Mr. T-S, is that I can not be the keeper of another man's conscience. But I'll try to eat."

It happens that I was brought up in a highly conscientious family. To my dear mother, and to her worthy sisters, there was nothing in the world more painful than what they call a "scene"—unless possibly it was what they call a "situation." Here we had certainly had a "scene" and still had a "situation." So I sat, racking my brains to think of something safe to talk about. At length I began:

"Mr. Carpenter, the spectacle you are going to see this evening is rather remarkable from the artistic point of view."

"Tell me about it," said Carpenter, and I was grateful for his tone of interest.

"Mr. T-S has built a large set, representing a street scene in Paris over a century ago. He has hired a thousand men—"

"And when it is done, what becomes of the men?"

"Dey got deir five dollars, ain't dey?" asked T-S.

"Yes, but that won't last very long."

"Dey got five million out o' verks in dis country now, and if I wanted to bust myself, I could feed 'em vun day, maybe two," said T-S. "But ven I got done, dey wouldn't be nobody to make pictures, and somebody would have to feed old Abej—or maybe me and Maw could go back to carryin' pants in a push-cart! Dere's plenty fellers got ten times vot I got, and never done a stroke o' verk fer it. Dey're de vuns y' oughter git after!"

"I would, if I knew how," said Carpenter, very quietly.

"Dey's plenty of 'em, right in dis room, I bet," replied the great T-S.

"Ask Billy," Mary added, "he knows them all!"

"You flatter me, Mary," I laughed.

"Ain't dey some of 'em here?" said T-S.

"Yes, that's true. There are some not far away, who are developing a desire to meet Mr. Carpenter, I am sure."

"Vere are dey at?" demanded T-S.

"I won't tell you that," I laughed, "because you'd turn and stare."

"All right," said the magnate, grinning good naturedly. "I'll keep a-eatin' my dinner. Who is it?"

"It's Mrs. Parmelee Stebbins," said I. "She boasts a salon, and has to have what are called lions, and she's been watching Mr. Carpenter out of the corner of her eye ever since he came into the room. She has had my eye three times, hoping I would give her a signal. I haven't given it, so she's about to leave."

"Vell, she can go to hell!" said T-S, keeping his promise to devote himself to his dinner.

"There is Miss Lucinda Stebbins," I said. "She's engaged to Babcock, millionaire sport and man about town, but he's taking part in a flying race over the Rocky Mountains tonight, and so Lucinda feels bored, but still she doesn't want to meet any freaks. Then there's Bertie Stebbins, who's thinking about a new style of collar he saw advertised today."

"I know that little toad," Mary said.

"Look out!" I whispered. "Here comes Mrs. Stebbins."

I heard Maw catch her breath, and I heard Maw's husband grunt, as I rose.

"How are you, Billy?" gurgled a voice—one of those voices made especially for social occasions. "Wretched boy, why do you never come to see us?"

"I was coming tomorrow," I said.

"Mrs. Stebbins, permit me to introduce Mrs. Tszchnicklefritzsch."

"Charmed to meet you, I'm sure," said Mrs. Stebbins. "I've heard my husband speak of your husband so often."

"And Mr. T-S," said I.

"Howdydo, Mr. T-S?"

"Pretty good, ma'am," said T-S. He had been caught with his mouth full, and was making desperate efforts to swallow.

A singular thing is the power of class prestige! Here was Maw, a good woman, according to her lights, who had worked hard all her life, and had achieved a colossal and astounding success. She had everything in the world that money could buy; her hair was done by the best hair-dresser, her gown had been designed by the best costumer, her rings and bracelets selected by the best jeweler; and yet nothing was right, no power on earth could make it right, and Maw knew it, and writhed in the consciousness of it. And here was Mrs. Parmelee Stebbins, who had never done a useful thing in all her days—unless you count the picking out of a rich husband; yet Mrs. Stebbins was "right," and Maw knew it, and in the presence of the other woman she was in an utter panic, literally quivering in every nerve. And here was old T-S, who, left to himself, might have really meant what he said, that Mrs. Stebbins could go to hell; but

"BVD" Underwear is Identified by This Red Woven Label

MADE FOR THE

B.V.D.

BEST RETAIL TRADE

(Trade Mark Reg. U.S. Pat. Off. and Foreign Countries)

No Underwear is "BVD" Without It

The "BVD" Red Woven Label is the Trade Mark by which The B.V.D. Company assures you the far-famed comfort, long wear and dependable quality of its product.

The B.V.D. Company
New York
SOLE MANUFACTURERS OF "B.V.D." UNDERWEAR.

"B.V.D." Sleeveless Closed Crotch Union Suits (Pat. U.S.A.) Men's $1.50 the suit, Youths' $1.00 the suit.

"B.V.D." Coat Cut Undershirts and Knee Length Drawers, 85c the garment.

Will you be near Nature this Summer? Then don't miss:

The WILD HEART

By EMMA-LINDSAY
SQUIER

with a 10-page introduction by

Gene
Stratton-Porter

Illustrations by
PAUL BRANSOM

"The Wild Heart," says Father C. F. McGinness in The Catholic Bulletin, "is as clean as a hound's tooth and as refreshing as a breeze from the ocean at sundown. We heartily recommend this book to every school, college, man, woman and child who appreciates Nature at her best and humor at its most whimsical."

WITH dozens of marginal decorations and large illustrations by Bransom, and with Mrs. Porter's remarkable introduction (which alone would be worth printing in booklet form), "The Wild Heart" belongs in every library and makes a wonderful gift book for anybody who will be near nature this summer.

Wherever good books are sold
$2.00

Cosmopolitan Book Corporation
Publishers

119 West 40th Street, New York, N.Y.

Order your copy today
$2.00

Mr. D. V. WEED

He adds EXTRA MONEY to his income every day

Mr. Weed never lets the New Jersey sun set on a day that hasn't brought him money for his spare time. This is easy for him because he represents Hearst's INTERNATIONAL and our five other magazines out of office hours, and our liberal commissions and bonus bring him good returns for his

SPARE TIME WORK

No matter how few your spare hours may be you can make money by our plan. You will find the work a recreation rather than an added burden and the money you earn will seem like a gift.

Hundreds of young men and women are earning their way through college by doing our work. If you want to enter school in the Fall, start now and accumulate a bank account that will see you through the year.

If you are in an office and want to take a vacation this summer you can take our work along with you to the mountains or seashore, and come back from your vacation rested and richer than when you started.

Write Us Today

—for details of our work. You need no experience or capital. Our trained force is back of you to help make the work pleasant, easy and profitable for you.

USE THIS COUPON FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

INTERNATIONAL MAGAZINE CO.
Agency, Dept. HI-712
119 West 40th Street,
New York City.

Send me details of your money-making plan, without any obligation on my part.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY.....

STATE.....

because he was married, and loved his wife, he too must tremble, and gulp down his food!

Mrs. Stebbins was a patroness of art and intellect; but never did she forget her fundamental duty, the enhancing of the prestige of a family name. When she was introduced to the screen-actress, she was gracious, but did not forget the difference between an actress and a lady. When she was introduced to a strange man who did not wear trousers, she took it quite as an every-day matter, revealing no trace of vulgar human curiosity.

Then came Bertie, full grown, but not yet out of the pimply stage. Bertie's sister remained in her seat, haughtily refusing to be compromised by her mother's vagaries, but Bertie had a purpose, and after I had introduced him round, I saw what he wanted—Mary Magna!

I TURNED back to Bertie's mamma. She had discovered that Carpenter looked even more thrilling on a close view; he was not a stage-figure, but a really grave and impressive personality. So here she was, inviting the party to share her box at the theater; and here was T-S explaining that it couldn't be done, he had got to see his "French revolution pictures took, dey had two t'ousand men hired to make a mob."

The upshot of it was that the great lady consented to forget her box at the theater, and run out to the studios to see the mob scenes for "The Tale of Two Cities."

The Stebbins car drew up by the portecochere; and suddenly I discovered why the wife of the street-car magnate was known as a "social leader."

"Billy," she said, "you come in our car, and bring Mr. Carpenter; I have something to talk to you about."

I took Carpenter by the arm and put him in. Bertie drove, the chauffeur sitting in the seat behind him.

"Beat you to it!" called Bertie, and waved his hand to the picture magnate as we rolled away.

As it happened, we made a poor start. Turning the corner into Broadway, we found ourselves caught in the jam of the theater traffic, and our car was brought to a halt in front of the Empire Varieties.

A crowd of "rah-rah boys," with yellow and purple flags in their hands, and the glory of battle in their eyes, pushed by. As our car halted, the cheer-leader gave a signal, and a hundred throats let out a roar. It sounded all the more deafening, because Bertie had joined in.

WHEN the noise died down, Carpenter spoke, half to himself. "You make your children into mobs!"

"It really isn't that bad," I pleaded. "It's all in good temper—it's their play."

"Yes, yes! But what is play but practice for reality? And how shall love be learned in savage war-dances?"

Bertie suddenly looked round from his place on the driver's seat. "Say," he demanded, in a grating voice, "where was that guy raised?"

"Bertie dear!" cried his mother. "Don't be rude!"

"I'm not being rude," replied the other. "I just want to know where he got his nut ideas."

"Bertie dear!" cried the mother; and you knew that for eighteen or nineteen years she had been crying, "Bertie dear!" in just the same tone.

Mrs. Stebbins elected to talk for a minute or two about a lawn fête she was planning to give next week for the benefit of the Polish relief. "Poland is the World's Bulwark against Bolshevism," she explained; and then added: "Bertie dear, aren't you driving recklessly?"

Bertie turned his head. "Didn't you hear me tell that old sheeny I was going to beat him to it?"

"But, Bertie dear, this street is crowded!" his mother protested.

"Well, let them look out for themselves!" the dear son answered.

A few seconds later the car suddenly slowed up—so suddenly as to slide us out of our seats. There was a grinding of brakes, and a bump of something under the wheels; then a wild scream from the sidewalk, and a half-stifled cry from the chauffeur. Mrs. Stebbins gasped, "Oh, my God!" and put her hands over her face to shut out the terrible sight.

Whirled into the midst of rage and death by an automobile accident, the strange Carpenter is thrown into touch with the common people and his swift fight begins. See Hearst's International for August, ready July 20th.

Gouverneur Morris's New Novel—Continued from page 76

The Better Wife

know. Isn't there any place we can go, where things won't ever come chasing us off?"

An opportune dividend enabled them to go on all the way to the Coast. Wyoming drove them to the station.

"And you'll write, you'll write often, Wyoming?"

Indeed Wyoming would; there never would be so many letters as Wyoming would write.

"And Wyoming, darling, just remember all I've told you, please; how there's nothing so dark but love can make it bright," Mary cried to her.

She had one letter from Wyoming—a gushing, fervent, adoring school-girl letter, and thereafter not any more. So you will understand that Mr. Bell had let the cat out of the bag.

They found a beach of the sea, a pebbly half-moon shaped bit of a beach, that nestled against a fine white, tossing and heaping up of sand-dunes, and that was handy to an isolated white farm house, that had never done such a thing before, but didn't know but what, upon proper reflection, it could accommodate a couple of boarders for the winter.

They could have the spare room. They had a look at it.

It was really quite dreadful, and the vast black-walnut bed resembled the hat rack in the front hall, and that resembled Rheims Cathedral. But there was a bright and cheery room adjoining, that had been the sewing-room, before the girls married, and if they didn't like the machine it could be taken out, or they could use it as a table to put a Victrola on, and the sewing-room could be their sitting-room.

The strong California brightness had drawn Mary to the window.

"You can see the ocean," she said.

"And if you like swimmin'," put in Farmer Jessup, "there ain't no undertow nor sea-puss, exceptin' after a blow."

"You," said Highland, "are from Down East. Didn't I catch a glimpse of a pair of scrimshawed whale teeth in the parlor?"

Farmer Jessup beamed.

"I'll bet dollars to doughnuts you did," said he. "My gran'paw was a whale captain out of Edgartown. Why, havin' you won't be like havin' boarders, it'll be like havin' folks. Maw," he shouted, for Mrs. Farmer Jessup was not only deaf but absent-minded, "Mr. Highland is jest folks—folks!"

Highland had fallen into the habit of casually bedearing Mary when there were people about.

"Well, dear," he said, "how about it?"

"Oh," she said, "I think it's a lovely place, and so clean and tidy, and the sea, and all—I'd love to stay."

"Well," said Highland, "I'm inclined to agree with my wife. We'll think it over and let you know tomorrow."

IN TALKING it over that night, he made a clean breast of many things that troubled him, and felt the better for it.

"Mary," he said, "the last thing I want to do in this world is to hurt your feelings in any way. For God's sake, don't get the idea that I am ashamed of you, if I'm all the time looking for out of the way places to settle in. I've been torn up by the roots. I'm at my wits' end to discover what sort of a life we ought to try to make for ourselves. I don't intend just to keep loafing and running away. I'm strong as a horse, and more and more I think I'd like to work with my hands, go out with a dinner pail in the morning, and come back at night to the pleasant little home you'd make for us, and to the good supper you'd have cooked."

"Oh, no, now don't say you'll set me free. We've had our little talk about promises. If you didn't exist, I'd never go back now. Don't think I'm mourning over old times. I thought them good, but now I see how vain and futile they were. I miss my boys like the devil. I am trying my darndest, Mary, to think out what we ought to do, what's right for us to do."

"Now Jessups' terms are mighty reasonable. If you feel that you could worry through a whole winter—get your company and your theaters and your movies out of the climate and the sunshine—we'd have a little bunch of money saved by spring, and then we could decide on some place, and go there, and try to start something. It won't be a jumping-off place. We'll go where there are people, and no matter what crops up against us, we'll stick, and fight it out, and come out on top. Can you swim?"

No, she couldn't. It must be wonderful. Well, there would be something more for her to learn, something more for him to teach. She could ride a little now, walk with the best, and, darned if he could remember the last time he had caught her stooping over and had scolded her for it! Why she walked about now, with her head in the air for all the world as if she was listening to a band playing a march.

If he had had a dog he would have kept it always near him. Having only a wife it was fortunate that she could serve the same purpose. He no longer hated her (except at times, and then it was the fact of her existing at all that he hated) and he was no longer indifferent to her.

It was impossible not to like a person whose back had straightened at his command, whose chest had broadened and deepened, whose way of walking had become strong and graceful.

THEN he had only to hint that he preferred a thing this way or that way and, like a shot, that was the way it became. She never noised or fussed about anything. Why, good Lord, she might have made some young fellow a perfectly good wife if she hadn't had bad luck. It was bad luck, nothing else! He was convinced of that. All her inclinations had been for what is sweet and unobtrusive and clean.

Sometimes they talked about her past, her problems and dilemmas. Why hadn't she tried so and so? Always she had a reason for not having tried so and so that seemed good to him. Her story never varied. He came to place implicit reliance on the truth of whatever she told him.

In her pitiful life she had never been a success. She had never had any real stroke of luck till she had met Highland.

But didn't he know that desperate as she had been, she wouldn't have pulled him down the way she had, if she'd known what she knew now. She had thought that he was just like any other man, but he wasn't. If he only knew how kind and decent he'd been to her! It was perfectly understood, wasn't it, that if he ever decided that he wanted to go free, she wouldn't say a word?

She returned so often to the subject of this perfect understanding, that one day he answered with a certain impatience.

"Perhaps you would like to be free. Is that what you are always hinting about?"

"I wouldn't let you off," she said, "if I could help it, unless you wanted me to, and when you do, say so."

ALL of which started Bud to making comparisons between the past and the present. His wife never complained. She was a good sport.

At this thought Captain Highland sat bolt upright on the soft hot sand where he was sunning himself. It was such an amazing and obvious thought! It explained so much! He wondered that it had never before occurred to him. Look at her now, the baby, making a fort with wet sand, and embellishing it with shells. If there was nothing to do but build a sand fort, she would build a sand fort and make it as nice as she could. She had been in the water long enough, and he had told her to come out and stay out, and she hadn't wanted to; but she'd just laughed and been a good sport about it.

She was a good looking way off like that, a crouching silhouette against the light. Nothing skinny about her now. It was

This Soothing Clasmic Pack Brings Out Your Hidden Beauty

Cover the ace as illustrated and rest while this wonder pack brings your hidden beauty to light—making your skin soft and clear—freshening the complexion and giving it a radiant, natural color.

IMMEDIATE RESULTS

You don't have to wait to see results—the very first application shows amazing benefits—you can actually feel the wonder work going on—the gentle lifting sensation proves that blemishes are being banished and that all the facial muscles and tissues are being rejuvenated. Boncilla treatments are also given in beauty parlors for women and can be used in your own home.

Boncilla

Beautifier

DOES THESE DEFINITE THINGS FOR THE FACE

1. Clears the complexion and gives it color.
2. Closes enlarged pores.
3. Removes blackheads and pimples.
4. Lifts out the lines.
5. Rebuilds drooping facial tissues.
6. Makes the skin soft and velvety.

On a guarantee of money back if you are not satisfied

Send for Generous Introductory Set

The Boncilla "Package O-Beauty" consists of the complete Boncilla Method—Beautifier, Cold Cream, Vanishing Cream and Face Powder enough for three or four facial packs. Obtain it from your dealer for 50c. or send the coupon to us with 50c. and we will mail it postpaid. Regular sizes priced as follows:

|                               |        |
|-------------------------------|--------|
| Beautifier, No. 7 Tube.....   | $1.00 |
| Creams and Powder, each.....  | .75    |
| These four in No. 37 set..... | 3.25   |

BONCILLA LABORATORIES

443 East South Street
Indianapolis, Indiana

I enclose 50c. Kindly send your Package-O-Beauty to:

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State..... H

CLOSE-TO-NATURE CANVAS HOUSE

For Every Outdoor Purpose

As open to the air as an umbrella but instantly closed weather-tight. Shutters adjustable to any degree of ventilation. Screened insect proof. Anchored against high winds. Erected or taken down without tools and rolled into bundles without detaching canvas. An ideal lawn house and for outdoor sleeping, camps, sanitariums, golf links, summer resorts, etc. For tuberculosis, nervousness, insomnia, and ill health generally. Sleep outdoors.

Close-To-Nature Company
500 Front Street Colfax, Iowa

the swimming had done it. He hadn't had a bit of trouble teaching her. Only once (it was when he was teaching her to float, which is the best first step to swimming, and her face had gone suddenly under) she had doubled suddenly up (quite contrary to instructions, to Hoyle and everything else) had given him one drenched look of despair, and clawed at him, but had voiced no complaint.

She could swim now—nicely. She would do a worthy trudgeon one of these days. He wished they had some place from which to dive. She was the slim, nymph sort that slips in so splashlessly—does so, at least, when it gets its head in first, and doesn't turn over too far and land somewhere on its back.

The fact that the second wife was such a good sport made all things possible.

Imagine his first wife, Bud thought, trying to make the best of anything that wasn't exactly the way she wanted it! Why that had been their whole trouble. His first wife had not been a good sport. Oh, she didn't squeal when they took her money at bridge, or when the other woman holed the putt in the finals. She had that kind of sportiness. But in the great serious game of husband and wife, of having children, and of not having children—in that game she wasn't on the level and no one could expect her to be on the level.

So it never had gone against her. It had never been allowed to. She who in tennis gave her adversary the benefit of every doubtful in or out, ran the thoughts of the man who had been her husband, she who was as above suspicion with a ball in a bunker as a Bible is in church, she who at cards seemed to care not whether she won or lost—was in the great game of life the most flagrant and outrageous little cheat imaginable. She put dope in the favorite's hot mash and her money on the long shot; she always had at least one ace pinched handily between her knee and the underside of the table. She took her winnings in cash, her losses were unwritten I. O. U.'s concerning which her memory soon failed her.

"Why if she'd had the spunk that this kid's got," he thought, "and the sense of honor, we'd have been happy as clams. Even if Fisher didn't lie when he said there had been no wrongdoing, there was wrongdoing in her head, and in her heart.

Thought alone has the power to smirch and befoul."

HE WONDERED if his present wife were warm enough, and he rose, and climbed down from the dunes to find out, going to her just as though he cared for her.

It was a pity that he who admired form, condition, and carriage so much could not have seen himself. Conventional clothes were not becoming to him, nor riding clothes (he was too heavily built for them) but in football clothes, baseball clothes, tennis clothes, his shirt open at the neck, or as now in his bathing suit, he was magnificent.

Over his arm he carried a wrapper of Turkish towelling.

"I've been roasting it in the sun for you," he said. "Here." He held it for her, and she slipped her pretty round arms through the wide sleeves and pulled the voluminous folds together.

"You're not to go out so far," he said,

"unless I'm with you. First I know you'll join a school of dolphins and go snorting off to China." She made him look at what he had presumed to be a fort. It was no such thing. It was a hacienda of adobe. It was called the Lost Ranch. The white shells in the courtyard were marble statues—the bits of sea-weed were supposed to be a thick planting of fuchsias and heliotrope. There were enthusiasm and eagerness in her voice.

"I believe," he said, "that if some one gave you a quince, you'd eat it and be thankful. I like your suit, the white trim looks very smart, and the skirt's just right. The most immodest dress in the world is a bathing suit with a skirt that's too long—the kind the cook and the nurse girl wear, and the silliest dress in the world is a bathing suit with too short a skirt. The ugliest dress in the world is an 'Annette Kellerman,' and the man who thinks he knows what women ought to wear and what they ought not to wear is a simp, and somebody ought to tell him so."

"Have a good sun bath?"

"Until I got thinking. I got thinking what good sports some people are, and that made me mad. I played billiards once—English billiards with a Maharajah."

"What's that?"

"A kind of tea-colored king. He had a billiard room as big as the inside of a cathedral. The floor was all covered with tiger skins. In one corner, covered with dust, were all the presents he had ever received from Queen Victoria. They were mostly Albert Memorial shaped clocks under glass domes. The ceiling was as high up from the floor as the vaulting of a cathedral is, and right splung up against the ceiling, printed and framed, were hung Robert's Rules of Billiards which all players are supposed to heed.

THAT WAS where His Highness was a cheap sport. I don't believe, that at that distance, a microscope could have read them through a telescope. But His Highness pretended that he could. If you happened to be going well, he'd look up at the rules and say he could see one that forbade any player to have more than five successive shots on Fridays. Then if he got going, he'd read the rule again and say he was sorry, but he'd made a mistake, and the rule didn't say five shots. It said fifty. If he missed, and left you a set-up and no rule could be read off quick enough to save him he'd exclaim: 'The crocodile tank!' and he'd drag you to the window to look at the crocodile tank, and while he told you that at that hour of the day the water in the crocodile tank looked like moonlight on snow (at all hours it resembled, and was, green slime) his chief of staff, a fellow that looked like Moses, only he was all silk and gold braid and diamonds, would wet the end of your cue, so that when you came back to shoot, you'd merely skid your ball off sideways. That king was the cheapest sport I ever met. . . . I hate a cheap sport worse than I hate anything else in the world."

So did Mary. "But go on. Tell more." He was started. She loved it when he got started. She could listen by the hour as another unfortunate woman listened to the celebrated Moor of Venice who had recounted his narrow escapes.

He loved to talk about India. It was so long ago and far away. Nothing had ever gone wrong then. Everything was different and better then. Even youth. Why in his day the young people had all been singing "Mandalay." They sang maudlin stuff now. There had been cleaner, greener lands in those days with neater, sweeter maidens in them. Now the world was all broken and bloody from the great war.

He had gone on for a while about India, and then he had got to thinking and that had brought all the old bitterness back. Sensitive to his every look, she turned her eyes from his face, and pretended that she had not noticed. Why couldn't that fool woman leave him alone? There were times when he seemed so boyish and contented and then that black look came and spoiled it all with a suggestion of what had gone before and of what he had suffered.

SHE WAS getting to be a little like that sweet Alice in another of those beautiful old songs that the young people don't sing any more, who "wept with delight when you gave her a smile and trembled with fear at your frown."

But it wasn't really as extreme as that. She was a good sport, and anything her husband said or did, went. Wherefore it was ever so much pleasanter when he talked jolly things than when he thought gloomy things.

She was profoundly grateful to him. She had the best reason that a woman could have for being grateful. He had taken the wrecked woman that she was, and made a pretty woman of her. She knew it; even if he didn't.

But men are so blind, and changes are so gradual sometimes. If he could go away for a month and then come back and look at her, then he'd see how pretty she was and he would appreciate her.

She wished he had heard what the woman had said in the hotel lounge, just when they had passed. She had said, "What an exquisite figure!"

He wouldn't be so ashamed about everything if he knew that he had picked a pretty one. If his old friends back there could know, they wouldn't feel so down on him.

But mostly, she wished that the first Mrs. Highland could see her.

"If she could have seen him holding the wrapper for me. . . . And the way he smiled!"

Nothing hurts a wearied wife so much as the knowledge that her former husband has thoroughly consoled himself. More especially if her particular Tertium Quid of the moment has turned out to be yellow through and through, instead of just leoparded, and her husband's consolation is her junior by fifteen years and filled with a determination to please her husband.

Uncle Fisher had not come forward even after the divorce. He did not love her enough—not at her age, and with such big violent boys—to face the unpleasant death with which he had been threatened by the big violent former-husband.

Will the awakening of Mary bring love and forgetfulness? In the hour of pain, people draw close to each other, and Mary is coming near to dark days that will try her. Hearst's International for August, ready July 20th.

Not only French—but Parisian!

BOURJOIS' [pronounced Bourjé-wah] Manon Lescaut* Face Powder is not only French, but also Parisian. Beautiful women of France, idols of Paris, have endorsed it. Honored in its own country Manon Lescaut ventured across the Atlantic, and, here too, the judgment of Paris was endorsed. For there is that in Manon Lescaut which only a Parisian can create. It has the right note of sophisticated simplicity without which a powder cannot hope to please a smart woman. It conceals itself, yet reveals itself, in enhancing your beauty. If you have not used Manon Lescaut you have not looked your best.

ASHES OF ROSES* ROUGE

is as exquisite and as delicate as Bourjois' Manon Lescaut Face Powder, and when rightly used, as difficult to detect. Both products are included in the twelve leading preparations found in the Bourjois Cabinet Assortment at progressive dealers. For the woman who prefers a lighter shade of rouge, we suggest Rouge Mandarine.*

BOURJOIS' MANON LESCAUT FACE POWDER

(BOURJÉ-WAH)

(MAN-ON LESS-KO)

Named and Famed for Beauty

A. BOURJOIS & CO., INC.
27 West 34th Street
Paris
Enclosed find 15c for samples of Bourjois' "Manon Lescaut" Face Powder and Bourjois' "Ashes of Roses" Rouge.
White ☐ Naturelle ☐ Rose ☐ Rachel ☐
"Peaches and Cream" for extreme brunettes ☐
Name _____
Address _____ City _____

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

At the Club

The Stanwyx
Staco No. 1293

Dignified, inconspicuous and correct, these Standard Rimless Glasses are becoming to most men and women.

WHILE service is the primary requisite of eye glasses—be sure that mountings and style conform to your personality, dress and surroundings.

Standard Glasses

offer the very utmost in service, comfort and style, the result of over forty-five years experience gained in the manufacture of fine mountings, scientifically designed to correctly hold the lenses prescribed by your specialist.

Comfort and style have been built into these mountings without sacrificing their scientific serviceability.

—Ask to see Standard Glasses

The Standard Optical Company
Geneva, N. Y.

Established in 1875

*Makers of Staco High Grade Frames, Mountings, Ophthalmic Lenses and Optical Machinery*

At the Office

*The Stanfield Staco No. 1599*

For School Wear

*The Stanford Staco No. 5735*

Vandemark's Folly

ponds, and the biggest muskrat houses. This slew is the only blot in the 'scutcheon of this pearl of counties, Mr. Vandemark—the only blot; and you've got the blackest of it."

I CAN still feel sorry for that poor boy, myself, green as grass, and without a friend in the world to whom he could go for advice, halted in his one-sided battle with the world, out there on the bare prairie, looking out on what he thought was the scene of his ruin, and thinking that every man's hand had been against him, and would always be.

Where were now all my dreams of fat cattle, sleek horses, waddling hogs, and the fine house in which I had had so many visions of spending my life, with a more or less clearly seen wife—especially during those days after Rowena Fewkes had told me how well she could cook, and proved it by getting me my breakfast; and the later days of my stay in the Grove of Destiny with Virginia Royall.

Any open prairie farm, with no house, nothing with which to make a house, and no home but a wagon, and no companions but my cows would have been rather forbidding at first glance; but this—I was certain I was ruined; I suppose I must have looked a little bad, for Henderson L. laid his hand on my shoulder.

"Don't cave in, my boy," said he. "You're young—and there's oceans of good land to be had. Keep a stiff upper lip!"

"I'll kill him!" I shouted. "I'll kill John Rucker!"

"Don't, till you catch him," said Burns. "And what good would it do anyhow?"

"Is there any plow-land on it?" I asked after getting control of myself.

"Some," said Henderson L. cheerfully. "Don't you remember that we drove up over a spur of the hill back there? Well, all the dry land north of our track is yours. Finest building-spot in the world, Jake. We'll make a farm of this yet. Come back and I'll show you."

SO WE went back and looked over all the dry ground I possessed, and agreed that there were about forty acres of it, and as Burns insisted, sixty in a dry season; and he stuck to it that a lot of that slew was as good pasture, especially in a dry time, as any one could ask for.

I paid Henderson L., bade good-by to Magnus Thorkelson, drove my outfit up on the building spot and sat there all the afternoon, not even unhitching my team.

Near evening, I was lying on the ground, looking out across the marsh, and as my misfortunes all rolled back over my mind, I turned on my face and cried like a baby. Finally, I felt a large light hand laid softly on my head. I looked up and saw Magnus Thorkelson bending over me.

"Forty acres," said he, "bane pretty big farm in Norway. My fadder on twenty acres, raise ten shildren. Not so gude land like dis. Vun of dem shildern bane college professor, and vun a big man in leggisatur. Forty acre bane gude farm, for gude farmer."

I turned over, wiped my sleeve across my eyes, and sat up.

"I guess I dropped asleep," I said.

"Yass," he said. "You bane sleep long time. I came back to ask if I stay with you. I halp you. You halp me. Ve halp each udder. Ve be neighbors always. I get farm next you. I halp you build house, an' you halp me. Maybe ve lif togedder till you git vooman, or I git voo-man—if American vooman marry Norwegian man. I stay?"

I took his hand and pressed it. Before long we had a warm dugout barn built in the eastern slope of the hillside, partly sheltered from the northwestern winds, and Magnus and I slept in one end of it on the sweet hay we cut in the marsh while the cows ranged on the prairie. Together we broke prairie, first on his land, then on mine. Together we hauled timber from the river for my first little house.

SO ON his section of land, most of which was marsh, Vandemark began to carve out his home. It was hard work and full of bitter disappointments. True, Virginia had come on to Monterey Centre with the Thorndykes but he had little time to see her and their friendship did not rapidly ripen into love. There were other sinister happenings—like the trouble with the claim-jumpers, fights in which Jake took a part. One of the family of intruders proved to be the Fewkes and Jake lost prestige by defending them—defending them simply because he had met them on the way in and they seemed helpless.

It was after this affair that Gowdy met Rowena and the whole family of Fewkes went to work on his big farm—a move that led eventually to Rowena's downfall. Not, however, before the big, honest Magnus had seen her and fallen helplessly in love with her. But one Sunday when Rowena came to Jake, pleading with him to marry her, he discovered her trouble and, in spite of his great love for Virginia, he agreed to marry Rowena. At the last minute, however, something fine rose up in the girl and she refused to let him destroy his happiness. Then came the big prairie fire that swept Vandemark Township, destroying homes and killing many people and the climax in Rowena's life. Vandemark's account of the fire is graphic:

THERE was a stiff, dry, west wind blowing, and a blue haze in the air. As the afternoon advanced, the sun grew red as if looked at through smoked glass, burning like a great coal of fire or a broad disk of red-hot iron.

There was a scent of burning grass in the air when I found my herd over on Section Eight, about where the coöperative creamery and store now stand. The cattle seemed to be uneasy, and when I started them towards home, they walked fast, snuffing the air, and giving once in a while an uneasy, anxious falsetto bellow; and now and then they would break into a trot as they drew nearer to the places they knew.

The smell of smoke grew stronger, and I knew there was a prairie fire burning to the westward. The sun was a deeper red, now, and once in a while almost disappeared in clouds of vaporous smoke which rolled higher and higher into the sky. Prairie chickens, plover and curlew, with once in a while a bittern, went hurriedly along to the eastward, and several wolves crossed our path, trotting along and paying no attention to me or the cows; but stopping from time to time and looking back as if pursued from the west.

They were pursued. They were fleeing from the great prairie fire of 1859, which swept Monterey County from side to side, and never stopped until it struck the river over in the next county. I felt a little uneasy as I hiked my cattle down into the marsh on my own land, and saw them picking their way across it towards my grove, which showed proudly a mile away across the flat.

I had plowed firebreaks about my buildings and stacks, and burned off between the strips of plowing, but I felt that I ought to be at home. So I rode on at a good trot to make my circuit of the marsh to the west. The cattle could get through, but a horse with a man on his back might easily get mired in Vandemark's Folly anywhere along there; and my motto was, "The more hurry, the less speed."

AS I topped the hill to get back to the high ground, I saw great clouds of smoke pouring into the valley at the west passage into the big flat, and the country to the south was hidden by the smoke, except where, away off in the southwest in the changing of the wind, I could see the line of fire as it came over the high ground west of the old Bill Trickey farm. It was a broad belt of red flames, from which there crept along the ground a great blanket of smoke, black at first, and then turning to blue as it rose and thinned.

I began making haste; for it now looked as if the fire might reach the head of the slew before I could, and thus cut me off. I felt in my pocket for matches; for the only way to fight fire is with fire.

I was not scared, for I knew what to do; but not a mile from where I saw the fire on the hilltop, a family of Indiana movers were at that moment smothering and burning to death in the storm of flames—six people, old and young, of the score or more lost in that fire; and the first deaths of white people in Vandemark Township.

Within five minutes, as I looked off to the northwest, I saw a woman walking calmly towards the marsh. She was a long way off and much nearer the fire than I was. I looked for the wagon to which she might belong, but saw none, and it took only one more glance to show me that she was in mortal danger. For she was walking slowly and laboriously along

DIAMONDS WATCHES
CASH OR CREDIT

Genuine Diamonds
GUARANTEED
PRICES ARE DOWN

We invite comparisons. You will be convinced that you can do better with LOFTIS. Our IMMENSE BUYING POWER for our Chain of Stores and our large Mail Order House enables us to make lower prices than small concerns.

SEND FOR FREE CATALOG
Everything explained. Over 2,000 illustrations of Diamond-set Jewelry, Pearls, Watches, etc. Any article sent prepaid for Free Examination. Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.

BARGAINS
Selected from our "At Best Sellers." Diamonds are dazzling, blue white, perfect cut, mounting rings are all Solid Gold. Furnished at prices given, and up to any price you wish.

Order by Number
DIAMOND RINGS: 1-White Gold, $100. 2-Yellow Gold, $50. 3-White Gold, or Green Gold with White Gold prongs, $75. 4-Green Gold, Diamond set in White Gold, $50. 5-White Gold, $75. 6-WEDDING RING: Platinum, $25; Green or Yellow Gold, $10. 7-WATCH: 17-J., gold filled, guaranteed 25 years, $27.50. 8-WRIST WATCH: White Gold, 16-J., $32.50.

CREDIT TERMS: One-fifth down, balance divided into equal payments within eight months.

LOFTIS
BROS & CO. ESTD. 1858

THE OLD RELIABLE ORIGINAL CREDIT JEWELERS
DEPT. B-292
108 N. State St., Chicago, Ill.
Stores in Leading Cities

Gray Hair banished in 15 minutes

INECTO RAPID

Thousands of American tourists have brought "INECTO-RAPID" from Europe. It can now be obtained in America. Its progressive features represent a distinct advance over all other hair coloring preparations. "INECTO-RAPID" is used exclusively by 97 per cent of the best European beauty parlors. The finest beauty establishments in America have now adopted it. "INECTO-RAPID" is specifically guaranteed to color gray, faded or streaked hair to its original shade in fifteen minutes. The color is absolutely permanent. It is so natural it cannot be detected from nature even under a microscope. It cannot injure the hair, or interfere with growth. "INECTO-RAPID" is the discovery of Dr. Emille of the Pasteur Institute, Paris, and differs absolutely from all other hair colorings because it repigmentizes the hair shaft instead of only coating the surface. Thousands of women apply it in the privacy of their own homes with perfect success.

SEND NO MONEY
Write for particulars with proof and our "Beauty Analysis Chart" Form AX INECTO, Inc., Laboratories and Demonstration Salon, 33-35 West 46th St., New York, N. Y.

PATENTS
SPECIAL OFFER Free Opinion as to Patentable Nature

Send for Record of Invention Blank and our Three Books, mailed FREE

Highest References, Prompt Attention, Reasonable Terms

VICTOR J. EVANS & CO.
PATENT ATTORNEYS
764 Ninth WASHINGTON, D. C.

like a person carrying a heavy burden. I kicked my heels into the horse's flanks and pushed him to a gallop. I must reach her soon or she would be lost, for it was plain that she was paying no attention to her danger.

The smoke swept down upon her, and when I could see her she was stooped with her shawl drawn around her head; or was she on her knees? Then she rose, and turning from the fire, ran as fast as she could, until I wheeled my horse across her path, jumped to the ground, and stopped her with my arm about her waist. I looked at her. It was Rowena Fewkes.

"Rowena," I shouted, "what you do in here? You'll get burnt up?"

"I couldn't go any closer," she said, as if excusing herself. "Would it hurt much? I got scared, Jake. Don't let me burn!"

There was no chance to make the circuit of the slew now, even if I had not been hampered with her.

I gathered a little armful of dry grass, and lighted it with a match to the leeward of us. It spread fast, though I lighted it where the grass was thin so as to avoid a hot fire; but on the side towards the wind, where the blaze was feeble, I carefully whipped it out with my slouch hat.

The main army of the flames, coming on from the west with its power of suction, fanned itself to a faster pace than our new line could attain, and the heat increased, both from the racing crimson line to the west, and the slower moving back fire on the other side. We sweltered and almost suffocated. Rowena buried her face in her shawl, and swayed as if falling. I took her by the arm, and leading the excited horse, we moved over into our zone of safety. She was trembling like a leaf.

Suddenly the heat and smoke grew less; I looked around, and saw that the fire had reached our burnt area and the line was cut for lack of fuel. It divided as a wave is split by a rock, and went in two great moving, spouting fountains of red down the line of our back-fire, and swept on, leaving us scorched, blackened, blood-shot of eyes and sore of lips, but safe.

We turned, with great relief to me at least, and made for the open country behind the lines. Then for the first time, I looked at Rowena.

She was black with smoke and ashes. Her skirts were draggled as if with repeated soaking with dew and rain.

I could not talk with her. I could only give her directions and lend her aid.

THAT night in Jake's humble home, Rowena's baby was born. He had Doctor Bliven and a widow to take care of her. After this incident, in spite of the fact that Magnus at once married Rowena, there was a smirch on Vandemark's name and the good people of Monterey Centre avoided him—a condition that took him quite out of Virginia's life.

The feeling against him eventually died away and he was restored to Virginia's good graces. Then came a warm day in January and Vandemark, looking out called it a "weather breeder" and prepared for a storm. He remembered Virginia was teaching near him and, as the sky darkened and the expected storm broke, he thought it well to see that she had no difficulty in getting home. Then as he was ready to start, a rig drove into the yard.

THE HORSES came to a stop in the lea of my house. There had been no such rig in the country until recently.

"Is this the Vandemark schoolhouse?" came from the man in the cutter.

"No," said I. "This is my farm."

"Ah, it's you, Mr. Vandemark, is it?" said he. "Can you tell me the way to the schoolhouse?"

I never for a moment harbored the idea that I was to allow Buck Gowdy to rescue Virginia from the blizzard, and carry her off into either danger or safety.

"Never mind about the schoolhouse," I said. "I'll attend to that!"

I took the horses by the bits.

"Vandemark," he shouted, "you forget yourself! Let go those horses!"

"Not by a damned sight!"

Buck Gowdy leaped from the cutter and carried the fight to me—and I was glad to see him coming. I had waited for this a long time. I have no skill in describing fights, and I was too much engaged in this one to remember the details. It ended soon. I took Gowdy's team and drove away.

It was less than a mile to the schoolhouse, which I was lucky to find at all.

I pulled up before the door and shouted Virginia's name with all my might, over and over again. I sat there ten or fifteen minutes before Virginia came to the door.

I turned the horses towards her boarding place, and in doing so, set their faces right into the teeth of the gale. Virginia pulled the robe up over her head. I had to face the storm and manage my team; but before I had gone forty rods, I saw that I was asking too much of them; and I let them turn to beat off with it.

THEY struggled on. It was a hard fight and a long fight, hopelessly lost as they were, in an Iowa blizzard, at a time when houses were very far apart and the world was wrapped in a blinding, searing blackness. At last the horses gave out; one of them stuck in a drift and Vandemark got out and unhitched them. Then he found they were close to a stack of straw, recently threshed. Into this they burrowed deeply and closing the opening with snow and straw, covered themselves with the buffalo robes and found their retreat warm and silent. There, for the first time, they declared their love and Vandemark cried out in ecstasy:

"THEN you are mine."

"Of course, I am," Virginia replied. "I've been yours ever since we lived together so beautifully on the road. Of course, I'm yours—and you are mine, Jacob, ain't you?"

"Then," said I, "just as soon as we get out of here, we'll be married."

Finally, I dug out just as we both were really and truly hungry and went back after Virginia.

Within fifty rods of us was the farmstead of Amos Bemisdarfer; and Amos stood looking at us in amazement as we came across the rippled surface of the snow.

A. Bessie Beatty's Interview with Trotsky—Continued from page 35

They Lie About Me

he escaped from Siberia in 1902, Trotsky was under the necessity of inventing a passport record. "The first name that came into my head was this of my prison guard, so I called myself Trotsky," he explained.

Not his father's name Braunstein, but the Siberian prison guard's will go marching down the pages of history to the quickstep of victory or the dirge of defeat.

That Trotsky is in the record to stay, no one can doubt. From Odessa, on the edge of the Black Sea where he spent his early school days, to Petrograd on the cold brink of the Baltic, men of all shades of political opinion have told me of his force.

"If he were not such an honest revolutionist, he would have been a second Napoleon," said one of his own followers.

FROM officers and soldiers, I have heard many stories of Trotsky under fire. They give him credit for saving the situation at several critical moments.

"Trotsky," said one of them, "can be destroyed, but not defeated. He has an infallible instinct for the critical moment. Once during the Denikin campaign, we were on the point of defeat. It was at a village called Leski in the Voronezh government. There were only a thousand of us. Denikin had eight or nine thousand. Trotsky told us we had to take the village. If we lost that, we would lose the war. It was nine or ten o'clock at night. Snowing, cold. We were without food. Our men were almost done for. We told Trotsky he must not stay. He refused to leave.

"If we do not win this battle, we lose everything," he said. "If we lose, I shall die here with the soldiers, but I will not leave." He stayed and we won."

An officer who was with him, when Udenich was approaching Petrograd, described a similar situation. Zinoviev, fearful of the outcome, was urging flight. Trotsky was adamant. "No. If I am to win this battle, I must fight here."

Most of the men associated with him say they have never seen him lose control of himself. "He is frozen fire," one of them told me convincingly.

One of the provodniks who served on his special train told me, he had seen Trotsky nervous but once. It was when they were rushing from Moscow to Petrograd to put down the Kronstadt uprising.

"We had two engines and we made the trip, a fourteen hour run in the old days, in seven hours," he said. "There were thirteen generals with Trotsky on our car and they were in consultation all the way there. Only six of the thirteen came back alive. The cars were in such a state they had to go into the yards."

I asked this man, who had no communistic leanings, about Trotsky as a boss.

"Strict but considerate," he said. "Things had to be right but he fed us well and he didn't pay any attention when he saw us speculating at stations."

An officer who had been with Trotsky at Kazan in August, 1918, when the city was surrounded by Tchekho-Slovaks, gave me another picture of the Commissar of War while actually at work on the job.

"It was he who conducted the defence of Kazan," he said. "He released the prisoners and organized the people, and by personal example gave them the courage to fight. I was in a mine-sweeper on the Volga with him. The engine went out of order. The Tchekhs attacked us. There was nothing for it but a hand-to-hand fight and Trotsky fought with the rest of us."

A member of the general staff told me that in the beginning of Trotsky's military career he relied too much on his own personality to carry him through crises.

"He has learned to take council," he said, "and we have great respect for his judgment. He has become a strategist."

A member of the General Staff Military Academy speaking of Trotsky's prowess in military science told of a recent visit of Trotsky to the Academy when the graduating class and a number of older officers were taking an examination.

Trotsky asked to be examined also. To the surprise of everyone, he finished answering his questions twenty minutes in advance of anyone else.

In the outside world, stories are current that Trotsky never moves without a large guard of armed men. As a matter of fact, he goes freely alone or with Madam Trotsky anywhere and everywhere. His limousine dashing swiftly through the Moscow streets is a familiar sight.

I asked him to pose for the motion picture camera and suggested that he come to the improvised studio, which Captain Vargas had organized in our mess. At first, he hesitated on account of time. Mr. Vargas urged that it would take only a few minutes, and he consented. It was arranged that he should let us know the hour later at which he could meet us.

ONE MORNING a Red Guard appeared at the door and announced that Comrade Trotsky would arrive in ten minutes. The stage was hurriedly set. A desk was pushed into place. There was a great bustle and testing of lights. Then a ring at the bell. The Commissar of War came in briskly. "I can give you five minutes," he said to Mr. Vargas, and took the seat to which he was motioned behind the desk. He needed no direction. The operation was as simple and natural as though he had been an actor and he was as consciously unconscious.

At the end of two minutes, Trotsky asked Mr. Vargas if he had finished. "You gave me five minutes, Mr. Commissar," he replied. Trotsky smiled, and the operator went on grinding.

Lenin is undoubtedly more beloved than Trotsky. To most of the people, he is an oracle. But force still commands its meed of respect. No one questions that Trotsky has force.

In their youth, Lenin and Trotsky blasted at the established order but quarreled over weapons. In their middle years of trying to found an order of their own, they still squabble over methods whenever it seems necessary or expedient. I have a suspicion that some of their latter quarrels

Sani-Flush

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
Cleans Closet Bowls Without Scouring

A little Sani-Flush shaken into the water in the closet bowl according to directions, and then flushed out, removes all visible stains and incrustations.

But it does more than that. Sani-Flush cleans the hidden, inaccessible trap as thoroughly as it cleans the bowl. It eliminates the cause of unpleasant odors and makes the use of disinfectants unnecessary.

Always keep Sani-Flush handy in your bathroom.

Sani-Flush is sold at grocery, drug, hardware, plumbing and house-furnishing stores. If you cannot buy it locally at once, send 25c in coin or stamps for a full sized can, postpaid. (Canadian price, 35c; foreign price, 50c.)

THE HYGIENIC PRODUCTS CO.
CANTON, OHIO

Canadian Agents
Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd., Toronto

WE TEACH COMMERCIAL ART

Properly Trained Artists Earn $100 a week and up. Meyer Both College—a Department of the Meyer Both Company—offers you a different and practical training. If you like to draw, develop your talent. Study this practical course—taught by the largest and most widely known Commercial Art Organization in the field with 20 years' success—which each year produces and sells to advertisers in the United States and Canada over ten thousand commercial drawings. Who else could give you so wide an experience? Commercial Art is a business necessity—the demand for commercial artists is greater every year. It's a highly paid, intensely interesting profession, equally open to both men and women. Home study instruction. Get facts before you enroll in any school. Get our special booklet, "Your Opportunity"—for half the cost of mailing—4c in stamps.

MEYER BOTH COLLEGE
of COMMERCIAL ART

Michigan Ave. at 20th St.
Dept. 24, CHICAGO, ILL.

are like diplomatic illnesses—there is a reason for them not registered on the thermometer or in the pulse count.

Lenin lives, instinctively, outside himself. He has an eternally bubbling spring of interest in other human beings. Trotsky has been dragged from introspection into action by the necessities of his situation. He has come up out of himself. I asked him, if he felt he had changed much in the last four years.

"I have had no time for self-analysis," he replied. "It is one of many psychological changes which the revolution has brought. In the old days, we were all thinking about ourselves all the time. But activity takes away self-analysis."

Lenin is the product of an idea. Trotsky is the product of its application. A Russian writer said of them:

"In Trotsky is crystalized all the psychology of the revolution, all her conscience, her anger, her generosity, her pride, the joy of her victory and the awful sufferings of her defeat. Trotsky is the extract of the Russian Revolution, her face, her soul. Lenin is her intellect."

I cannot imagine an arm-chair old age for Trotsky—slippers beside a fireplace. He will not peter out. His sense of the dramatic is too strong for that. The eager, hungry mind of him, subtle, lashingly satiric, is not the kind that fades out in a twilight of reminiscence. He is a spirit of struggle. He will die with his boots on ready for action.

¶ Sir Gilbert Parker's Novel of Another Wild Youth—Continued from page 48

Carnac's Folly

factors in the equation; they were non est in the post-mortem history of John Grier. How prodigious a nerve the old man had to make such a will, a will that outraged; that was, in effect, a proclamation that his son Carnac had no place in John Grier's scheme of things, while John Grier's wife was rewarded like some faithful old servant!

MONTHS went by. In them, Destiny made new drawings. With his mother, Carnac went to paint at a place called Charlemont. Tarboe pursued his work at the mills successfully; Junia saw nothing of Carnac, but she had a letter from him, and it was one that might have been written by a man to his friend; yet with an undercurrent of sadness that troubled her.

She might, perhaps, have yielded to the attentions of Tarboe, had not an appealing message come from her aunt, and at an hour's notice, she packed up and went to the West again on sick service.

Politically, the Province of Quebec was in turmoil. The time was drawing near when the Dominion Government must go to the polls, and in the most secluded cottage on the St. Lawrence, the virtues and defects of the administration were vital questions. Voters knew as much of technical law-making as the average voter everywhere, but no more, and sometimes less. Yet there was in the mind of the French-Canadian an intuition, which, to him, was as valuable as the deeper knowledge of a trained politician. The two great parties in the Province were led by Frenchmen. The English people, however, were chiefly identified with the party opposed to Barouche, the Secretary of State.

As the agitation began in the late spring, Carnac became suddenly interested in everything political. He realized what John Grier had said concerning politics—that, given other characteristics—the making of laws meant success or failure for every profession or trade in the country. He had known a few politicians; though he had never yet met the most dominant figure in the Province—Barode Barouche, who had a singular fascination for him. He seemed a man dominant and plausible, with a right-minded impulsiveness. Things John Grier had said rang in his ears.

As the autumn drew near, excitement increased. Political meetings were being held everywhere. There was one feature more common in Canada than in any other country; the opposing candidates met on the same platform and fought their fight out in the hearing of those whom they were wooing. One day, Carnac read in a newspaper that Barode Barouche was to speak at St. Annabel. As that was not far from Charlemont, he determined to hear Barouche for the first time. With Barode's speeches in print, he was familiar, and he had for him a sympathy which, to himself, seemed a condition of temperament.

"Mother," he said, "wouldn't you like to go and hear Barode Barouche at St. Annabel? You know him, don't you?"

"Yes, I knew him long ago," was the scarcely audible reply.

"He's a great, fine man, isn't he? Wrong-headed, wrong-purposed, but a big fine fellow."

"If a man is wrong-headed and wrong-purposed, is it easy for him to be fine?"

"That depends. A man might want to save his country by making some good law, and be mistaken both as to the result of that law and the right methods in making it. I'd like you to be with me when I hear him for the first time. I've got a feeling, he's one of the biggest men of our day. Of course, he isn't perfect. A man might want to save another's life, but he might choose the wrong way to do it, and that's wrong-headed; and perhaps he oughtn't to save the man's life, and that's wrong purposed. There's no crime in either. Let's go and hear Monsieur Barouche."

HE DID not see the flush that suddenly filled her face; and, if he had seen, he would not have understood. For her, a long twenty-seven years rolled back to the day when she was a young neglected wife, full of life's vitalities, out on a junction of the river and the wild woods, with Barode Barouche's fishing-camp nearby. She shivered now as she thought of it. It was all so strange, and heart-breaking. For long years, she had paid the price of her mistake. She knew how eloquent Barode Barouche could be; she knew how his voice had all the ravishment of silver bells to the unsuspecting. How well she knew him; how deeply she realized the darkness of his nature! Once she had said to him:

"Sometimes I think that for duty's sake you would cling like a leech."

It was true. For thirty long years, he had been wifeless, his wife having lost her reason three years after they were married. In that time, he had faithfully visited the place where she was confined every month of his life. At the bottom of his heart, Barode Barouche did not want marital freedom. He had loved the mad woman. He remembered her in the glory of her youth, in the splendor of her beauty. The insane asylum did not destroy his memory.

Mrs. Grier remembered too, but in a different way. Her relations with him had been one swift, absorbing fever—a mad dream, a moment of rash impulse, a yielding to the natural feeling which her own husband had aroused, the husband who now neglected her while Barode Barouche treated her like a queen, until a day when under his beguilement a stormy impulse gave—Carnac.

THEN the end came, instant and final; she bolted, barred and locked the door against Barouche, and he had made little effort to open it. So they had parted, and had never clasped hands or kissed again. To him, she was a sin of which he never repented. He had watched the growth and development of Carnac with a sharp sympathy. He was not a good man; but in him were seeds of goodness. To her, he was the lash that scarred her flesh, day in and day out, year in, year out—a lash that kept her sacred to her home. For her children's sake, she did not tell her husband, and she had emptied out her heart over Carnac with overwhelming fondness. "Yes, I'll go, Carnac," she said at last, for it seemed the easier way. "I haven't been to a political meeting for years."

The meeting was held in what had been a skating-rink and drill hall. On the platform in the center was the Chairman, with Barode Barouche on his right. There was some preliminary speech-making. A resolution was moved supporting Barouche, his party and his policy, and now and then there were little explosions of merriment at strokes of humor made by the speakers, and especially by one old farmer who made his jokes on the spot, and who now tried to embalm Barouche with praise. He drew attention to Barouche's leonine head and beard, to his alert eyes and quizzical face, and said he was as strong in the field of legislation as he was in body and mind. Carnac noticed that Barouche listened good-naturedly, and now and then cocked his head and looked up at the ceiling as though to find something there.

There was a curious familiarity in the action of the head which struck Carnac. He and his mother were seated about five rows back from the front row, on the edge of the aisle. As the meeting progressed, Barouche's eyes wandered slowly over the faces of his audience. Presently, he saw Carnac and his mother.

Mrs. Grier was conscious of a kind of shock upon the mind of Barouche. She saw the man's eyes go misty with feeling. For him, the world was suddenly shut out, and he only saw the woods of a late summer's afternoon, a lonely tent—and a woman. A flush crept up his face. Then he made a quick spasmodic gesture of the hand, outward, which again Carnac recognized as familiar. It was the kind of thing, he reflected, that he did himself.

So absorbed was Barode Barouche that he only mechanically heard the Chairman announce himself, but when he got to his feet, his full senses came back. The sight of the woman to whom he had been so much, and who had been so much to him for one short month, magnetized him; the face of the boy, so like his own as he remembered it thirty years ago, stirred his veins. There before him was his own unacknowledged child—the only child ever born to him. His heart throbbed.

Then he began to speak. Never in all his life had he spoken as he did this day. It was only a rural audience; there was not much intelligence in it; but it had a character quite its own. It was alive with its own interests which were chiefly of agriculture and the river. It was composed of both parties, and he could stimulate his own side, and, perhaps, win the other side.

Thus it was that, with pulses beating hard, the blood pounding through his veins, the inspired sensualist began his speech. It was his duty to map out a policy for the future; to give the people an idea of what his party meant to do; to guide, to inspire, to inflame.

As Carnac listened, his mind kept framing the words not yet issued, but which did issue from Barouche's mouth; his quick intelligence correctly imagined the line Barouche would take; again and again, Barouche made a gesture, or tossed his head, or swung upon his feet to right and left in harmony with Carnac's own mind. Carnac would say to himself, "Why, that's what I'd have done—that's what I'd have said, if I had his policy." More than once, he caught his mother's hand in some inspired moment of the speech, and he did not notice that her hand trembled as she clung to him.

But as for Barouche's chapter of policy on Education, Carnac almost sprang to his feet in protest when Barouche declared it. To Carnac it seemed fatal, though it was expounded with a supremely taking air; yet as he himself had said, it was wrong-headed and wrong-purposed.

When the speech had finished to great cheering, Carnac suddenly turned to his mother.

"He's on the wrong track. I know the policy to down him. He's got no opponent. I'm going to stand against him at the polls and defeat him."

She clutched his arm. "Carnac—Carnac! This is impossible! You don't know what you're doing."

"Well, I will, quick," he replied. "I'm out after him, if they'll have me."

That night, Carnac mapped out his course, carefully framed the policy to offset that of Barode Barouche, and wrote a letter to the Chairman of the Opposition at Montreal offering to stand, and putting forward his ingenious policy. He asked

How YOU Can Write Stories and Photoplays

By ELINOR GLYN

Author of "Three Weeks," "Beyond the Rocks,"
"The Great Moment," Etc., Etc.

FOR years the mistaken idea prevailed that writing was a "gift" miraculously placed in the hands of the chosen few. People said you had to be an Emotional Genius with long hair and strange ways. Many vowed it was no use to try unless you'd been touched by the Magic Wand of the Muse. They discouraged and often scoffed at attempts of ambitious people to express themselves.

These mistaken ideas have recently been proved to be "bunk." People know better now. The entire world is now learning the TRUTH about writing. People everywhere are finding out that writers are no different from the rest of the world. They have nothing "up their sleeve"; no mysterious magic to make them successful. They are plain, ordinary people. They have simply learned the principles of writing and have intelligently applied them.

Of course, we still believe in genius, and not everyone can be a Shakespeare or a Milton. But the people who are turning out the thousands and thousands of stories and photoplays of to-day for which millions of dollars are being paid ARE NOT GENIUSES.

You can accept my advice because millions of copies of my stories have been sold in Europe and America. My book, "Three Weeks," has been read throughout the civilized world and translated into every foreign language, except Spanish, and thousands of copies are still sold every year. My stories, novels, and articles have appeared in the foremost European and American magazines. For Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, greatest motion picture producers in the world, I have written and personally supervised such photoplays as, "The Great Moment," starring Gloria Swanson, and "Beyond the Rocks," starring Miss Swanson and featuring Rodolph Valentino. I have received thousands and thousands of dollars in royalties. I do not say this to boast, but merely to prove that you can be successful without being a genius.

Many people think they can't write because they lack "imagination" or the ability to construct out-of-the-ordinary plots. Nothing could be further from the truth. The really successful authors—those who make fortunes with their pens—are those who write in a simple manner about plain, ordinary events of every-day life—things with which everyone is familiar. This is the real secret of success—a secret within the reach of all, for everyone is familiar with some kind of life.

Every heart has its story. Every life has experiences worth passing on. There are just as many stories of human interest right in your own vicinity, stories for which some editor will pay good money, as there are in Greenwich Village or the South Sea Islands. And editors will welcome a story or photoplay from you just as quickly as from any well-known writer if your story is good enough. They are eager and anxious for the work of new writers, with all their blithe, vivacious, youthful ideas. They will pay you well for your ideas, too. Big money is paid for stories and scenarios to-day—a good deal bigger money than is paid in salaries.

The man who clerked in a store last year is making more money this year with his pen than he would have made in the store in a life-time. The young woman who earned eighteen dollars a week last summer at stenography just sold a photoplay for $500.00. The man who wrote the serial story now appearing in one of America's leading magazines hadn't thought of writing until about three years ago—he did not even know that he could. Now his name appears almost every month in the best magazines. You don't know whether you can write or not until you try.

I believe there are thousands of people who can write much better stories and plays than many we now read in magazines and see on the screen. I believe thousands of people can make money in this absorbing profession and at the same time greatly improve present-day fiction with their fresh, true-to-life ideas. I believe the motion picture business especially needs new writers with new angles. I believe this so firmly that I have decided to give some simple instructions which may be the means of bringing success to many who have not as yet put pen to paper. I am going to show YOU how easy it is when you know how!

Just fill out the coupon below. Mail it to my publishers, The Authors' Press, Auburn, N. Y. They will send you, ABSOLUTELY FREE, a handsome little book called "The Short-Cut to Successful Writing." This book was written to help all aspiring people who want to become writers, who want to improve their condition, who want to make money in their spare time. Within its pages are many surprises for doubting beginners; it is crowded with things that gratify your expectations—good news that is dear to the heart of all those aspiring to write; illustrations that enthrall, stories of success; new hope, encouragement, helps, hints—things you've long wanted to know.

"The Short-Cut to Successful Writing" tells how many suddenly realize they can write after years of doubt and indecision. How story and play writers began. How many rose to fame and fortune. How simple plots and ordinary incidents become successful stories and plays when correctly handled. How new writers get their names into print. How one's imagination properly directed may bring glory and greatness. How to WIN.

This book and all its secrets are YOURS. You may have a copy ABSOLUTELY FREE. You need not send a penny. You need not feel obligated. You need not hesitate for ANY reason. The book will be mailed to you without any charge whatever.

Get your pencil—fill out the coupon below. Mail it to The Authors' Press before you sleep to-night. This little act may be the turning point of your whole career. Who knows?

THE AUTHORS' PRESS, Dept 149 Auburn, N. Y.

Send me ABSOLUTELY FREE "The Short-Cut to Successful Writing." This does not obligate me in any way. (Print your name and address plainly in pencil.)

Name.....
Address.....
City and State.....

Elinor Glyn

also for an interview; and the interview was granted by telegram—almost to his surprise. He was aware, however, of the discontent among the English members of the Opposition, and of the wish of the French members to find a good compromise.

He had a hope that his singular position—the notoriety which his father's death and his own financial disfranchisement had caused—would be a fine card in his favor. He was not mistaken. His letter arrived at political headquarters at a moment when there were difficulties concerning three candidates who were pressing their claims. Carnac Grier, the disinherited son of the great lumber king, who had fame as an artist, spoke French as though it were his native tongue, was an element of sensation which, if adroitly used, could be of great service. It might even defeat Barode Barouche.

In the first place, Carnac was young, good-looking, personable, and taking in his manner. Barouche was old, experienced, with hosts of enemies and many friends, but with injurious egotism. An interview was, therefore, arranged.

On the morning of the day it took place, Carnac's anguished mother went with him to the little railway station of Charlemont. She had slept little the night before; her mind was in an eddy of emotions. It seemed dreadful that Carnac should fight his own father, repeating what Fabian had done in another way. Yet at the bottom of her heart, there was a secret joy. Some native revolt in her had joy in the thought that the son might extort a price for her long sorrow and his unknown disgrace.

As she had listened to Barouche at the meeting, she realized how sincere yet insincere he was; how gifted and yet how ungracious was his mind. Her youth was over; long pain and regret had chastened her. She was as lonely a creature as ever the world knew; violence was no part of her equipment; and yet terrible memories made her assent to this new phase of Carnac's life. She wondered what Barouche would think. There was some ancient touch of war in her which made her rejoice that after long years the hammer should strike.

Somehow, the thing's tremendous possibilities thrilled her. Carnac had always been a politician—always. She remembered how, when he was a boy, he had argued with John Grier on national matters, laid down the law with the assurance of an undergraduate, and invented theories impossible of public acceptance. Yet in every stand he had taken, there had been thought, logic and reasoning, wrongly premised, but always based on indisputable principles. On paper, he was generally right, in practice, generally wrong. His buoyant devotion to an idea was an inspiration and a tonic. The curious thing was that while still this political matter was hanging fire, he painted with elation.

That was the most curious part of it all.

His mother knew he did not see the thousand little things which made public life so wearying; that he realized only the big elements of national policy. She understood how those big things would inspire the artist in him. For, after all, there was the spirit of Art in framing a great policy which would benefit millions in the present and countless millions in the future. So, at the railway station as they waited for the train, with an agitation outwardly controlled, she said:

"The men who have fought before, will want to stand, so don't be surprised if——"

"If they reject me, mother?" interrupted Carnac. "No, I shan't be surprised, but I feel in my bones that I'm going to fight Barode Barouche into the last corner of the corral."

"Don't be too sure of that, my son. Won't the thing that prevents your marrying Junia be a danger in this, if you go on?"

A sullen tragic look came into his face, his lips set. The sudden paleness of his cheek, however, was lost in a smile.

"Yes, I've thought of that; but if it has to come, better it should come now than wait longer. If the truth must be told, I'll tell it—yes, I'll tell it!"

Carnac out to fight Barouche—eager youth against powerful age—and, Carnac does not know it, but it is son opposing father. Back of all is Carnac's secret marriage. See Hearst's International for August, ready July 20th.

What Frazier Hunt Saw and Heard in the Ulster Country—Continued from page 69

Who's to Blame in Ireland?

to drive us out! We'll see who gets driven out of this country!"

I told my driver to hurry on. But I only found more intolerance, more hate, than I had found in the country—Belfast.

There was firing going on as I drove from the station to the hotel. It was Sunday and in the afternoon, after I had finished a late lunch, I wandered out on the streets. Probably, I was looking for trouble! I recall that I unconsciously but deliberately strolled towards the district whence the sporadic firing came.

I found myself in a broad thoroughfare that seemed deserted. One or two figures hurried along close to the inside of the walk and stopping now and then in doorways. They looked like slinking midnight prowlers. I took the middle of the walk in fancied protection against them.

Around a corner in one of the side streets, some friendly voice addressed me, "You're taking a big chance, friend. There was a man killed up the street a little while ago by a stray bullet."

I stepped up beside my adviser—a slender, middle-aged man, wearing a bright bow tie and winged collar, and looking for all the world like what he was—a gentleman of the track and the stables.

"Thanks, old man," I suggested. "This street does look a little exclusive."

"I could see you was from the States and was a stranger around here. This shooting is bad business. You don't know when you're going to stop something yourself."

I led my new friend across the side street to a quiet back room of a little hotel and we fell to talking. It appeared he had made numerous trips to the States with horses, but since the business had fallen on evil days he had stepped down and out with his beloved animals.

Then we turned to the Belfast situation. "I was in a double-decker tram the other night, when a bunch of gunmen climbed up to the top, threw a gun into my face and asked me where I belonged. 'Protestant,' I said. Then they pushed their way on through and in a second I heard two or three shots right there in the car. Then the gunmen shoved by me and left the car. They'd killed a poor beggar of a Catholic going home from his night work."

"It's awful here. You don't know when you're going to get shot. If you take one side the other side will get you—and if you stay in the middle, you're game for either side. If I had enough dough to buy a ticket, I'd leave the country and the whole terrible business."

Leaving my friend, I wandered back to my hotel. It was beginning to grow dusk and a pall of terror was settling over the city, as vivid and positive as a heavy fog. Honest folk were hurrying home from their Sunday afternoon excursions. Those who had to pass through some "no man's land" between Catholic and Protestant districts, were wondering what luck they would have this night.

At the entrance to my hotel, I spoke to the doorman. "A lot of shooting going on tonight, sir," he remarked rather casually. "A bomb was thrown about an hour ago and several people badly hurt."

"Catholic or Protestant?" I asked.

"Catholic people this time," he answered. "They've got to do something to keep them Sinn Fein paid gunmen in hand. They're to blame for all this. They're sent up here from the South to terrorize us. The Southern Government is behind them. They get their arms and ammunition and their orders from down there. They want to turn Ulster into a Catholic country, but they've got to kill all of us first."

I went on up to my room. An odd, little old chambermaid was fussing about.

"OH! I'M so glad to see you back safe, sir," she half whimpered. "One of the servants was telling me there's been an awful lot of shooting and killing going on this afternoon. I was afraid for you, you being a stranger and just arrived. It's terrible, ain't it, sir? And it's all the fault of them Orange gunmen, sir." She lowered her voice to almost a whisper. "I'm not supposed to talk about religion, sir, but you're a stranger here and you won't mind. Well, them Orangemen is all to blame."

"The poor Catholics is all working people and they're being put out of their jobs and they're being killed and the Orangemen are trying to drive them out of this part of the country—that's just what them paid Orange gunmen are trying to do. You know they call them fellows 'Specials' and they got three grades, A, B, and C, and altogether they're 30,000 of 'em. And you got to be an Orangemen before you can even get in—and they're all after killing the poor Catholics and driving them out."

I left her rambling on and went down to the dining-room for my supper. "A bit of

BUILD YOUR BEAUTY IN NATURE'S WAY

By A. Jamieson Karr

IRENE FRANKLIN, the always delightful comedienne and famous star of the "Greenwich Village Follies," in talking modestly of the secret of her charms said: "A good complexion is not always quite enough to make popularity on the stage. A firm and youthful contour is quite as important. I have found that both a beauty of contour and a beauty of complexion may be won through the use of a most dainty and delightful preparation and it is ideal to use right in your own home."

"Every woman wants a beauty no other woman can have," said Miss Franklin, with a smile. "A beauty expressive of her own individuality, her own charm. The beauty which can be put on which any woman can imitate, does not win lasting and sincere admiration. Nature does not copy. She gives to each individual woman her own charm to develop—her own personal beauty of skin which can be brought out. Every beautiful woman has simply found her own beauty. She has followed Nature's way to beauty. She does not imitate."

TWENTY-THREE years ago, in her exclusive and fashionable Beauty Parlor, Mrs. M. G. Scott discovered and perfected Mineralava Beauty Clay and Face Finish with the one aim to stimulate the individual beauty of individual women. The Mineralava Treatment does not "imitate" beauty. It actually achieves a natural beauty of skin and contour by Nature's own method—the stimulation of blood circulation. Mineralava builds the vibrant, virile, under-skin tissues and muscles, which are so essential to the radiant and rounded face and form of youth. Mineralava removes wrinkles.

Mineralava does not give you another's skin, but it gives you your skin as you have yearned for it—soft, firm, fresh, colorful, free from flaws. It gives you the beauty Nature intended you to have.

EVERY woman knows the name of Victor Vivaudou, famous Parisian Perfumer and master of cosmetics and toilet preparations. Listen to Monsieur Vivaudou's opinion of Mineralava, formed after

Authorized Interviews with Miss Irene Franklin, Monsieur Victor Vivaudou, Mrs. M. G. Scott, and the makers of Mineralava Beauty Clay and Face Finish

IRENE FRANKLIN, famous star of the Greenwich Village Follies, says:

"The firm and youthful contour is as important on the stage as a good complexion. Both are secured by the continued use of Mineralava, which I find dainty and delightful for home use."

Irene Franklin

Manufacturer's Offer—Try Mineralava at Our Risk!—You are absolutely protected in your purchase of Mineralava.

You Are to Be the Judge—Our Money Back Guarantee—As the manufacturers of Mineralava we guarantee to you that after the application of one Mineralava Set you will actually see a freshened complexion. You will see that your wrinkles are being removed. You will feel the tightening muscles filling out your contour. If the results are not as promised your money will be refunded by your Dealer immediately.

Warning: Avoid Imitations—Mineralava is successful. Because it is successful it is imitated. Go to dependable Drug and Department Stores. Ask for the original Mineralava Beauty Clay and Face Finish. The original is your only protection. Mineralava keeps indefinitely and that is why we are able to sell it to you through your favorite dealer.

Make This Test Yourself!—We do not conduct a mail-order business. We know you want to purchase your Mineralava from your own dependable Drug or Department Store. Buy your set today, one bottle of Beauty Clay $2.00, one bottle of Face Finish $1.50. If your dealer does not have a supply send us his name on coupon below and you will receive C. O. D., through your dealer, a full set with the understanding you will pay for same as stated above and the further understanding your money will be refunded if you are not entirely satisfied. Scott's Preparations, Inc., 10 East 38th Street, New York.

MAIL THIS COUPON TO-DAY

Scott's Preparations, Inc.,
10 East 38th Street, New York City.

Please deliver to me C. O. D. through my dealer (name below), a complete set of Mineralava Beauty Clay and Face Finish under your guarantee. I agree to pay the small purchase price, $3.50, with the understanding that if the results are not as stated above, my dealer will refund the price.

Name _____

Street _____

Town _____ State _____

My Dealer's Name is _____

AA 7

years of search and research for just such a treatment:—"I know that the Mineralava Treatment is the one fulfilled desire of women the world over—a care of the complexion which is at once natural, convenient, and inevitably successful."

—A. JAMIESON KARR.

23rd SUCCESSFUL YEAR
Mineralava
REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.
Beauty Clay & Face Finish

PARIS VIVAUDOU NEW YORK
Distributor

brisk shooting going on today, sir," my waiter said to me.

"Killing poor Catholics," I suggested.

"Oh! no, sir, these were Protestants killed this afternoon. It's awful, isn't it? It isn't safe anywhere in Belfast these days. Worse than the war, sir. These Sinn Fein gunmen are terrible brutes, sir. They'd murder anybody—women and children, too."

Apparently there was no break in this vicious wheel of hate and fear and terror and distortion. For days I tried to find some sane voice crying out for a compromise and for common sense and common justice. In all the scores of people I talked to I found only one or two—and their voices were so weak that it was like whispering into the angry face of a storm.

ONE MORNING I approached an old jaunting-cart driver who had driven me two or three times before and asked him to take me down to North Derby Street, to a small Catholic section where several children had been killed by a bomb.

He looked at me quizzically for a moment or two. "Ye won't get us killed, will ye?" he asked in the Scotch accent that one hears so often in the Ulster country.

"I think as much of my neck as you do of yours," I answered.

It was about 10 o'clock in the morning—the safest part of the day. As we drove down Royal Avenue—which is Belfast's Main Street—and jogged on into York Road, I felt a growing sense of the terror and uncertainty of life in this community.

Two or three times we drove by Catholic quarters—for here in Belfast and in all the other cities of the Ulster country, as well, the Catholic families are herded in pales, terrible and cruel. My friendly old driver pointed them out with his long whip. With the wisdom of the streets and of long nights on silent corners where he had learned real philosophy and real tolerance, he explained to me that the workmen were always fools—always wasting their strength and hate on each other.

Slowly we jogged deeper and deeper into the living terror. Before he turned his lazy horse into North Derby Street, I knew that we had reached the bottom of the pit of hate and savagery.

IT WAS a windswept, narrow street, lined on both sides with red brick houses that one could be sure were as cold and uncanny within as they were without. Two or three half-clothed children hurried by. At the turn of the corner, two thinly clad, undersized, ratty men stuck their noses around the corner of an alley, then withdrew and watched us with open suspicion.

I set myself for a bullet in the back. Except for the scurrying children, there was no one in sight and I almost wondered why they did not shoot us—outsiders driving into their forbidden district to gloat over the murder of their children.

"There on the corner is where them Catholic children was killed," my driver said to me in colorless monotone. "Some devil slipped down here and threw the bomb into the center of a dozen of them playing there in the street."

He stopped his horse and I looked at the raw empty, narrow, murder-hole with awe and horror. A thin, bent, anemic man turned the corner and passed by.

"Raw day!" I commented in half fear.

He looked up at me in astonishment and, without replying, quickened his pace and hurried by. There was no room in his world for pleasantness and fellowship. It was a world filled with bitterness and poverty and terrorism.

"Turn round and drive back!" I cried.

That noon I dined at one of the great clubs of Belfast. There were six of us at the table and my five hosts were representative business and professional men of the city. They were all grim, determined men when it came to religion and politics.

"Until the South settles down, until they become less bigoted and intolerant about their religion, until they stop bullying us, you may be sure we will have nothing to do with them," one of my hosts solemnly pronounced, while the others nodded their heads in approval. "We refuse to enter any combination with them except under the Union Jack, you may be quite sure of that. Only seven and a half percent of our Belfast manufactured goods are consumed in the South. We can get along without any of their trade if we have to. Of course, we want friendly trade relations so that our wholesale and distributing houses here can prosper—but we can live without it."

There was no need for me to ask any questions. All I had to do was to listen. Finally, one elderly gentleman who had had little to say so far, began:

THESE are three basic reasons why we cannot enter any union with the Southern Government," he said. "First, there is business and economic reasons. Here in Belfast, without natural resources, without coal or iron and without any imperial aid, we have built up one of the greatest ship building and linen manufacturing centers of the world.

"The continuation of our prosperity depends on free import of raw materials, free import of food to satisfy our workmen and the same general governmental conditions that have held in the past. We can take no chances of an agricultural South imposing duties on us or in any way interfering with our industries.

"Second: there is the question of religion. Now we are not afraid of Home Rule—we are afraid of Rome Rule. Any guarantees given by the South mean nothing to us: we have absolutely no faith in anything they do or say. We don't propose to take any chances with our religious freedom and tolerance. We refuse to add the North to the priest-ridden South.

"Third: there is education. Under the present plan, the teachers are paid by the Government but whoever furnishes the school building has the privilege of hiring and discharging the teachers. We would like to have free open schools but we know that if the South had power over us we would have only deeper Catholic influence to combat and eventually we would have to fight to keep our children out from under the influence of genuine Catholic schools. We're not going to be drawn into any such thing. We are going to keep what we have—what country and people and freedom—and we will fight to hold them."

The Bounders' College is the most delicious thing in all Ulster—and one might say Ireland. Go down Rosemary Street to Number 15, then up a dusty dark pair of stairs to the second floor and then to the left and through a door bearing the legend "Daniel McDevitt, Tailor." That's it!

McDevitt is a real tailor and this is a real tailor shop. But it's a good deal more than that too—for you get ideas ironed out here, and the black spots of intolerance sponged out of your heart, and broad, liberal goods cut to the latest patterns.

"Is it really religion that's at the bottom of the trouble in the North?" I put forward my first evening at the College.

A giant of a Protestant shipyard worker, discharged along with the Catholics because he was a labor organizer, started to answer, but the tailor caught the floor.

"It's religion on the surface but it goes much deeper than that," he explained. "In 1798, when the United Irishmen revolution was attempted, all the leaders, including Lord Fitzgerald, were Protestants. Yet this was a Nationalistic movement like the South of Ireland fight for independence.

THEN FROM 1914, when Carson organized his Ulster Volunteers, and on through the war, there was some Catholic baiting, but nothing very serious. It was just a sort of prelude to the real outbreak of July 12, 1920. At that time there was fighting in the South, and a number of Ulster military men, serving with the military in the South, were being killed.

"You see, in January and February, 1919, there had been a strike here in Belfast for a forty-four-hour week and the labor leaders had succeeded in getting the men to bury all religious differences and not to be split and stampeded on the cry of religion. In one of the big parades there were banners bearing, 'To hell with the man who mentions religion.'

"All the big employers in Belfast, without a single exception, were Protestant, and they hated the Protestant labor leader, quite as much as the Catholic, so in the general house cleaning the radical laborite was to be swept out along with the Catholic workmen. This all happened on July 12. On that day thousands of Catholic workmen and all the labor leaders were beaten and driven from the shipyards."

"What's going to happen now?" I asked.

"Anything," the little tailor answered. "If the South should start reprisals against the local Protestants in Southern counties the reaction here would be terrible. We'd have a real Catholic pogrom then, and of course, that would bring on a terrible civil war—which is just what the Ulster Die-Hards and the old Ascendancy would really like. British troops could be called in and the reconquest of the South undertaken.

"But there are two big points against all that. First, the unemployed Protestant workmen, once their government doles are stopped, and their living conditions become more and more severe, will be driven slowly into the arms of the unemployed Catholic workmen. The economic stress will prove stronger than the religious hate. Already a lot of the Protestant workmen who used to be bitterest against the Catholics now understand what fools they have been."

A tall, slender young fellow sitting near me began chuckling to himself.

"Eh! I used to be a Pape (Papist) fighter myself. More than once I've helped beat up Catholic boys. But I finally got wise. And the rest of 'em will too, in time."

© Bruno Lessing's New Story of an Old Friend—From page 80

Lapidowitz Dines Out

in the kitchen," replied the maid, "and there ain't nothing on the stove and no sign of dinner."

MRS. MORITSKY uttered a long drawn gasp that sounded suspiciously like "Oy-y-y!" and hastened towards her husband. The maid had done Lapidowitz an injustice. He was not actually playing cards. He was merely telling the cook her fortune by reading the decrees of her destiny from the face of a pack of cards. Moritsky, in the doorway, almost speechless with rage, stood for a moment gazing upon the scene. Then:

"Say, what's the idea?" he asked. Lapidowitz looked at him calmly and then back to the cook's fortune.

"I didn't come here to be insulted," he said. "I give you a good business proposition—fifty dollars what don't have to be paid all at once as the man will wait—and you treat me like a dog."

"Why ain't the cook cooking the supper?" demanded Moritsky. Lapidowitz shrugged his shoulders.

"She's a friend of mine," he replied, airily. "Who treats me like a dog treats her like a dog."

For the space of one whole minute, Moritsky passed through all the sensations of apoplexy. A real, shrewd, business man is quick to recover his wits. A genial smile gradually formed itself upon his face. Had Lapidowitz been a shrewd business man, he would have shuddered at that smile.

"Well," said Moritsky, in the most friendly tone that he could assume, "I guess the joke is on me. How much d'ye say you want for your business deal?"

"Fifty dollars," said Lapidowitz. "But I give you my word of honor you get every cent back as soon the money begins—"

"Tut, tut!" exclaimed Moritsky, drawing a roll of banknotes from his pocket and beginning to count them. "We will talk about paying back some other time. The main point is you want fifty dollars. Here is the fifty. I give twenty-five to you and twenty-five to the cook. Is that all right? And will she start in getting the supper ready right away?"

LAPIDOWITZ scratched his head. The prospect of an equal division with his unsuspicious accomplice had not occurred to him. But as he observed the eagerness with which the cook seized the money that was held out to her he was discreet enough not to discuss the matter.

"I didn't tell you how to divide it," he said, reproachfully, "but it's all right. Now how about my five dollars for translating your orders to the cook?"

Moritsky, whose geniality had now become sincere, handed him another bill.

"Anything so long it makes you happy," he said. "Now tell her to get busy with the supper and see that she does it."

For the next hour Lapidowitz worked like a Trojan to help Tina with her cooking. He brought her pots and pans, cut the bread and made sandwiches, stirred dressings and busied himself in a dozen ways to save her steps. When everything was ready, he helped the maids carry the dishes upstairs.

The affair was nearing its end and Lapidowitz was eating a sandwich in the kitchen when Moritsky appeared.

"I forgot to ask you," said he, "if you was getting enough to eat yourself?"

"Sure," said the schnorrer. "Tina cooked me a couple of squabs and some kaiserschmarn. I'm just eating a sandwich to kill time."

"That's fine," said Moritsky. "Now, maybe, if you come upstairs with me we can talk some business."

Lapidowitz rose with alacrity and followed Moritsky to his bedroom on the second floor. Moritsky was exceedingly polite. He insisted upon the schnorrer preceding him into the room.

"From now on," he explained, "you ain't in my employ no more. We are both gentlemen."

Lapidowitz bowed with great dignity. And then, with sudden alarm as he noted Moritsky's actions.

"Hey!" he cried. "What are you locking the door for?" It was Moritsky's turn to grin.

"I want you to meet a friend of mine," he said. "Mister Flannigan from Police Headquarters."

"Is that the bum?" asked Mister Flannigan, calmly.

"That's him," said Moritsky. "Thirty dollars he got out of me by keeping back the supper."

Mister Flannigan rose, very slowly and yawned. Then with the utmost deliberation he walked towards Lapidowitz and, after scrutinizing him carefully for a few moments, proceeded to go through his pockets. The money amounted to exactly thirty-one dollars and fifteen cents. There were a few pawn tickets, a small mirror and comb and an assortment of cheap odds and ends. Moritsky counted the money and pocketed it.

"Give him the rest," he said, "and put him out."

"Shall I just take him out, or kick him out, or lock him up?" asked the detective.

"Kick him out," came the prompt reply. "If you lock him up I got to go to court and I'm too busy."

It was a week later—the incident had almost passed from his mind—when, outside of Milken's café he met Tina.

"I was waiting for you," she explained. "Mr. Moritsky kept me for a week and then took that money out of my wages."

"That ain't my fault, is it?" asked Lapidowitz.

"No," said the cook, blushing coyly. "That ain't what I wanted to speak about. But you said something about being married. Don't you remember?"

Lapidowitz gasped. He looked swiftly about him wondering whether it might not be wisest merely to run away. And then came inspiration. He smiled at her.

"I didn't say anything about being married," he said, genially, "I just told you to think about it. I've been thinking about it ever since. I come to the conclusion that it's bum business."

Hudson River by Daylight

As famous as the river whose historic course they follow are the palatial white flyers of the Day Line fleet. Plan, this year, to view the natural wonders of the Hudson from the decks of these magnificent steamers, the most luxurious river craft in the world. The Day Line forms the ideal link between New York and vacation points North and West. Delightful One-Day Outings from New York.

Daily and Sunday service; season to Oct. 22.
Rail tickets accepted, New York to Albany,
Albany to New York.

Write for Illustrated Literature

Hudson River Day Line
Desbrosses Street Pier New York

DIAMONDS

Here at 60% of Market Price

This absolutely flawless diamond gem 1/2-1/16 ct. at $100 among bargains in recent list. Many other big values in our lists. Buy HERE! Prices based on loan values, not market values. This 75 year old diamond dealing firm has thousands unpaid loans and other bargains. Must sell NOW.

Why Pay Full Prices

Any diamond sent for absolutely free examination at our risk. No obligation. No cost to you.

Send for Latest List

Describes Diamond Bargains in detail, gives guaranteed loan values. Explains unlimited exchange privilege. Write for list today. Send now.

JOS. DE ROY & SONS 1188 DeRoy Bldg. Only Opposite Post Office, Pittsburgh, Pa.

An Easy Way to Remove Dandruff

If you want plenty of thick, beautiful, glossy, silky hair do by all means get rid of dandruff, for it will starve your hair and ruin it if you don't.

The best way to get rid of dandruff is to dissolve it. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp, and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most, if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and three or four more applications should completely remove every sign and trace of it.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop, and your hair will look and feel a hundred times better. You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store. A four-ounce bottle is usually all that is needed.

The R. L. Watkins Co., Cleveland, Ohio.

Q. Dana Burnet's Story—One that Every Father Will Understand—Continued from page 31

Wandering Daughters

discerning she might have guessed that this abrupt transition of the family fortunes was in the nature of a forced bloom; but such a thought did not occur to her.

She was to have her coming-out party, after all. First, though, and really most delightful of all, the house was to be done over. Not completely, but sufficiently. . . . Where it showed.

Mr. Trull came to dinner a few nights later. The dinner itself was served by a new maid in white cap and apron. Mrs. Bowden wore a silk dress, cut low at the neck. Mr. Bowden wore a dinner coat—also new. Bessie, meeting her parents in the lower hall just before the arrival of the guest, stopped and stared at them in ecstatic amazement.

"Why, papa— Don't you look great! And mama too. Oh, I think it's simply spiffy!"

Mr. Bowden laughed easily.

"We're getting gay in our old age, Bessie!" he said.

Mr. Trull himself was impressed—though he showed it only in a certain expansiveness of manner. It was plain that he had made a mistake about these people. He had thought them rather dowdy—"provincial" was the word he had found for them. But they were of the larger world, after all. . . .

THEY had coffee afterwards, in the parlor. Bessie, when she heard her mother give the order, could hardly believe her ears. She accepted the innovation with outward calm, but inwardly she trembled with pride and joy.

The gilt furniture came in for some good-natured joking from Mr. Bowden.

"Tastes change," he confided to Mr. Trull. "Twenty years ago this furniture was quite the thing. Twenty years from now it will be quite the thing again."

Bessie laughed—with a sense of relief. How clever her father was! She had never realized it before.

"But now," added Mr. Bowden lightly, "I feel that we ought to make a change."

Perhaps a little more color."

"Color is certainly coming in," said Mr. Trull, from the heights of his artistic consciousness. "People aren't afraid of color any more."

He, being consulted, advised a dull, oriental red with a background of cream-colored walls. The marble mantel, he thought, might stay. It would lend a touch of quaintness—yes, quaintness was the word—to the room.

So the parlor blossomed in red and cream; took on an elegance; struck a modern note—and was known as the drawing room. Then came the hall. The mission furniture was removed, and a few old pieces of mahogany, dragged down from the attic and out of dark corners under Bessie's active direction, were polished, touched up and established in its stead. Next the front porch was done over. It had been painted for twenty years the same shade of discouraged brown. Brown didn't show dirt. . . . But now it was covered with a cheerful white, and the house-shutters, which had been hitherto rather disfiguring necessities, were painted an ornamental green. Bessie herself selected the exact shade—with the assistance of Mr. Trull, who was eager to help.

IT WAS in the renovated house, in the atmosphere of renaissance, that Bessie's coming-out party took place. The night was a complete triumph. All of Bessie's new friends were there, and most of her old ones as well.

Johnnie Hargrave came, solidly handsome, silent, and not a little bewildered by the Bowden metamorphosis. Bessie danced with him once, enjoyed thoroughly his unsuccessful attempt at aloofness, and then went back to the arms of young men who took her slender loveliness as a matter of course. . . . It was rather nice dancing with Johnnie. There was something about Johnnie that was different—and yes, rather—nice.

If only he weren't so stodgy!

At one o'clock supper was served by a prominent local caterer.

Hours later, when the last of the guests had departed, Bessie, a bit disheveled but very happy, sought out her father in his den on the second floor.

"Papa! It was just splendid. And the punch! Where did you get it?"

"I bought some of Charley Horton's stock," said Mr. Bowden, puffing a perfect cigar. "I had intended to serve cocktails, but your mother thought champagne would be a little more—" Mr. Bowden waved his hand—"spiffy!"

"It was just the thing—wasn't it wonderful, mama?"

This to Mrs. Bowden, who had just come in from a final inspection of the house (to see what damage had been done).

"Yes, I think it was very successful. Everyone seemed to have a good time."

"They did! The best ever. I really think it was the nicest party I've ever been to. And the punch—Papa said that was your idea."

Mr. Bowden interrupted hastily. "Did you taste it, Bessie?"

"I had a sip of Austin's—" She seemed astonished at this fact; then she laughed. "Honestly! I was having such a good time—why are you looking at mother in that strange way?"

"I WAS just thinking, my dear," said Mr. Bowden serenely, "that perhaps I ought to apologize to your mother. I had a notion that she was an uncompromising Puritan. But, by George, she's the best sport in the family. She drank two whole glasses of punch."

"I was thirsty!" said Annie, blushing.

In the solitude of their double bedroom, Annie confronted her husband.

"What did you mean by trying to give me all the credit?" she demanded.

"My dear, we must stand together in this. If Bessie thought one of us was—reserving judgment—"

"I am reserving judgment. I keep asking myself whether it's right for us to sacrifice this way—just to give her such things. Things of the body. I can't help thinking about—about her soul, Will."

"I agree with you. It's her soul I'm thinking about."

"But—"

"I know. You think it's a strange way to get at her soul, giving her champagne punch and dancing parties. But I tell you, Annie, it's the only way. Bessie hasn't grown up to the point where we can appeal to her mind—to her spirit. It's environment that counts with her now. I've been reading a lot of new books lately, my dear. Books by men who see life whole. They say that environment counts and I know it does. If we can't make Bessie's home the most attractive place she knows, if we can't give her what she considers—spiffy!"—he laughed over the ridiculous word—"right here at home, then I say home is a failure, and that means that civilization is a failure."

"My Lord, Will!"

Mr. Bowden laughed. He was excited, and a little inspired.

IT'S TRUE. We older people—we of the older generation, we're too set in our ways of thinking. Trouble with us is we don't look at the world as a going concern. There's got to be new life—new ways of getting at life—and we must realize it, and help to get the best out of it, or go to our graves bitter and disappointed." He abandoned generalization and returned to their personal problem. "What I feel is that some day all this new life of Bessie's will come to a head. There'll come a day when she'll have to decide whether she's going forward or back, whether she's to get the best of her environment, or whether her environment's to get the best of her. And when that day comes, I want to be in a position to talk to her, to advise her. That's how I'll get at her soul—and that's why I insisted on the champagne punch."

Mrs. Bowden shook her head.

"You're a great man, Will. A really great man. I've always known it. And I trust you. But—I do have my doubts. . . . Some of those young men tonight were almost tipsy."

"If they'd been drinking cocktails at the club," countered Mr. Bowden, "they would have been tipsy."

Mr. Bowden was walking home from church with Johnnie Hargrave. It was a morning in early Spring. The hedges along James Street were turning green, and crocuses were showing in the lawns of the old places past which they walked.

But beneath this heritage of tranquility, and beyond it, Mr. Bowden knew that life was moving, flowing—irresistibly making new patterns to replace the old. A changing pattern. . . . Life, restless and indestructible, perpetually in revolt, and as always, a little blind, was rushing on behind the curtain of a thousand common-places; was passing in the street, hurrying towards its rendezvous with the future.

He spoke to the young man beside him.
 "You say that you love my daughter?"
 "Yes, sir. I've always—ever since I was a freshman at college."

"You want to marry her?"

"More than anything else on earth. But she—Bessie's changed this last year, Mr. Bowden. She's not the girl she used to be. I can't make her out."

"Well, Johnnie," said Mr. Bowden, "how do you expect to marry a girl you can't make out?"

"Sir?" said the young man in surprise.

"I say, how can you expect to make an impression on Bessie if you stand outside the things she's doing and thinking——?"

"Well, sir! Now that you've mentioned it, I feel I can speak my mind. The fact is, I don't approve of the things Bessie's doing."

"But you approve of Bessie?"

The former football player gave a kind of groan.

"Yes, God help me—I do."

"God won't help you, young man, unless you help yourself."

Johnnie stopped and stared at him. A staid and elderly couple brushed by them, with curious neighborly glances. Mr. Bowden took Johnnie's arm and they walked on.

"My boy, I'll tell you something—a secret. I'd rather give Bessie to you than to any young man I know. So you see, I'm on your side."

Hargrave was touched. He pressed Mr. Bowden's arm.

"Why, thank you, Mr. Bowden. I thought you liked me but I—I didn't know——"

"Yes. I've told you the truth. I'm being frank with you. I'd like to help you—if I can."

"You'll put in a good word for me with Bessie?"

"I'll do nothing of the sort," said Mr. Bowden.

"But you said——"

"Look here, Johnnie. The trouble with you is, you're too set. You don't realize that there's more to life than business and churchgoing on Sunday. You need education." It struck Mr. Bowden at that moment that his own education had been extraordinarily rapid. He mused over the fact; then set it aside as inconsequential. "You're a steady-going, really first-rate young man."

"I've got some ideals——" said Johnnie, with the conscious pride of youth indulging its soul. "I believe in business and I believe in the Church."

"So do I, so do I! But what's business for? To support life! And what's the Church for? To mould life—isn't it? Well, then! Well, then! You've got to understand life before you can support it or mould it, haven't you?"

"Yes, sir, but——"

"Look here, my boy, I'm going to tell you something. The trouble with you is you're standing outside of the life that's going on around you. I know what you think of Bessie's crowd—the crowd she's going with! You think it's an ungodly set—and it is, according to our old godly standards. But the God of gods—what do you think He thinks of it, eh? Do you suppose he'd stand aside and say, 'They're not my sort. Let the devil have 'em?'"

"But my attitude is purely personal."

No, it isn't. No, it isn't. Not a

MAY WE GIVE YOU THIS BOOK?

KINDRED OF THE DUST is Peter B. Kyne at his best—which is an assurance of a corking good story about people you will love, with a setting of life lived gloriously in the open.

IT IS the story of Hector McKaye, the old Laird of Tyee, and his fight to keep his son Donald from marrying the Outcast girl, Nan of the Sawdust Pile. Nan, too, has a will of her own in deciding what is best for Donald, for she has the courage to give up the man she loves. In the end, what Donald has to say about it makes the story.

This Great Novel Without Cost to You

If you will send us the subscription of a friend to Hearst's INTERNATIONAL for one year, we will send you a copy of this book. The subscription must be other than your own, as Hearst's INTERNATIONAL does not give premiums. Mail the coupon with the name and address of your friend (or friends—we will send a book for each subscription) on a separate paper, and enclose with a remittance to cover the cost at $3.00 a subscription. (Canadian postage 50 cents extra a year; Foreign, $1 extra.)

----- MAIL THE COUPON TODAY -----

Hearst's INTERNATIONAL

Dept. 722

119 WEST 40th STREET
NEW YORK CITY

Gentlemen: Enclosed find (insert amount of your remittance).....for which please send Hearst's INTERNATIONAL one year to the friends whose names appear on the attached list. Send copy of "Kindred of the Dust" to me.

NAME.....

STREET NO. ....

CITY .....

STATE.....

bit of it. Your attitude is the attitude of all the godly. . . . You love Bessie. You say you do—and I believe you—sincerely. And yet, when she began to grow away from you and your ideas, you let her go. You never made a fight for her. You let young Trull and his crowd have her without an effort."

"But, sir, I—I don't see. If you think Bessie's going with the wrong crowd—and she is! That fellow Trull's got a yellow streak, and I'd tell him so to his face—why do you—encourage her in it?"

Mr. Bowden smiled.

"Perhaps I am encouraging her. . . . But I'll tell you one thing, Johnnie. Bessie belongs to me now. She doesn't run away from me. She doesn't hide from me."

"I—see," said Johnnie slowly. "Mr. Bowden—you—you're right. I've acted like a bull-headed fool. I haven't put up a fight—and I want to! But I don't know how to begin."

"Begin by studying the life around you. That's what I did. Wake up and look at it. Try to understand Bessie—you'll find she'll meet you half way. And if I were you, I'd read books that deal with life."

"Books! Do you mean to say you can find all this in books?"

"Not this particular thing, perhaps," said Mr. Bowden. "But—life. Life as it is. Trouble with most books is they give you something made-up—just a story that begins and ends. But there are writers who see life as it is—as a force that goes on, that continues, that never stops moving."

They had reached Hargrave's place—Johnnie still lived at home by preference—and they stopped by the clipped California hedge to shake hands.

"I want to thank you, Mr. Bowden," said Johnnie. "I—I don't know how it'll come out, but I want Bessie." Mr. Bowden heard with emotion the note of longing in the young man's voice. "And I'm going to try—I'll put up a fight, anyway!"

Bessie, her hat on, her coat flung over the arm of the chair, sat in her father's den waiting for Austin Trull to come and take her motoring. She looked tired. There were dark rings under her eyes. Mr. Bowden, in his dinner jacket—he wore it every evening now—lay back in his Morris chair.

He took a box of cigarettes from the tobacco cabinet at his side and offered it to his daughter.

"Cigarette, Bessie?"

"I don't smoke, papa. I have—but I don't like the taste."

"Suppose I ought to swear off," said Mr. Bowden, contemplatively. "Smoke too much, I know—"

There was a silence.

"Who do you think was at the club last night?" asked Bessie, looking at the tips of her smart little shoes.

"Who?"

"Johnnie Hargrave!"

"No. Really? Johnnie getting gay?"

She laughed, a trifle nervously.

"Yes. He's joined the club."

"Glad of it," said Mr. Bowden. "I like Johnnie—"

"So do I," said Bessie. "But—I wish he didn't always look as if he was going to lead you in prayer."

It was Mr. Bowden's turn to laugh.

"He'll get over that. . . . When Johnnie sees a little more of the world he'll be quite a man. Not that I don't believe in prayer. I still go to Church pretty regularly myself, you know."

"Do you believe in religion, papa?"

"I'm afraid I do, Bessie. It almost stands to reason, doesn't it? There's certainly a law in the universe, a law that governs everything. . . . Religion is that law—a sort of principle—"

"Yes, but what is the principle?"

"Well, I should say it was the principle of—of progressing life. The really religious people are those who make the most of their own lives. The difficulty is to pick your way. . . . What is right for one person may be wrong for another."

"Austin is an atheist," Bessie said.

"Is he? That's interesting."

"He doesn't believe in God, or religion, or anything."

"Oh, he must believe in something, my dear! Men do—instinctively."

"Well, he believes in freedom—in living a free life."

Mr. Bowden had to exert himself to avoid combativeness.

"Freedom? Yes. But how—?"

"Why, just by living it—" began Bessie, but at that moment the front door-bell rang. Mr. Bowden could hear it vibrating through the house, a trivial, tinkling sound that nevertheless had in it something of a doomsday note.

Bessie rose at once. "That's Austin. Good-night, Papa."

She left him sitting in his armchair, puffing at his cigar, and went downstairs to Austin. The latter stood at the bottom step, his hand on the newel-post, waiting for her. He, too, was smiling—

"Dearest—!"

"Ssh!" warned Bessie. "Mother's in the hall—" She raised her voice. "Good-night, mother!"

"Good-night. Don't drive too far."

Austin helped her on with her coat, then took her arm and they walked out of the house into the cool Spring darkness. On the porch he put his arms around her and kissed her. Bessie clung to him. Her lips trembled against his.

"Oh, Austin—! I love you so."

THE LIGHT in her father's study was still burning when she got home. She stood in the darkened hall, looking at that streak of light falling from the open door. . . .

If it had been all in darkness—!

She wanted darkness, to think, to justify her joy to herself. But she would have to face the light some time. . . .

She was not ashamed. She did not doubt the man she loved. His was not a common love. It was the passion of a great soul, a soul that offered, as it demanded, freedom.

And yet—

If she could only talk to someone. Her father—!

He had understood a good many things during the past year. Perhaps he would understand this. Was she afraid to confront him with it?

She walked towards the light of his door.

He was bending over some papers on his desk as she entered. How gray his hair was! She had never noticed that before.

He swung about, brushing aside his papers.

"Hello! Back already?"

"Yes. We didn't go far."

"Sit down, honey. You look tired—"

"I'm not tired, papa."

"Worried about something?"

"Not worried exactly—" Was she going to let him drag it out of her?

"I'll tell you, papa. Austin and I—that is, he's going to New York to live. To paint. . . . And I'm going with him."

Mr. Bowden deliberately selected a cigar and lighted it.

"Well, my dear, I suppose it's inevitable that you should marry some day."

"I'm not going to marry him, papa."

THE man sitting in the armchair straightened up with a jerk. For a moment he stared at his daughter.

"You're not going to marry him?"

"No!"

"You love him, Bessie?"

"Yes."

"Yes, you must. And he—?"

"He loves me, papa. It's this way. Austin doesn't—he doesn't believe in marriage. You mustn't think he's just—he doesn't believe in it."

"I—see. In asking you to—live with him—he is acting from conviction?"

"From conviction—yes. Absolutely!"

"And are you—also convinced?"

"I—Yes, I am! Marriage is a bondage, papa. It—it's a heritage of slavery from the past—"

"I agree with you, my dear. It's love that counts. And perhaps you're right about marriage—"

"Papa, I knew you'd understand!"

"But you must remember, Bessie, that you're not dealing with a theory entirely. You're dealing with a personal problem—and everyone's problem is different from everyone else's. Let's admit that you're right about marriage, in principle. Now! How does that principle apply to you?"

"What do you mean?"

"I mean this. Suppose, in this particular case, the theory doesn't work out. Suppose you find—you and Trull—that you've made a mistake. I don't mean in principle. I mean in fact. Suppose you discover—afterwards—that you aren't congenial. It often happens with married couples—even in the case of love-marriages. It might happen with you."

"But—it couldn't, papa. I'm sure!"

"Bessie, people change. They grow. Sometimes they grow out of themselves into quite different people. When you were a child you were sure that you would never stop playing with your big rag doll. Do you remember?"

"Yes. But I'm not a child now."

"What you are now will seem a child to you ten years from now. Then, my dear, it may be that you'll find you've made a mistake. I don't say you will. I say you may. And then, I'm afraid, it will be too late."

"For what?"

"For getting back to growing."

"You say such—queer things, papa."

"My dear, I'm trying to express myself. Let me put it this way. I want your happiness more than anything else on earth, and by happiness I mean getting hold of the life principle—which is growth. You're through growing physically. But mentally you've only begun to grow. There's no limit to what the mind can reach to—and I'm afraid—What I'm afraid of is that your mind will some day turn on you and condemn you. Then what will you do?"

"Do?"

"Yes. We've got to look at everything, Bessie. As it is. You're not a person to—stand alone. Maybe that's my fault. Maybe I ought to have taught you more—how to take care of yourself. I mean economically—in a practical sense. Then if anything happened to your love-life, you'd have something to fall back on. As it is, if that went wrong, you'd be—lost."

"You don't trust Austin!"

"I do him the honor to believe he's sincere. At least, according to his own standards. What I'm not sure of is that his standards will stand trial——"

"But life is so short!"

"It's longer than you think."

"I couldn't give him up, papa."

"I don't want you to give him up."

"What do you want?" There was a note of surprise, almost of curiosity, in Bessie's voice. What a child she was!

Mr. Bowden leaned back in his chair, looking at the lighted end of his cigar.

"The truth is, Bessie, I think you ought to see more of the world before you decide—just what place you're going to occupy in it. I'd been planning for some time to send you abroad—to Europe."

"To Europe!" gasped Bessie.

"Yes. Now here's what I'd suggest. Keep your love for him. Hold on to it. Don't be ashamed of it! But take it with you to Europe and judge it from a distance. Measure it by other standards."

"Europe..." said Bessie. "Why, papa, I didn't know!"

"Think it over, my dear. Think it over. Only I want you to promise not to do anything without letting me know."

"I promise." She got up and went to him, sank down in front of him and cried, her head on his knees.

HE HAD to lie a little to Annie. He told her that the insurance business had been excellent during the past year. "My apparent prosperity has had an effect on the business," he said; which was true to a certain extent. "I've got the money to send you and Bessie abroad, and I want you to go." That also was true.

The lie was by implication. He had not realized the money from his business. He had raised it by borrowing from a friend in business. The five thousand dollars that he had saved for a nest-egg was gone—spent in a year. The loan followed, of necessity.

But Annie didn't know that. He had made up his mind that she wasn't to worry during her trip abroad. As for Bessie, it seemed only natural that her father, once having decided to make money, should continue to do so.

When Bessie told Austin that she was going to Europe, that young man lost control of himself. He accused her father of trying to separate them. It was rather an unfortunate tack to take. It chilled Bessie. "Why, Austin, I should think you'd be willing to wait for me—six months."

"It will be an eternity!" he exclaimed.

"But—dearest—wouldn't you rather have me after I've been—after I've seen things, and been to Europe—and all? I'll be so much more—well, broad, Austin!"

"I'm satisfied with you as you are!"

"But I should think you'd be glad!"

said Bessie, rather stubbornly; and added: "I'll see you in New York when I come home. Then I'll know—I mean, we'll both know—and everything will be—more wonderful than ever!"

Austin felt himself at a disadvantage. Apparently Bessie's mind was made up. It ended by his kissing her and swearing eternal faithfulness. But his passionate phrases had lost their old ring.

BESSIE and her mother were gone all summer. They went to France, to England, to Italy, and to Switzerland. Bessie's letters to her father revealed a gradually increasing enthusiasm for Europe, a gradually decreasing mention of her future with Austin Trull. She had spoken of him freely at first. One letter had said that she was surer than ever of her love for him.

It had cost Mr. Bowden a bad week, during which it had seemed almost an agony to drag himself about from the office to his empty home, and back to his stuffy office again.

But the week had passed, and there had come another letter from Bessie—eight pages of joyous description of Paris. "Thank God for Paris!" breathed Mr. Bowden, fervently, as he reached the end of it. He glanced at the postscript, smiled, and taking off his spectacles, wiped his eyes with his handkerchief. He was a sentimental person. . . .

The postscript had said that they both missed him terribly. He must surely come with them another time.

Another time——!

"It's working out," Mr. Bowden told himself. "It's working out . . . I'm glad I did it."

He saw a good deal of Johnnie Hargrave that summer. Johnnie was reading religiously such works as the modern wave had carried to Jamestown.

"I don't know whether I'm as comfortable in my mind as I used to be," he said to Mr. Bowden, "but I'm certainly a lot clearer about one thing."

"What's that, Johnnie?"

"My own ignorance."

Mr. Bowden laughed.

"As long as you feel that way I guess you're safe."

Johnnie looked thoughtfully at the older man.

"You know," he said, "there's something in that quotation about man enjoying himself too little." He paused and then added, quite seriously. "I think I'll get a car."

Bessie and her mother reached home in October. Mr. Bowden went to the station to meet them. The train pulled in. He stood at the gate, watching the passengers pouring through the exit. His heart beat painfully.

He would know the moment he saw Bessie's face. . . . Where were they? Why didn't they come——?

"Papa!"

He found himself in the arms of a young woman who was utterly a stranger to him. . . . A beautiful young woman in a Parisian suit and hat, who laughed as she kissed him.

"Papa, darling. How are you?"

"Bessie . . . My, my—I never would have known you. Nor Annie either——"

He embraced his wife, pulled out his handkerchief and blew his nose violently;

X-BAZIN

The French way to remove hair

THE smart American woman is now using X-BAZIN, because for more than a hundred years, discriminating Parisiennes have found it the cleanest, safest, and most effective way to remove superfluous hair. It is a dainty, rose-perfumed powder that leaves the skin smooth, cool, and white.

It is Absolutely Safe

Unlike the inconvenient razor, it effectively discourages the future growth of the hair, and it is so thoroughly pure that it can be used with perfect safety on the face as well as on arms and under the armpits.

At all drug and department stores, 50c. and $1.00 in the U. S. and Canada. Elsewhere 75c. and $1.50.

Send 10c. for trial sample and descriptive booklet.

Made by the makers of Sesadent.
GEO. BORGFELDT & CO. Sole Distributors in the United States and Canada.
Dept. D, 16th Street and Irving Place, New York

DIAMONDS

FOR A FEW CENTS A DAY

$1.50 a Week
SEND NO MONEY
Looks like
$350 Solitaire
No
only $59.50
We Trust You

MONEY BACK GUARANTEE

Don't send a single penny. Ten days Free Trial. When the ring comes, examine it—if you are not convinced it is the Greatest Bargain in America, send it back at our expense. Only if pleased, send $1.50 weekly—at the rate of a few cents a day. This Bargain Cluster Ring with 7 Blue-White Perfect Cut Diamonds can be yours. No Red Tape. No Risk.

Million Dollar FREE Send for it today. It pictures thousands of Bargains. Address Dept. 140B

J.M. LYON & CO.
2-4 Maiden Lane N.Y.

CLARK'S CRUISES by CAN. PAC. STEAMERS

Clark's 3rd Cruise, January 23, 1923

ROUND THE WORLD

Superb SS "EMPRESS OF FRANCE"
18481 Gross Tons, Specially Chartered
4 MONTHS CRUISE, $1000 and up
Including Hotels, Fees, Drives, Guides, etc.

Clark's 19th Cruise, February 3
TO THE MEDITERRANEAN

Sumptuous SS "EMPRESS OF SCOTLAND"
25000 Gross Tons, Specially Chartered
65 DAYS CRUISE, $600 and up
Including Hotels, Fees, Drives, Guides, etc.
19 days Egypt, Palestine, Spain, Italy, Greece, etc.
Europe stop-overs allowed on both cruises.
Europe and Passion Play Parties, $500 up

Frank C. Clark, Times Building, New York.

BIG MONEY AND FAST SALES. Every Owner Buys Gold Initials for his auto. You charge $1.50, make $1.35. Ten orders daily easy. Write for particulars and free samples.
AMERICAN MONOGRAM CO. Dept. 195, East Orange, N.J.

SEE HISTORIC QUEBEC

A journey down the mighty St. Lawrence to the ancient city of Quebec is like a trip to yesterday. Every hour of this inland water journey has its revelation of grandeur and historic interest. Niagara, the sublime; the Venetian-like Thousand Islands; the thrilling descent of the marvelous rapids; then Montreal, Quebec and Ste. Anne de Beaufré.

Beyond Quebec is beautiful Murray Bay, Tadoussac and the glorious Saguenay with its stupendous Capes, "Trinity" and "Eternity." Send 2c in stamps for illustrated booklet, map and guide, to John F. Pierce, Passenger Traffic Manager, Canada Steamship Lines, Ltd., 200 C. S. L. Building, Montreal, Canada.

CANADA STEAMSHIP LINES

LIKLY (LIKELY) Luggage

On the week-end trip or longer vacation, you will always feel proud of your LIKLY LUGGAGE. Noticeably distinctive in design and quality—and it wears the longest.

Sold by the best stores everywhere

HENRY LIKLY & CO.
Rochester, N. Y., U. S. A.

Be sure the luggage you buy bears this trademark. It identifies LIKLY distinctive quality.

WRITE Dept. E for illustrated price lists of BAGS, TRUNKS, CASES and PORTFOLIOS.

International Sales Co.

Publishers' Representative
Chicago, Illinois

The authorized agents of the International Sales Company, 417 South Dearborn St., Chicago, Illinois, with branches in the principal cities throughout the United States, are authorized to solicit, and accept, yearly subscriptions to Hearst's INTERNATIONAL, at the regular subscription price of $3.00 per year.

Hearst's INTERNATIONAL

119 West 40th Street
NEW YORK

then hustled off to attend to their baggage—

They rode home, all the way out to James Hill, in a motor cab. Bessie sat between her father and mother, talking volubly, and stopping frequently to laugh and hug her father's arm. At home when she and her father were alone, Bessie said: "Papa, I must tell you. I saw Austin."

She stopped, and a smile touched her lips. Mr. Bowden's impressionable heart missed a beat. "I hadn't written him I was coming, and I—went to his studio. Mama wanted to go with me but I wouldn't let her. It's a good thing she didn't."

"Well?" said Mr. Bowden, simply.

"Papa, he was having a party. Tea—and cocktails. The place was full of people. It was an awful jam. Austin was embarrassed. But I wasn't. I stayed till they were gone. There was one girl—Austin said she was a model—who looked daggers at me. She seemed very much—at home in his studio."

Mr. Bowden said nothing. After a moment Bessie went on:

"He showed me some of his work. I didn't know what to say. It seemed—well, kind of cheap—after what I'd seen in Europe. I left as soon as I could."

"You're sure it hasn't left a scar?" asked Mr. Bowden gently.

"Nothing that won't heal, papa. I may as well tell you the truth. I don't think Austin was worth it."

"No?" said Mr. Bowden.

"No. At least, I don't think—I'm sure I never would have been happy with him. But I would like to know how you knew—?"

"I didn't know, my dear. I only thought—it ought to be tested."

"Well, you're a pretty wonderful sort of person, I think."

"I'm nothing of the kind, my dear. But thank you for saying so."

There was a pause. Then Bessie went to him, in her old impulsive way, but instead of kissing him held out her hand. He shook it heartily.

Mrs. Bowden came into the room.

"Johnnie Hargrave's down-stairs, Bessie. He wants to say hello to you. I understand he's bought a car," said Annie, looking at her husband.

"Yes," said Mr. Bowden, "quite a sporty one, I believe—"

"For Pete's sake!" said Bessie, "what's happened to Johnnie?" And for some reason she laughed.

But at the same time, she began briskly to tuck in the stray locks of hair that showed beneath the smart hat-brim.

"Maybe you're too tired?" suggested Annie, with a touch of guile that caused Mr. Bowden to chuckle inwardly. (Annie was learning!)

"Oh, no! I'd like to see Johnnie. . . . Tell him I'll be down in a jiff— Or aren't you going downstairs, mother?"

"Yes; I'm going. I'll tell him," said Annie, with more haste than finesse. (Annie would never learn—entirely.)

"Good night, papa!" This time she bent down and kissed him; then gave her young laugh. "Oh, isn't it funny? Going joyriding with Johnnie Hargrave!"

When Annie came back upstairs she found her husband working over some papers on his desk.

Six months later Bessie announced her engagement to Johnnie Hargrave. Annie was the first to hear the news. That was her privilege; but it was to her father that Bessie unbosomed herself.

"It's wonderful, papa," she said, after Mr. Bowden, the incurable sentimentalist, had finished drying his eyes. "Johnnie isn't at all the person I thought he was. . . . He's the most broad-minded man I've ever met. I'm simply crazy about him. . . . And I feel—oh, I don't know—as though I'd be safe."

"I think you will be, Bessie."

The girl mused, standing before him in a pink silk kimono, her hair in a long braid down her back. How young she was, how clean and fresh and unspoiled.

"Papa, if I ever have a child—a girl—I'm going to teach her to—be able to stand alone. I'm going to make her learn something useful and practical."

"Well," said Mr. Bowden, "I think that would be a good idea, Bessie."

"When I think of what might have happened to me! Not that Austin was bad. . . . But he was weak. His ideas came from weakness—not from strength. If I hadn't had you to help me—"

"Did I help you, Bessie?"

"Don't be foolish, papa. But I—if I ever have a daughter she's going to learn how to take care of herself. She's going to learn from the beginning."

"To go on!" said Mr. Bowden, a light breaking on his face. "That's it, Bessie. People must go on."

The wedding was over. The house was empty of its guests. Mr. and Mrs. Bowden sat in the reborn parlor, in the perfume of wilting flowers, under the lights of the crystal chandelier that threw a glow upon the white crash-covered carpet and turned dark the red of the chairs arranged precisely about the walls.

"I'll have to mortgage the house, I'm afraid, Annie."

"You should have told me you were going into debt, Will."

"There was no need of your worrying about it. I'll never deceive you again."

"Oh, Will! It means working the rest of your life—without any change or rest. It doesn't seem right, somehow. Of course I'm glad—I'm happy about Bessie. But it doesn't seem right."

"Maybe it isn't," said Mr. Bowden, staring at the bower of roses under which Bessie had been married. "Maybe it isn't. But it's—a satisfaction."

"It'll be hard work paying off the mortgage, won't it, Will?"

Mr. Bowden did not hear her. He was thinking his own thoughts aloud.

"It has to go on. You can't slip back and have any pride in yourself. I've done a pretty good thing, Annie. . . . Yes, a pretty good thing. I've faced this new life that's got a hold of our country—and by God, I've got something out of it. Something clean and good. Healthy. Bessie's children will have a fair start."

"But—the mortgage—"

"Sometimes you have to mortgage the past to pay for the future. You and I, Annie, we may not be able to live very high, but we can live in peace."

Annie got up and kissed him.

"It's late, Will, and you didn't eat any supper. I watched you. You come out to the kitchen and I'll give you a nice bowl of mush and milk."

The Sinfulness of Skippy

[Continued from page 66]

then there's Snorky. I've got to save him, too."

"But, Jack . . ."

"I'm not asking for anything more than just your picture, nothing more—nothing that commits you to anything!"

"You will, won't you?"

"I . . . I will think it over," said Miss Tupper finally, remembering the terrific report which her sister had brought her via Snorky Green. "I will give you my dethition after thupper."

That evening, Skippy, excusing himself from Snorky who was taking Margarita to a lecture on the fauna and flora of Yucatan, set out for the parsonage with a thumping heart.

On his way he had built up a dozen eloquent conversations, but all memory of things tender and convincing were forgotten as he ventured over the slippery floor of the parlor and beheld at the side of Jennie a large, blown-up, thin-haired male visitor, who was introduced to him as the Rev. Percy Tuptale.

Intuition is a strange thing that fortunately returns to lovers, drunkards and children in their hour of need. From the first touch of her hand and the first look into her face, Skippy knew that a crisis had arrived. Mr. Tuptale was so placidly and professionally at ease, and Miss Tupper so nervously and unsilently conversational, that the conversation bubbled on like a kettle steaming in a distant room. He nodded once or twice, Mr. Tuptale fingered a magazine, while Jenny ran on.

"Something awful is going to happen," said Skippy, staring at the biblical engravings on the wall. "They're going to try to make me give back that pin."

Miss Tupper stood up. Skippy stood up. Mr. Tuptale stood up.

"Jack, I have taken a therious, a vewy therios thep," said Miss Tupper, flushing. "I do want to help you tho much but, but I have thought, that ith, I am afraid I know tho little how. You may think it dweadful of me . . ."

She paused and Skippy, frozen to the marrow, said icily:

"Yes, what is it?"

"I have gone to Mr. Tuptale . . . to Percy for his advice. I—I had to."

"Excuse me," said Skippy loftily. "Is Mr. Tuptale—are you—is he?"

"Well, yeth," said Jenny, blushing while a smile spread enormously over Mr. Tuptale's features.

"Oh!"

"You thee, that is why," said Jenny hastily, "and, oh Jack, I do want you to talk to him, juth ath you talked to me. Tell him evwything. He ith tho helpful and tho underhanding."

She swayed from one foot to another and glanced from the boy to the man.

"Jenny, dear," said Mr. Tuptale with clerical ease, "I think, ahem . . . suppose you let us talk this over together? It would be easier, wouldn't it?"

"Oh, yeth, indeed!"

The next moment they were alone.

"And now, my boy," said Mr. Tuptale blandly. "Let's have it out man to man." Skippy did not at once comply. He walked slowly around the red plush rocker and then back to the bamboo fire screer and rested his elbows lightly upon it and glowered at the all-unconscious curate murder in his heart.

"Jenny is very fond of you, Jack," said Mr. Tuptale, caging his fingers. "She has a warm and sympathetic nature, a big heart, and I can quite understand how deeply concerned she is in the brave fight you are making. I want you to accept me as a friend, a real friend. . . . I know men and I know what temptations are, early associations, acquired habits. Jack, my boy, there is nothing really wrong in you. I saw that the moment you came into the room."

"Who said there was . . . pray?" demanded Skippy, whose hands were trembling with rage.

Mr. Tuptale looked up quickly and said, "Jenny has told me all—naturally."

"She told you I gambled."

"She did."

"She told you I drank and smoked?"

"She did, of course, and I consider it was her duty to do so."

"Well, is there anything wrong in that?"

"Anything wrong in gambling, drunkenness, steeping oneself with tobacco until your hand shakes like a leaf?" said Mr. Tuptale, rising.

"Exactly. Do you know your ten commandments, sir?"

"Are you insulting me, sir?" said the curate, yielding to a natural irritation.

"Kindly point out to me in the ten commandments where any habit of mine is forbidden," said Skippy.

Mr. Tuptale's jaw dropped, twice he tried to answer and twice failed.

"You will kindly restore to Miss Tupper this pin," Skippy said, producing it after a struggle with his tie. "Also inform her that I shall immediately send back to her other articles I need not now specify. Thank you for your interest in my case, but it is quite unnecessary—quite. I can stand by the ten commandments. Good night."

He went down the crunching gravel and slammed the gate.

"And there is more, sir," he exclaimed aloud, forgetting that he was now alone.

"One thing more. You can tell Miss Tupper that even among the lowest of my associates, gamblers and drunkards and race track sharks though they be, a promise given is sacred, sacred, sir, and the man who breaks it is—is—is—"

But here rage quite overtook him and he picked up a stone and flung it at an inoffensive tree.

"It's all Snorky!" he said, in the swift progress of moods. "I knew he'd overdo it! Holy Mike, what in Sam Hill did he tell Margarita! He must have—he—" But again imagination failed him.

"And I believed I had met a good woman," he said bitterly. "Faugh, they're all alike. Well, I don't care what does become of me. Serve her right if I went plumb to the bad. And I'll do it, too!"

Whereupon, having resolved upon a life of crime, he plunged his hand into his pocket and cast from him the now unnecessary cigarettes!

It is the habit of well kept thousands. Follow the use of your tooth brush with a few drops of Absorbine, Jr. in an eighth glass of water.

This, as mouth wash, spray and gargle, removes disagreeable tastes and breaths; destroys crevice hidden germs that cause decay, and alleviates conditions of sore throat. It leaves the mouth refreshingly clean.

Absorbine, Jr. is also, for overtaxed muscles, the powerful yet safe liniment with the clean pleasant odor. Again, it is an antiseptic, cleansing and healing to skin breaks. All in one container for your greater convenience.

At most druggist's, $1.25, or postpaid. Liberal trial bottle, 10c. postpaid.

W. F. YOUNG, Inc.
470 Temple St., Springfield, Mass.

Absorbine, Jr.
THE ANTISEPTIC LINIMENT
TRADE MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

DON'T ENVY
BEAUTIFUL ANKLES
HAVE THEM!

You need no longer envy beauty of ankle line
BONNE FORME make:
BEAUTIFUL ANKLES

Worn at night BONNE FORME gives definite rest and comfort to tired, aching feet and ankles. BONNE FORME SHAPES YOUR ANKLES TO THE CORRECT LINES.

Write for our free illustrated booklet and learn what famous stars like Marion Davies and Doris Kenyon, who have used BONNE FORME say. Better yet, just slip $5.00 in an envelope, and we will send BONNE FORME postpaid by return mail. Order by mail.

L. R. TAYLOR CORPORATION

Dept. B-2

18 West 34th Street

New York City

Reduce Your Flesh in Spots

Arms, Legs, Bust, Double Chin

In fact the entire body or any part without dieting by wearing DR. WALTER'S

Famous Medicated Reducing
RUBBER GARMENTS

For Men and Women
Anklets for reducing and Shaping the Ankles, $7.00 per pair. Extra high $9.00
Send ankle measurement when ordering.
Bust Reducer, $2.00
Chin Reducer, $0.50

Send for Illustrated Booklet
Dr. Jeanne O. Walter
353 Fifth Avenue - New York

FILMS DEVELOPED

Mail us 20c with any size film for development and 6 velvet prints. Or send 6 negatives any size and 20c for 6 prints. Prompt service. Roanoke Photo Finishing Co., Bell Ave., Roanoke, Va.

Are You Sending Blindfolded Dollars Abroad?

Be Guided by the INTERNATIONAL Bulletin. Sent FREE to Hearst's INTERNATIONAL Subscribers

WHAT countries offer you the richest investment and trade opportunities? What are the conditions, the fluctuations, the pitfalls? How do foreign production and marketing affect you in this country? Do you wish to be regularly and intelligently informed on these and on any other important overseas subjects that may interest you at any time?

The International Institute of Economics, headed by an economist of world-wide reputation, has been gathering information concerning overseas countries since May, 1921.

Its Bulletin, including the World Map of Business conditions, will give you month-to-month information covering 72 nations on Agriculture, Mining, Industry, Trade, Transportation, Finance, Politics. Answers to specific inquiries are given by mail on request.

Your Subscription to Hearst's INTERNATIONAL Entitles You to this Valuable Service Free

IF you want to know foreign conditions as they actually exist—the carefully checked results of uninfluenced and penetrating analysis—a birdseye view of all overseas countries or specific information on any business subject in any individual country—then you need this service.

Particularly if you have any investments abroad or if you are thinking of making any foreign investments of any kind.

Send $3.00 to Hearst's INTERNATIONAL, 119 West 40th St., New York, for a year's subscription to the magazine, mentioning that you wish, without charge, to join the International Institute of Economics. A Membership Card will be sent on receipt of your enrollment and the two publications will be mailed regularly so long as you are a member.

THE INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF ECONOMICS

119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y.

Hearst's International

A LIBERAL EDUCATION

"The final aim of Truth in Advertising is to make the printed advertisement as dependable and as widely accepted as is the printed dollar bill."

- 1.—GUARANTEES, without reservation, every printed statement of its merchandise advertisers.
- 2.—GUARANTEES their statements in transactions involving promise, purchase, service or delivery to the customer.
- 3.—GUARANTEES their advertised products purchased direct, or through retailers.
- 4.—GUARANTEES to refund your money, plus ten per cent as a fee to you for furnishing the facts in any case where, in your opinion, the advertiser or the product has not made good.

35 cent

Hearst's International

CL HENRY FORD'S JEW MANIA

CL A New Novel by the man who wrote "The Jungle"

CL The funniest story the author of "Potash and Perlmutter" ever wrote

CL "THE FUTILITY OF SUICIDE"

By Sir Oliver Lodge

THE MIRACULOUS STORY OF MINERALAVA

As told by Monsieur V. Vivaudou, President of Vivaudou, Inc. and Producer of Mavis, Mai d'Or Talc Powders and Perfumes

By V. Vivaudou

IRENE FRANKLIN

famous star of

The Greenwich Village Follies, says:

"The firm and youthful contour is as important on the stage as a good complexion. Both are secured by the continued use of Mineralava, which I find dainty and delightful for home use."

Irene Franklin -

"THE Mineralava Treatment is not in any sense a cosmetic, for the color it immediately imparts is natural. It does not cover imperfections—it removes them. The smoothness, firmness, youthful radiance of a skin once treated with Mineralava is noticeable to anyone. Mineralava Beauty Clay, when used regularly with Mineralava Face Finish, will actually build underlying muscles and tissues into a healthful and youthful firmness, which altogether dispels wrinkles and flabbiness.

"I PERSONALLY guarantee to refund full purchase price to anyone who will continue the full eighteen treatments that one Mineralava set contains and does not find Mineralava everything represented. I know that anyone will actually see a natural beauty grow during these treatments. I have seen such wonderful effects again and again.

"I CAN honestly say I believe that any reader of this page who tries Mineralava Beauty Clay and Face Finish will find the same satisfaction as already experienced by hundreds of thousands of women. Not only women in the home have found Mineralava a truly miraculous treatment but notable leaders of society and stars of the stage and screen. Among the scores of stage favorites who endorse Mineralava are such famous actresses as Julia Sanderson, Irene Bordoni, Marjorie Rambeau and Miss Irene Franklin, whose testimonial is here reproduced."

Mineralava is in its 23rd successful year and is sold through reliable drug and department stores.

Mineralava
Beauty Clay & Face Finish

PARIS VIVAUDOU NEW YORK
Distributor

This coupon is worth $1.00 to you when presented to your dealer.

TO THE DEALER:

You are authorized to cash this coupon when duly signed by bearer for $1.00 to be applied on the purchase of a set of Mineralava Beauty Clay and Mineralava Face Finish.

Upon the return of this coupon authentically signed to Scott's Preparations, Inc., 10 East 38th Street, New York City, an allowance of $1.00 will be made on each set of Mineralava Beauty Clay and Mineralava Face Finish ordered to replace that sold under the conditions of this introductory offer.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

Coming NEXT Month:

WHEN parents name a boy William Slavens McNutt he can do nothing less than live up to his name and be a natural born story teller. "Another Cobb come to judgment," is the way the Editor put it when he found "The Boy Who Read Dime Novels." Which is praise enough for any writer. Watch for Bill McNutt's first story in September Hearst's International

BILL MCNUTT

In This Number:

NORMAN HAPGOOD'S Editorials 6

Three Distinguished Serials

They Call Me Carpenter 23
By Upton Sinclair
Illustrated by Lucius Wolcott Hitchcock

The Better Wife 57
By Gouverneur Morris
Illustrated by Henry Raleigh

Carnac's Folly 72
By Sir Gilbert Parker
Illustrated by Walt Louderback

Eight Short Stories

The Nightmare Room 8
By A. Conan Doyle
Illustrated by W. T. Benda

No Cards 12
By Montague Glass
Illustrated by M. Leone Bracken

The Big Clumsy Swede 31
By Bernice Brown
Illustrated by Douglas Duer

Men Are Such Screams 37
By Royal Brown
Illustrated by David Robinson

Paul and Ruth and Solomon 49
By Donn Byrne
Illustrated by Baron de Meyer

Brothers Under the Sod 62
By Clifford Raymond
Illustrated by John Sloan

The Scalp Hunter 79
By Owen Johnson
Illustrated by James Montgomery Flagg

A Mother at Bay 87
By Richard Washburn Child
Illustrated by G. Patrick Nelson

A World Survey in Articles

The Futility of Suicide 5
By Sir Oliver Lodge

Will Portugal Blow Up Next? 19
By F. Britten Austin

Henry Ford's Jew-Mania Part III 44
By Norman Hapgood

From Broadway Back to Buttercups 53
By Frank Ward O'Malley

Seven States and a Big River 68
By William Hard

They're Out to Get La Follette 84
By Richard Barry

Who's Afraid! 100
By Walt Mason

Speaking of Our Coal Bill 106
By Arthur Gleason

Play, Book, Art and Science

Captain Applejack 93
By Walter Hackett

Merton of the Movies 97
By Harry Leon Wilson

The Picture that Made Paris Gasp 96
By Willard Huntington Wright

Why Light is Curved 102
By James Hopper and E. E. Free

In Babylon 52
A poem by Harry Kemp

If He Should Come 22
A poem by Edwin Markham

Cover design for this issue painted by W. T. Benda

Arthur Pryor and His Band play for you and they play music of your own choosing. This great band plays as many encores as you wish—such playing as is possible only when Victor records and Victrola instruments are used together. You can hear not only Pryor's Band, but Sousa's Band, Conway's Band, Vessella's Band, U. S. Marine Band, Garde Republicaine Band of France, Band of H. M. Coldstream Guards, Banda De Alabarderos—the greatest bands of every nation and the best music of all the kinds the whole world has to offer.

Victrolas $25 to $1500. New Victor Records demonstrated at all dealers in Victor products on the 1st of each month.

Victrola

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

Important: Look for these trade-marks. Under the lid. On the label.
Victor Talking Machine Company, Camden, New Jersey

The FUTILITY of SUICIDE

By Sir Oliver Lodge

THROUGH no action of our own we have been accommodated with a material body composed of a varying assemblage of atoms of matter, wherein to develop and grow an individuality, or persistent personal character. The opportunity so afforded us lasts as long as the material instrument continues in good order. It may be shattered by an accident or by a crime, or it may be injured by poisons secreted by those parasitic organisms which are commonly known as disease-germs, or it may simply wear out and cease to work.

Under such circumstances the personality so far developed is set free, and continues as best it can without either help or hindrance from the material vehicle which has served its turn and which was automatically constructed for its availability and training.

This episode of incarnation, this opportunity for terrestrial existence in association with matter, is evidently to be appreciated as one of high importance in the total scheme—of which we know so little—and it is universally regarded as reprehensible in the extreme to do anything that shall curtail the laborious opportunity so provided. Whether a second chance is ever accorded to an undeveloped personality, is a subject open for discussion; but anything like a conclusion is at present very uncertain. Many, perhaps most, think that the opportunity is unique and can not be repeated. On the other hand there are some who think that incarnation is often repeated, and that a gradual rise of the individual in the scale of existence is thus accomplished.

Let us leave the question open. Until we know more, safety lies in the middle path. It seems to me likely that a second opportunity may be permitted under exceptional circumstances, but that reincarnation cannot be counted upon nor arranged for. All I know is that existence undoubtedly continues; and I suspect that the special opportunities afforded by association with matter are not likely to recur.

If that be so the heinousness of murder is amply accounted for; and self-murder is only one degree less criminal than the murder of another. In either case the period allowed for terrestrial life is violently cut short; and irreparable injury may be done to a growing and developing personality.

WHY should anyone attempt such a thing? The usual excuse is a fit of madness. But such madness may be the result of untrammelled long-cultivated passion, and therefore may be essentially blameworthy.

Self-injury is unnatural, though in certain moods it is possible. Surely no one really wishes to injure himself, not his essential self. He may mutilate his body, he may try to destroy it, but it must be because he thinks he sees the way to some higher good or to some lesser evil. Or he may mistakenly think that he can secure eternal unconsciousness and extermination, and thus end both his joys and sorrows. But the unconsciousness sought will only be temporary. A person in violent unbearable pain, or smitten with an incurable disease, or—as we have seen in the war—so shattered as to be a useless and helpless hulk, may seek release from suffering not only [Continued on page 110]

HAPGOOD Talks of Wages,

A New Party? LINCOLN in his most casual talks usually said something. That solid book, "City Homes on Country Lanes," quotes from a speech of 1859, scarcely reported at the time: "The most valuable of all arts will be the art of deriving a comfortable existence from the smallest area of soil."

Is not that a mouthful? Lincoln calls this life an "art." The ideal is "comfortable," not luxurious. The area is the smallest.

No third party will amount to much hereafter that does not brood imaginatively on agriculture. The common people recently are showing a few signs of life. Meetings at Chicago, Cleveland, and elsewhere have shown American Socialists beginning to realize they cannot do much with exclusive Marxism. They begin to hold out their hands to labor in general. Brains enough to form a program which forecasts progress for labor and progress for the farm is the only chance for a new party's success.

Why Not Break Up? OUR excellent Secretary of Agriculture, speaking of the need of lower freight rates, mentions undoubtedly evil results, but also mentions this: "Gradually to shift industrial enterprises westward, nearer the surplus food producing territory."

Well, what about it? Distribution today adds hopelessly to costs. Among dreams, the most promise is in more independence for localities. Transportation is breaking down. It costs too much. Why not transport less?

There lies before the writer a letter from the Anglo-American Mill Company, of Owensboro, Kentucky, which makes little flour mills that can be operated by one man. That letter says:

"Undoubtedly the high freight rates are stimulating interest in small mills. There is no doubt that if the high freight rates do continue, it will result in making communities more self contained."

Turn back to the preceding editorial and ponder its opening sentences. If Lincoln were alive today he would be educating his hearers to the dangers of size.

Coal SOCRATES, in words invented for him by Plato, says: "Perhaps possession of all science, if unaccompanied by knowledge of what is best, will more often than not injure the possessor." Elsewhere, Plato says something to the effect that too much power in any of us is bad for the soul.

The coal problem does not begin or end with the coal strike. Read Mr. Gleason in this issue. Also keep two ideas clear:

1—Autocratic control of a necessity by a few managers is a contradiction of democracy. Suppose a few air-barons controlled the ozone.

2—The propaganda that wages are unnecessarily high is bunk. Wages have decreased. The next editorial will tell you how.

Even a conservative, once studying the subject, becomes a radical. Senator Freylinghuysen, of New Jersey, says: "We cannot find out what the costs are because the National Coal Association has put out the eyes of the Government by the injunction in the Maynard Coal Case (an injunction that prevents the Federal Trade Commission from investigating costs of coal production). . . . The Coal lobby has tied the Government's hands and poked out its eyes."

It makes small difference whether a person is conservative or liberal. So powerful are facts that all we need is to have them before the public. But the facts are precisely what the coal lobby is determined to have kept out of sight.

Wages THE MOST important step to be taken in coal is to force regularity of employment and production. There are ways of doing this, if the operators, the workers, the government, and the public care to do it.

In order to clear the way for such fundamental decisions, it is well for the public to realize that real wages have not gone up either in coal or in the labor world generally. Real wages mean the amount of such necessities as clothes, food, and fuel that a person gets in return for his work.

When the miners struck in 1919, real wages of the pick-miners were the lowest since 1900: thirty-seven per cent less than they had been twenty years earlier. The mine laborers had dropped forty-five per cent.

When the strike of this year began, on April 1, the operators had demanded reductions of from thirty to forty per cent; this at a time when, far from profiting by the advance in mechanics, the men were working about two days a week and thousands were starving. The increase in physical output of the country from 1900 to 1920 was at least thirty per cent per capita. Why did not labor receive any of that increase, to say nothing of receiving all of it?

Flappers and Baseball

Time BRAZIL is about to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of her independence. It is interesting to think that we, the first of the large modern republics, are in independent government only forty-six years older than our sister in South America. Perhaps before long new democratic forms in industry will spread as rapidly as shifting of political power has taken place in the last century and a half.

When we measure changes in social institutions, we must remember how short is written history. We think of Jesus of Nazareth as living long ago. If you take a man of the age of Charles William Eliot, Chauncey Depew, or Uncle Joe Cannon, how many such lives would lead back to Jesus? Put twenty-two such lives, preceding the birth of these three Americans, and the first in the chain would have been in old age at the Crucifixion.

Rumblings OUR HARD-BOILED friends in Washington are worried. The recession of the high wave of 1920 was inevitable but it is annoying to those who sat on it and rode to power. When Beveridge, in the Indiana primaries, beat a choice specimen of the good Indian, tacitly backed by the administration, and openly backed by the regular state machine, worrying focussed. When Gifford Pinchot proceeded to clean up the regulars in Pennsylvania, the old-timers put their heads together still closer. We publish an article this month on the campaign in Wisconsin, where La Follette will walk to victory regardless of the old-fashioned. Even Lodge is alarmed.

The people don't know much about the issues. When Beveridge swept Indiana, it was on no special issue. It was a general preference for a man who had been pigeon-holed as independent against a man who openly proclaimed himself a regular. When Pinchot won his victory, only a few weeks earlier deemed impossible, not many voters studied the issues. They classified Pinchot with the free crowd, and that was enough.

The public usually votes against something. A hundred years from now, it may vote for something.

Flappers THE TERM has changed its meaning. When it started in England, taken from shooting, it meant a young girl just beginning to count as a woman. Now, in this country, it has spread over all the attributes and standpoints, ideas and standards, on the female side, of the young generation. It has gained a meaning of dispraise. In this evolution it has become absurd. A young woman is a woman. A woman is a conserving force. Whatever the flapper may be today on the surface, she is in essence womankind, and womankind protects, as ever, the safety and achievements of the race. Men make most of the progress and also most of the destruction. Woman holds to what is good, and uses all her strength against what is bad. The girls of today will perform that eternal function, even as their granddaughters in centuries to come.

Money in Baseball OLD CAP. ANSON, shortly before he died, declared that the earlier contests had a more personal interest. Money did not decide. Today, Cleveland or Washington might happen to win a pennant, but the cards are stacked in favor of cities that can spend more money. Huggins or McGraw can purchase everybody in sight. Boston may develop Ruth, but New York buys him. McGraw's "million-dollar infield" was not developed, like the earlier infields of Anson, Cominsky, Chance, and Mack. Two of its members, when already stars, were bought away from contenders. Detroit deserves Ty Cobb, as Providence deserved Radbourne, as Baltimore deserved its champion team. Even as late as Baker, Barry, Collins, and McInness, teams were built instead of made out of the highest prices. There ought to be a limit to the amount of money any team can spend.

Kelly IF YOU ask us, which you didn't, who has been the most interesting player in the history of the game, we mention one Mike Kelly. He owed nothing to an accidental circumstance, as Ruth owes half his value to the fact that there are seats and fences to prevent fielders from going back for his long drives. Kelly caught, played right field, frequently pitched, and occasionally took any position. On bases his running made the opposing nine nervous, as did later the running of Ty Cobb. Kelly's high spirit was the life of his own club. His mind was as quick as that of Johnny Evers. His smiling batting of fouls until he got his base on balls led to the foul strike rule. His almost unflinching cutting of third base led to two umpires. His stealing of home was one of the earliest and most frequent. If anybody in baseball has had as many powerful and brilliant qualities as this many-sided Irish-American his name lingers not in our memory.

Q "See, Jack," he said, his manner wild and delirious, "you were always a sportsman. If one or the other of us were to drink the contents of this vial it would clear the situation."

The Nightmare Room

By A. Conan Doyle

Illustrated by W. T. Benda

THE SITTING-ROOM of the Masons was a very singular apartment. At one end, it was furnished with considerable luxury. The deep sofas, the low, luxurious chairs, the voluptuous statuettes, and the rich curtains hanging from deep and ornamental screens of metal-work, made a fitting frame for the lovely woman who was the mistress and dominating spirit of the establishment.

Mason, a young but wealthy man of affairs, had clearly spared no pains and no expense to meet every want and every whim of his beautiful wife. It was natural that he should do so, for she had given up much for his sake. The most famous dancer in France, the heroine of a dozen extraordinary romances, she had resigned her life of glittering pleasure in order to share the fate of the young American, whose austere ways differed so widely from her own. In all that wealth could buy, he tried to make amends for what she had lost.

Some might perhaps have thought it in better taste had he not proclaimed this fact—had he not even allowed it to be printed—but save for some personal peculiarities of the sort, his conduct was that of a husband who has never for an instant ceased to be a lover. Even the presence of spectators would not prevent the public exhibition of his overpowering affection.

But the room was singular. At first it seemed familiar and yet a longer acquaintance made one realize its sinister peculiarities. It was silent—very silent. No footfall could be heard upon those rich carpets and heavy rugs. A struggle—even the fall of a body would make no sound. It was strangely colorless also, in a light that seemed always subdued. Nor was it all furnished in equal taste. One would have said that when the young banker had lavished thousands upon this boudoir, this inner jewel-case for his precious possession, he had failed to count the cost and had suddenly been arrested by a threat to his own solvency.

It was luxurious where it looked out upon the busy street below. At the farther side it was bare, spartan, and reflected rather the taste of a most ascetic man than of a pleasure-loving woman. Perhaps that was why she only came there for a few hours, sometimes two, sometimes four in the day, but while she was there she lived intensely. Within this nightmare room, Lucille Mason was a very different and a far more dangerous woman than she was in any other room.

DANGEROUS—that was the word. Who could doubt it who saw her delicate figure stretched upon the great bearskin which draped the sofa? She was leaning upon her right elbow, her delicate but determined chin resting upon her hand, while her eyes, large and languishing, adorable but inexorable, stared out in front of her with a fixed intensity that had in it something vaguely terrible. It was a lovely face—a child's face—and yet Nature had placed there some subtle mark, some indefinable expression, that told that a devil lurked within. It had been noticed that dogs shrank from her, and that children screamed and ran from her caresses. There are instincts that are deeper than reason.

Upon this particular afternoon something had greatly moved her. A letter was in her hand which she read and re-read with a tightening of those delicate little eyebrows and a grim setting of those delicious lips. Suddenly she started and a shadow of fear softened the feline menace of her features. She raised herself upon her arm and her eyes were fixed eagerly upon the door. She was listening intently—listening for something that she dreaded, most certainly dreaded to hear.

For a moment, a smile of relief played over her expressive face. Then with a look of horror she stuffed her letter into her dress. She had hardly done so before the door opened and a young man came brightly into the room. It was Archie Mason, her husband—the man whom she had loved, the man for whom she had sacrificed her European fame, the man whom now she regarded as the one obstacle to a new and wonderful experience.

THE American was a man about thirty, clean-shaven, athletic, dressed to perfection in a closely cut suit that outlined his perfect figure. He stood at the door with his arms folded, looking intently at his wife, with a face that might have been a handsome, sun-tinted mask save for those vivid eyes. She still leaned upon her elbow, but her eyes were fixed on his. There was something terrible in the silent exchange.

Each interrogated the other and each conveyed the thought that the answer was vital. He might have been asking, "What have you done?" She in her turn seemed to be saying, "What do you know?" Finally, he walked forward, sat down upon the bearskin beside her, and taking her delicate ear gently between his fingers, turned her face towards his.

"Lucille," he said, "are you poisoning me?"

She sprang back from his touch with horror in her face and protests upon her lips. Too moved to speak, her surprise and her anger showed themselves rather in her darting hands and her convulsed features. She tried to rise, but his grasp tightened upon her wrist. Again he asked his question, but this time it had deepened in its terrible significance:

"Lucille, why are you poisoning me?"

"You are mad, Archie! Mad!" she gasped.

His answer froze her blood. With pale parted lips and blanched cheeks, she could only stare at him in helpless silence, while he drew a small bottle from his pocket and held it before her eyes as grim evidence of her guilt.

"It is from your jewel-case!" he said.

Twice she tried to speak and failed. At last, the words came slowly one by one from her contorted lips.

"At least I never used it."

Again his hand sought his pocket. From it he drew a sheet of paper which he unfolded and held before her.

"It is the certificate of Dr. Angus. It shows the presence of twelve grains of antimony. I have also the evidence of Du Val, the chemist who sold it."

Her face was terrible to look at. There was nothing to say. She could only lie with that fixed hopeless stare like some fierce creature in a fatal trap.

"Well?" he asked.

There was no answer save a movement of desperation and appeal from the beautiful woman.

"Why?" he said. "I want to know why?" As he spoke his eye caught the edge of the letter which she had thrust into her bosom. In an instant, he had snatched it. With a cry of despair, she tried to regain it, but he held her off with one hand while his eyes raged over it.

"Campbell!" he gasped. "It was Campbell!"

She had found her courage again. There was nothing more to conceal. Her face set hard and firm. Her eyes were deadly as daggers as she faced him.

"Yes," she said, "it is Campbell."

"My God! Campbell of all men!"

He rose and walked swiftly about the room. Campbell, the grandest man that he had ever known, a man whose whole life had been one long record of self-denial, of courage, of every quality that marks the chosen man. Yet he, too, had fallen a victim to this siren and had been dragged down to such a level that he had betrayed, in intention if not in actual deed, the man whose hand he shook in friendship.

It was incredible—and yet here was the passionate, pleading letter imploring his wife to fly and share the fate of a penniless man. Every word of the letter showed that Campbell had at least no thought of Mason's death, which would have removed all difficulties. That devilish solution was the outcome of the deep and wicked brain that brooded within that perfect habitation, in the mind of the woman he loved.

MASON was a man in a million, a philosopher, a thinker, with a broad and tender sympathy for others. For an instant his soul had been submerged in his bitterness. He could for that brief period have slain both his wife and Campbell, and gone to his own death with the serene mind of a man who has done his plain duty. But already, as he paced the room, milder thoughts had begun to prevail.

How could he blame Campbell? He knew the absolute witchery of this woman. It was not only her wonderful physical beauty. She had a unique power of seeming to take an interest in a man, in writhing into his inmost conscience, in penetrating those parts of his nature that were too sacred for the world, and in seeming to stimulate him towards ambition and even towards virtue and splendid kindness.

It was just there that the deadly cleverness of her net was shown. He remembered how it had been in his own case. She was free then—or so he thought—and he had been able to marry her. But suppose she had not been free. Suppose she had been married. Suppose she had taken possession of his soul in the same way. Would he have stopped there? Would he have been able to draw off with his unfulfilled longings? He was bound to admit that, with all his New England strength, he could not have done so. Why, then, should he feel so bitter with his unfortunate friend who was in the same position? It was pity and sympathy that filled his mind as he thought of Campbell caught by this wonderful siren.

AND SHE? There she lay upon the sofa, a poor broken butterfly, her dreams dispersed, her plot detected, her future dark and perilous. Even for her, poisoner as she was, his heart relented. He knew something of her history. He knew her as a spoiled child from birth, untamed, unchecked, sweeping everything easily before her with her cleverness, her beauty and her charm. She had never known an obstacle. Now one had risen across her path and she had madly and wickedly tried to remove it in the only way she could think of.

But if she had wished to remove it, was not that in itself a sign that he had been found wanting—that he was not the man who could bring her peace of mind and contentment of heart? He was too stern and self-contained for that sunny, volatile nature. He was of the North and she of the South, drawn strongly together for a time by the law of opposites, but impossible for a permanent union. He [Continued on page 131]

Q. "Lucille, why are you poisoning me?" With horror in her face, her blood froze as he drew from his pocket a small vial and the evidence furnished by the doctor and chemist.

IF you were asked to name
the two funniest characters in magazine fiction the chances are you would say
Abe Potash
and Mawruss Perlmutter
Now
Montague Glass has created
Uncle Ellis November—the funniest of them all

Zig-Zag Burlesquers

No Cards

By Montague Glass

Illustrated by M. Leone Bracker

“YOU don’t tell me!” Ellis November exclaimed and made little moaning noises through his nose, indicating not only shock and surprise, but grief as well.

“And what’s more, Uncle Ellis, the mother is one of those bleached blondes, too—you know the type,” said his niece, Miss Selina Rossmeyer.

Uncle Ellis nodded sympathetically.

“And what did you say the name was?” he asked.

“Well, as a matter of fact, the name ain’t so bad,” Miss Rossmeyer was obliged to admit. “It’s Wittkowsky.”

“I was afraid you was going to say Kelly or something,” Uncle Ellis said with a sigh of relief, for the matter under discussion was the recent engagement, or at any rate Miss Rossmeyer said it was an engagement, of her cousin Cyril November. Cyril and Selina were the only surviving niece and nephew, and sole heirs-at-law of Ellis November, provided of course that he died intestate. There was, to be sure also the possibility that he might leave a will disinheriting Cyril, in which event Miss Rossmeyer would be the sole legatee and devisee. Hence, in view of this circumstance, she spared no detail of her cousin’s latest escapade.

“Not even in a follies is she,” Miss Rossmeyer continued. “It’s a burlesque show by the name ‘Zig-Zag.’” “T’phooce!” Uncle Ellis exclaimed.

“Mr. Fischelmann offered to take me to the theayter where the show was—somewheres down on Fourteenth Street, but I wouldn’t lower myself,” Miss Rossmeyer said.

“You done right,” November declared. “And furthermore Fischelmann had his nerve with you, that he should suggest such a thing even.”

Miss Rossmeyer blushed faintly.

“He meant it for the best,” she said. “He says, as your lawyer, and since you was away in Lakewood and everything, he thought it was his duty that one of your relations should see it with her own eyes, in especially as the company would be playing in Union Hill the next week, and it ain’t so easy to get to.”

“Easy to get to or not,” Uncle Ellis announced, “I am going out to Union Hill and see that girl and tell her she should let the boy alone.”

He wiped his bald forehead vigorously with his handkerchief and snorted indignantly.

“I should sit still and see half my property go to a burlesquer yet,” he said, “and only last month I put new stair carpets in the Ammerman house and got an estimate on making over them two cold water walk-ups on 108th Street into new-law houses.”

“Well, that’s the way it goes,” Miss Rossmeyer said.

“Not by me, it don’t,” Uncle Ellis declared firmly, “because if that boy don’t come to his senses, Selina, as sure as there would be sewer and paving assessments on them Throggs Neck lots, which I bought at the Van Voorhis sale, I would make a new will and cut that boy off without a nickel.”

“And believe me, Uncle Ellis, as much as I feel towards Cyril on account of his own father being my Uncle, and everything, I would rather you would give it to an orphan asylum or a Home for Chronic Females or something,” Miss Rossmeyer said, “because I don’t want a button from his share.”

UNCLE ELLIS rose from his seat and flapped his right hand at Miss Rossmeyer.

“Say!” he said. “I ain’t going to burn my bridges till I meet them, which it would be time enough I should talk about changing my will after I seen that girl and hear what she’s got to say.”

“Well, Mr. Fischelmann seen her and he seen also the mother,” Miss Rossmeyer declared as she walked towards the door with Uncle Ellis. “She wanted him he should bring a lawsuit against Benny Lickman, from Lickman & Shift in the cutaway, dress suit and tuxedo business.”

“I know ’em well,” Uncle Ellis said, “and I suppose she claimed Lickman wanted to marry her I suppose.”

“Well, as a matter of fact, the lawsuit was about a four carat ring she claimed he took back to get made smaller, and she never seen him afterwards," Miss Rossmeyer explained.

"I'm glad he had that much sense," Uncle Ellis said in conclusion, "and all I could say is if Cyril ever gives that girl so much as a German silver safety pin, he need never look to me for a postage stamp even. I'll be through with him for good and all. He better remember that."

He emphasized this statement by clapping his derby hat on his head with such violence that it gave forth a clear tambourine-like sound.

"And in the meantime, Selina," Uncle Ellis added, "if you should happen to see that loafer, y'understand, tell him what I said. I got to collect some rent once in a while, or I would go right over to where he works and tell him so myself."

Both as a real estate operator and as an uncle, Ellis November's heart was in the right place. That is to say, it was situated in the normal position, beat regularly and in fact functioned so placidly that when Cyril November's parents died during his fourteenth year, Ellis had immediately put him to work as a packer in the basement of a prominent dry goods store, and had retained all but ninety cents of his weekly wages to defray the expenses of his board and lodging.

As for Selina, she had kept house for Uncle Ellis ever since her sixteenth year, some ten years in all, and during that time had so managed the finances of her uncle's household that by comparison with the table she had set, the inmates of a New Hampshire county poor farm can be said to enjoy a rich unbalanced diet of meat, game and poultry. For instance, her coffee could be distinguished from her tea only by a faint suggestion of the smell of an old briar pipe which was present in the one and absent in the other, and she had by long practice acquired a formula for chicken soup so nicely adjusted to the human palate that it was impossible to say whether the resulting hot water did or did not possess a faint flavor of feathers.

HOWEVER, Uncle Ellis had been a widower so long, that he had entirely forgotten what constituted good cooking, and besides he was much too busy with the management of his tenement property to linger over his meals. Occasionally, in collecting his rents, he had encountered the odor of real food, but he invariably curbed any faint appetite it may have stirred in him by reflecting that it probably came from the kitchen of a tenant in arrears with the rent.

Nevertheless, the human stomach can not be indefinitely put off with vague promises of a square meal, such as were the meals Miss Rossmeyer provided, and in consequence, Uncle Ellis under medical advice had spent two weeks at Lakewood, but after fourteen days at the kind of hotel which he too modestly estimated to be within his resources, neither Uncle Ellis nor his stomach had benefited by the experience.

Hence when he entered the office of Sam Fischelmann, his attorney, that afternoon, he was in far from an amiable mood.

"Listen, Fischelmann," he said, "what for a lawyer are you that I couldn't turn my back with you in charge of my interests for two weeks, even, when everything gets balled up on me?"

Fischelmann grew immediately quite red in the face.

"Could I help it if your nephew wants to marry a burlesque actress?" he asked indignantly, but in view of the circumstances that he himself had first introduced her to Cyril, and only that morning had given Cyril a letter of recommendation to a client who dealt in diamonds on the wear-them-till-you-pay-for-them system, there seemed but slight basis for his indignation.

"I don't know," Uncle Ellis said as he sank listlessly into a broken seated chair, "sometimes I think it would pay me to hire a good lawyer, Fischelmann—someone who ain't half asleep all the time."

FISCHELMANN could not prevent a smile at what Uncle Ellis intended for an exceedingly cruel thrust. Half asleep, Uncle Ellis had called him, and not five minutes after Selina had telephoned him how Cyril would be disinherited if he bought Miss Wittkowsky as much as a safety pin, he had set in motion the machinery for blasting Cyril's hopes with a three carat engagement ring. Probably Miss Wittkowsky was wearing it for the matinée right now, Fischelmann reflected, and his smile broadened as he thought of it.

"This is no laughing matter, Fischelmann," Uncle Ellis said. "What use have I got it for a lawyer which he don't know enough

Q. "I should sit still and see half my property go to a burlesquer yet," said Uncle Ellis. "If that boy don't come to his senses, he need never look to me for a postage stamp even."

C. "That ain't no cash diamond," Miss Wittkowsky told Cyril. "If you feel like you got to go into debt on my account, make it an ice-box or a parlor suit."

to send me for twenty-five cents a telegram to come home in a pinch. Which if you would let me know in time, I could have nicked the whole thing in the bud."

"Is that so?" Sam retorted. "Well, let me tell you something, Mr. November, all you've got to do is to go near that woman and try to bust things up, and the first thing you know, you will have a suit for malicious interference in contract on your hands."

"Well, what am I going to do?" Ellis asked. "Sit down and watch him marry her yet?"

"Don't do anything," Fischelmann advised. "If he wants to marry her, that's his lookout."

UNCLE ELLIS was about to protest but Sam extended his right palm towards Uncle Ellis's nose, as though he were a traffic policeman and Uncle Ellis a taxicab.

"Now, I know what you're going to say," he added. "But you got other relations besides Cyril and you could leave your money to them."

"What do you mean—them?" Uncle Ellis cried. "I've got one other relation, and the chances is if I left my money to her, the best she would do with it would be to marry some no account pinhead, Fischelmann, who would give her A Number One assistance in passing it on to automobile manufacturers."

"Say!" Fischelmann interrupted. "The chances is a level-headed girl like that would marry somebody who would take just so good care of her money as she could herself."

As he had already outlined to her a scheme whereby he intended to put the whole thing in first mortgages on improved real property in the Boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx only, there was a note of finality to this statement.

"Listen, Fischelmann," he said, "if you've got any such ideas like that in your head, let me tell you that I got other plans for my niece than she should marry a lawyer without prospects."

"Did I say you hadn't?" Fischelmann said. This was neither the time nor place, if indeed there could be any time or place, for breaking it gently to Uncle Ellis that in his absence in Lakewood, there had been another engagement in the family, and as for the offensive implication that he, Fischelmann, was a lawyer without prospects, all sorts of prospects—none of them unpleasing—unfolded themselves for Fischelmann.

First, there was the prospect of marrying Miss Rossmeyer, and if this failed, then there was the prospect of disentangling Cyril from his alliance with Miss Wittkowsky, for which he could charge Uncle Ellis a fee and Miss Wittkowsky a commission. Finally, if the worst came to the worst, and he were to suffer a breach with Ellis November, there was always the prospect of a suit by Miss Wittkowsky against Uncle Ellis for malicious interference with contract. He could therefore afford to be magnanimous towards Uncle Ellis's rude behavior.

"Believe me, Mr. November," he added, "if I would be thinking of getting engaged to anybody, an old client like you would be the first to hear of it."

"So far as getting engaged to anybody is concerned, Fischelmann, your private affairs don't concern me not in the least, y'understand," Uncle Ellis declared, "but if my niece or nephew is going to get married to anybody, then that anybody has got to match my money with more than just experience, y'understand, or else a lot of orphans is going to get the benefit of it."

"Then you want to make a new will?" Fischelmann inquired.

"Not yet," Uncle Ellis concluded, "but when I do, Fischelmann, there ain't no lawyers too high priced for me to go to, because you could take it from me, Fischelmann, I ain't going to spare no expense in making it holeproof, with a replacement guarantee from the Supreme Court if necessary."

WHEN Sam Fischelmann and Miss Selina Rossmeyer had evolved the plan for Cyril November's disinheritance by getting him engaged to a burlesque actress, they had considered the matter in all its phases and were absolutely certain in advance that Uncle Ellis would be outraged by it and that Miss Wittkowsky would prove mercenary.

Uncle Ellis had more than realized their expectations, but they were entirely mistaken in Miss Wittkowsky. One need not have been a burlesque actress to find in all Miss Wittkowsky's former engagements to marry, much greater advantage in their breach than their observance; for in every case, the prospective bridegrooms had been bald and fat, and Miss Wittkowsky had always regarded them more in the light of future defendants in actions for breach of promise of marriage, than as partners in the marriage itself.

But Cyril was a different proposition. Cyril was slender, and his black hair waved poetically from a high white forehead. His features were classic in their regularity and he made twenty-five dollars a week as a bookkeeper in a wholesale millinery business. Even Miss Wittkowsky realized that he was not the timber out of which defendants in breach of promise suits are made, and much as Sam Fischelmann and Miss Rossmeyer would have been surprised by it, she loved him for himself alone.

C "What's this?" Uncle Ellis demanded. "That's coffee," Mrs. Wittkowsky said. "That ain't coffee," the old man insisted. "I don't like coffee but I like this. Must be awful expensive."

"Tell me, kid," she said to him as on the following Sunday afternoon they sat in the front parlor of the Wittkowsky apartment on West Forty-eighth Street, "how much did you pay down on this rock?"

She referred to the precious stone in a ring on the third finger of her left hand which Sam Fischelmann's client in the enthusiasm of selling it to Cyril had described as a two and seven-tenths carat brilliant of the first water, blue white and without a flaw.

"What do you mean—pay down on it?" Cyril said, and Miss Wittkowsky patted his flushed cheeks tenderly.

"Don't get sore, kid," she said. "That ain't no cash diamond, it's an instalment diamond, and if you feel like you've got to go into debt on my account, Cyril, why, just make it an ice-box or a parlor suit or something."

"But you've got to have an engagement ring, ain't you?"

"With some people, you bet, and witnesses, too," Miss Wittkowsky said, "but your word is good enough for me, dearie, so don't you go wasting your money on no presents. Just give me the name and address where you bought this, and I'll get you your deposit and your contract."

She smoothed back his hair in a manner almost maternal. In fact, there was just a suggestion of the doting mother in her entire attitude towards Cyril, for while the difference in their ages was negligible, there was a good twenty years' difference in their weights. Furthermore, her salary with Graubart & Schein's Zig-Zag Company had been for the past two seasons one hundred and seventy-five dollars a week, and she naturally felt maternal towards the twenty-five dollar a week Cyril.

Not so Mrs. Fannie Wittkowsky, her mother, however, and when after another hour or so of this semi-maternal alliance, Cyril had gone, Mrs. Wittkowsky immediately opened up.

"Lookut here, Goldie," she said, "how long are you going to fool around and waste your time with this young feller?"

"Who says I am fooling around?" Goldie demanded. "We are engaged."

"Yow, engaged!" Mrs. Wittkowsky exclaimed, with a laugh. "How many hundred times did I hear you say that before?"

"I know you did," Goldie admitted, "but this time I mean it. Honest I do."

"What do you mean, you mean it?" Mrs. Wittkowsky cried, suddenly very serious. "What are you going to live on with such a boy?"

"Listen, Mommer; every time I get engaged, it's the same thing," Goldie protested. "Right away, you want to know the history of his life and everything. Last Wednesday, I met my fiancé for the first time, and you want me I should tell you what we're going to live on yet."

"Sure I know," Mrs. Wittkowsky said, "but them other engagements was just engagements, whereas from the way you look at that young feller, when he is here, I could tell that this here engagement is something else again."

"Well, what of it?" Goldie said not at all abashed.

"What of it!" her mother repeated. "For to do your own laundry work for the rest of your days, you don't got to get married. You could always get a job in a laundry."

"I could always get a job in a burlesque troupe, and besides, his uncle has got all kinds of money," Goldie said.

"And who told you this?"

"Fischelmann, the lawyer," Goldie continued. "He says that Cyril and his cousin, Miss Rossmeyer, is the only heirs of this here Ellis November, and he should ought to know because Fischelmann himself is engaged already to marry the other heir."

"But didn't you told me that Fischelmann himself introduced you to this young feller," Mrs. Wittkowsky said, "and didn't you also told me that he invited him and you to lunch especially on purpose so you should get acquainted with each other, and maybe get engaged?"

"Suppose he did?" Miss Wittkowsky answered her quickly.

Mrs. Wittkowsky shrugged her shoulders and made an appealing gesture at the enlarged crayon portrait of the late Mr. Wittkowsky which hung on the opposite wall.

"Ai!" she exclaimed, "what did I done that a daughter of mine should be so dumb? A crook lawyer, practically a stranger except for one replevin suit, invites her to go fifty-fifty on this here Ellis November's money and she don't suspect nothing."

"WHO SAYS I don't suspect nothing?" Goldie cried. "I can read that crook lawyer like a book, Mommer. He thinks I would act to any man like I done it to Benny Lickman."

"Or Max Kronacher or Harry Citron, or this here feller in the furnishing business in Akron," Mrs. Wittkowsky interrupted. "Any one of them men would have made you a good husband, Goldie, and what did you done?"

"I got rid of them before they got rid of me," Goldie said; "but this here kid is different. If Fischelmann thinks I'm going to try to shake down that old man, he's mistaken, or if he thinks he can make the old man leave all his money to Cyril's cousin, he can't get away with that too. I don't want his money. All I want is the kid, see? Now go ahead, Mommer, and fix up some coffee. I always tried to be a good daughter to you, didn't I?"

Mrs. Wittkowsky nodded through her tears.

"And Cyril's going to be a good son to you," Goldie said as she patted the old lady's shoulder affectionately. "Other-

C. "You engaged!" Mrs. Wittkowsky exclaimed. "How many hundred times did I hear you say that before." "I know you did," Goldie admitted, "but this time I mean it."

M. LEONE
BRACKETT
1922.

“Don't be afraid that I couldn't give you a good home,” Uncle Ellis told Mrs. Wittkowsky. “This year with everything deducted that it was possible to deduct, I paid an income tax on pretty near eighteen thousand dollars.”

wise,” she added fervently, “he's liable to get an awful wollop from me.”

On the following Wednesday morning, while Miss Selina Rossmeyer was preparing breakfast by scraping the more badly charred piece of toast, she was interrupted by a loud exclamation from Uncle Ellis. She removed the coffee pot from the gas stove where it had been simmering for over half an hour and went at once into the dining-room to see what caused the outbreak on the part of her esteemed relative.

“Now what's the matter?” she asked.

UNCLE ELLIS excitedly pointed at the morning paper with a trembling forefinger.

“You shouldn't go near her,” he says. “You should let matters take their course,” Uncle Ellis cried. “Wait till I see that loafer, that's all. I wouldn't show him no mercy at all.”

“Now listen, Uncle Ellis,” Selina said, “if Cyril wants to act this way, what can you do. He ain't been home here for a week, and——”

“Who is talking about Cyril?” Uncle Ellis cried. “I am talking about Fischelmann. ‘She would sue you for interfering in a contract,’ and what is the result? Here! Read.”

He thrust the morning paper at Miss Rossmeyer and once more pointed to the following notice:

NOVEMBER—WITTKOWSKY. Mrs. Sarah Wittkowsky of 366 A West 48th Street announces the betrothal of her daughter Goldie to Mr. Cyril November. Reception at home Sunday, March 22nd, 3 to 6 P. M. No cards.

“‘No cards,’ it says, which little did I think that my nephew would marry into a burlesque family where they actually got to advertise no cards so that their friends wouldn't be scared of marked decks being pulled on them,” Uncle Ellis continued.

“And that schlemiel advises me to sit still and do nothing. Not another nickel's worth of business will he get out of me. Not so much as one dispossess even. Today I would get me another lawyer as is pretty near a lawyer.”

Miss Rossmeyer turned pale.

“But Uncle Ellis,” she cried, “he meant it for the best. You don't understand Mr. Fischelmann.”

“I understand him a whole lot better than you do,” Uncle Ellis retorted. “Fischelmann is more than a schlemiel. He is a schemer. By hook or by crook, that feller's got it into his head that he would sooner or later get a hold of some of my money. You don't know him, Selina. His is prepared even if necessary to marry you. He as good as told me so himself.”

By making this assertion, Uncle Ellis did not intend to be gratuitously insulting. It was only that he held no illusions as to his niece's lack of charm and considered the matter to be so self-evident that he took for granted her own acceptance of a situation no woman ever accepts.

“Is that so!” she exclaimed, “even me he is willing to marry.”

“WELL, HE didn't say so in so many words,” Uncle Ellis said mildly upon the principle of a soft answer turning away wrath, “but I actually think he would, Selina, he's that desprit already.”

Miss Rossmeyer laughed mirthlessly.

“I suppose anybody would have to be desperate if they wanted to marry me,” she said, tapping the table cloth with the fingers of her right hand. “Desperate and crazy, you would think, I suppose, such a person must be.”

In all the ten years she had kept house for Uncle Ellis, she had never before indulged herself like this. She had other methods of relieving her feelings, such as putting too much pepper in the soup and not enough in the gedampfte Kalbfleisch, but, up to now, Uncle Ellis had directed his rough criticism towards her housekeeping and her management of the household expenses, and not towards herself and her dim prospects of marrying.

"Say!" he asked. "Did I say something?"

"Oh no, you didn't say nothing," Miss Rossmeyer retorted bitterly. "Don't consider me at all. If you think I am such a terrible looking person that nobody would want to marry me, just say so. It ain't me that Mr. Fischelmann likes, it's your money. Me, I am nothing."

"Now listen to me, Selina," he began. "I ain't so crazy about orphans, and people which leaves their money to orphan asylums is practically throwing it away in the streets because everybody knows that orphan asylums don't treat orphans too kindly. But just the same, Selina," he said, "if I must got to do it, y'understand, why then I must, so I give you fair warning, Selina, any of my relations can get married to anybody they want to, but if I ain't asked about it first, understand me, I go right straight down to the nearest orphan asylum, and them suckers would be only too glad to draw a holeproof will for me, free for nothing."

Uncle Ellis lived in one of his own flats on One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street, a circumstance which contributed nothing to the comfort or convenience of the other occupants.

For instance on this particular morning the occupant of the sixth floor front east had accompanied him to the subway station and for the entire distance had threatened him with the Department of Health and a summons to appear before a City Magistrate and explain his conduct.

HENCE when Ellis at last found himself swinging on the strap of a downtown express, he was quite breathless. Moreover he had eaten no breakfast, he was sixty odd years of age and this last encounter, coming on top of Miss Rossmeyer's attack, had left him so disturbed that the train had passed Ninety-sixth Street before he began to read his paper. His eye immediately fell once more upon the notice of his nephew's engagement. A pulse beat in his cheek as he read again the names, the addresses and the words No Cards.

"Loafers!" he exclaimed, meaning Miss Wittkowsky and her mother—and the next moment his mind dwelt on Fischelmann.

"A lawyer the feller calls himself," he continued, and tucked his paper into his pocket just as the train passed Eighty-sixth Street. He had made an important resolve in the matter.

"After all," he announced quite loud, "why should I take it laying down?"

He had addressed this rhetorical question to himself, for he had suddenly determined to go to the residence of Miss Goldie Wittkowsky on Forty-eighth Street and have it out with her.

It did not improve matters for Uncle Ellis that Miss Wittkowsky and her mother occupied the top floor of an old-fashioned walk-up apartment house and although he rested in the vestibule for at least two minutes before ringing the bell, he could just about totter up-stairs. In fact, it took him so long to reach the top floor that both Miss Goldie Wittkowsky and her mother were leaning over the banisters as he crawled up the last two flights.

"Old Mr. Kaplan with the bill from the delicatessen, ain't it?" Mrs. Wittkowsky called.

"Shush, Mommer," Goldie said, as Uncle Ellis toiled up the last few steps.

"Miss Wittkowsky," he croaked, and Goldie nodded.

"That's me," she said.

For a few seconds, Uncle Ellis panted helplessly.

"My name," he gasped, "is Mister November."

"Mister November!" Mrs. Wittkowsky cried, and before Uncle Ellis could even nod in reply, his knees gave way and he toppled over senseless.

WELL, you sure could of knocked me on the head with a feather!" Mrs. Wittkowsky exclaimed a half an hour later, as she and Goldie sat in the front parlor waiting for the doctor to come out of the best bedroom where Ellis November lay stretched on Mrs. Wittkowsky's Renaissance bed spread. "That little bit of an old man Cyril's uncle!"

"Shush, Mommer!" Goldie said. "He might hear you."

"Let him," Mrs. Wittkowsky retorted. "Do you think I am afraid he should hear me? And that young feller jollied you into thinking he had a rich uncle yet. Does he look rich?" Mrs. Wittkowsky asked. "If he didn't tell me he was Cyril's uncle, I would of took a chance and schencked him a quarter he should go and buy himself a cup of coffee or something."

"You would have done right, too," said the doctor who had come out of the bedroom unnoticed. "In fact, it wouldn't be a bad idea to make him a cup of coffee right now and several slices of toast."

"What!" Mrs. Wittkowsky exclaimed.

"And if you've got such a thing as a couple of fresh eggs in the house, let him have them soft boiled," the doctor said, "because if I don't miss my guess, he hasn't had a square meal in a week."

Mrs. Wittkowsky turned to Goldie and made an eloquent gesture with both hands.

"Well, Goldie," she said. "What did I told you!"

"I don't believe it," Goldie said. "He just sold a large apartment house on Southern Boulevard."

"If you don't get him that coffee quick he may pass out on you right here and now," the doctor added.

"I'm going, I'm going," Mrs. Wittkowsky cried. "And she thinks he's a millionaire! Nebich!"

"Is he real sick, doctor?" Goldie asked, after her mother had gone on her errand of mercy.

"I wouldn't say so," the doctor replied. "A little food'll fix him. He's hungry, that's all."

A minute later Goldie went into the bedroom.

"Well, Boss," she said heartily, "how are they coming?"

Uncle Ellis looked at her mournfully.

"Gimme my hat," he croaked, "I got to get down to the office right away."

"Now listen," Goldie said, and drew the wrap around his shoulders, tucking it in with a friendly pat, "you're set till after lunch anyways."

Here Mrs. Wittkowsky entered with a tray on which was a cup of fragrant coffee and two poached eggs.

It was a new experience for Uncle Ellis. Kindness and courtesy were entirely unfamiliar to him. He hardly knew how to cope with them, and for lack of anything else to do, he began to sample the coffee.

"What's this?" he asked after the first two or three spoonfuls.

"That's coffee," Mrs. Wittkowsky said.

"That ain't coffee," he said. "I don't like coffee, but I like this," and he tried it again.

"I can't help what you like," Mrs. Wittkowsky declared. "That's coffee."

"Must be expensive coffee," Uncle Ellis remarked after he had drained the cup.

"Twenty-five cents a pound by the A. & G. stores," Goldie answered with an air of pride.

"You don't tell me!" Uncle Ellis exclaimed as Mrs. Wittkowsky replaced the empty cup with a full one.

"It's all in the way it's made," she said.

"And she can make it, believe me," Goldie added. "She's forgotten more about cooking than Delmonico ever learned yet."

YES?" UNCLE ELLIS remarked, as he began on his third cup of coffee. "Well, some people make gods out of their stomachs—but not me."

Having said this, he ate another poached egg, three in all, and after the tray was removed, he began to think that it was about time to discuss the object of his visit. He found it singularly difficult to make a start, however, and had cleared his throat any number of times only to find himself engaged in friendly conversation.

Moreover, it developed that Mrs. Wittkowsky knew many of Ellis November's old acquaintances and was even able to mention a funeral which she and Uncle Ellis both attended during the panic of 1893.

"And I shouldn't wonder we was to other places together, too," Mrs. Wittkowsky said. "I bet yer you used also to went to them affairs of the Ladies' Fuel and Aid on account of Brody's wife being president, ain't it?"

It had been some time since he had indulged in polite small talk with ladies and he had felt a trifle embarrassed, but now he looked squarely at Mrs. Wittkowsky. Her hair almost justified Miss Rossmeyer's description of it—that is to say it looked as though it were bleached and yet there were enough white strands in it to make it seem natural, and as far as Uncle Ellis could see, Mrs. Wittkowsky was a motherly person in her late fifties, rather well preserved, with regular features, faded blue eyes and a mouth that turned up at the corners.

"I did used to go to them affairs," Ellis admitted.

"Well, it's funny I couldn't remember the name November," Mrs. Wittkowsky said, "which it ain't what you would call an ordinary name exactly."

"And if you would excuse me for saying so," Ellis retorted, "it's just so funny that I couldn't re- [Continued on page 129]

Q First Russia, then Germany and now Ireland. What country will furnish the world's next political revolution? Close students of international affairs say Portugal

Q Sidonio Pais, once the idol of the Portuguese, governed by his personal authority until assassinated by a madman.

WILL PORTUGAL BLOW UP NEXT?

By F. Britten Austin

SOME little time ago, in one of those cafés around the Rocio Square in Lisbon, the political clubs wherein the Governments of Portugal initiate their rise or fall, a well-known politician was seated peacefully sipping his coffee. At another table across the café sat another gentleman, with romantically long hair falling almost to his shoulders—all Lisbon will recognize him from this description. The long-haired gentleman was likewise peacefully sipping his coffee and at the same time reading his newspaper. Suddenly there was a revolver shot. The politician toppled over. Who had fired? Not a soul had moved in the café—until the detonation brought the customers to their feet.

After the corpse had been carried out, the long-haired gentleman smilingly indicated to an excitedly mystified companion a little smouldering hole in the skirt of his coat. He had fired through his pocket while pretending to read his newspaper. "Who is that long-haired man?" "He?—oh, that is so-and-so (I refrain from making him better known than he already is), the chief assassin of the 'Carbonaria'."

And every Carbonario in Portugal will assure you that the Carbonaria does not exist. In the strictest verbal sense, this is doubtless true. But any optimistic individual who should be innocent enough to accept this statement and attempt to govern Portugal without reference to the Carbonaria would speedily find that he had reckoned without his host. It was the Carbonaria that changed Portugal from a Monarchy into a Republic. It is the Carbonaria, veiling its mysterious membership under one name or another, that virtually has governed Portugal ever since.

It is true that officially there is nowadays no such thing as the Carbonaria. It is a name far too unpleasantly familiar in Portuguese ears. Long ago, that all-powerful secret society which listened to the secrets of every Portuguese household—and invented them, if necessary—discreetly dropped it. Besides, disintegrated by success, it has split into various sections, not always at peace with one another.

It is the Group of the Thirteen that is most in evidence at the present time. Those days are few when the Portuguese newspapers are without a reference to its activities—nearly always in the form of violent and amazingly impudent aggression. On the day I began to write this article, for example, a number of its agents attacked an ex-Civil Governor of Lisbon, the one before the last, and endeavored to drag him from a motorcycle sidecar in broad daylight and in the central and most frequented part of the city. It may be said with safety that there is no politician in that harassed Republic who is not acutely sensitive, at any given moment, to the state of his personal relations with the Grupo dos Treze.

IF PORTUGAL is to be saved from collapse as a European power, some "strong man," another Porfirio Diaz, must impose a salutary discipline on that little horde of political conspirators who gamble in Portuguese Governments, at a pace which in these past two years has grown faster than ever, for their personal profit.

The Carbonaria is a secret society founded originally as far back as 1823, at the time of the first Miguelite Civil War. Throughout the nineteenth century it continued a somewhat checkered existence, but after the unsuccessful Republic's revolt of 1891 it increased greatly in numbers and influence. Nevertheless, it was only in the last years of the Monarchy that it became really formidable. It was then reorganized under the capable triumvirate of Antonio Maria da Silva—Prime Minister of the Republic, not for the first time, at the date this article is written; Machado dos Santos—then a lieutenant in the Navy, and subsequently known as the "Founder of the Republic" (which distinction did not save him from being murdered by his ancient associates the other day); and a certain Luz d'Almeida, who has otherwise failed to achieve any special fame.

A network of espionage covered the country.

The murder of King Carlos and the Crown Prince on February 1, 1908, was certainly the handiwork, direct or indirect, of the Carbonaria. During the short reign of the young King Manoel its numbers and its underground influence increased. It is said to have had a membership of 40,000 in 1910. The Revolution of October, 1910, which abolished the Monarchy, was the achievement of the Carbonaria and virtually the Carbonaria alone.

For the next few years the Carbonaria had things all its own way. It installed a Republican government that was merely a respectably draped simulacrum of itself. It persecuted intolerantly all those who did not belong to its particular party. The prisons were choked with Monarchists, real, suspected, or alleged. The Church, of course, was the object of its especial hatred. All processions and festas were abolished, the churches were shut and the priesthood was virtually driven out of the country. A great deal of this anti-religious legislation was undone in 1918 by Sidonio Pais, but it is still against the law in Portugal to take a child under fourteen years of age to church!

THE excesses of the Carbonaria during the first years of the Republic of course provoked bitter hatred and the inevitable reaction. Nowadays it is found more convenient to hide its light under a bushel. But, under one or another of its aliases, it is still alive—and it is with this formidable network of secret societies that any statesman who would set Portugal's house in order would have to deal.

Closely allied with the secret societies is that well-organized minority of the Portuguese people which calls itself the Democratic Party and which has, from the beginning of the Republic held the dominant position in Portuguese politics. It is led by that somewhat mysterious personality (there is nothing that happens in Portugal that is not ascribed to him) Dr. Alfonso Costa who, after being for some years the political genius of the Republic, was subsequently its representative at the Peace Conference and who, despite reiterated appeals from politicians in difficulty, has since found it preferable to remain in Paris.

Apart from the Democratic Party, and intriguing with or against it for the spoils of office, according to the exigencies of the moment, is a dozen or so of other parties, more or less corresponding to their titles and more or less ephemeral. Politics in Portugal are an affair of personalities and not of principles. Whatever their nominal labels, it may safely be assumed that all these personalities would unite with the Democrats, the Carbonaria, and any other allies who were available, to make life difficult for any "strong man" who proposed to clean the Augean stable of Portuguese politics.

Yet it is for such a "strong man" that the majority of Portuguese crave, even to the extent of hoping that a foreign power or a group of foreign powers will eventually impose a ruler of foreign birth. They are tired and disgusted with the constant succession of governments, born of some obscure cabal, that last a month, a week, or a day. And things are getting worse. There were twenty-seven governments during the first ten years of the Republic; there have been seventeen during the past two. Not a single President since the establishment of the Republic, has accomplished his allotted term of four years. The present President, after two years, is publicly begging to be allowed to resign. It is whispered that he is on the death list of the Carbonaria and he lives in close retirement, his young and beautiful wife, a pathetically romantic figure, who is passionately attached to him, constituting herself his warden and closely scrutinizing every visitor before he is admitted to the presidential presence. Anyone might be the dreaded assassin!

Few of the Portuguese now look to their ancient and exiled Monarchy to rescue them from their troubles. Besides, Manoel has publicly stated that he would not come back, even if they asked him. It is for some new, possibly yet unknown, regenerator of their country that the Portuguese wistfully look.

Is there such a man? There are said to be several individuals who aspire to the perilous honor of the Dictatorship. If this is true, they are discreetly diffident of declaring their ambitions.

Twice there have been Dictators, and the would-be Cromwells of the present day doubtless meditate on the object lesson afforded by their predecessors.

The first of these Dictators was General Pimenta de Castro. In the reaction against the excesses of the youthful Republic, a military pronunciamento brought him into power in 1914. For the next few months, he governed Portugal with a firmness and a moderation that were gladly received by the majority of his countrymen, but that were highly distasteful to the Carbonaria and the politicians, who, of course, intrigued against him, hand in hand. On May 14, 1915, the troops revolted and Lisbon found itself being bombarded from the river. The unfortunate Dictator was arrested, dismissed from the army, and exiled to the Azores.

THE NEXT Dictator, Sidonio Pais, was a much more picturesque figure—one of the most picturesque figures that have appeared in Europe for generations. Originally a colonel of artillery, he had been Republican ambassador to Berlin, but few people knew anything of him until, quite suddenly and unexpectedly, on December 5, 1917, he took the center of the stage as the leader of a completely successful military revolt.

General Pimenta de Castro had been content to make himself Prime Minister under the existing President. Colonel Sidonio Pais proclaimed himself President and Dictator. He then referred the fait accompli to the electorate, for once free to vote as it liked. The Portuguese—and it is significant of their attitude to this or any other man who showed them that he meant to rule—confirmed him by the biggest ballot, some sixty percent; in the history of the Republic.

Sidonio Pais became the idol of the Portuguese people. It was openly suggested to him that he should make himself King. He governed by his own personal authority, with a Ministry from which the politicians were excluded. But he gave Portugal the best and most popular government it had had for many years—at once firm and liberal.

The excluded politicians and the Carbonaria kept him busy, however. He had to deal with a constant succession of plots that twice developed into armed but unsuccessful risings. At last, in December, 1918, he was assassinated by an alleged madman at the Rocio railway station in Lisbon.

Never was more manifest the divorce between the Portuguese politicians and the Portuguese people. The people gave themselves up to an extraordinary frenzy of grief, the houses of Lisbon were draped in black, for days a procession of weeping men and women passed before his body laid out in state.

They have nowadays a "Red" movement, liberally subsidized from foreign sources, among the underpaid, bitterly discontented working population of Lisbon and Oporto.

The Bolshevik agitators—known to be in league with the secret societies—are trying to bring about a bakers' strike in the hope that the famished mob will rise in desperation.

NINE OUT of ten of the Portuguese whom I asked whether they could indicate any personality who might yet save the Portuguese Republic shrugged their shoulders and said—with the diffidence of many disillusionments—"Perhaps Cunha Leal."

Senhor Cunha Leal enjoys the distinction of being one of the youngest Prime Ministers of modern times. He has been called the "Michael Collins of Portugal." It was the Revolution of October 19, 1921, where he bravely tried in vain to save the life of the Premier Senhor Granjo, that first brought him to the forefront in Portugal.

As Prime Minister, Cunha Leal made himself felt. He announced, in a public speech: "It is for me to give orders. It is for the nation to obey them." This is the kind of talk the Portuguese people like. The country wondered whether he was about to make himself Dictator. He did the reverse. He held the elections and, being defeated by the Democratic machine, resigned the Premiership.

As far as is known, he is absolutely independent of the political parties and of the secret societies. Yet if there is one thing of which the average Portuguese is firmly convinced, it is that Cunha Leal is the man of the immediate future.

Something in him, too, has caught the eyes of foreign countries. There is no legation in Lisbon that has not reported voluminously upon him to its chancellery.

The first time I met him was in the Chamber of Deputies at Lisbon.

"What, in your opinion, is Portugal's greatest need today?" I asked him.

C. A monarchist party is at work in Portugal, but ex-King Manoel, shown here with his consort, declares he will never return as the ruler of his people even should they request it.

"Obviously, a strong and stable Government—one that remains long enough in power to establish a continuity in policy and is powerful enough to enforce reforms."

"Then a dictatorship is the solution?"

"A dictatorship, yes—but a dictatorship must have a loyal organization, military or otherwise, to support it. Where among the mutual jealousies which convulse the country is such a firm support to be found? I agree that the country needs a single strong man—a modern Napoleon. But such a man must carefully prepare his organization in advance. It can not be improvised."

"The era of Revolutions in Portugal is presumably not at an end?"

"Unfortunately not." Sr. Cunha Leal was emphatic. "There will certainly be more revolutions before a stable government is attained. Personally, I am all against these revolutions—made, most of them, to satisfy personal ambitions—which leave, each one of them, the country in a worse state than it was before."

"And the financial situation?"

"It is of the first and most urgent importance to us that we should have a foreign loan. Portugal is the only one of the smaller countries that suffered through the war, which has not received any assistance from the richer Allies. Such a loan would benefit the country that granted it—America or England—as it would re-establish our purchasing power. Portugal could give ample security."

"It has for many years been suggested, outside Portugal, that the best way for Portugal to relieve herself of her financial embarrassments would be for her either to sell or lease some at least of that colonial empire which is no source of profit to her."

"There is no Portuguese Government of whatever party," he said, "that would dare to suggest to the country that it should either sell or lease any part of its colonial empire. We have been a great people. We founded a great [Continued on page 125]

If He Should Come

By Edwin Markham

IF JESUS should tramp the streets tonight,
Storm-beaten and hungry for bread,
Seeking a room and a candle light
And a clean though humble bed,
Who would welcome the Workman in,
Though He came with panting breath,
His hands all bruised and His garments thin—
This Workman from Nazareth?

Would rich folk hurry to bind His bruise
And shelter His stricken form?
Would they take God in with His muddy shoes
Out of the pitiless storm?
Are they not too busy wreathing their flowers
Or heaping their golden store—
Too busy chasing the bubble hours
For the poor man's God at the door?

And if He should come where churchmen bow,
Forgetting the greater sin,
Would He pause with a light on His wounded brow,
Would He turn and enter in?
And what would He think of their creeds so dim,
Of their weak uplifted hands,
Of their foolish prayers going up to Him
Out of a thousand lands?

C. Decoration by Franklin Booth

Franklin Booth

A Novel of the Second Coming

By the author of
"The Jungle"

They Call Me Carpenter

By Upton Sinclair

Illustrated by Lucius Wolcott Hitchcock

Q. "Tell me, Mr. Carpenter!" said Mary Magna, "have you ever been in love?" "Mary," said Carpenter, "I have been in grief."

Q. Which tells how the Figure came out of the stained-glass window and was whirled into a fatal automobile accident.

INTO THE COOL safety of St. Bartholomew's Church, fled the rich young man. The mob had beaten and chased him when he came out of the theater at which was being shown a German-made moving picture. Secure in the great church, he sank down into a pew and rested his throbbing, bleeding head upon his arms. A moment later a hand touched him and he heard: "Don't be afraid. It is I." Raising his eyes, he saw that the man at his side had stepped out of the stained-glass window and where he had been was a great hole with the sun shining through. At the touch of the hand, the pain and the rage died away. Then those two, the mob's victim and the stranger who said, "They call me Carpenter," went out into the roaring Broadway of Western City. At Madame Planchet's Beauty Parlor, whither they were dragged by a moving picture critic whom they encountered on the street, they met Mary Magna, the star of the movie world and Mr. T-S, the magnate of the film. Of course T-S saw in Carpenter a great movie actor, and insisted upon taking him and the rich young man to dinner, along with his wife and Mary Magna. At the fashionable Prince's, they ran into another mob, this time of waiters on strike, and Carpenter was narrowly saved from serious injury. Mrs. Stebbins, a society leader, knew the rich young man and wanted to know Carpenter. So she approached the table and, accepting an invitation to go to T-S's studio to see some night scenes shot, asked Carpenter to ride in her car. Her son drove. The car was halted by a traffic jam and as young Stebbins had told T-S he would beat him to the studio, he paid little attention to the speed laws as they swept along. Once or twice Mrs. Stebbins asked, "Bertie dear, aren't you driving rather fast?" To her warning, the young man paid no attention. As they drove recklessly through a crowded street, there was a sudden grinding of brakes, the bumping of something under the car, a scream from the sidewalk, and Mrs. Stebbins cried out.

THE accident had happened in an ill-chosen neighborhood; one of those crowded slum quarters, swarming with Mexicans and Italians and other foreigners. Of course that was the only neighborhood in which it could have happened.

There was one child under the front wheels, crushed almost in half, so that you could not bear to look at it, to say nothing of touching it; and there was another, struck by the fender and knocked into the gutter.

The first person out was Carpenter. He took one glance at the form under the car, and saw there was no hope there; then he ran to the child in the gutter and caught it into his arms. The poor people who rushed to the scene found him sitting on the curb, gazing into the pitiful, quivering little face, and whispering grief-stricken words. There was a street-lamp near, so he could see the face of the child, and the crowd could see him.

There came a woman, apparently the mother of the dead child. She saw the form under the car, and gave a horrified scream, and fell in a faint. There came a man, the father, no doubt, and other relatives; there was a clamoring, frantic throng, swarming about the car and about the victims. I went to Carpenter, and asked, "Is it dead?" He answered, "It will live, I think." Then, seeing that the crowd was likely to stifle the little one, he rose. "Where does this child live?" he asked; and someone pointed out the house, and he carried his burden into it. I followed him; and it was fortunate that I did so, because of the part I was able to play.

I saw him lay the child upon a couch, and put his hands upon its forehead, and close his eyes, apparently in prayer. Then, noting the clamor outside growing louder, I went to the door and looked out, and found the Stebbins family in a frightful predicament. The mob had dragged Bertie and the chauffeur out of the car, and were yelling menaces and imprecations into their faces; poor Bertie was shouting back, that it wasn't his fault, how could he help it? But they thought he might have helped coming into their quarter with his big, rich car; why couldn't he stay in his own part of the city, and kill the children of the rich?

A man hit him a blow in the face and knocked him over; his mother shrieked, and leaped out to help him, and half a dozen women flung themselves at her, and as many men at the chauffeur. There was a pile of bricks lying handy, and no doubt also knives in the pockets of these foreign men; I believe the little party would have been torn to pieces, had it not occurred to me to run into the house and summon Carpenter.

Why did I do it? I think because I had seen how the crowd gave way before him with the child in his arms. Anyhow, I knew that I could do nothing alone, and before I could find a policeman, it might be many times too late. I told Carpenter what was happening, and he rose, and ran out to the street.

IT WAS like magic, of course. He called to the crowd, stretching out his arms, and they gave way before him, and he walked into them, and when he got to the struggling group he held his arms over them, and that was all there was to it.

Except, of course, that he made them a speech. Seeing that he was saving Bertie Stebbins's life, it was no more than fair that he should have his own way, and that a member of the younger generation should listen in unprotesting silence to a discourse, the political and sociological implications of which must have been very offensive to him. Bertie listened; I think he would not have made a sound, even if he could have done so, after the crack he had got in the face.

"My people," said Carpenter, "what good would it do you to kill these wretches? The blood-suckers who drain the life of the poor are not to be killed by blows. There are too many of them, and more of them grow in place of those who die. And what is worse, if you kill them, you destroy in yourselves that which makes you better than they, which gives you the right to life. You destroy those virtues of patience and charity, which are the jewels of the poor, and make them princes in the kingdom of love.

"Let us guard our crown of pity, and not acquire the vices of our oppressors. Let us grow in wisdom, and find ways to put an end to the world's enslavement, without the degradation of our own hearts. For so many ages we have been patient, let us wait but a little longer, and find the true way! Oh, my people, my beloved poor, not in violence, but in solidarity, in brotherhood, lies the way! Let us bid the rich go on, to the sure damnation which awaits them. Let us not soil our hands with their blood!"

He spread out his arms again, majestically. "Stand back! Make way for them!"

Not all the crowd understood the words, but enough of them did, and set the example. In dead silence, they withdrew from the sides and front of the car. The body of the dead child had been dragged out of the way and laid on the sidewalk, covered by a coat; and so Carpenter said to the Stebbins family, "The road is clear before you. Step in." Half dazed, the intruders obeyed, and again Carpenter raised his voice. "Drinkers of human blood, devourers of human bodies, go your way!"

WHEN he stopped speaking, it was because a woman pressed her way through the crowd, and caught one of his hands. "Master, my baby!" she sobbed. "The little one that was hurt!" So Carpenter said to the crowd, "The sick child needs me. I must go in."

They started to press after him, and he added, "You must not come into the room. The child will need air." He went inside, and knelt once more by the couch, and put his hand on the little one's forehead. The mother, a frail, dark Mexican woman, crouched at the foot of the bed, not daring to touch either the man or the child, but staring from one to the other, pressing her hands together in an agony of dread.

The little one opened his eyes, and gazed up. Evidently he liked what he saw, for he kept on gazing, and a smile spread over his features, a wistful and tender and infinitely sad little smile, of a child who perhaps never had a good meal in his lifetime. "Nice man!" he whispered; and the woman, hearing his voice again began sobbing wildly, and caught Carpenter's free hand and covered it with her tears.

"It is all right," said he; "all right, all right! He will get well—do not be afraid." He smiled back at the child, saying, "It is better now; you will not have so much pain." To me he remarked, "What is there so lovely as a child?"

The people thronging the doorway spread word of what was going on, and there were shouts of excitement, and presently the voice of a woman, clamoring for admission. The throng made way, and she brought a bundle in her arms which, being unfolded, proved to contain a sick baby. I never knew what was the matter with it; I don't suppose the mother knew, nor did Carpenter seem to care. The woman knelt at his feet, praying to him; but he bade her stand up, and took the child from her, and looked into its face, and then closed his eyes in prayer.

When he handed back the burden, a few minutes later, she gazed at it. Something had happened, or at least she thought it had happened, for she gave a cry of joy, and caught the hem of his garment with one hand and began to kiss it. The rumor spread outside, and there were more people clamoring. Before long, filtering into the room, came the lame, and the halt, and the blind.

I had been reading not long ago of the miracles of Lourdes, so I knew in a general way what to expect; and yet, somehow, I could not watch it without being startled, thrilled in a strange, uncomfortable way.

Later on I had company in these unaccustomed emotions; the crowd gave way, and who should come into the room but Mary Magna! She did not speak to either of us, but slipped to one side and stood in silence—while the crowd watched her furtively out of the corner of its eyes, thinking her some foreign princess, with her bold, dark beauty and her costly attire.

I went over to her, whispering, "How did you get here?" She explained that, when we did not arrive at the studios, she had called up the Stebbins home and learned about the accident. "They warned me not to come here, because this man was a terrible Bolshevik; he made a bloodthirsty speech to the mob. What did he say?"

I STARTED to tell; but I was interrupted by a piercing shriek. A sick and emaciated young girl with paralyzed limbs had been carried into the room. They had laid her on the couch, from which the child had been taken away, and Carpenter had put his hands upon her. At once the girl had risen up—and here she stood, her hands flung into the air, literally screaming her triumphant joy.

Of course the crowd took it up—these primitive people are always glad of a chance to make a big noise—so the whole room was in a clamor, and Carpenter had hard work to extract himself from the throng who wished to touch his hands and his clothing, and to worship him on their knees.

He came over to us, and smiled. "Is not this better than acting, Mary?"

"Yes, surely—if one can do it."

Said he: "Everyone could do it, if they knew."

"Is that really true?" she asked, with passionate earnestness.

"There is a god in every man, and in every woman."

"Why don't they know it, then?"

"There is a god, and also a beast. The beast is old, and familiar, and powerful; the god is new, and strange, and afraid. Because of his fear, the beast kills him."

"What is the beast?"

"His name is self; and he has many forms. In men, he is greed; in women, he is vanity, and goes attired in much raiment—the chains, and the bracelets, and the mufflers——"

"Oh, don't!" cried Mary, wildly.

"Very well, Mary; I won't." And he didn't. But, looking at Mary, it seemed that she was just as unhappy as if he had gone on with his startling recital.

He turned to an old man who had hobbled into the room on crutches. "Poor old comrade! Poor old friend!" His voice seemed to break with pity. "They have worked you like an old mule, until your skin is cracked and your joints are grown hard; but they have not been so kind to you as to an old mule—they have left you to suffer!"

To a pale young woman who staggered towards him, coughing,

Carpenter closed his eyes in prayer. Suddenly he cried, "Walk!" The lad stared at him while the people caught their breath; then with a little choking cry, he took a step.

he cried: "What can I do for you? They are starving you to death! You need food—and I have no food to give!" He raised his arms, in sudden wrath. "Bring forth the masters of this city, who starve the poor, while they themselves riot in wantonness!"

But the members of the Chamber of Commerce and of the Bankers' Association of Western City were not within hearing, nor are their numbers as a rule to be found in the telephone book. Carpenter looked about the place, now lined pretty well with cripples and invalids. Only a couple of hours of spreading rumor had been needed to bring them forth, unholy and dreadful secrets, dragged from the dark corners and back alley-ways of these tenements. He gazed from one crooked and distorted face to another, and put his hand to his forehead with a gesture of despair. "No, no!" he said. "It is of no use!" He lifted his voice, calling once more to the masters of the city. "You make them faster than I can heal them! You make them by machinery—and he who would help them must break the machine!"

He turned to me; and I was startled, for it was as if he had been inside my mind. "I know, it will not be easy! But remember, I broke the empire of Rome!"

C. In dead silence, the crowd obeyed Carpenter and fell back from the car. Half dazed the Stebbins family and their chauffeur entered the machine.

That was his last flare. "I can do no more," he whispered. "My power is gone from me; I must rest." His voice gave way. "I beg you to go, unhappy poor of the world! I have done all that I can do for you tonight."

Silently, patiently, as creatures accustomed to the voice of doom, the sick and the crippled began to hobble and to crawl from the room.

HE SAT on the edge of the couch, gazing into space, lost in tragic thought; and Mary and I sat watching him, not quite certain whether we ought to withdraw with the rest. But he did not seem aware of our presence, so we stayed.

In our world, it is not considered permissible for people to remain in company without talking. If the talk lags, we have to cast hurriedly about in our minds for something to say—it is called "making conversation." But Carpenter evidently did not know about this custom, and neither of us instructed him. Once or twice I stole a glance at Mary, marveling at her. All her life she had been a conversational volcano in a state of perpetual eruption; but now, apparently, she passed judgment on her own remarks, and found them not worth making.

In the doorway of the room appeared the little boy who had been knocked down by the car. He looked at Carpenter, and then came towards him. When Carpenter saw him, a smile of welcome came upon his face; he stretched out an arm, and the little fellow nestled within it. Other children appeared in the doorway, and soon he had a group about him, sitting on his knees and on the couch.

They were little gutter-urchins, but he, seemingly, was interested in knowing their names and their relationships, what they learned in school, and what games they played. I think he had Bertie's football crowd in mind, for he said: "Some day they will teach you games of love and friendship, instead of rivalry and strife."

Presently the mother of the household appeared. She was distressed, because it did not seem possible that a great man could be interested in the prattle of children, when he had people like us, evidently rich people, to talk to. "You will bother the Master," she said, in Spanish. He seemed to understand, and answered, "Let the children stay with me. They teach me that the world might be happy."

But after a while, one of the children began to rub his eyes, and the mother exclaimed—it was so late! The children had stayed awake because of the excitement, but now they must go to bed. She bundled them out of the room, and presently came back, bearing a glass of milk and a plate with bread and an orange on it. The master might be hungry, she said, with a humble little bow. In her halting English, she offered to bring something to us, but it was evident that she did not suppose we would care for poor people's food but Carpenter ate hungrily.

MEANTIME he tried to get the woman to sit on the couch beside him; but she would not sit in his presence—or was it in the presence of Mary and me? I had a feeling, as she withdrew, that she might have been glad to chat with him, if a million-dollar movie queen and a spoiled young club-man had not been there.

So presently we three were alone once more; and Mary, gazing intently with those big dark eyes that the public knows so well, said, "Tell me, Mr. Carpenter! Have you ever been in love?"

I was startled, but if Carpenter was, he gave no sign. "Mary," he said, "I have been in grief." Then, thinking, perhaps, that he had been abrupt, he added with a strange tone in his voice, "You, Mary—you have been in love?"

She answered, "No." I'm not sure if I said anything out loud, but my thought was easy to read, and she turned upon me. "You don't know what love is. But a woman knows, even though she doesn't act it."

"Well, of course," I replied; "if you want to go into metaphysics—"

"Metaphysics be damned!" said Mary, and turned again to Carpenter.

Said he, "A good woman like you—"

"Me?" cried Mary, and she laughed, a wild laugh. "Don't hit me when you've got me down! I've sold myself for every job I ever got; I sold myself for every jewel you saw on me this afternoon. You notice I've got them off now!"

"I don't understand, Mary," he said, gently. "Why does a woman like you sell herself?"

"What else has she got? I was a rat in a tenement. I could have been a drudge, but I wasn't made for that. I sold myself for a job in a store, and then for ribbons to be pretty, and then for a place in the chorus, and then for a speaking part—so on all the way. Now I portray other women selling themselves. They get fancy prices, and so do I, and that makes me a 'star.' I hope you'll never see my pictures."

I sat watching this scene, marveling more than ever. That tone in Mary Magna's voice was a new one to me; perhaps she had not used it since she played her last "speaking part!"

Said Carpenter, "What are you going to do about it, Mary?"

"What can I do? My contract has seven years to run."

"Couldn't you do something honest? I mean, couldn't you tell an honest story?"

"Me? Good heavens! Tell that to T-S, and watch his face! Why, they hunt all the world over for some new kind of clothes for me to take off; they search all history for some war I can cause, some empire I can wreck. Me play an honest woman? The public would call it a joke, and the screen people would call it indecent."

CARPENTER got up, and began to pace the room. "Mary," said he, "I once lived under the Roman empire——"

"Yes, I know. And I was Cleopatra, and again I was Nero's mistress while he watched the city burning."

"Rome was rough, and crude, and poor, Mary. Rome was nothing to this. This is Satan on my Father's throne, making new worlds for himself." He paced the room again, then turned and said: "I don't understand this world. I must know more about it, if I am to save it!" There was such grief, such selfless pity in his voice as he repeated this, "I must know more about this world!"

"You know everything!" exclaimed Mary, suddenly. "You are all wisdom!"

But he went on, speaking as if to himself, pondering his problem, "To serve others, yet not to indulge them; for the cause of their enslavement is that they have accepted service without return. And how shall one preach patience to the poor, when the masters make such preaching a new means of enslavement?" He looked at me, as if he thought that I could answer his question. Then with sudden energy he exclaimed: "I must meet those who are in rebellion against enslavement! Tomorrow I want to meet the strikers—all the strikers in your city."

"You'll have your hands full," I said—for I was a coward, and wanted to keep him out of it.

"How shall I find them?" he persisted.

"I don't know; I suppose their headquarters are at the Labor Temple," I answered uncertainly.

"I will go there. Meantime, I fear I shall have to be alone. I need to think about the things I have learned."

"Where are you going to stay?"

"I don't know."

Said Mary, hesitatingly, "My car is outside——"

He answered, "In ancient days I saw the young patricians drive through the streets in their chariots; no, I shall not ride with them again."

Said I, "I have an apartment at the club, with plenty of room."

"No, no, friend. I have seen enough of the masters of this city. From now on, if you want to see me, you will find me among the poor."

¶ "The road is clear before you," Carpenter said to the Stebbins family. "Step in," and added, "drinkers of human blood, devourers of human bodies, go your way!"

"If I may meet you in the morning," I said, "to show you to the Labor Temple——" Yes, I would see him through!

"By all means," said he. "But you must come early, for I can not delay."

"Where shall I come?"

"Come here. I am sure these people will give me shelter." He looked about him. "I suspect that some of them sleep in this room; but they have a little porch outside, and if they will let me stay there I shall be alone, which is what I want now." After a moment, he added, "What I wish to do is to pray. Have you ever tried prayer, Mary?"

She answered, simply, "I wouldn't know how."

"Come to me, and I will teach you," he said.

I WENT early next morning, but not early enough. The Mexican woman told me that "the Master" had waited, and finally had gone. He had asked the way to the Labor Temple, and left word that I would find him there. So I stepped back into my taxi and told the driver to take the most direct route.

Meantime I kept watch for my friend, and I did not have to watch very long. There was a crowd ahead, the street was blocked, and a premonition came to me: "Good Lord, I'm too late—he's got into some new mess!" I leaned out of the window, and sure enough, there he was standing on the tail-end of a truck, haranguing a crowd that packed the street from one line of houses to the other. "And before he got half way to the Labor Temple!" I thought to myself.

I got out, and paid the driver of the taxi, and pushed into the crowd. Now and then I caught a few words of what Carpenter was telling them, and it seemed quite harmless—that they were all brothers, that they should love one another, and not do one another injustice. What could there have been that made him think it necessary to deliver this message before breakfast? I looked about, noting that it was the Hebrew quarter of the city, plastered with signs with queer, spattered-up letters. I thought: "Holy smoke! Is he going to convert the Jews?"

I pushed my way farther into the crowd, and saw a policeman, and went up to him. "Officer, what's this all about?" I spoke as one wearing the latest cut of clothes, and he answered accordingly, "Search me! They brought us out on a riot call, but when we got here, it seems to have turned into a revival meeting."

I got part of the story from this policeman, and part from a couple of bystanders. It appeared that some Jewish lady, getting her shopping done early, had complained of getting short weight, and the butcher had ordered her out of his shop, and she had stopped to express her opinion of profiteers, and he had thrown her out, and she had stood on the sidewalk and shrieked until all the ladies in this crowded quarter had joined her. Their fury against soaring prices, and wages that never kept up with them, had burst all bounds, and they had set out to clean up the butcher-shop with the butcher. So there was Carpenter, on his way to the Labor Temple, with another mob to quell!

"You know how it is," said the policeman. "It really does cost these poor devils a lot to live, and they say prices are going down, but I can't see it anywhere but in the papers."

"Well," said I, "I guess you were glad enough to have somebody do this job."

He grinned. "You bet! I've tackled crowds of women before this, and you don't like to hit them, but they claw into your face if you don't. I guess the captain will let this bird spout for a bit, even if he does block the traffic."

WE LISTENED for a minute. "Bear in mind, my friends, I am come among you; and I shall not desert you. I give you my justice, I give you my freedom. Your cause is my cause, world without end. Amen."

"Now wouldn't that jar you?" remarked the policeman. "Holy God, if you'd hear some of the nuts we have to listen to on street corners! What do you suppose that guy thinks he can do, dressed up in Abraham's night-shirt?"

Said Carpenter, "The thrones of the mighty are tottering, and the earth shall belong to them that labor. He that toils not, neither shall he eat, and they that grow fat upon the blood of the people—they shall grow lean again."

"Now what do you think o' that?" demanded the guardian of authority. "If that ain't regular Bolsheviki talk, then I'm dopey. I'll bet the captain don't stand much more of that."

Fortunately, the captain's endurance was not put to the test. The orator had reached the climax of his eloquence. "The kingdom of righteousness is at hand. The word will be spoken, the way will be made clear. Meantime, my people, I bid you go your way in peace. Let there be no more disturbance, to bring upon you the contempt of those who do not understand your troubles, nor share the heartbreak of the poor. My people, take my peace with you!" He stretched out his arms in invocation, and there was a murmur of applause, and the crowd began to disperse.

I pushed my way forward, by virtue of my good clothes, and got through the press about Carpenter, and took him by the arm, saying in my most persuasive manner, "Come on now, let's see if we can't get to the Labor Temple."

There was a crowd following us, of course; and I sought to keep Carpenter busy in conversation, to indicate that the crowd was not wanted. But before we had gone half a block, I felt someone touch my arm, and heard a voice saying, "I beg pardon, I'm a reporter for the Evening Blare."

Now, of course, I had known this must come; I had realized that I would be letting myself in for it if I went to join Carpenter that morning. I had planned to warn him, to explain to him what our newspapers are; but how could I have foreseen that he was going to get into a riot before breakfast, and bring out the police reserves and the police reporters?

"Excuse us," I said coldly. "We have something urgent——"

"I just want to get something of this gentleman's speech——"
"We are on our way to the Labor Temple. If you will come there in a couple of hours, we will give you an interview."
"But I must have a story for our first edition, which goes to press before that."

I HAD Carpenter by the arm, and kept him firmly walking. I could not get rid of the reporter, but I was resolved to get my warning spoken, regardless of anything. Said I, "This is a matter extremely urgent for you to understand, Mr. Carpenter: This young man represents a newspaper, and anything you say to him will be read in the course of a few hours by perhaps a hundred thousand people. If it is found especially sensational, the Continental Press may put it on its wires, and it will go to several hundred papers all over the country——"

"Twelve hundred and thirty-seven papers," corrected the young man.

"So you see, it is necessary that you should be careful what you say—far more so than if you were speaking to a handful of Mexican laborers or Jewish housewives."

Said Carpenter, "I don't understand what you mean. When I speak, I speak the truth."

"Yes, of course," I replied. Meantime I was racking my poor wits figuring out how to present this strange acquaintance of mine most tactfully to the world. I knew the reporter would not tarry long; he would grab a few sentences, and rush away to telephone them in.

"I'll tell you what I'm free to tell," I began. "This gentleman is a healer, a man of very remarkable gifts. Mental healing, you understand."

"I get you," answered the reporter. "Some religion?"

"Mr. Carpenter teaches a new religion."

"I see. A sort of prophet! And where does he come from?"

I tried hard to evade. "He has just arrived——"

But the bloodhound of the press was not going to be evaded.

"Where do you come from, sir?" he demanded of Carpenter.

To which Carpenter answered, promptly, "From God."

"From God? Er—oh, I see. From God! Most interesting! When, may I ask?"

"Yesterday."

"Oh! That is indeed extraordinary! And this mob that you've just been addressing—did you use some kind of mind cure on them?"

I could see the story taking shape; the headlines flamed before my mind's eye—streamer heads, all the way across the sheet, after the fashion of our newspapers:

PROPHET FRESH FROM GOD QUELLS MOB

I came to a sudden decision in this crisis. The sensible thing to do was to meet the issue boldly, and take the job of launching Carpenter under proper auspices. He really was a wonderful man, and deserved to be treated decently.

I addressed the reporter again. "Listen. This gentleman is a man of remarkable gifts, and does not take money for what he does. If you are going to tell about him at all, do it in as dignified a manner as possible."

"Of course! I had no other idea——"

"Your city editor might have another idea," I remarked, dryly. "Permit me to introduce myself." I gave him my name, and saw him start.

"You mean the Mister——" Then giving me a swift glance, he decided it was not necessary to complete the question.

Said I, "Here is my card," and handed it to him.

He glanced at it, and went on, "I'll be very glad to explain matters to the desk, and see that the story is handled exactly as you wish."

"Thank you," I replied. "Now, yesterday I was caught in that mob at the picture theater, and knocked nearly insensible. This gentleman found me, and healed me almost instantly. Naturally, I am grateful, and as I find that he is a teacher who aids the poor and will not take money from anyone, I want to thank him publicly, and help to make him known."

"Of course, of course!" said the reporter.

I thought that was sensation enough, and that the interview would end; but alas for my hopes! Said that bloodhound of the press, "Will you give public healings to the people, Mr. Carpenter?"

To which Carpenter answered, "I am not interested in giving healings."

"What? Why not?" asked the reporter.

C. The little one opened his eyes and a wistful, tender smile spread over his features. "Nice man!" he whispered. "It is all right," Carpenter said. "You are better now," and he added, "What is there so lovely as a little child?"

"Worldly and corrupt people ask me to do miracles, to prove my power to them. But the proof I bring to the world is a new vision and a new hope."

"Oh, I see! Your religion! May I ask something about it?"

"You are the first; the world will follow you. Say to the people that I have come to understand the nature and the causes of their mobs."

"Mobs?" repeated the puzzled young bloodhound.

"I wish to understand a land that is governed by mobs; I wish to know who lives upon the madness of others."

"You have been studying a mob this morning?" inquired the reporter.

"I ask, why do the police of Mobland put down the mobs of the poor, and not the mobs of the rich? I ask, who pays the police, and who pays the mobs?"

"I see! You are some kind of radical!"

I hastened to break in, "Mr. Carpenter is not a radical; he is a lover of man." But then, I realized, that did not sound just right. How the devil was I to describe this man? How came it that all the phrases of brotherhood and love had come to be tainted with radicalism? I tried again. "He is a friend of peace."

"Oh, really?" observed the reporter. "A pacifist, hey?" I thought, "Damn the hound!" I knew, of course, that he had the rest of the formula in his head: "Pro-German!" Out loud I said, "He teaches brotherhood."

But the hound was not interested in my generalities and evasions. "Where have you seen mobs of the rich, Mr. Carpenter?"

"I have seen them whirling through the streets in automobiles, killing the children of the poor."

"You have seen that?" asked the bright reporter incredulously. "I saw it last night."

Now, I had inspected our Times and our Advertiser that morning, and noted that both, in their accounts of the accident, had given only the name of the chauffeur, and suppressed that of the owner. I understood what an amount of social and financial pressure that feat had taken; and here was Carpenter about to spoil it! I laid my hand on his arm, saying, "My friend, you were a guest in that car. You are not at liberty to talk about it."

I expected to be argued with; but Carpenter apparently conceded my point, for he fell silent. It was the young reporter who now spoke.

"You were in an auto accident, I judge? We had only one report of a death, and that was caused by Mrs. Stebbins's car. Were you in that?" Then, as neither Carpenter nor I replied, he laughed. "It doesn't matter, because I couldn't use the story. Mr. Stebbins is one of our 'sacred cows.' Good day and thank you for what you have told me."

HE STARTED away; and suddenly all my terror of newspaper publicity overwhelmed me. I simply could not face the public as a guardian of a Bolshevik! "Young man," I said, "I tell you, Mr. Carpenter is not a radical. Get that clear!" And to the young man's skeptical half-smile, I explained, "He's a Christian!" At which the reporter laughed out loud.

We got to the Labor Temple and found the place in a buzz of excitement over what had occurred in front of Prince's last night. I had suspected rough work on the part of the police, and here was the living evidence—men with bandages over cracked heads, men pulling open their shirts or pulling up their sleeves to show black and blue bruises, which were the result of police attention.

In the headquarters of the restaurant workers, we found a crowd jabbering in a dozen languages about their troubles; we learned that there were eight in jail, and several in the hospital, one not expected to live. All that had been going on, while we sat at a table gluttonizing—and while tears were running down Carpenter's pale cheeks.

The arrival of Carpenter attracted no particular attention. The troubles of these people were too recent for them to be aware of anything else. All they wanted was someone to tell their troubles to, and they quickly found that this stranger was available for the purpose. He asked many questions, and before long had a crowd about him—as if he were some sort of government commissioner, conducting an investigation. It was an all-day job, apparently. I hung around, trying to keep myself inconspicuous.

TOWARDS NOON, came a boy with newspapers, and I bought the early edition of the Evening Blare. Yes, there it was—all the way across the front page; not even a big fire at the harbor and an earthquake in Japan had been able to displace it. As I had foreseen, the reporter had played up the most sensational aspects of the matter: Carpenter announced himself as a prophet only twenty-four hours out of God's presence, and proved it by healing the lame and the halt and the blind—and also by hypnotizing everyone he spoke to, from a wealthy young clubman to a mob of Jewish housewives. Incidentally, he denounced America as Mobland, and called it a country governed by madmen.

I took the paper to him, thinking to teach him a little worldly prudence. Said I, "You remember, I tried to keep out that stuff about mobs—"

He took the sheet from my hands and looked at the headlines. I saw his nostrils dilate, and his eyes flash. "Mobs? This paper is a mob! It is the worst of your mobs!" It fell to the floor, and he put his foot on the flaring print.

Said he, "You talk about mobs—listen to this." Then, to one of the group about him: "Tell how they mobbed you!" The man thus addressed, a little Russian tailor named Korwsky, narrated in his halting English that he was the secretary of the tailors' union, and they had a strike and a few days ago their offices had been raided at night, the door jimmied and the desk rifled of all the papers and records. Evidently it had been done by the bosses or their agents, for nothing had been taken but papers that would be of use against the strike. "Dey got our members' list," said Korwsky. "Dey send people to frighten 'em back to verk! Dey call loans, dey git girls fired from stores if dey got jobs—dey hound 'em every vay!"

Carpenter turned to me. "You have mobs that come at night, with dark lanterns and burglars' tools!"

I HAD noticed among the men talking to Carpenter one who bore a striking resemblance to him. He was tall and not too well nourished; but instead of the prophet's robes of white and amethyst, he wore the clothes of a working-man, a little too short in the sleeves; and where Carpenter had a soft and silky brown beard, this man had a skinny Adam's apple that worked up and down. He was something of an agitator, I judged, and he appeared to have a religious streak.

"I am a Christian," I heard him say; "but one of the kind that speaks out against injustice. And I can show you Bible texts for it," he insisted. "I can prove it by the word of God."

This man's name was James, and I learned that he was one of the striking carpenters. The prophet turned to him, and said:

"Tell him your story." So the other took from his pocket a greasy note-book, and produced a newspaper clipping, quoting an injunction which Judge Wollcott had issued against his union. "Read that," said he; but I answered that I knew about it. I remembered hearing my uncle laughing over the matter at the dinner table, saying that "Bobbie" Wollcott had forbidden the strikers to do everything but sit on air and walk on water. Now I got another view of "Bobbie," this time from a prophet fresh from God. Said the prophet, "Your judges are mobs!"

Soon after the noon-hour, there pushed his way into the crowd a young man, whom I recognized as one of the secretaries of T-S. He was looking for me, and told me in a whisper that his employer was downstairs in his car, and wanted to see Mr. Carpenter and myself about something important. He did not want to come up, because it was too conspicuous. Would we come down and take a little drive? I answered that I should be willing, but I knew Carpenter would not—he had been in an automobile accident, and had positively refused to ride in a motor again.

Then, said the secretary, was there some room where we could meet? I went to one of the officials, and asked for a vacant room where I could talk about a private matter with a friend. I managed to separate Carpenter from his crowd and took him to the room, and presently Everett, the secretary, came with T-S.

The great man shook hands cordially with both of us; then, looking round to make sure that no one heard us, he began: "Mr. Carpenter, I told you I would give a t'ousand dollars to dees strikers. Don't you remember?"

The other's face, which had looked so gray and haggard, was suddenly illumined as if by his magical halo. "I had forgotten it! There are so many hungry in there; I have been watching them, wondering when they would be fed."

"All right," said T-S. "Here you are." Reaching into his pocket, he produced a wad of new shiny hundred-dollar notes, folded together. "Count 'em."

Carpenter took the money in his hand. "So this is it!" he said. He looked at it, as if he were inspecting some strange creature from the wilds of Patagonia.

"It's de real stuff," said T-S with a grin.

"The stuff for which men sell their souls, and women their virtue! For which you starve and beat and torture one another—"

"Ain't it pretty?" said the magnate, not a bit embarrassed.

The other began reading the writing on the notes—as you may remember having done in some far-off time of childhood. "Whose picture is this?" he asked.

"I dunno," said the magnate. "De Secretary of de Treasury, I reckon."

"But," said the other, "why not your picture, Mr. T-S? You are the one who makes the money, and enables everyone else to make it."

IT WAS one of those brand new ideas that come only to geniuses and children. I could see that T-S had never thought of it before; also, that he found it interesting to think of. Carpenter went on:

"If your picture were on it, then everyone would know what it meant. People would say: 'Render unto T-S the things that are T-S's!' When you were paying off your mobs you would pay with your own money, and wherever they spent it, the people would bow to Caesar—I mean to T-S."

He said it without the trace of a smile; and T-S had no idea there was a smile anywhere in the neighborhood. In a business-like tone, he said, "I'll t'ink about it." After a pause he went on, "You give it to de strikers—"

But Carpenter interrupted. "It was you who were going to give it. I can not give nor take money. Your promise was that you would come and give it. Now do so."

"But, Mr. Carpenter, if I vas to do such a t'ing, it would cost me a million dollars. I vould git into a row vit de Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association, dey vould boycott my business dey vould give me a black eye all over de country. You dunno vot you're askin,' Mr. Carpenter."

"I understand then—you are in business alliance with men who are starving these people into submission, and you are afraid to help them? Afraid to feed the poor!" The far-off, wondering look came again to his face. "The world is organized!" he said, to himself. "There is a mob of masters! What can I do to save the people?"

T-S was unchanged in his cheerful good-nature. "You give dem a t'ousand dollars and you help a lot. Nobody can do it all."

But Carpenter was not satisfied; he shook his head, sadly. "Please take this," he said, and pressed the roll of bills back into the hands of the astounded magnate!

HOWEVER, T. S. had come there to get something that day and I thought I knew what it was. He swallowed his consternation, and all the rest of his emotions. "Now, now, Mr. Carpenter! Ve ain't a-goin' to quarrel about a t'ing like dat. Dem fellers is hungry, and de money vill give dem vun good feed." Suddenly he had an inspiration. "I know. I git Mary Magna to give it! She's a voman!"

Carpenter turned with wonder. "Then women are permitted to have hearts?"

"Shoost so, Mr. Carpenter! Ha, ha, ha! Ve business fellers—my Gawd, if you knew vot business is, you'd vunder that ve got hearts enough to keep our blood movin'." [Continued on page 126]

*You need not fear for the future of American literature
when we are developing young writers of the type of Bernice Brown.
Here is her first story for
Hearst's International*

The Big Clumsy Swede

By Bernice Brown

Illustrated by Douglas Duer

*C. Vanda drew up sharply to avoid running into a man.
They looked at each other and there was something searching in the gaze.*

IT WAS a quarter of six by the clock in the station lunch room and the train for Duluth was due in sixteen minutes. Vanda Terschak scrutinized the counters as the hostess of a smart dinner party might satisfy herself of the rightness of her table. In sixteen minutes, fifty hungry travelers would pour out of the day coaches and devastate her counters with the thoroughness of a visitation of locust. But now, the room gave her a genuine esthetic satisfaction.

She liked the white squares of paper napkin laid neatly upon the rough, scoured wood, the precision of each knife and fork and spoon and the jaunty fan of napkin that sprang, triumphant, from each heavy, polished tumbler. Then she inspected the water gauge on the new nickel coffee boiler.

"Gee whiz," she said, "he is boiling like fit to kill already." With quiet fingers, she adjusted the valves. Vanda Terschak was the only one of the girls Gus Lieber allowed to tamper with the mysterious new percolator. "The rest of you Bohunks all thumbs." Gus Lieber's tack was Prussian. "The both hands of Vanda sind right hands once."

It was true that Vanda handled everything with the nice precision of an artist. Her movements were never hurried and she gave little impression of the physical strength most Bohemian girls possess. Her whole body still moved with the unconsciousness and grace of a child and yet she was a woman. To the power of her physical charm, she appeared as unawakened as a girl of twelve though she was essentially maternal.

At five minutes of six, the door from the waiting room was pushed open and a big man in a mackinaw jacket blocked the doorway. His cap was off and his tousled blond hair fell over his forehead. His shoulders were heavy and he stooped as do most men physically overdeveloped. Vanda turned around and the man's blue eyes rested on her shyly.

"I ban hurt a little." He made an awkward gesture with his left hand to the hand that hung stiffly at his side. "Get burn by welding machine. Boss say you put something on. Please——" He smiled at her but his face was gray under the weather beaten bronze of his skin.

Vanda took his wrist and examined the burn. "Gee whiz." Her brow contracted with concentration. "He sure hurt, eh, big Swede?" She looked up into his face and smiled. Then she pushed him into a chair by the counter. "Seena," she called, "fetch the soda and a glass of water." From a cracker box under the counter, she selected a frayed clean napkin and tore it into strips. Seena brought the water, slopping a little on the floor as she walked.

Then he held out his hand to Vanda and he watched her daub on the soda and wrap the narrow white strips around his big calloused fingers. The white of the bandage made his skin as dark as an Indian's. He was ashamed suddenly of his great blunt hand. He was the biggest man in the Northern Pacific Wrecking Gang No. 27. He had earned for himself the title of the "Terrible Swede" but now every inch of his height appalled him.

SUDDENLY, the warning shriek of an engine at the crossing shrilled into the room. It was the 6:01 for Duluth. Vanda led him to the corner and pushed him gently into a chair by the stove. "Wait," she said. Then she went back to the counter. Gus Lieber elbowed open the door from the kitchen, a pie in each hand.

Vanda nodded to him. "That old train ahead tonight, gee whiz," she said. Her cheeks were glowing with the excitement of having to meet an emergency and her eyes looked black. "Quick, Seena, two pitchers of water. There is no time for star looking."

From his corner by the stove, Waldemar Jenssen watched. Sometimes he could not see her as the crowd of men from the train clustered dense around the counter. Dishes clattered, men barked out their orders and Gus Lieber's commands became more German and more guttural. There was something barbaric in the ruthless eagerness of this hungry pack. They gulped their coffee and swallowed their buns as though food were something they had not known for days instead of hours. In ten minutes, the fury abated.

Vanda cleared away the dishes, great piles of them adroitly balanced in her arms. Behind her, the swinging door into the kitchen flicked back and forth like an aspen leaf in midsummer. Finally, the counter was reset for tomorrow and Gus Lieber mopped up the wet floor. Then Vanda came back to her patient.

"Hurt now?" she asked.

He shook his head. "Very fine now. I t'ank you." He stood up awkwardly. "I go now. Good-by." But he did not move.

Vanda Terschak smiled up at him. "Eat a bite here," she said, "with me. I save out something good for you."

A FLUSH of pleasure and embarrassment reddened the bronze of his cheeks. "No," he repeated doggedly, "I go now." Again he did not move.

This time Vanda laughed. "You big bluff," she challenged. "Come here."

He followed her to the counter and she set before him a piece of steak, a great mound of mashed potato and an oatmeal dish full of apple sauce. "There," she said. "Better than the grub at camp, eh?" It was a candid bid for admiration, as naïve and as charming as a little girl's.

The man's eyes lifted to hers slowly and in them burned the defeated longing of one who would speak and has been cheated of words. "It's fine and dandy," he said at last, but Vanda Terschak looked away suddenly from the speech that was rising rapidly in his eyes.

"Here," she said, "I cut him for you. You are like a leetle baby." She laughed delightedly and her elbow touched his coat as she leaned over to reach his plate. "Shall I feed you too?"

He blushed at her raillery. "You t'ink 'big awkward Swede' maybe," he said, "but I ban strong. See." He doubled up his arm in childish defiance.

Vanda pursed her lips and laughed again. "Boo," she said. "You think to scare me?"

He shook his head. "Not scare but make you like me a little."

Again she looked away from the yearning in his eyes. "You talk nonsense, big Swede," she said. "It is time you go now. I close up," she added convincingly.

He rose obediently and followed her to the door. It was February outside, bitter cold and starlight. Across the road, the wind had driven great barricades of snow and the ground between lay bare and stark as a crater. He waited a moment in the doorway, his cap in his hand.

"I see you again, sometimes?" he asked finally.

She shrugged her shoulders. "If you have eyes!" Then she smiled up at him, repentant. "Sure t'ing, big Swede."

"Sunday," he said, "I get whole day off." He waited a moment, twisting the rough cap with his fingers. "I take you snow-shoeing in birch forest, if you let me. We see big wolf track, maybe," he said by way of inducement.

"O-oh," she laughed and pretended to be impressed. "Well, perhaps I go, perhaps. Now, beat it."

For five days he remembered her as she stood there, laughing. But her eyes had not laughed. Her eyes were kind, as kind as her hands had been. A thousand times, he admired the dexterous bandage. All week, he wore it. It became grimy and torn, in spite of the care he took, but he would not remove it.

FINALLY, Sunday came and he called for her at the lunch room. They walked to the edge of the village before he suggested they put on the snow shoes. Then Vanda sat down on a log, her head bent over, her eyes intent on his awkward fingers that struggled to fasten the straps.

"Here," she said, "go way." Their hands touched as she seized the narrow thongs of buck's hide. "You no good at this business. N. G."

Still kneeling before her in the snow, he watched. "There," she said and she laughed down at him. "Now show me a wolf track, big clumsy Swede."

The snow was as fine and as soft as dust, the snow of the bitter cold. It shook down into their faces from the branches of the spruce and fir trees. Overhead was a sky blue as July's with long streaks of white cloud across it.

They had little to say to each other. It was not necessary to speak words in order to fend off the embarrassment silence brings upon the less unsophisticated. For miles they tramped and the shadows grew bluer.

"Gee whiz," she said, "it is late."

So they turned around and followed their own trail back to the village. At the station door, he stopped. "Our camp moves on tomorrow, seventeen miles up the road. A bridge, she is busted. But I come back again next Sunday?"

"All right," she said and laughed. "Next Sunday we hunt for lion tracks, eh?"

Next Sunday Waldemar Jenssen came again and the next and the next. Timidly, stupidly he told her about the farm back in Sweden. There had been too little land and too many sons, so Waldemar had been pushed out. He went to sea then, on the Nun, but the Jenssens were no sailors. At New York, he skipped his boat but he signed on again, this time at Buffalo, on one of the old-fashioned whale-backs that used to carry cargo up and down the Great Lakes. At Duluth, he again skipped ship. A labor scout for the Northern Pacific picked him up in a Finnish saloon down on the point and hired him. For two years, he had followed the railroad south across the desolate prairie still charred and blasted by the great fire that had swept it twenty years before.

Waldemar Jenssen hated the railroad as he had hated the ocean. He belonged to a race of farmers and he wanted a farm. All around him lay the little estates of his countrymen, patches of sandy potato land and thin pastures through which showed the red clay of the soil.

Often he had talked with these farmers and they explained to him how the country was homesteaded. It seemed at first he could never understand them. Finally, he understood and in March he filed his claim.

A fellow countryman in the village of Black Cloud trusted him for the lumber and he started to build his barn. Life is simple up in the north country. Only a hundred miles from the city of Minneapolis lies a country as remote, as foreign as the Steppes of Russia, owned by people who seem to have come, some way, blindfolded from a village in Russia or in Sweden or in black-hilled Bohemia. The sons and daughters of these strangers go to the state's university and, later, some of them go to the senate.

BY JULY, Waldemar had finished his house, he owned two milk cows and the sandy ground had been sowed to potatoes. The last Sunday in June, he drove back to the village for Vanda.

Vanda laughed as he lifted her over the wheel but there was something appealing in his clumsy tenderness. She bent over and rubbed her ankle elaborately where he had scraped it against the side of the box. "You are too damn' strong, big Swede," she said, still laughing. "Next time I help myself in."

After a while they came out of the forest and passed miles of barren pasture, stretching east and west forever and north towards the low curved hills. Finally Waldemar pointed.

"See!" he said.

Vanda wrinkled her nose and squinted. "That black dot?"

He nodded and his eyes glowed with pleasure. "My house that I build. See, too, another dot? My barn and the yellow is my potato patch."

"Gee whiz," she said, "so tiny. How could a big man like you get in that house and your barn is built for one small chicken."

He smiled down at her. "You will see. He is not so damn small as he looked from here."

They did not speak again until they drove into the farmyard. The house was unpainted and the sward in front still blotched with the red clay from the excavation.

Waldemar was like a mother exhibiting a precocious but homely child. "He not very nice yet, I t'ink." But his eyes pleaded for her approval.

Again she laughed. "Pretty good for you. Now I go inside," and she made a comic grimace. "That will be fierce, eh?"

In the doorway, she looked at the one room. The floor was swept and the air was still sweet with the smell of the lumber. In one corner stood a bed and she knew he had tried to draw the rough blanket up smoothly. In another corner, was a cook stove, cluttered with pans and crocks. On the rough deal table by the window, were a Mason jar with a branch of wild cherry, a mail-order house catalog and a Catholic prayerbook printed in Bohemian. Vanda picked up the prayerbook with curious fingers. She knew he was watching her but she did not look at him. After a while she put the book back on the table.

"Now show me the barn," she said.

¶ "He ban here," said Seena, "the new boss of the construction gang. He ban swell fellow." A little apart from the group near the door, Vanda saw the stranger, his cab off, his hands in his pockets.

He explained to her where he was going to store the hay and he led her around to the shed for the plow and the cart and that galaxy of curious, shapeless things one finds only around farmers' barns and the use for which seems obscure.

Behind the barn was a hen tied to a log by a tangled piece of cord. The man's cheeks flushed with embarrassment. "She gad about like a silly woman," he said. He knelt down to unfasten the string, bound tight now around the hen's legs. The bird struggled and fought, beating her wings against the ground in an agony of terror at his roughness.

It was a ridiculous scene and they both knew it, but Vanda Terschak did not laugh. When the bird at last was free, he looked up at her and there were tears in her eyes.

"Vanda," he whispered.

For a long moment, they gazed at each other. Finally, she walked over to him. He was still on his knees, his hands at his sides. A second, she stood there, then she put both hands on his head and drew it gently against her. Timidly, his arms were lifted around her. She knew he was afraid of the strength that lay in them.

"Big, clumsy Swede," she said. "I come. You need me, eh? Yes, I come and help you."

VANDA TERSCHAK gave Gus Lieber, at the lunch counter, one week's notice and she and Waldemar were married in the little Catholic chapel by the Bohemian priest. Late in the afternoon, they drove out again to the farm. Twilight had melted sky and land into a common gray, soft as a pigeon's breast, and the hills to the north were as thin as the pasteboard back-drop of some tremendous, empty playhouse. Birds still chirruped in the underbrush and against the sapphire of the evening sky swerved and curled a flock of swallows.

Waldemar watched them in silence. Finally he spoke. "They are for good luck, the swallows." Shyly, he reached over and touched her hand. "They know you come."

Vanda patted the calloused hand in her lap but her eyes were on the reins, one of which had been crudely mended in a clumsy man's way with a piece of wire.

"You are my good luck," he said, "my swallow. Look at me once, little luck bird."

For an instant, she faced him but the yearning, the dumbness of his pleading choked her. He was so humble, so timid in his great strength. Then she saw that the seam of his sleeve was torn and that he had mended it with great, rough stitches. At once she was glad she had come.

Waldemar was still on his knees, his hands at his side. A second Vanda stood there and then she put both hands on his head. "Big Clumsy Swede," she said, "you need me. Yes, I come and help you."

"Tomorrow I fix that," she thought, "and the harness and we put up some shelves in the kitchen."

In the six weeks that followed, Waldemar thought he had been right. She was his luck bird. Everything she touched prospered. Under her direction, he finished the house, rehung the doors, closed up the cracks in the barn. She discovered, too, how the blade of the plow should be adjusted so that it would cut less deeply into the sandy earth.

The first Sunday in August, Vanda drove alone into the village to go to mass. She had on her wedding dress of white percale and a big white hat with red roses. The skin of her face and throat was wind bronzed and red with health and her teeth were very white. In her eyes and mouth lay a sort of unawakened and wholly unexpected contentment.

Seated high on the driver's seat, her body yielded to the rough jolting of the wagon with something that was almost grace. At the corner by the Lutheran church, she drew up sharply to avoid running into a man. For an instant, they looked at each other and there was something amazed and searching and baffled in that gaze.

With hands that trembled for the first time, Vanda drew in the reins. "Gee whiz," she said. "Better look where you're goin', eh?"

The young man took off his cap and smiled up at her. He was tall and straight and good-looking. Brown curls, cropped short, fitted close to his head which was beautifully modeled. His eyes were blue, his mouth large and turned up a shade at the corners and his teeth were as white as hers.

"Yes," he said. "I shouldn't want to be laid out—now." His cap was still off and she saw the way the sun glinted in his hair and was reflected in his eyes.

Another moment, they stared at each other, then Vanda's horse, impatient of the delay, started on. She did not draw in the reins to stop him nor did she look back. At the church, she got out of the wagon and tied the horse with a rope halter to the wooden paling of the fence.

Inside the church, she knelt down and her lips said over the Hail Mary but it was as though someone else had said it. All through the mass, she did not look behind her but she knew he was there—watching. She did not feel self-conscious, or excited, but when she knelt for the benediction, she knew it was of her he was thinking.

AT THE fence by Vanda's horse, stood the stranger. He was as well dressed as any man from Minneapolis who ever came into Gus Lieber's lunch room and his manner proclaimed his assurance. Again from the driver's box, she looked at him.

"There is a dance tomorrow night at the Rudolf's barn raising." His words were neither command nor entreaty. He knew simply that she would be there. Then he took off his cap again and the sun once more turned the close-cropped locks into glinting bronze.

They did not even say good-by, for his presence did not leave her. All the way back to the farm, it seemed as though she were powerless to move and her eyes saw nothing. She thought, suddenly, of a fairy tale of her childhood and she smiled to herself. "I bet I am enchanted," she whispered finally. "Gee, how funny."

When she came into the one room of the farmhouse, Waldemar looked up suddenly and blushed. He was sitting at the little deal table and before him lay a dozen pieces of paper, torn and ink blotted. It was coarse-grained paper and the pen he used tripped maliciously and left little sprays of ink in its trail. Waldemar's brow was wrinkled and beads of perspiration stood on his upper lip.

"Oh," he said, "you are back too soon." He was like an honest child, caught at a knavish trick. "It was to be a surprise."

C, "It is true. I am not coming," Vanda said. Her face was white but her eyes were calm. "I love you. But you do not need me. To some women it is more to give than to have given to. You I love but him I can help."

Vanda stepped nearer and looked at the arduous scrawls. "What is it?" she asked in perplexity.

"I write those folks in Minneapolis, like you read about in paper—that send you little chicks that are just hatched so you not have to wait for old hen to lay and hatch them herself," Waldemar laboriously explained to Vanda.

"Oh——" Vanda slowly took off her hat and unbuttoned her dress. She stood there before him in her petticoat, her arms and neck bare. "Oh——" she repeated.

The next afternoon, Vanda put on a clean blue gingham dress, shimmery with starch, and harnessed the horse to the spring wagon. She walked to the edge of the potato patch where Waldemar was working and called to him. With questioning eyes, he came towards her. She met his look squarely.

"Look," she said. "I take the clock into town to get fix and then I buy sugar and tea and coffee."

He nodded his assent dumbly.

"Then I have supper at Gus Lieber's and I go to the dance in the Rudolf's new barn. I think I stay all night with Seena afterwards. It will be late."

Again he nodded.

Vanda smiled at him pityingly. He would be lonesome without her. She was sorry for him.

"I have not seen the folks since—since I come here," she said. "Tonight by Rudolf's, we have two fiddles and a zither, like in the old country." A far away look came into her eyes. She was homesick, not for the dirty village in Bohemia that she scarcely remembered, not for the gaiety and excitement of the lunch counter, she was homesick for something intangible, nebulous, something she had never known. She felt oppressed and at the same time exhilarated.

WALDEMAR rubbed the sleeve of his shirt across his face. He was embarrassed at the contrast between her trimness and his grime. He did not want her to go but it would never occur to him to prevent her. She was young and he was thirty. He must remember that.

"Tell Seena she must come here some times, eh?" He wanted her to believe he understood, that he shared her social cravings. "Soon you can show her your chicks. You will be proud then, eh?" he beamed.

Vanda smiled and nodded. "You will see tonight there is clean straw for the cows, and the door to the chicken coop is fastened tight, and plug up the weasel hole beneath the fence."

He smiled slyly at the unflattering minuteness of her directions. "I will try to be as smart like you," he finally told her.

Some way, the hours passed until all the girls at Gus Lieber's piled into Vanda's wagon and started for the dance. They were a noisy crowd, as fresh and light-hearted as though they had not already worked since six o'clock in the morning. Vanda was more plainly dressed than they but at once she was glad. She was no village flirt at a street fair. She would not coquette for his attention. But beneath her hauteur lay another reason. She knew that, for him, her beauty would shine through a thousand dresses of gingham.

Along the fence at the Rudolf's there stood already a half a dozen farm wagons and a pretentiously shiny new roadster. Seena noticed it and pointed.

"See," she said, "he ban here. The new boss of the construction gang." Then she turned to Vanda. "Woof—" and she made a comic, extravagant gesture. "he ban swell guy. A fellah told me he been in Chicago and Minneapolis and Winnipeg and China. And he ban rich." Her voice shrilled with emphasis.

VANDA looked at the girl beside her. "Oh." So he worked for the railroad. Well, she supposed he had to work for someone. It was strange. Perhaps Isolde never wondered either what it was Tristan did. "Come on," she said, but she walked more slowly than the other girls.

A little apart from the group near the door, was the stranger. His hands were in his pockets, his cap off, and his eyes watched the doorway. He stood apart not from snobbishness but from preoccupation. He was like a man on a crowded city corner who catches a memory of April trees and broiling trout stream. When Vanda entered, he came over to the giggling, pushing group of country girls. He and Vanda looked at each other but they did not speak. When the fiddles struck up a noisy folk tune, he slipped his arm around her and led her into the dance.

Vanda and the young man danced as though out of all the millions of people in the world, they alone possessed reality. Their response to each other was as simple, as complete, as the joining of two raindrops on a window pane. After the dance, they followed the others out into the moonlight but they did not loiter near the door so that they might come trooping back the instant a new dance was begun. Instead, they walked on across the pasture, blanched and still in the moonlight. It did not occur to them they had come far, that the dance tunes reached them only as crippled melodies from which distance had shorn all but the accented middle notes. Vanda could supply the lost notes from memory but Michael Collins had been raised on other tunes in another land.

Finally they stood, their eyes looking out over the prairie.

"I have seen the sea like that," he said. "Once I shipped to Rio. I was sixteen. When we started I was the boy that was there to let the cook bedevil him. When we came back, there wasn't a mast I couldn't reach the top of. It's great business, bein' up there with nothing but the sea and the sky and St. Anthony to keep you from plungin' headlong." He shrugged his shoulders cynically but his smile was as ingratiating as a boy's. "Not that I count much on the Saints."

She looked up at him gravely.

"No," he went on, "the world's a fine rose growing on a thistle. It's yours for the picking." He stretched out his hands towards her. "See, my fingers are agile and strong. I can get you the rose—without a scratch, without a thorn prick." They looked at each other in silence. The wind stirred the long grass of the pasture, it caressed their cheeks like the touch of a phantom lover. "Vanda, Vanda—"

SUDDENLY, her arms sought the curve of his shoulders, her temple pressed against his cheek, the smell of her hair was in his nostrils. They never knew how long they held each other. Three tunes were begun and finished in the Rudolf's ballroom and they still stood there. Finally, his lips touched her hair, her eyes.

"Vanda," he said.

She lifted her face to him and their lips met. It was as though all their lives had been nothing but a preparation for this moment. Nothing before had mattered, nothing to come mattered. All the reality of existence was crowded into a moment.

"Listen," he said at last. "Next week I go up to Winnipeg and from there to Quebec. I'm the boss of the division." He held her away from him and looked at her. "I'm always going to be the boss. You're either born that way or you're not. I knew it that first trip I shipped to Rio." This was no theatrical bravado. He was as honest with her as though he were in con-fessional. "Come with me to Winnipeg. It's a big world and I can show it all to you. I can give you everything you want. I'll take you to San Francisco and maybe to China. There'll be big ships and big cities and big oceans. It's the keys to the world I've got here in my pocket."

For a long moment, they looked at each other. She did not move and her arms hung motionless at her sides.

"I'll come." She held up her hand suddenly. "No, first listen." He was standing close to her but he did not touch her. "It is not because of the big cities, or the things you could give me. It is, I don't know—" she lifted her shoulders with a quaint wistfulness, "—it is as though the sun told the willows it was April. Is it a big foolishness that I speak?"

Suddenly, they heard voices across the pasture. She wondered idly whether they had been missed, but neither was oppressed either by regret or embarrassment.

"Come," she said, "it is late."

Slowly they turned and walked back towards the barn, their hands holding fiercely to each other.

"Sunday," he said, "after mass I shall tell you where to meet me."

She nodded. "Sunday. That is six days from now. Six years." She laughed softly, happily. "What if I hadn't nearly run over you, eh?"

He shrugged his shoulders and drew her against him with a sort of desperate tenderness. "What if there hadn't been any world whatsoever?" he asked, laughing lightly.

They clung to each other.

"I love you," he whispered. She pressed her cheek against his and their arms held each other with the fierceness that has in it the knowledge of parting.

"Gee whiz, gee whiz," she whispered. Perhaps there is a providence that hears and interprets even such prayers as this.

ALL THAT week on the farm, Vanda went about her work with a sort of feverish intenseness. She baked and scoured and churned. She even tried to show Waldemar how the curded cheese of the Bohemians was made.

"Why for should I learn?" he demanded. "Is it not enough that you are a master?"

Afternoons, she helped him with the potatoes. She showed him how to raise the oat bin so that the rats could not molest it. She had a hundred plans and Waldemar humored her.

"Next spring," she said, "you should dig a ditch the length of the potato field. The soil to the east is better. Can you remember that?"

He looked down at her and smiled. "Next spring you can remind me," he told her while his eyes smiled.

That Sunday they drove in together to the village. At the door to the church, Waldemar drew up the horse. "I come back when the mass is over."

Vanda puzzled a moment. "No," she said, "meet me at Seena's. I walk a little way with the folks."

He nodded but he did not drive on. For a minute they looked at each other. "Vanda," he said, "there is no one so pretty like you in all Minnesota."

A flush stained her cheeks and crept painfully down her throat. "Oh, go on," she said with an effort. Strange how difficult it was to smile then.

After the service, Collins was waiting for her on the sidewalk. Quite as naturally as though he had been her brother, she left the Rudolf's and went to him.

"Tomorrow night," he said, "I shall leave here at seven o'clock and drive out to your place." He waited a moment but she did not interrupt him. "I shall wait for you at the edge of the pasture where the red rock is. We can make Duluth by morning. You can buy all you want there. Then we'll go on to Winnipeg." He was speaking as calmly as though he were telling her the weather would be fine for the harvest. They did not even shake hands. "Vanda," he said, "it will be tomorrow the beginning of the world for me and I hope for you."

Their eyes burned into each other. "I know," she said.

Then they said good-by and neither one looked back.

As soon as Vanda returned to the farm, she put on her work dress and started for the potato patch. Waldemar, returning from the barn, met her half way. "Vanda," he protested, "you work too hard. Leave a leetle for a big man like me, eh?"

But she shook her head grimly. "Today he is fine weather. Tomorrow?" She shrugged her shoulders. "Go in the house now and smoke." She turned him around, as one would a child, and gave him a little push. "Shoo—" [Continued on page 112]

Q. Some Men still imagine they have a hand in selecting a Wife.
That's why Royal Brown gave this title
to his story

Men Are Such Screams

By Royal Brown

Illustrated by David Robinson

LOVE of adventure sends some men to those far corners of the earth where civilization has established its last outposts; love of woman exiles as many more. For instance, Malcom Coe. In the glow of an August full moon, a certain girl had murmured "No" after she had given him every reason to believe she would murmur "Yes." Straightway somewhere east of Suez, where a lack of any Ten Commandments offers emotional diversion such as Kipling described, seemed fitted to his mood. East of Suez or south of Gehenna, he did not care much which. That the Caribbean should have claimed him was mere coincidence. Mileage was, after all, what counted most.

Now, on this May night almost two years later, he stood gazing down at a little harbor where the lights of a steamer twinkled as vivid against the velvet fabric of the night as the tropical stars themselves. But his thoughts were on neither the lights nor the stars.

These be degenerate days. No matter how far a man goes, sooner or later his mail overtakes him. Advertisements and bills, class reunion notices and club dues; even now and then, a stray wedding invitation. In Malcom's right hand, thrust into the pocket of trim linen riding breeches, was one such. . . .

"Mr. and Mrs. Francis Edward Ballou request the pleasure of your company at the marriage of their daughter to—"

Lyle Louise

Exquisitely engraved, impeccably correct to the last formal period was this. But below, a swift impulsive pen had added:

"Please, please come!"

In the light of the August moon Lyle had lifted her eyes to his, eyes as guileless as were Eve's when she met her lord and master after partaking of the apple.

"Oh, Malcom!" she had breathed, "I'm so sorry! If I had ever dreamed—"

The tropic night with its hot, too unctuous trade wind, its throbbing stars and its great moths beating their wings against the porch lamp, were forgotten. Memory had opened a vista two thousand miles long. The man Lyle was to marry, he did not know even by name. It didn't matter anyhow. He was thinking of that impetuously-penned message—and of Lyle.

"That," he mused, "is like her."

Once he would have been powerless to resist. Now he merely smiled, without bitterness. He was no longer the impulsive, hot-headed youngster who, rejected by Lyle, had risen so impetuously to the challenge a printed page had offered him.

This had taken the form of a newspaper advertisement.

The rubber plantation development to which he found himself committed was all that the newspaper advertisement promised, a tropical forest to be combated, a native village to be organized and made sanitary, all to the end that a little strip of jungle be conquered to serve civilization. The tropics had bronzed him, the daily schedule kept him lean and fit. But the change in him went further than that.

IN THE TROPICS a white man either becomes stronger or is utterly submerged. To Malcom there had come a new and crisper manner of speech, little lines of self-repression and decision had been etched in around his mouth and eyes. But for this his environment and the responsibilities it brought was not wholly responsible. There had been the business of forgetting Lyle.

Love and hate seemed inextricably mixed, and woven through this a thread of sick self-disgust when suppressed emotion surged anew. Days when he forgot Lyle, forgot her twenty times an hour, definitely and finally. Nights when struggling against an incredible loneliness, he realized that, had she been near, he would have humbled himself unspeakably. Then, finally, the blessed day when, handling what had threatened to blaze into a native insurrection he had realized, in the tropic dawn, that he had not had a single thought of Lyle for all of twenty-four hours.

Not once, in all this time, had he been back North, and only once had any of his old friends penetrated his isolation. This had been Billy Pryce, who had dropped in without warning.

"I had an idea that you lived in a Spanish hacienda, surrounded by a colorado, madura harem," Billy had announced. "And here you are in a tin-roofed shanty with about three sticks of furniture. I'm disappointed."

Malcom had smiled. "Sorry, perhaps you'll have better luck next time."

They had talked most of the night—tobacco and reminiscence in the naked light of an unshaded lamp. In the morning, Billy had resumed his trip north on the steamer. But before he went, he had taken several pictures.

From the steamer came a burst of jazz, played on the ship's phonograph. Normally, Malcom would have gone down for dinner and chit-chat with the ship's officers. But tonight he had a guest. The Velasquez, arriving just before sunset and sailing at noon tomorrow, had brought Preston from the home office and he, at the moment, was busy at Malcom's desk with the statistical stuff that was a part of Malcom's daily routine. He must, Malcom thought, be about through, and he turned and entered his quarters.

Preston looked up. He was a big man, with a shining bald head about which a great moth fluttered fascinatedly.

"I'm taking you North with me, Coe," he announced, abruptly and with no introduction.

This was breath-taking, for Malcom realized its significance.

"Well?" demanded Preston, with a grin.

Malcom recovered himself, and answered, "I might say that this is so sudden and unexpected and all that sort of thing."

"It didn't take me long to pack when the news came," retorted Preston.

Malcom nodded. Irrelevantly he remembered that Lyle was to be married on the twenty-ninth, and this was the sixteenth. . . .

"They kept me sweating for three years," Preston continued, feelingly. "You're damned lucky to be pulled North so soon, Coe."

"I know I'm lucky," he acknowledged, "and yet in some ways—"

"Wait until you see the bright lights!" prophesied Preston enthusiastically.

In New York there were bright lights, color and motion—all that Preston had hinted at. To a man back from the tropics, there was chance for infinite diversion. But Malcom was to see a lot of New York anyway and as a prelude to promotion he had been presented with a long deferred vacation which he was now eager to enjoy.

Standish, situated on the north shore of Cape Cod, had never been his home, but it had been his playground in other years. That, doubtless, was adequate explanation of why his thoughts turned thither. Lyle was probably there, but no emotion, save perhaps curiosity, stirred at the thought of seeing her again.

The motors were whirring. A girl in a white Fiat looked up at him, their eyes met. She smiled, half-maliciously, half-amusedly, and he recognized her.

"The man," she murmured, offering him a small and very much tanned hand, "actually remembers me. I'm flattered!"

"Of course I remember you! You're Penelope Ballou—"

"Penelope—always raveling and unraveling!" she quoted. "May I have my hand back again? I'm not Lyle, remember—only her little sister."

"You're terribly tanned," she went on, mercilessly, "but you still blush as becomingly as ever. Are you coming to Lyle's wedding?"

"I don't know. I'm only here for a few days—sort of a vacation before I go to work again."

"It would please Lyle immensely—she hopes to have a long line of mourners present, you know. But then, every girl does!"

THE MEMORY of the three words penned on his invitation made him color anew. He wondered now to how many other suitors of other years Lyle had sent that same message and, in spite of his indifference, he felt subtly deflated. He remembered, too, that Penny—for so everybody called Lyle's sister—had ever had that effect on him. She had been only sixteen when he had been mad about Lyle, but she had had a barbed tongue even then.

"Where are you putting up?" she demanded.

"At the Inn," he replied and, glancing around, saw the Inn's bus about to depart. He turned back to Penny. "I'm glad to have seen you—"

"I doubt it!" she retorted and, without pause, added, "Let the bus go. I came to meet dad but he's not here. I'll drop you at the Inn myself."

Malcom acquiesced. As he seated himself, she set one trim pump on the starter and, further busying herself with the instrument board, offered him chance for a swift appraising glance. She was not the least bit like Lyle and she had no suggestion of her sister's beauty.

This far had he got when she glanced up at him—the direct, candid-eyed glance of a very modern young person who, having thoughts of her own, is never averse to speaking them.

"Have I changed much?" she demanded.

"Very little."

"What a blow! In stories, you know, the long leggy little sister always develops into a raving beauty."

"You were never long and leggy," he reminded her.

That was the truth.

"And Lyle inherited all the beauty there was in the family anyway," she finished coolly, with another direct glance.

"Who is she going to marry?" Malcom asked.

"Oh, Robert comes from Philadelphia—but he's not so slow at that. Forty, madly in love with Lyle and rotten with money. She'll be happy."

Her eyes were ahead again. Lovely as Lyle she never would be, but she did have a fine, straight little nose and a purposeful chin.

"I rather think myself," she observed, "that my profile is the best part of me. But it's so darn difficult to always keep it in evidence."

Malcom started, then smiled. "I've heard," he countered, "that it's the latest thing for debs and sub-debs to discuss themselves as if they were bills of merchandise or something of that sort."

The Fiat, which she handled with cool and careless competency, turned into the main street of Standish. Here she slowed down a little and looked up at him again.

"You haven't changed such an awful lot yourself," she observed. "I'm disappointed. I suppose it's because you lack the tropical setting and the spiffy soldiers-of-fortune suit you wore while disporting yourself there."

"How did you know about that?" he demanded.

"Billy Pryce showed everybody the snaps of you," she explained. To that she added, without the quiver of an eyelash, "I made him give me one and I was mad about it—for almost a month. Aren't you flattered?"

SO THIS was the modern method! Confronting it, Malcom felt absolutely antiquated. But he managed to smile at her. "Terribly!" he confided.

"I only told you because Lyle would have anyway. She found it in my bureau drawer where she had no business."

The negotiation of a passage between two cars engaged her for the fraction of an instant. Then:

"Besides," she went on, "I'm supposed to be still having a mad, hopeless crush on you. That's what makes Tommy Judd so determinedly attentive to me."

"And who is Tommy Judd?" asked Malcom, seeking change of subject.

"Harvard, twenty-three. He dances rather well and is sort of cute, too. And you see, it's time I had some sort of a man. Lyle says —"

Malcom braced himself against a collision that seemed inevitable as the Fiat took a corner.

"Good Lord!" he murmured, as the danger passed and he relaxed a little.

"He should have blown his horn!" defended Penny.

"You didn't blow yours!"

"I was thinking about Tommy—men are such screams. I had to invent some way of getting his interest—I'm not Lyle, you know. Your reappearing this way is rather a blow. But—if I do look languishingly at you—" she paused apparently to practice—"he'll be just darn jealous enough to propose—"

"Look here," protested Malcom, "I'm not sure that I—"

Penny gave him a cool amused glance. "Don't get excited!" she advised. "It won't hurt you and I'd like being engaged to him. It would be great fun, especially as dad raves and froths at the mouth every time his name is mentioned in the house."

In the glow of an August full moon a certain girl had murmured "No."

The Inn, an old Colonial mansion that had been remodeled and enlarged, was at hand. Penny brought the Fiat to a standstill at the curb.

"It would help some if you seemed interested," she suggested, rather casually. "But don't, of course, if it's too much trouble."

A bell-boy shot out and captured Malcom's bag and lingered for the owner who stood looking at his smiling companion.

"Thank you for the lift," was all Malcom could say, with this audience at hand.

"One good turn deserves another," she quoted, and added, "I'll warn Lyle that you're back. A woman always wants to look her best when a rejected lover reappears, you know. You'll receive a royal summons to the throne just as soon as she has made herself utterly adorable."

IN WHICH Penny proved herself a true prophet. Malcom found himself directed to the telephone just as he finished with dinner.

"Penny told me you were here—such a very pleasant surprise!" came Lyle's voice. "Are you going to be at the Pierce's tonight?"

"No. I've just arrived. Nobody knows I'm here—"

"Do come over then. I'll hurry my dressing, if you will. Robert isn't to come for me until nine—we'll have time for a few words anyway if you get here at a quarter before. I'm just dying to hear all about you—"

The old, old Lyle! Malcom reflected, swiftly, that he must meet her sooner or later—and it might as well be sooner. Phrasing this more flatteringly, he assured her that he would be most happy to come. At a quarter before nine, as he walked up the path towards the Ballou summer place, a voice called out to him from the brick-paved porch that, flanking the east end, overlooked the sea, a voice whose tone had often thrilled him.

"I'm here!" it said carrying a note of genuine command.

No, Lyle had not changed. The dusk left her all but indistinguishable as she offered him her hand, but he realized that she was ready for the dance at the Pierce's and memory limned in her features.

"You've been very successful, haven't you?" she ventured, in that voice which, deliberately patterned after Ethel Barrymore's, had once stirred him so.

"Oh, I wouldn't say that. I—"

"And I think that you ought to be a little grateful to me!" she went on. She placed slim fingers on his arm and looked up at him. "Aren't you—just a little bit?"

This was unsettling, bewildering. In spite of himself and his absolute belief that the old feeling was dead, something as old as Adam stirred in him. But she did not wait for him to answer anyway.

"You ought to be!" she announced. Then, her voice almost wistful, she added, "I—I think it was well you went so far away, Malcom. If you had stayed we both might have been a little foolish. I knew it wasn't for our happiness, and yet—"

A motor turned into the drive. As its searchlights swung an arc, they illuminated the porch—and the speaker's face.

"Penny!" he gasped.

The light lingered on her face long enough to reveal her smile.

"I did get away with it, didn't I?" she demanded, serenely enough. "I thought I could. I think I could be an actress if I were better looking—I am a born mimic! I used to mimic you to Lyle—you'd have died if you could have heard her laugh. And I think you ought to be grateful to me at that. Because otherwise she might have married you."

Malcom, however, hardly heard that. "Was it you that telephoned?" he demanded.

"No, that was Lyle. I overheard her. She'll be down herself in a minute, but—oh gosh, I did have you going, didn't I?"

The motor had come to a standstill.

"Just a moment, Tommy," Penny called. Lowering her voice, she added, "He'll ask me if I was with you and I'll tell him I was, and he'll be a riot the rest of the evening. He'll never guess I was just stealing Lyle's stuff."

Expertly and with a profound disregard for evening wrap and high-heeled slippers, she vaulted the rail and joined the waiting Tommy. The motor having whirled away, it dawned upon Malcom that Lyle was probably waiting for him inside.

The butler informed him that Miss Lyle was "hin the library, sir," and there Malcom discovered her, very beautiful in décolleté. She was standing, pensively, beside the table. As he entered, she looked up, with that quick vivacious smile he remembered so well.

"You are late!" she reproached. "But—" she offered her hand.

"I'll forgive you because you've come so far to my wedding."

Never a quiver of an eyelash as she said that. If anything she was more beautiful than he remembered.

"I hoped," she went on, "that you would, Malcom, if only to be sure that you had forgiven me. I've often wondered just how you felt."

THEY were, however—thanks to Penny—to have literally just a moment together after all, for the bridegroom-elect appeared then. Lyle, with an instant lapse into the formal, turned to introduce him.

"You've heard me speak of Malcom Coe many times, Robert," she suggested to that gentleman.

"Of course," agreed Robert Frazer—although he hadn't.

Lyle picked up her wrap and Robert sprang to drape it over her shoulders.

"Can't we drop you at the Inn?" she asked Malcom.

But Malcom said he'd prefer to walk, and so they said good-by.

"It was good of you to drop in informally," Lyle added graciously. "Please come again."

Everything considered, this was nevertheless, Malcom, as modest as the average man can be expected to be, suspected that Lyle would have developed that other note had not Frazer appeared.

Now this may have done Lyle an injustice. On the other hand, Penny herself would have bet anything on the fact that Lyle would do just that.

"The more standoffish he is the harder she'll try to get him started," she mused. Then she glanced at her wrist-watch. "Darn Tommy, I wonder where he is!"

This was the next morning. She and Tommy were to play

Q. "Tommy needs a jolt. He promised to meet me at ten and it's five minutes past now."

Q. They were literally, thanks to Penny, alone for just one minute.

nine holes. She, hatless as usual, sat on the steps of the club house at the Country Club.

"I'll give him just one minute more," she thought and, looking up, saw Malcom. "Hello, there, Malcom!" she said, in her most nonchalant manner. "Are you going around this morning?"

"If I can find somebody to get a guest card——" he answered.

Penny rose with effortless grace. "I'll get you one—provided you'll play with me," she said.

Malcom hesitated. He was already a little afraid of Penny. It had become apparent to him that one never knew what she would say—or do—next.

"I'm way off my game," he evaded. "The opportunity to practice has been slight."

"I don't mind. Tommy needs a jolt. He promised to meet me at ten and it's five minutes past. And that will never do"—she grinned boyishly—"even if I really ought to be ashamed of myself."

"Did Tommy say that?"

"Last night. Isn't it funny how men get that way. He's so darn jealous that he raves every time I mention your name. So I mention it often."

"I'd feel flattered if it weren't that——"

"You needn't be. Tommy is just approaching that condition where any man I talk to is a menace. Funny part of that is that he told me only a week ago that it was a relief to meet a girl a man could be just friends with, without a lot of nonsense, for once."

"Is that why you're reducing him to pulp?" ventured Malcom.

Penny gave him a quick glance. "Gosh, but you are intelligent—for a man!" she approved. "Of course no girl wants to be told that she's as bad as that—or that what he likes about her is that she's got brains. That is almost too much to stand."

"Did he say that?" he asked.

Penny nodded. "I'm the first member of my sex who has ever been able to meet him on the lofty intellectual plane he lives on. He told me that he wasn't the marrying kind—but I'll bet he'll eat that yet!"

This seemed probable. Tommy appeared just as Malcom and Penny were driving from the first tee. He vouchsafed them a distant nod that was intended, obviously, to indicate an entire lack of interest, but which, nevertheless, carried the suggestion of a glower.

"I'll bet anything that he invites Mildred Malloy to go around with him," Penny prophesied. "He told me only yesterday that he thought she was an awful fluff, but he'll think I'll be jealous just the same. Men are such screams!"

Expertly she stooped and prepared a tee. Then, with the same careless competency that seemed to feature everything she did, she drove straight and true for a surprising distance.

"You do that darn well!" he exclaimed, with real appreciation.

"Too darn well!" she retorted. "Most men don't like to play with me. What they want is a girl who fozzles and looks helpless—oh, they do!"

"I had no intention of disputing you, I assure you!" interposed Malcom, mildly.

He drove in turn, watched the ball and then looked at her to see what she thought of it.

"You are off your game!" she agreed.

Of that there could be no question. She beat him unmercifully.

"I suppose you'll never forgive me," she observed, as they returned to the club house. "Men never do."

"Don't you ever beat Tommy?" Malcom questioned her. "Egypt's Queen, no! I always go to pieces at the crucial moment. Still I'm not as much of a hypocrite as Mildred Malloy—look at her now."

Malcom looked at Mildred to whom, even as Penny had prophesied, Tommy was devoting himself.

Penny grimaced. "Can't you hear her say, 'Oh, I'd give anything if I could drive the way you can, Tommy! But I know I never will.'"

Then with a swift change of expression, "Egypt's Queen, here's Lyle! I'm off," she cried, and immediately left him.

David R.

Q. "Darn Tommy—where is he?" Penny demanded.

ONCE he would have thanked her for this. Now he felt abandoned. The smile with which Lyle greeted him failed to give him reassurance. She was in colorful sport trappings but she confessed that she had come for luncheon and not for golf. Robert was to meet her—he must, she felt quite sure, be around somewhere. But when Malcom offered to search him out about the club house, she merely gave him a half-bantering, half-provocative glance from under carefully treated lashes.

"There was a time," she murmured, "when you wouldn't have been quite so anxious to find him."

The lightness of her tone made that permissible. There being no escape short of boorishness, he played the game very well, until Robert arrived to set him free.

"Sally Some told me that she was sending you a card to her dance this evening," Lyle told him then. "I'll see you there, of course. You won't fail to come?"

With that she went off, leaving Malcom to recover.

"Whew!" he thought, "I think that on the whole I prefer Penny's directness."

Of that he was at least to get more samples. Sally Some, not content with the card for her dance, telephoned him and exacted from him a promise that he would appear.

He kept this promise and Penny promptly fell upon him—Penny ecstatic-eyed, and wearing a gorgeous bunch of violets.

"Thank you!" she breathed. "So much!"

"For what?" he asked, utterly bewildered.

"For these," she touched the violets. "It was sweet of you, after I beat you at golf. I'll take back all I ever said about men."

"But," protested Malcom, ineptly, and then something in her eyes silenced him. He glanced about and there, sure enough, stood the fiercely glowering Tommy.

"It was sweet of you to wear them," he retorted, in a voice intended to carry to Tommy's ears.

This she did not at once answer. Then her eyes came back to his.

"You are a duck!" she said breathlessly. "Tommy's gone out looking as if he'd like to commit murder. If you'll just absolutely insist upon about five dances—it won't be so awful, I dance rather well—I can see Tommy's finish."

Malcom surprised even himself—strange it is how swiftly men can slip into old habits—by countering with, "Only five!"

Penny gave him a swift glance. "Gosh, but you are a glutton for punishment," she said. "But I've only five left—including this one," she added significantly.

As she had said, she danced very well. He told her so, when the music stopped after the last encore.

"Thank you," she said, demurely. "Do—do you mind very much if I look at you adoringly. Tommy says that the way I look at you makes him sick——"

D.R.

Q. "You're a duck!" Penny told Malcom.

The cymbals crashed, the saxophone shrieked and so, with the other instruments striving to make themselves heard, the orchestra plunged anew into what is called dance music these days. The first bars brought Tommy towards them. He nodded ever so curtly to Malcom and austere reminded Penny that this dance was his. As they departed, Malcom remembered that he must ask Lyle for a dance. She, her smile mocking him, displayed a full card and looked for his disappointment.

"You should have come sooner, Malcom," she said.

"Better late than never," retorted Malcom, and coolly erased a "Robert" from the space beside the next fox-trot and wrote down his own name.

When he returned the card, she lifted her eyebrows. "Oh well, Robert won't mind," she acquiesced. "He's a dutiful, rather than enthusiastic, partner."

"I," said Malcom gallantly, "can't quite believe that!"

Eventually he claimed Penny again. "Well?" he demanded, as she surrendered herself to him and they swung out into the floor, "How's Tommy now?"

"Oh, he begged my pardon for running off with Mildred this morning. And he asked me to play with him tomorrow morning. But I told him I couldn't."

"Why not?" demanded Malcom.

"Have you forgotten that I'm playing with you?" she asked with great directness of gaze and purpose.

Malcom missed a step. "Sorry," he apologized contritely.

"All my fault," she assured him sweetly. "And I told him I couldn't go sailing with him tomorrow afternoon because you had already asked me. But he'll never know if—if you ask me now," she suggested with little subtlety.

MALCOM came to. "I do," he said. "I ask you now, and I feel very much flattered——"

"You look—startled!" she commented. "But I'll try not to bore you and anyway it will protect you from Lyle. She can't bear the thought that you have got over it and I warn you she'll vamp you every chance she gets. Oh, don't drag Robert into it. Lyle is Lyle, you know!"

Lyle herself was to furnish fresh proof of that. She chose deliberately to sit out her dance with him on the porch. If she blushed—which is doubtful—the dusk hid her blushes. She worked towards her end in the same indirect, insidious way, letting her voice rather than the words she used, point her meaning.

"You have," she murmured, "got over it—after all, haven't you? I knew you would, and yet——"

She let it hang there, to his discomfort. She had managed at once to strike a note that was almost hypnotic, so obvious was his cue and her desires with reference to the trend of the conversation into which she was determinedly forcing him and from which, at a glance, Malcom saw no easy way of escape.

"And if I should say that I hadn't," he thought grimly, "she'd open her eyes wide and say, 'Why, Malcom—have you forgotten that I'm to be married?'"

Robert's approach was, therefore, a relief to him. Malcom made up his mind, definitely, to avoid tête-à-têtes with Lyle.

That which occurred two days later on the porch of the Country Club was therefore not of his seeking. The more so in that he suspected, from her manner, just what she was about to say.

"Penny," she announced maliciously, "was having a lover's quarrel with Tommy when I left the house. But I think she'll be here soon."

The shot went home. Malcom was indeed waiting for Penny. "What," Lyle went on, in a drawl that had once quickened him so, "are you trying to do to Penny, anyway, Malcom?"

"What," retorted Malcom, ruefully, "is Penny trying to do to me I'd like to know?"

This was a tactical mistake. He laid himself open to Lyle's swift thrust.

"Make you rather ridiculous, I should say," she assured him, too sweetly.

This he did not doubt. In Standish there were many of the old crowd, but he had seen little of them, except ever so casually. The most of his time had been monopolized by Penny. He had golfed with her, swam with her, sailed with her and danced with her. He had, in brief, been maneuvered into a position where he was being used by a sub-deb to further what he had at first whimsically dubbed her own nefarious ends. But Standish, of course, didn't know that and he was beginning to feel a bit conspicuous—and ridiculous.

"Here she is now," murmured Lyle, and lifted expressive eyebrows as Penny slid herself out of the white Fiat without pausing to open the door. "The funny part of it is that in the old days she never missed a chance to poke fun at you."

"I think," retorted Malcom, goaded to it, "that in the old days I must have been very funny, Lyle."

Lyle smiled. "You were!" she assured him. "But not half so funny as you are now. Can't you see that she's just using you to make Tommy jealous?"

This was a good exit line and Lyle was preparing to use it so, but Malcom surprised her by saying, "So she herself told me," he assured her.

Lyle paused. "She did!" Then she lifted expressive eyebrows in lieu of spoken comment, and moved off as Penny came up to the porch.

"Sorry I'm late," she apologized. "But Tommy's been throwing fits——"

"Isn't it about time that you took pity on Tommy?" interposed Malcom quickly. "It seems to me that you're treating him pretty rotten, if you'll pardon——"

Penny gave him a swift, inscrutable glance. "The worse Lyle treated you the faster you crawled back for more," she reminded him.

Without waiting for an answer to that she added:

"I don't know what Lyle was saying to you just now—but I'll bet I could guess. I've had a good many years in which to study her and I'm sure I've learned a few things about my beautiful sister and her methods."

"I'm not so sure. What she said," Malcom hesitated, and then plunged—"was that I was always funny—but that now I'm funnier than ever."

"That was rather clever of her. And of course you hated

Q. "I told him you weren't the least bit—in love with me—but he thinks you are."

Q. "The worse Lyle treated you the faster you crawled back for more," Penny coolly reminded Malcom.

the very idea of it. Particularly when it came from her."

"I don't particularly care for it," he admitted ruefully.

She did not answer at once. Her eyes went out over the links leaving her profile, with its fine short nose and its purposeful chin towards him, and he again studied it carefully.

"I'm sorry," she said, presently, with an air of repentance.

"Don't be!" he answered. "It doesn't matter. I'm going tomorrow anyway."

"Tomorrow?" Her eyes, wide with incredulity, sought his. "You're not going to stay until the wedding?" she asked.

Malcom shook his head. He had not, up to the instant that he spoke, had the slightest idea of going on the morrow, but the idea had come to him and it had seemed an inspiration. He could very easily finish his vacation elsewhere or even return to New York at once. He realized that she was waiting for an explanation and he promptly fell back on that which all women hate because it is one they can not question.

"It's unexpected," he admitted. "But business——"

"If you're going tomorrow, Malcom," she cut in, swiftly, "you must come to the picnic with me tonight."

"Picnic?" he asked in a tone of genuine surprise.

"I promised Tommy I'd go. We're going out to Captain Kidd's Island in the motor-boat with Mildred Malloy and one of Tommy's friends to have dinner there. The moon will be full tonight and just glorious."

"I'm sorry, but I can't. I've got to pack, you see," he answered, rather lamely.

Penny seemed about to protest but evidently changed her mind. The picnic was not again mentioned during their nine holes of golf. Malcom was back on his game now—nor did she say anything more about his going. When they returned to the club house, she offered him a lift to the Inn and this he accepted. The two miles were swiftly covered, but even so conversation lagged. He, considering her, realized that he was going to miss her mightily. The impulse to put that into words came as the Inn appeared. "This is good-by, I suppose," he began. "I probably won't see you——"

Penny stepped on the accelerator and the Inn flashed by.

"I'm going to kidnap you," she announced, her eyes on the road. "You must come. And—please don't tell Tommy you're going! I've told him that you aren't the least bit—in love—with me, but he—he thinks you are. And that helps. I think that tonight's my—last chance," she added.

SO MALCOM found himself, acquiescent in the party that Tommy's swift thirty-footer just landed at sunset at Captain Kidd's Island—so named because of the inevitable legend. He already wished himself anywhere but there, not because he was an obvious fifth in what would otherwise have been a perfect foursome, and not—surely—because Penny had permitted Tommy to monopolize her all evening.

The explanation he gave himself was that, for the first time, he was seeing swift and twenty, as typified by Milly Malloy, in action. Penny had not prepared him for this, she at least had always been amusing. Milly was not.

"I wish I'd brought my bathing suit," Milly was announcing to Tommy's friend. "It would be gorgeous to take a swim in the moonlight after dinner."

"Why bother about a bathing suit?" demanded Tommy's friend in a casual tone.

In Malcom's old days a man who dared that would have been promptly read out of polite society. But Milly only giggled.

They had their picnic in a sheltered stretch between great dunes. A fire was built and to this Malcom devoted himself, glad for that much diversion. He felt as old as the everlasting hills and he wondered if he had ever seemed as crassly ignorant and cocksure as Tommy and his friend were.

"You ought to see my old man trying to play golf," Tommy's friend was saying to Mildred. "Say, but that bird is a scream. He asked me to give him a lesson, but once was enough. Solid ivory above the ears!" Malcom knew the boy's father by reputation. He had started with nothing and achieved so greatly that bigger men than his son would ever be, hung on his nod. But that did not save him from his son's satire.

"He's got nothing on the governor," Tommy chimed in. "I'll bet your old man could give mine a stroke a hole and beat him."

Tommy's friend did not answer that. He turned to Milly.

"I'll say you're some curly pig," he was assuring her, in the free manner of a modern youth. "Let's park."

Malcom rose. "I'm going to take a walk," he announced.

THE BREEZE was off the sea. To Malcom, who had lived so long in the tropics, it seemed crisp and clean washed, grateful. Presently he swung to the top of a great dune. The moon's rim, like a huge iridescent orange all but submerged in the sea, shone against the eastern horizon. He stood and watched it, but his thoughts were elsewhere.

The picnic fire had been permitted to die out. From behind him came a squeal from Milly.

"A pretty party!" he thought.

The picture that presented did not involve Milly at all. Without warning he felt a sudden surge of emotion that startled him and left him utterly agast.

"Good Lord!" he exclaimed presently. "I'm not going to be that kind of a fool twice, I hope."

Nevertheless, the thought of Penny—and Tommy—

The coast lights twinkled and glowed in the distance. The revolving light at the harbor's entrance, making its long swing, flashed its benignant beam on him. Finally he glanced at his watch. It was almost ten. The tide was on the make, but it would not be full for four hours yet. He recalled that up to half-tide it was possible to walk dryshod along the sandbars to the mainland. From that point it was ten miles into Standish but—

The moon had encountered a low lying bank of cloud and its light was masked, but Tommy's voice guided him to where the last embers of the picnic fire glowed.

"Either you care for me or you don't," Tommy was saying. "It's come to a show-down. Penny——"

Eavesdropping was not Malcom's intention. He would have

1. Lyle chose deliberately to sit out her dance with Malcom on the porch.

2. "Gee, but you are a glutton for punishment," Penny cried approvingly.

retreated had not Penny realized his presence even as he saw them.

"Shh!" she warned Tommy.

Once again Malcom felt that sudden, surprising surge of emotion. But he fought it down determinedly.

"Sorry to interrupt," he apologized, his voice determinedly light. "But I'm going to walk in, if you don't mind. I can just make it before the tide covers the bars."

"Why, it will take you hours, Malcom!" protested Penny.

"I feel like walking," he replied—and started then and there.

The moon, riding free in all its beauty, was paling the stars, but he was plainly in no mood to enjoy the beauty of the night. Vigorous exercise was giving him the sole emotional outlet he craved. He did notice, however, that the running lights of Tommy's thirty-footer passed back into the harbor as he reached the mainland.

Now and then, as he strode swiftly along the road that fringed the harbor, the searchlights of on-rushing motors spotlighted him and he stepped aside to let these whirl past. He had covered half the distance to the Inn when one of these motors, instead of speeding by, slowed down and finally came to a full stop as he came abreast of it.

"I ran out to give you a lift the rest of the way," explained Penny's voice.

"I prefer to walk, thank you," retorted Malcom. Taken unawares he spoke without stopping to consider, and even he was surprised at the ungracious sound of that.

Penny, however, merely silenced the motor and stepped forth.

"All right," she said. "I'll walk, too."

Malcom stopped short and, against his will, looked at her.

Her little face was—or at least it seemed so to him—almost lovely there in the moonlight.

"Why," she asked quickly, "are you angry with me?"

"I'm not," he assured her, as quickly.

"You—you didn't mind my inviting you and then hardly speaking to you?"

THIS took Malcom by surprise. "Why should I?" he asked.

Ever so briefly she hesitated. Then, "I thought—you might—if—you—if you loved me just a little."

The words sank to almost a whisper, but her eyes did not falter. They became deep, mysterious, compelling, she seemed all eyes. He felt a swift and heady impulse that all but swept him off his feet before he chilled to a swift suspicion.

"Are you trying to vamp me now, Penny?" he asked and marveled at the lightness of tone he achieved.

She gave him a long, long look. Then, "Thank you!" she murmured and would have turned away had he not caught at her.

"What are you trying to do to me, then?" he demanded, and there was no lightness in his tone now. "You told me that you were using me to make Tommy jealous. You've got Tommy—what more do you want?"

"Nothing," she replied. But then she added impetuously—fiercely almost, "Do—do you think that I'd go to all that trouble for Tommy? Tommy—oh, Tommy makes me sick!"

"Makes you sick?" he echoed, in his dense masculine way.

"Why, you said—"

"I suppose," she cut in, scornfully, "that it was because of Tommy that I worked so darn hard to prevent Lyle from marrying you two years ago. She might have if it hadn't been for me. And I suppose it was because of Tommy that I stole one of Lyle's wedding invitations and wrote 'Please, please come,' on it and sent it to you—"

"You wrote that, Penny?" he gasped, incredulously.

The moonlight was merciless; it did not spare her swift blush. But:

"I did," she confessed, dauntlessly. "I half hoped you would come, and half hoped you wouldn't—because I knew it would be only because you thought Lyle wrote it."

Then I did what I said I was doing except that—that I was using Tommy to try to make you jealous. I told you that I felt that tonight was my last chance—" She broke off and for the first time her eyes fell. "Oh, I know what you're thinking, and, and I wouldn't marry you now for anything."

"Penny—" he began, "you don't realize what you're—"

"I know," she rushed on, heedlessly, "that you think I'm absolutely shameless. But if you think that girls nowadays are going to sit around with their hands in their laps, waiting for some man to fall in love with them, you've got another guess coming. Especially when they're as hopelessly homely as I am—"

"You're not homely," he challenged quickly. "You're—"

He broke off abruptly, making one last supreme effort for self-mastery.

"Say it!" she commanded.

"Adorable!" he blurted out.

"Gosh!" she breathed, and her uplifted eyes were mysterious once more, "why you—you must be even more in love with me than I'd suspected, to think that! I—oh, Malcom—what are you waiting for now?"

The man in the moon found his vision momentarily veiled by a malicious little cloud, but he hastily brushed this aside.

"Ah!" said he, with an immense and—considering the times he has witnessed that very sight—incredible satisfaction.

"They'll accuse me of cradle robbing," Malcom was saying. "And yet I never had the slightest intention of falling in love with you—"

"Men are such screams!" murmured Penny. "I don't care what you intended as long as you have. You have—haven't you, Malcom?"

Of that he left in her mind and his—not the slightest doubt.

C. "Gosh!" Penny breathed, "Why—You must be more in love with me than I suspected!"

C. "Either you care for me or you don't," Tommy was saying. "It's come to a show-down Penny."

The Inside Story of

HENRY FORD'S JEW- MANIA

The Strange Adventures of No. 25 H

By
Norman Hapgood

PART THREE

STEP UP, Ladies and Gentlemen, and meet investigator No. 25 H. He has a leading rôle in this instalment.

If this farce-tragedy had not its serious side, I should wish for the style of Alice-in-Wonderland. That master of grotesque dreams, Sir John Tenniel, who drew for Lewis Carroll the pictures we all know of the White Rabbit, the March Hare, and the Cheshire Cat, would exactly meet our purpose.

In our tale are many elements that intermingle and affect one another. When last month I exhibited the counter-protocols, that were forged to get even with the people who were marketing the anti-Jew Protocols, I expected this month to set forth the original forgeries. But other quaint doings claim priority and the Protocols go over to next month. This month 25 H and the other heroes appear in their brilliant rôle of protecting the country against thinkers of the type of Miss Jane Addams, Col. House, and Mr. Justice Brandeis.

Let the reader keep in his gigantic brain the fact that it is not the Jews primarily who are being defended in this exposure. Unsuspected by Ford himself, there exists a special law of history that when you start to persecute one race or one religion you inevitably begin a crusade against the principle of freedom itself. Hence always the drive against Jews becomes a smoke-screen for a drive against free thought.

I go rather often to Paris. To this day, thinkers in Paris divide people as pro-Dreyfus and anti-Dreyfus. The famous case has long since lost its original significance of forged evidence against a Jew. It has long since come to stand rather for the acid test of liberalism. The anti-Dreyfusites mean the stand-patters and militarists and monarchists; the Dreyfusites, the uncompromising liberals.

So it is with the Beiliss case. That ignorant Russian peasants can be stirred up to believe Jewish ritual requires Christian blood is not the main point. The point is the mob-psychology used by the Tsars to keep the masses in subjection.

Thus it is that the Ford-Daniels pseudo-detectives inevitably combined not only with the Russian monarchists but with reactionary American organizations like the American Defense Society and the Civic Federation, and put bodies like the Civil Liberties bureau under suspicion. The crime of this bureau is that it regrets to see abstract thought corrected by imprisonment in our country, as before the war it used to be in the three despotic monarchies overthrown in the war. It is headed by a youngish man named Roger

The Ford International Weekly
THE DEARBORN INDEPENDENT

MR. WILSON, while President, was very close to the Jews. His administration, as everyone knows, was predominantly Jewish. As a Presbyterian elder, Mr. Wilson had occasional lapses into the Christian mode of thought during his public utterances, and was always checked up tight by his Jewish censors.

That is the story of William Howard Taft's efforts to withstand the Jews, and how they broke him. It is probably worth knowing in view of the fact that he has become one of those "Gentile fronts" which the Jews use for their own defense.

C. Above is a clipping from Mr. Ford's paper showing how the manufacturer sees two Presidents as Gentile fronts

Baldwin, one of the few examples of a man socially and financially well-placed who nevertheless concerns himself with things of the spirit: getting, as it were, through the eye of a needle. The Ford-Daniels sleuth, 25 H, reported against the Civil Liberties Union a leaflet which opened thus:

"Our fight is to help secure unrestricted liberty of speech, press and assemblage, as the only sure guaranty of orderly progress.

"It is time enough for the rightful purpose of civil government for its officers to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order."—By Thomas Jefferson.

"The struggle for freedom today centers around the activities of the organized workers and farmers. Everywhere that struggle involves the issues of free speech, free press, and peaceful assemblage. Everywhere the powers of organized business challenge the right of workers to organize, unionize, strike and picket. The hysterical attacks on 'red' propaganda, on radical opinion of all sorts, are in substance a single masked attack on the revolt of labor and the farmers against industrial tyranny."

WHEN he discovered this dynamite 25 H was highly pleased with himself. A less enterprising brain would have thought it irrelevant, since most of the signers were Christians. But 25 H knew a "Gentile Front" when he saw one. Jeanette Rankin of Montana, ex-Congresswoman, was vice-chairman. Mr. Baldwin was director. Miss Addams, James A. Duncan, John A. Fitch, Andrew Furuseth, John Haynes Holmes, Frederick A. Howe, Helen Keller, Robert Morse Lovett, Allen McCurdy, Grenville S. McFarland, Vida D. Scudder, Helen Phelps Personal ...

Chicago, Illinois.
July Twenty-Seventh.
Nineteen Twenty.

Thank you for your letter of July twenty-fourth.

I regret exceedingly that a circular such as you enclose, one headed "LEONARD WOOD - Jew Finance, masquerading as the Old Guard, has nominated Senator Harding, etc., etc.", has been circulated. Your letter brings me the first information I have concerning it.

I have done everything possible to build up a spirit of national solidarity and to prevent the rise of racial or religious animosities.

I shall be very glad to have you send this communication to the American Legion Headquarters, Indianapolis, for such use as they choose to make of it.

OFFICE OF
CHARLES STEWART DAVISON
Chairman, Board of Trustees
AMERICAN DEFENSE SOCIETY
59 WALL STREET, NEW YORK

August 23, 1920.

Dear Sir:-

Have you received through the mails recently a small printed book (with paper cover) Anti-Bolshevist entitled "The Protocols". We are informed that such a book was sent you and without regard as to whether it be authentic or not it deals with matters of importance and should be closely read that each may form his own judgment.

CHARLES STEWART DAVISON
Chairman Board of Trustees
American Defense Society

Here you find a hint as to how intensely the American Defense Society pushed the Protocols. The lack of authenticity obviously did not worry the Standpatters.

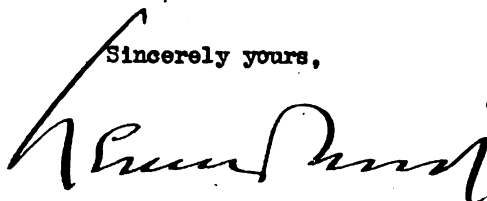

Stokes, Norman Thomas, William S. U'Ren, Oswald Garrison Villard, and George P. West were well-known Christians, but on the other hand, the eagle eye of 25 H observed such Jewish names as Felix Frankfurter, Ernest Freund, and Morris Hillquit.

Still 25 H was no tyro. He behaved as a real detective should behave. He did not send in his visiting card. I remember once a female detective, evidently new at the business, bursting into my cabin on an ocean liner in war-time, and proclaiming, "I am a detective." "Good," I said, "sit down." "No," said she. "Where is your luggage?"

There was no such candor in the Ford-Daniels sleuths.

Irwin St. John Tucker, one of the prominent liberals of

Sincerely yours,

C. Leonard Wood flatly denies any indorsement of the widely discussed racial or religious animosities.

America, was visited in Chicago, the third week in April, 1921, by one of the Jew-chasers. Mr. Tucker will learn first when he reads these lines that a man who called on him, and had a long chat with him on that April day, was a no less formidable figure than 25 H.

Mr. Tucker evidently trusted the masquerading 25 H. He did what other authors have done before him. He showed the visitor a manuscript. On April 23, Operative 124 X sent this memorandum to Mr. Daniels:

"At Chicago last week 25 H spent considerable time with Irwin St. John Tucker, and was told by Mr. Tucker that he had begun a book on the Jewish problem; and he showed 25 H his manuscript of the introduction so far as he had written it. He asked 25 H to obtain him a copy of the Jewish Protocols. Mr. Tucker appeared to be inclined to place great credence in the Independent articles, largely for the reason that he had great confidence in the personal integrity of Mr. Ford. Of course 25 H did not reveal his mission, nor did he lead the conversation."

A little note of question, a tiny rift in the lute, creeps in occasionally. Is it possible any of the Sherlocks lied? Operator 124 X, who reports the activities of 25 H, finishes his memorandum on a note of doubt. "The information contained in this report," he adds, "is, of course, furnished by 25 H."

AS THE worst of all Jews, in Mr. Ford's brain, are Jewish bankers, it is not strange that the sleuths were excited about the famous dinner which Otto H. Kahn gave at his home to the Prince of Monaco on the evening of May 2, 1921. This function engaged the attention of Operator 123 X. On the morning of the next day, he made a report to Daniels. It was a grand report. Operator 123 X actually named all of the guests present. Several of these guests, boldly declares 123 X, are known to be in favor of the cancellation of all war debts. Just think of that!

There were newspaper editors at the dinner, the report alleges. I hope it is not libelous to repeat that among them were Frank A. Munsey, owner of the New York Herald and the Evening Sun; Arthur Brisbane, of the Hearst newspapers; Herbert Swope, executive editor of the New York World; and Louis Wiley, of the New York Times. The report says so. I have not had time to ask Mr. Brisbane if the international Jewish bankers succeeded in persuading him that he and Mr. Hearst are wrong, and I am right, in our views about the value of war-debts.

Judge Julian Mack, of the Federal Circuit Court, is a distinguished figure in the judiciary. His excellent reputation is founded only in part on his judicial standing. It is founded in part also on his work for the conciliation of labor and capital, and in part on the active rôle he has taken in the Zionist movement. This admirable American citizen puzzled our detectives a good deal. They put their heads together.

When the judges of one circuit court take their vacations, judges from elsewhere take their places. These arrangements are made by agreement. Now, Watson, why did this Chicago judge appear so often in New York? Hah! Why did he? This must be looked into—carefully, stealthily, with numerals. They sleuthed him in New York. They sleuthed him in Chicago. Admirers of Babe Ruth have all heard of Judge Landis. Judge Landis is a good man at headlines. Let us see, thought the sleuths, if we can work out a comparison between the Jew Mack and the Christian Landis.

This would be of special excellence because Mr. Ford's paper charges baseball frauds, along with Benedict Arnold's treachery, to the Jews of all the ages.

So Mr. Daniels writes William Cameron, the editor of Ford's paper, under date of September 9, 1921:

"Dear Mr. Cameron:

"Enclosed find report of 124 X on Judge Mack. My judgment is that 124 X ought to go to Chicago and check up Mack's record there, and, at the same time, make comparisons between his record and that of Judge Landis. I would like to have your advice on this before sending him to Chicago. If he goes to Chicago, would you like to have him stop at Dearborn to talk things over with you?"
Dictation mark CCD/WK.

AS AN illustration of the kind of literature that was circulated around the country, attacking the Jews and the liberals at the same time, we reproduce part of a weekly business letter sent out to a large number of clients by Taylor, Oberg & Company, of Colorado Springs, Colorado.

While the sleuths were busy making Woodrow Wilson a tool of a Jew of the Supreme Court, and through him of the Jews ruling the world, they had time to keep track of other movements of cosmic importance. For example, I happened to go to a dinner myself, at which the principal address was made by Dr. Weissman, the head of the World Zionist organization. It was a spiritual and high-minded address in German, and I was so enthusiastic that I was glad, as the next speaker, to say what I could about the 6,000 years during which the Jewish ethical spirit has embodied itself in some of the most permanent moral writings that literature possesses. It never occurred to me at the time that sleuths were around trying to turn this great ethical movement into a crime, nor did it occur to me that any detective who might be wandering around the place would be an employe of Henry Ford. The letter reproduced on this and the following page, however, will show that the Zionist movement was not overlooked by our high protectors of Christian civilization.

Unhappily for me, I was not able to hear Mr. Einstein, who spoke about the same time. I had wanted to hear him, having a curiosity to get an impression of what may be the greatest scientific mind since Darwin. This same letter will show, however, that again I was mistaken. Instead of its being a noble occasion, an occasion that people might look back to with pleasure all their lives, to have heard and seen this pioneer in one of the great sciences, it was something to be looked upon with suspicion, because Mr. Einstein happens to be a Jew.

THE DEARBORN INDEPENDENT got into the game and told us that the Einstein theory amounted to nothing. It has not yet told us that, because Jesus was a Jew, Christianity amounts to nothing.

That Mr. Ford did not intend his campaign against the Jews to develop into a general campaign against liberalism is probable, and indeed is indicated by the fact that most of the anti-liberal material collected by his trailers failed to find its way into the Dearborn Independent.

But that it is impossible to exculpate Ford and his publishing company entirely from encouragement of this campaign against libera's is shown on page 40, where his special secretary, Liebold, encourages the Daniels aggregation to go after one of

The Washington
Washington, D.C.

*Saturday
5/28/21.
Dear Mr. Daniels:
Things now are going very nicely and getting some good material. Will stay over here for the big Mass Meeting*

Ⓐ This letter shows the Ford investigators getting

Q. The World Conspiracy, as seen by Mr. Ford and represented by William Howard Taft, Justice Brandeis and Woodrow Wilson.

the most valuable spiritual leaders in the country, a Christian, Rev. John Haynes Holmes.

Now let us glance at an episode that shows how these evil examples fit together and spread. Technically, Ford is, of course, responsible only for what is done by him and his employes, but from the point of view of higher politics and history he must be judged as having set loose a malicious force that added fury to similar forces already in existence. One of Mr. Ford's contemporaries and fellow-workers against liberalism, including Union labor, was Leslie Frey-Shismareff. In the town of Scranton, Pa., in the heart of the coal district, this person with a hyphenated Russian name is conducting a weekly newspaper known as the Gentile Tribune. It is apparently intended for distribution among the dissatisfied coal miners. In this weekly, Leslie Frey-Shismareff has attacked many of the liberals in the United States, including a number of those who have been mentioned in the Ford detective reports. In almost every number Henry Ford and his campaign against Jews and against liberalism are praised. Incidentally, not a few numbers contain articles addressed to coal miners, telling them not to listen to men on soap boxes and not to give any heed whatever to men who attempt to tell them about the labor situation in the mines of America. This Russian editor points out that every person who stands on a soap box and tries to tell the American miner that he is being abused is in all likelihood a Jew who is only trying to upset affairs in the United States. Frequently it is pointed out that thousands of striking coal miners are sitting in their homes, satisfied that the coal strike, so far as they are concerned, is of Jewish origin and of Jewish maintenance for the furthering of Jewish aims.

BUT LET US not postpone longer the most important of all the fields covered by our sleuths, namely the nation's capitol, Washington, D. C. Of the Washington operators, F. H. Creech, a Washington lawyer, and C. W. Smith were the chiefs. Smith was once a star government detective, who had worked with Daniels, when Daniels, as a government employe, had, under the Department of the Interior, investigated the Chippewa Indian land question in Minnesota. These chief detectives paid small sums to assistant "operators" which sums they reported in their personal expense accounts.

2
for Einstein & Aliezman next Wednesday at the Poli Theatre. Think it may prove very important.
Have the check for $50.00 today, but it should not get in before Wednesday, as I sent it to Jen & Co., and got Winters to cash a Fairbanks check.
Sincerely,
F. Hunter (Creech)

after the greatest living scientist because he is a Jew.

Informants of ours in whom we have the greatest faith, bring us the startling revelation that the Bolshevik movement in general has been fostered and financed by the Jews. Trotzky - whose real name is Bronstein - is a Jew, and all down the list are shown substitutions of the same sort. We have in our possession the complete translation of "The Protocols" showing the deliberate patience of the Jewish race over centuries, and containing some of the most astonishing and astounding statements.

The very evident intent is, through the power of money, to bankrupt the world!

The failure on our part to awaken interest at the time the Non-Partisan League was in its infancy here, dampens our enthusiasm to present this new and startling revelation to our readers, but to anyone sufficiently interested we heartily recommend the reading of "The Protocols and World Revolution."

Yours very truly,

Second Floor,
Exchange National Bank Bldg.

TAYLOR, OBERGE & COMPANY.

PUBLISHING Co.

or Independent
Daily Weekly

CH.

Feb
22nd
1921

A certain civic standpatters' society, it was said, furnished the material for this business letter sent to its clients by Taylor, Oberge & Co.

They proceeded straight to the top. Having the premise that President Wilson was a Gentile "front," they had to prove it and they took steps to do so.

One of the most logical pieces of information that came their way was when they visited a certain mild-mannered little man who lived in Brooklyn. Their quest was not in vain. From him they received the convenient "information" that the son-in-law of Colonel House, Gordon Auchincloss, was a Jew. This gave a scientific foundation for what was otherwise reasoning that the philosophers call deductive reasoning.

IF IT had only been true that Mr. Auchincloss was a Jew, it would have been clear that Colonel House was a Gentile "front." Granted that, the step to the President was simple, for all through the war, as well as before, the world had been taught to identify the beliefs of Mr. Wilson with those of the distinguished citizen from Texas. Why suppose that President Wilson was in control of the international Jews? The psychology is easy, once you get going.

So this idea traveled and traveled in the brain of Ford and naturally wound up with his agents trying to prove the Jewish influence of Colonel House and President Wilson.

For weeks, the detectives tried to trace out a private telephone line leading from the home of Justice Brandeis, one of the two greatest brains of the United States Supreme Court.

Where was this private telephone line supposed to lead? Consider this, Watson. A telephone has two ends. The other end of this telephone was supposed to lead to the White House. And in that White House the President lay broken and gravely ill. Around the home of Justice Brandeis the detectives were sneaking.

MR C C Daniels
20 Broad St
New York City

Dear Mr Daniels:

Sometime, at your convenience, will you kindly have someone drop over to the Arbitrator, Post Office Box 42, Wall Street Station and ascertain just who and what this outfit is!

I might say that Rev John Haynes Holmes appears to be connected in some way with the organization.

Very truly yours

THE DEARBORN PUBLISHING CO.

E. J. E. BOND
General Manager Z

ENC 2

A. John Haynes Holmes gets dragged into the controversy, though his connection with the Jewish movement is never made clear.

The report on this wire-seeking enterprise reads:

"Have made connection with my friend, the police sergeant, to ascertain as to whether or not there [Continued on page 119]"

Daniels himself has told one of my friends:

"We thought we had a pretty good lead to the White House from the Brandeis home. Our theory was that this wire lead to the White House."

At this time, Josephus Daniels, brother of C. C. Daniels, was a member of President Wilson's Cabinet.

We offer a portion of a report to Daniels, from an operator in Washington, on this wire-seeking. We assume, being more Sherlock Holmes than Watson, that the "our friend J" means "our friend, the Justice." "Mr. Carr" was often applied to mean Mr. Ford—a merry pun. You see: Mr. Carr—Mr. Ford—Car.

Q. You women who split hairs on questions of honor consider the problem Marge Campbell had to face when she learned her husband was a murderer

Photographic Illustrations by Baron de Meyer

PAUL & RUTH & Solomon.

By Donn Byrne

SO IT was her husband who had killed Miles Hanlon, him they called "the gombeen man." So it was he who did it! Curiously enough, Marge Campbell felt no shock or terror or great shame now. Could she have known it subconsciously all these weeks? Of course not. Yet where was the shock, the pain, the horror? There was none. Yet something inside turned to chilled steel.

From the drawing-room of the terraced house she could see, from the edge of the Irish coast, the dun hills of Scotland across the Channel—purple somehow, and only one steamer on the broad waters, half way out, slipping northward, from Belfast to America most likely. In the garden outside, a maid in white was going here and there among the rose bushes, gathering flowers for a table decoration, her Ulster voice humming a folk-song:

I know where I'm going,

I know who's going with me,

I know who I love,

But the de'il knows who I'll marry.

Q. Marge was aglow with life and love when she married Rory. "My Star of Antrim! Your hair is as red as gold, and your eyes are as deep as the sea," he sang and kissed her slim soft hands.

Yes, she had known something was wrong for a few weeks now. There had been a shadow on her husband's very handsome, somewhat common face, and a strange nervousness about him. She had not connected it with the murder of the local money-lender—how could she? She knew he was in debt over card games, horse races, and the like, but so he always was, and he never spoke to her of them. Yes, he had been nervous, strange, haunted as it were, but that he had killed Miles Hanlon, the gombeen man—that she never suspected until the little Catholic priest had come visiting her that morning.

"You are certain of this, Father Gray?"

"As certain as that I'm alive, Miss Marge," he said, calling her by the name under which the Glens of Antrim knew her. "Your husband met Hanlon coming late at night from the Ballycastle. Where your husband was, I don't know. They met on the bridge over the Owendarragh. Your husband had his loaded riding-crop. Hanlon was found a mile down the river, on the rocks. How I know it I don't choose to say. I am breaking no seal of secrecy," he added.

"I know that, Father Gray," Marge Campbell said quickly. Though her Ulster tradition was inimical to the priest's belief, yet she knew him for a gentleman. Some peasant had witnessed it and told him, fearful of what was to be done under the circumstances. Or, perhaps, the clergyman had seen the thing himself, returning from some late sick-call.

"But why do you tell me?" she had asked him. "Why don't you tell my husband? Why don't you speak to my brother, Sir Colin Fraser?"

"To tell it to Rory Campbell would do no good. To tell it to Sir Colin would mean that Sir Colin would arrest your husband. There would be nothing else for him to do. I tell it to you because your family should know of it. And for another reason: after this speech, there will never be heard one other word of this. I promise you that."

"You will not communicate with the authorities?"

"I am not an officer of the peace, Mrs. Campbell. I am only a servant of God, needing the inspiration of His infinite wisdom."

So it was her husband who had killed the gombeen man. She should be shocked, numb with terror, white with fear. Her head had become suddenly alert and quick as a whippet, cold and stubborn as the Ulster steel.

SHE HAD to think now, rapidly, clearly, fully. There was a big issue to be faced, and so little time. Everything about her blotted out for an instant—the solid drawing-room, the great French windows, the garden and the singing girl in it, and she was in a world of cold gray facts.

Did she love her husband? She hardly knew. She was fond of him. That was as far as she could say—but she was intensely sorry for him, the poor fellow, the poor, poor fellow.

She remembered him as she had known him four years ago, before they were married—a great hulk of a man with black curly hair and blue eyes and a rollicking laugh—a figure to make any woman glad. Perhaps he followed horse racing too much, drank too much, gambled more than was good for him, but he had nothing to do beyond draw his income from the Belfast linen mill his people had left him and ride to hounds and shoot in the autumn.

"He's a roaring lad, is Campbell of Cairngorm," the countryside spoke of him, “but he’ll quiet down when he gets married. They all do.”

“I have a trust to that dead man that his murderer shall pay,” Colin Fraser told his sister. His was an upright, meticulous sense of honor, as definite and terrible as a drawn sword.

But contrary to the rule, Campbell of Cairngorm did anything but calm down on his marriage to her. A good thing for him that marriage had been—Margery Fraser, the belle of the Nine Glens—the Star of Antrim, the countryside parts called her; a sister of Sir Colin, deputy-lieutenant of the county to His Majesty, the King, the national grand-master of the Orange lodges; and Marge’s own fortune, which was not little.

“You ought to bless this day,” someone had told Rory on his wedding morning. “It’s you are lucky.”

“Sure the devil’s children have the devil’s luck,” he laughed back in his wild, rollicking way.

That’s how he had treated that mar-

(Continued on page 117)

Q. Painting by Arthur E. Becher.

IN BABYLON

By Harry Kemp

WHILE to the sky's astonishment
The sea grows golden with the dawn,
The people herd in Babylon
With windows closed and curtains drawn.

The people talk in Babylon
Of what is right and what is wrong;
The people talk in Babylon
Of art and music, life and song. . . .

In Babylon the music plays,
While all night long the dancers heave
To cymbal, drum, and saxophone;
The swarming dancers interweave

Like savage hordes at tribal rites;
They shuffle by in seething droves—
They make small words of this and that
And palter at their maudlin loves. . . .

Yet, when the brain-sick dark has gone,
I find it good indeed to know
That, beyond roaring Babylon,
The fruits of earth and labor grow.

That long and clean the furrows fall
Unhindered by the builded height
Where pleasure spins her golden top
In citadels of vain delight!

Frank Ward O'Malley, once New York's most famous reporter, listened to the siren call of the busy real estate agent and bought a house in the country

Now Mr. O'Malley says unto you:
"As I mount the rostrum, dear brothers of the Forty-second Street Country Club, remember you have with you tonight
a man who knows what he knows"

From BROADWAY Back to Buttercups

By Frank Ward O'Malley

Illustrated by Rea Irvin

IN THE EARLIEST days of the Great War I, like so many other Broadwayites, took only an academic interest in the big European riot. Our grocer brought its horrors home to me. He greeted me, sad-eyed and apologetic, one day when the head of our household dragged me along on her morning marketing trip. From generalized apologies about the rising prices of necessities of life our grocer finally stuttered forth a concrete statement. Gordon gin, he said, had jumped to ninety cents!

Even in those days there was little consolation in the fact that arriving dinner guests always, before entering our city apartment house elevator, played safe by dropping in at the oasis nearest the apartment and gulping a fast one or two over the bar by way of precaution. A big item of city-life overhead is friends. Even back in those days, when cautious guests could arrive at your door already partly primed, they expected you, almost as much as they do in these days of bone dryness, to shake 'em up some more.

Passable rye leaped to one dollar and sixty cents. The more saving housewives were now bargaining in the cut-rate grocers' shops, but still they were unable to get good Scotch for quiet domestic consumption under two dollars a bottle. The war at last had entered our own domicile. Fortunately our two tiny children were not yet old enough to sense the shadow settling on our home. They romped and played as in the departed days of good sixty-cent gin.

Over night Gordon gin vaulted to one dollar and ten cents a bottle! Already in the more cultured bars in Manhattan's midriff they were beginning to ask from thirty to fifty cents for a single Bacardi cocktail. They were getting it, too. I know this of my own knowledge.

It is when the ordinary staples of life start to hurdle beyond the city man's control that he begins to intimate to his friends that he is thinking about moving to the country for his children's health and happiness. If he is childless, he announces instead that he and the Little Woman pine to leave the noisy, fêted, crowded city and move out to the wind-swept open spaces—return to the soil—live in the way the Almighty intended a man to live, close to throbbing old Nature.

Nightly our city apartment seemed sodden with second lieutenants. Table Scotch zoomed to two-fifty a bottle. I had a sad hour one day reading the monthly grocery bill. We broke the news to our metropolitan intimates that at last we had come to the definite conclusion that a city apartment was no place to bring up children. We were moving to the country for the children's sake, we told the world.

ICAN take a drink or let it alone, but a second lieutenant's power of self-control never gets beyond taking a drink. At a time when second lieutenants had more leisure than they were to have a few months later we moved from the city to a house in New Jersey. It was situated half way between the aviation training camp at Little Silver and Camp Dix. Ours was the half-way house. Now in these post-bellum days, we find that a second lieutenant returned to store clothes is still a second lieutenant at heart. As I shall show you in a few minutes, a man does not appreciate how many friends he has until he moves to the country—especially to the State whose chief crop is Jersey applejack.

"Yes—" so I argued back in my apartment-house days—"the way to reduce the high cost of our friends' high living is to move to the still, wide, open spaces of New Jersey." It would be nearer the truth today to say the still wide-open spaces of New Jersey, perhaps. Anyway, we've been here now for almost five years, but it seems longer than that since I ended the long stretch of years throughout which—clad always in a white carnation, mauve spats and a fresh shine—I by day and night ornamented Broadway.

Now I go around with milk on my shoes. Between autumn and spring, dead leaves collect thickly beneath the collar of my overcoat—new in 1917. I've got past protesting when our Main Street barber shaves the back of my neck to the bald spot and then combs my hair the way all barbers will comb hair unless interfered with. No longer have I the universal city habit of reaching for the barber's hair-brush and ruining with a dab the barber's arty rococo front hair effect.

What does country life get you? The question daily grows more important; and it is no new urge resulting from urban housing conditions today and the consequent city rents.

Go as far back as the dead days when the standard price in Gilligan's place of business round the corner was fifteen cents, or two for a quarter, for Gilligan's best private stock hardware; when draught beer was fifteen cents per coal hod; when you got potted plants in the apartment-house lobby and nine rooms for a hundred dollars a month or less. Back in that golden age a citified seer named Don Marquis described the typical New Yorker in effect as follows:

"The typical New Yorker is a man who moved from the country to the city and slaves in the city to make enough money to move from the city to the country."

There you have a description that includes a big percentage of the inhabitants of all the country's important express-train ports of call. Perhaps I should except the city of Washington. Alone among the country's city slickers, the heart of the Washington nation-saver is where his Government job is. To get him back to the soil, you have to shoot him.

Not high rents alone, but a generalized belief in the city slicker's heart that everything costs less in the country, urges him to telephone for the long-distance moving van. Possibly, probably the city man was born and raised in the country and should know. He doesn't. He came to the city in his callow unmarried days. In those days Pop, who never had the urban urge, alone made a scientific study of the family living expenses—not forgetting the cost of the one-way railroad ticket that brought Son from the but-tercups to Broadway.

But give one of these lads a stretch of twenty uninterrupted years in a city flat that pinches across the shoulders and he knows as much about rural problems as a Secretary of Agriculture. Just about as much.

Listen while briefly he raves of what he knows.

Once you've bought a country house you're free for life from the unholy item of apartment house rent—what? And listen! With a cheap box of a garage in the back yard, you save the forty to sixty bucks a month the city garage bandits heartlessly set you back—huh?

Meats, milk, eggs, vegetables—as man to man, aren't things cheaper when bought at the source? The country merchant's overhead is so much less than the city merchant's, the country merchant should sell cheaper, shouldn't he?

Let me break in here to observe that there is a grain of truth in that thought. He should.

But let the city economist proceed: Right in your own garden you can raise enough stuff to feed half a dozen families. You dig up a little patch; you sprinkle broadcast a few cents worth of seed; finally you stoop occasionally to pull up a weed, probably while you and the Little Woman are out in the garden gazing full souled between rose petals at the dying sun. Then you begin freely to eat your way through unlimited beets, peas, lettuce and beans until the frost is on your pumpkin and the pumpkin's in the pie. Oh, great stuff, people!

And listen again! With a little two-car garage and only one car, what's to prevent you from keeping a roof over your own kindly cow, eh? Have to water a cow and generally valet it, of course, but when carrying out water for your car radiator why not carry enough water in one trip to water the cow?

And you can't tell me—the city slicker still speaking—that when it comes to the servant question the unspoiled, simple, good old American native stock isn't cheaper and better than these European savages or chronic brunette mistakes from Jamaica that infest city kitchens. Must be lots of these hard-working, decent country jays that would kiss you if you offered to house and feed them and gave them all of twenty-five dollars a month besides for their very own! Untrained, perhaps, but never mind the style and fancy gewgaws. Wholesome country cooking on the table three times a day—that's the stuff!

No swarms of so-called friends invading the flat day and night, bringing with them to warm their welcome, only their own pretzels to increase their thirst. No—

CITY SLICKER, hush! As man to man, shut up! As I now mount the rostrum, dear brothers of the Forty-second Street Country Club, remember I discuss no academic theories. From this on, gentlemen, we have with us tonight a man who knows what he knows.

Let us begin at random with the ever-present servant problem.

Intimate experiences in the city and country have convinced me that in the matter of the servant question the perfect state rapidly began to be wiped away, forever beyond recall, when Sherman marched through Georgia and Grant advanced on Lee. I don't go so far as to subscribe to my wife's contention that the South should have been allowed to win. In cookless moments here in the country, she glooms because the Union was not disrupted. Sherman and Grant, she feels, quite overstepped themselves.

Often, however, when I am helping her wash the dishes in the silences of a country night I find myself looking not unkindly on the servant situation as it existed in the old South before the Civil War. One can't help seeing some good in the general idea of being able to buy a good cook outright, as one buys a car, and, if heart taps or joint squeaks develop, turning her in and getting a new one.

Often while scraping a plate or shaking the tablecloth from the porch, the porch—in my mind's eye—becomes suddenly Southern Colonial.

Q. Table Scotch zoomed to two-fifty a bottle. I had a sad hour over the grocery bill one day. Then we told our intimates that we were moving to the country for the children's sake.

In fancy I hear coming across the fields the banjos and singing of my three hundred and sixty-seven faithful servants—their souls their own or the devil's, but their bodies mine, mine! As I read the Richmond Rooter my wife steps out and remarks lightly that Palmyra, the cook, has just quit without notice.

No excitement about the matter as there would be today.

"Here, Nip! Here, Tuck!" I call casually towards the kennels. "Doggies, the cook's left. Get her. And don't mess her. Git!"

Long before noon good old Palmyra, chastened, a bit bedraggled but still a perfectly good cook, is back beside the stove nursing the pot roast.

Fancy the ecstasy of being able then to stride terrifyingly into your cook's kitchen; of glaring at her until the tremblings of the wretch set stove-lids rattling; of speaking your mind—to the cook!

"Why, you wall-eyed, cavery-faced female creature! Where in Haitch, Palmyra, do you get the big idea you can leave me—me! Damn yuh, take that and that and that! And if you ever step out of this kitchen again, even to attend your own funeral, I'll tear off your right arm and slam your front teeth through your back hair with it! Get me, you!! Grrrrr-woof!"—to your cook, remember!

I would not, of course, literally have the old order back, but daily I grow more ready to tolerate my wife's belief that Sherman was wrong.

I submit as an exhibit the simple, unsophisticated, native-bred belle of Barnegat Bay who, in collusion with our house-and-garden man—her husband—temporarily is messing up our domestic affairs. She insists upon having a phonograph, our phonograph, beside the kitchen range while she cooks. The heat long ago made it next to impossible to distinguish between our Werrenrath records and our Sousa's Bands. Our Galli-Curci's are spattered with bacon grease. She always times a boiling egg by putting on "Cohen on the Telephone." She costs about ten dollars a month more than a sound Jamaica.

C. My porch, in my mind's eye, becomes Southern Colonial. I hear my wife say that the cook has quit without notice. "Doggies, the cook's left," I call towards the kennels. "Git her." Long before noon the cook, a bit bedraggled but still a perfectly good cook, is back at the stove.

Her gifted husband's wants run to the scientific. His latest mandate ran to the effect that it looked like he and Ma would be more content about staying with us throughout the lawn mowing season if I got me one of these here new wireless radio telephone dinguses, like his son Asher's got down to Tuckerton. Him and Ma could sort of set in the kitchen and kind of chat with the boy nights.

The lightest requests of the simple souls are commands. Today our side yard looks like a gallant five-masted schooner scooting along under bare poles.

Taking native stock American cooks, by and large, there is only one thing I can say in their favor. They are economy itself in their demands for equipment. Their only necessary tool is the frying-pan. They can fry soup, cake, tea, hors d'œuvres. It's a special gift. Sometimes a particularly thick roast of beef takes infinite patience and Al Jolson's entire repertoire on the kitchen phonograph; but give our cook time, a four-rib roast and enough records and she can fry a roast. Often a stack of her wheatcakes gets mixed up with a stack of phonograph records, owing to the similarity in texture and color. Our teeth tell us when we are biting into John McCormack's "Kil-larney," but our cook's musical ear seems to tell her nothing as she calmly plays one side of one of her wheatcakes on the phonograph and then turns it over and plays the other.

I SUPPOSE it is only fair to add also that country-bred waitresses have the art of serving a meal without maddening stage waits between courses. The bird we have first puts the entire dinner from soup to coffee—all fried—on the dinner-table in one clump and lets it cool properly while she next dons her cap and apron, frizzes her hair and generally dolls up until she really is very fetching. Finally she joins us and our city slicker guests and remarks pleasantly, "Well, folks, are you ready to set up?"

This ends her day. In return the poor, deluded, unsophisticated nut asks only for her working clothes, lodging, light, heat, three very full meals and eight to ten additional daily coffee souses and fifteen dollars a week. Fifteen was all she was asking when I came upstairs here an hour or two ago, at least.

The only other livestock we have ever had around the place was a cow we acquired shortly after moving to the country. The cow was only a temporary success. The cow gave milk regularly for some months but—if I may go into certain physiological details without being accused of vulgarity—she went dry. For months we all but flooded her with wholesome water, patiently forcing her to drink liquid to excess. She still stayed dry. Just why I never learned. There is nothing in keeping cows.

A moment ago I made a brief allusion to city slicker guests. Country life does not, I find, save us much on the high cost of our friends' living. From any Friday to Monday in the summer and throughout all holiday seasons and many week-ends in the autumn, winter and spring, our flivver meets all trains.

In the city, a guest really is a guest. In the country, the word guest comes to be looked on somewhat as a metropolitan hotel man looks on the word guest. There is, however, one vast difference. In the country it is the host who pays and pays and pays.

The only noticeable difference between our winter and summer guest business is that in winter our local bootlegger's delivery man stops at our kitchen door for the market list only about once a week. Between June and Labor Day he delivers on Tuesdays and Fridays.

We now have numbers painted on the outside of all our bedroom doors. Our family name and address are stamped on all our coat-hangers and towels, and in each bedroom the hair-brushes, combs and a volume of religious literature are attached to the walls by neat brass chains. All we lack, in fact, to make our house a regular New York hotel is a dancing floor in the dining-room and an occasional suicide in Thirteen Front.

It goes without saying that the big item of overhead to the country gentleman these days is guest hootch. Occasionally an exceptionally sensitive week-end guest elaborately opens a suitcase when he arrives on Friday and makes a ceremony of presenting to us a small bottle of synthetic gin. It lasts the donor himself almost until the Friday night dinner. We have him with us until the following Monday.

His little squirt of gin wouldn't so much as give tang to the average country house week-end cocktail batch of these dry days. In rush seasons we find that it saves time and labor to mix 'em up in the ice-cream freezer. In the harder press of big holiday seasons, we have to shake 'em up in the electric washing-machine, a good, fair capacity machine.

Back in the simpler days of legal alcoholism in the city, I remember, our guests never expected us to begin to ply them with liquor until just before the dinner hour. In these Volstead days, you get talked about unless you make at least one round of the bedrooms before breakfast with a tray tinkling with stiff pick-me-ups. Then you have to send up their breakfasts—always if your week-end guest is a woman. She may have to get up at dawn to rustle up the family breakfast in the city, but when visiting in the country, she always breakfasts in bed. It is a practice demoralizing to our country servants. You cannot convince a pure, simple native Jersey maid that a female who breakfasts in bed is a good woman.

KEEP in mind that gin is now nearer nine dollars than ninety cents—oh, far nearer! I came to the country with a vague notion that, of all places, I surely could come out ahead in the hooch game in New Jersey. My theory was fairly sound but it didn't work out.

"Look, children," I used to say to my little ones as we roamed under our apple trees the first year we were here. "When these apples are ripe daddy will have them crushed and let the juice stand while nature takes its course for daddy. Then when Aunt Louise or Uncle Charley or Aunt Emmy"—all friends, even mere acquaintances, must be listed as aunt or uncle to all children these days—"swoop down on daddy he will have apple-jack for all. One sniff of daddy's pretty red apple up in the tree so high there and, if first properly handled, it will lay back its ears and kick even big Uncle Charley backward across a room the size of the Ocean Grove Auditorium."

The idea, I say, didn't work out. No Jersey native now has time to handle odd jobs of applejack making. All native Jersey experts now are too busy selling applejack. It is not made now. It is only sold. Can you explain the phenomenon? Neither can I.

You can, however, raise vegetables for your guests at little cost right in your own yard. If you plant at the proper season, you begin to gorge on tender yet powerful young onions late in May. Then there is a long stage wait before anything else ripens. Finally, all the peas ripen on July fifteenth, all the limas on July sixteenth, all the tomatoes on July eighteenth and all the green corn, carrots and beets on July twenty-first.

During harvest week we have four vegetables for breakfast and enlarge the vegetarian variety of the meals as the day progresses. Daily for a week or ten days, we give baskets of lima beans, baskets of tomatoes, of string beans to our neighbors to north and south. Nightly, under cover of darkness, sneakily, our neighbors to north and south leave baskets of tomatoes, of lima beans, of string beans from their gardens on our back porch.

For days following the morning upon which all our tomatoes ripen simultaneously, every porch rail, window ledge, fence top, even the tops of bookcases and the piano, are strung with ripe tomatoes perched cheek to jowl. Midsummer heat does not deal kindly with a plucked ripe tomato. In fact, when it comes to death, I know of nothing that dies so absolutely as a ripe tomato cut off in its prime. There is nothing in raising vegetables.

During the other fifty weeks of the year, the country resident has a choice of canned corn or fresh vegetables that spent the fashionable season in Florida, Bermuda or Southern California, then traveled first-class to New York, made a visit in the city, and finally motored down our way by truck. We pay for their outing and traveling expenses.

Of all the counties in the United States, this Monmouth County, New Jersey, is second only to Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, in the value of its annual crop of flossy table vegetables—or was the last time I saw the statistics a few years ago. Onions, for instance, run riot around us.

BUT EXCEPT during our own local Onion Week, I have never met an onion in our village market that didn't have a sort of cockneyish Bermuda air about it. Any local onion which the Jersey native does not promptly ship to New York, he sells, I suppose, in the Bermuda market. Once during a railroad strike, the fish train from New York didn't reach us down here on the Atlantic Coast throughout a stretch lasting three Fridays in Lent. If it were not for the oysters and clams we dug up at low tide, we'd have starved to death. If our neighborhood runs true to the general form, the only American farm or sea-shore products not shipped immediately to New York for the city slickers are sea-gulls and poison ivy. [Continued on page 137]

A Novel
of REGENERATION

by the Man Who Wrote
"The Wild Goose"

The Better
Wife

By Gouverneur Morris

Illustrated by Henry Raleigh

C. Mary, living on the beach and in the water, grew stronger and prettier every day. She found it a wonderful thing to be thought pretty.

I<sup>C.</sup> Setting Mr. Morris's Big Problem of a Good Wife and Beginning the Answer
T WAS hard for the newly awakened Captain Highland to believe. The bedraggled sick girl told him flatly she was his wife. He stared at his amazement. It was true, she insisted; they had been married the evening before at Greenwich, Conn., and were united for better, for worse. Worse, was the only thing of which Bud Highland could think. The girl was not only sick—she, he discovered, belonged to the most wretched sisterhood. To Bud, a promise was a promise and he had sworn to love and protect. He determined, after the first flush, to keep his promise to protect. But not in New York—at that his pride rebelled. At once, he made plans to take his new wife, his first wife had divorced him for the other man and gone away with the two boys, to the West where he and she were unknown and where she might win back squandered health and youth. Strength and happiness came to the second wife but the past crept after them and they were forced to flee farther West, to the coast—in the effort to escape the inescapable. Gradually, there emerged the real woman back of the sick creature who was now Mrs. Highland and from whom Bud was losing his desire to escape. Retrospection threw into fine relief the graces of the present Mrs. Highland. He had remembered how the first Mrs. Highland, though a lady, had fumed at slight annoyances, had been unwilling to play the game in a square companionship of give and take. It was this recollection that awakened in him slowly an appreciation of the real qualities of the woman he now called wife—a recurring thought coming often during the long-dragging months of enforced idleness.

ONLY FUSSY men know how to pass time without working; and with them it is not really knowledge, but rather character and instinct. With women it is different.

A woman can always manage to be up and dressed in time to catch a given train; but if she must leave her house at eleven o'clock to catch it, still she will not be up and dressed until one second before eleven. She knows how to kill time. If she had had to leave at nine, she would have had a second to spare.

It was a slow, long winter for Bud. It was a swift, short one for Mary. She was learning so much; swimming, how to cook and preserve, how to embroider, how to work a sewing-machine. She was not only getting prettier every day, but their bedroom contained a becoming mirror, there was another in the Gothic hat-rack (it took the place of the rose window in a cathedral) and still another in the parlor.

It was a wonderful and a beautiful thing to be good looking. Don't you think having her head chopped off would have been a lot harder for poor Marie Antoinette if she had had to stand up and lie down before all those people looking like an old frump? The girls who sit in little cages in front of the movie palaces exchanging money for tickets, do you think they could stand it, if they were pimply and had bulbous noses? All day in a cage? Not much they couldn't if they hadn't their good looks!

1. The Jessups found Mary good and sweet—brimming with youth and real kindness.

Nothing makes a woman quite so happy and self-satisfied as being admired for those qualities for which she deserves no credit whatever. The man who sets out to be a Lothario gets no where if he seeks to undermine his intended victim's defenses by telling her how good she is, how honest, how worthy, how skilled in needle work, how sensibly dressed, how good at pies. His success will depend on how pretty he thinks she is, and on the degree to which he is able to make her think that he understands her and is in close sympathy with her.

Why women want to be understood is another matter. The need seems commensurate with her looks. If she is average, she can do with a lot of misunderstanding; if she is really pretty, she can't. But if she is beautiful, she needs only someone to tell her so. Of course, the text only refers to such women as have no brains or sense of honor, duty, decency or obligation, and in these matters the reader, before she feels herself insulted, must judge for herself.

With her return to health and prettiness, it is not to be doubted, that there germinated somewhere deep in Mary Highland's sub-consciousness, the first faint flutterings of the need for being understood. But these were things that she would not have disclosed, or talked about, not at this time, with anyone, even had that faint fluttering need been a strong loud-crying necessity.

She had reached that point in her mental evolution when she wanted to know why it was out of the question for her to feel just like anyone else; because she wondered if she didn't actually feel pretty much like anyone else. The horrors of those five years, between her enforced corruption and her marriage with Bud, were no longer vivid like a nightmare from which one has just awaked. Rather one knew that things had happened because one had an actual remembrance of their having happened; but they were vague and far away. Months of real illness and real pain soon become a negligible memory.

MARY was beginning to feel a merciful renewal of her spirit, and the hope that she might live things down.

Then one day, she came back from the beach snuffling; and was down the next day with a miserable red-nosed cold. Being in fine condition, she soon threw it off, but was left with a dry, persistent cough. This was most distressing at night. It distressed Highland too. It distressed him not only because he thought that it must hurt her, in spite of her denials, but because it wakened him and kept him awake. Sometimes, but not when he was really wide awake, he felt very impatient with her. He thought at such times that perhaps she gave way to it a little too easily, and that with a little more resolution, she might have done more to keep it in check.

What Dr. McMahon had said about her tonsils coming out some day, had lain long dormant in his head. It waked now, and got itself remembered. He had never spoken to her about it and he did not now. He merely announced one morning that there was no use letting a cough like that run on and on, and that they were going to Los Angeles, the nearest big city, to consult a throat specialist.

They might be gone a week Highland told the Jessups; and learned for the first time that their son, of whom they were inordinately proud, was coming home for a brief visit, and that they had counted on showing him off to the Highlands in all his perfect satisfactoriness, and were disappointed.

He had a big position with the Southern Pacific. They had kept it open for him while he was in the war. He had been in the Rainbow Division. He earned eighty-five dollars a week. He had been wounded slightly. He would have graduated from California if it had not been for the war. Once when he was little he had saved a woman from drowning. It was too bad they were going away. He would have made things lively. He could mimic people and sing, and tell funny stories.

"Oh," said Mary when she was alone with her husband, "they are so disappointed. And they are so kind and good. What does a day or two matter one way or the other."

"He may be something awful," Bud protested, but in the end, sooner than mar the Jessups' pleasure in their son's return, he made concessions.

"He blows in tomorrow night," he said. "We'll arrange not to go till the next day."

When that next day came he was sorry that he had not agreed to wait longer before going to Los Angeles.

His parents had told the truth about their son. He was an extremely satisfactory young man. He could mimic people and he could sing and he could tell funny stories; but he didn't much, and then so shyly and with such sweet temper, that he was delightful to his small audience.

Highland loved the way he waited on his mother and deferred to his father. His quiet voice had some quality that pierced the mother's deafness. If he looked straight at her, she missed no syllable of what her son said.

They had thought her a kind, nondescript little person; but she was not. She was a personage. She had brought this splendid big boy into the world, this strong handsome, shyly whimsical, gifted creature, and, to him, hers had always seemed the right way of doing things, and the right way of thinking things, and always would seem so.

"When you going to bring me home a daughter?" she asked beamingly at supper. The subject having been suggested by her catching some of the youth in Mary's voice as she asked Farmer Jessup for water. Having asked, she arose, and in her simple, spick white dress, swept into the adjoining pantry to fetch a bottle of forgotten Worcestershire, and returned in time for his answer.

"When I find someone just like Mrs. Highland, Mother," he said, "and that's never."

"Well," said the old lady, "there's something in that. T'ain't often you find one that's as good and sweet and always wanting to be helping in the kitchen, as she is; but if there is another, you find her, and you tell her for me that I want her to come home with you and be here always."

So that was the impression that his wife made on people, thought Bud who had heard the question and the answer. He would be jiggered! She was the kind of woman whom a young man could select, if only to be courteous and agreeable, as representing the type of woman that he wanted for his wife, one day; and whom a mother could admire. Oh, their saying so didn't mean much and all that; but if they didn't think pretty well of her, their thoughts would have traveled into some other channel when they talked of a wife for the son.

To make even more astonishment for him, Highland now learned the sort of impression he himself had made.

"And if she's a good wife to him," piped Mrs. Jessup, "he's an all-fired good husband to her, though I do say it, as ought to stand up for my sex, and help 'em to keep on thinkin' they are down-trodden by the men. He's got more thought for her in a day than your paw ever had for me in all the long years we was keepin' company. He's up the minute she comes into the room, and stays up till she sets, and when she goes out, he jumps up and holds the door open. And if she drops her thimble he's down and after it before you can say 'Jack Robinson,' same as our old Ben would jump into the creek to fetch out a stick before it hit the water."

"When you going to bring me home a daughter?" Mrs. Jessup asked. "When I find someone just like Mrs. Highland, Mother," Jessup told her, "and that will be never."

"WELL, MA," shouted Farmer Jessup, "and don't he act the same way by you?" Since Highland's good manners were natural and unconscious, he deserved no credit for them. Nevertheless, the credit that he was receiving was very pleasant to him and he drank it avidly.

What sweet old people the Jessups were! What a splendid boy that was of theirs! Any father could be proud of such a son. How pleasantly the home coming was going off! It might have been so awkward and such a bore.

Bud sat for a while with young Jessup after the old people and Mary had gone off to bed. Then it might have been noticed, that they were entirely lacking in that reticence which is so marked among the men, old and young, who have come home from the war. They swapped experiences with a will, and touched the psychology of fear, and unbent to each other as they could never have unbent to men who had not suffered what they had suffered, and who, consequently, could not have understood what they were talking about as they told of their life in the army.

"Yes," Highland agreed, "the old commandments weren't made for soldiers. The big sins are Treason and Disloyalty."

After a long silence, young Jessup laughed. "And if it hadn't been for the way I sailed into that supper of mother's," he said, "I'd add Gluttony."

"There was a man in my company . . ." began Highland . . .

Mary was not asleep, but she was lying with her back turned so that the light should not shine in her eyes. But Highland did not know that she was awake, and until she told him, went about the work of undressing in a cautious tip-toe manner. But when he knew that she was awake he spoke enthusiastically about young Jessup.

"He's a peach of a fellow," he said. "I don't know when I've taken such a shine to a young man."

"Nor I," said Mary. "He said he'd be up to drive us to the station. I wish he wouldn't. He's such a lot out on the road trying to sleep in upper berths, I know his mother'd want him to sleep late and rest."

She heard her husband's pumps drop lightly to the floor, one after the other, and knew that in a moment he would turn out the light. She waited until the light was out, and the bed had given that pained and astonished series of creaks that it always gave when it felt his weight upon it. Then she said: "It was funny at supper, wasn't it?"

"What was?"

"About us."

"Oh. . . . Why, I don't know. Mary; was it?"

"Ye-es," she said in a queer little mixture of voice and snuffle.

HE WAS afraid she was crying. He wanted to say something that would help her to stop. He could think of nothing. But if she was crying, she managed to be ever so quiet and tactful about it, and he couldn't be sure. Then just as he was dropping off to sleep, she had a coughing fit. The sounds she made and the behavior of the bed clothes told him that she was sitting up to stop it. She often did that, sat bolt upright, and clenched her hands and tried to stop coughing.

The fit passed, and she lay down again.

Highland drew a long breath of relief and in a few moments had dropped off to sleep.

But Mary did not sleep for a long time.

She had cried a little. True, she had cried because of facts. She had done her duty. Now she was imagining things. Suppose she hadn't married Bud. Suppose she had got hold of a little money somehow, and had got her health back, and had come to—well, just such a place as the Jessups—and just such a man as their son had come home to visit them, and had fallen in love with her, and his mother thought she was good and sweet and always wanting to help in the kitchen—He would never have known unless she told him. If he never knew, and his mother never knew, and if she was a good wife to him, and always good and sweet, and always wanting to help, couldn't things like that be right? Not ever?

But she didn't even feel like a bad woman! If she was good and sweet it was because it was natural to her; if she was contented with very little, it was because it was natural to her. Why, yes, if things were as she was supposing, she would take a chance, she would take a chance. How pretty he thought her! She couldn't help knowing that. It was such a warm, pleasant, innocent thing to be glad because someone thought you were pretty. It was the kind of thought that nobody could blame you for smuggling up to, and hugging a little if you wanted to.

She was sitting bolt upright in the bed. She was speaking in a flat, colorless voice. She had never done anything like that before to Bud's knowledge. He knew that you mustn't startle them when they were like that. Best not speak to her even—unless, of course, she got out of bed and tried to climb out the window, or something like that.

"Yes," she repeated in the same flat, passionless voice, "it is quite, quite true, Mrs. Jessup. I wasn't a good woman before I married my husband; but I am a good woman now. And I hope you will let us stay on; because we like it here."

After a while she lay down again.

"You had a nightmare last night," Bud told her in the morning, "and you talked in your sleep."

"What did I say?"

"Oh, just a lot of rubbish," he assured her lightly.

When they had said good-by to young Jessup at the station, and were on their way to Los Angeles, she said suddenly:

"Do you think we ought to go back?"

"How do you mean—ought to go back?"

"They are such dear, kind people, and I think it would kill me, if they found out."

"There's not one chance in a million, Mary. It's bad enough to run away from facts; and I think we ought to draw the line at running away from all the remote possibilities we can think of or imagine," he said firmly.

MARY proceeded then to have one of her ridiculous coughing spells. It would stop, and then begin again. People who were trying to read began to look at her, and one old man who was too near-sighted to see that she was pretty, scowled.

Bud went to the end of the car and returned presently with a cup of water.

"I spoke to the conductor," he said, "and he says the drawing-room isn't taken. Drink this and we'll go in there."

How thoughtful he was, and tactful! Always looking after one, and being courteous and so matter of fact and quiet about it. Being taken to Los Angeles to consult a specialist—it was just like a real wife. But maybe it was because he hoped the specialist would say that she had something the matter with her that would kill her quick. She dismissed this disloyal and unjust thought.

He was the kind of man who does his best to take good care to the end, of whatever is given him to take care of. She knew that perfectly well. She knew that his sense of duty would cause him to stand any amount of pain, and to make any amount of personal sacrifice, if her welfare demanded it.

The specialist made her put back her head and open her mouth. He wore a round mirror in the middle of his forehead. This reflected a light into your throat, and then—g-a-g—g-u-g—splutter and Mary could hardly breathe.

Both her husband and the specialist were laughing at her. She had not been hurt, only surprised.

"It's your soft palate that makes you cough," said the specialist. "Too long. Both your tonsils are bad, but the right one is very bad. And you've got an adenoid as big as that!" He made a shape in the air with his thumb and forefinger. "It won't hurt you a bit." He went on, "You won't feel anything, and after a few weeks, when you find how much better you feel, you'll be my friend for life."

"When could you do it, Doctor?" asked Highland.

"Tomorrow morning at 9:30. I've a patient moving out tonight, and that gives me just one spare room. Only keep you twenty-four hours—never had any trouble yet—except with a bleeder. And I'll bet you are not that."

He tested her; drawing blood from the ball of her thumb into a glass tube not much bigger than a hair, and thereafter breaking off bits of the tube from time to time and looking at his watch to see how long it took her blood to coagulate, and when it had coagulated, he gave an exclamation indicating that her coagulation was a little quicker than normal, and with his thumb and forefinger, he triumphantly drew from what was left of the tube a dark, hair-like formation of the coagulated blood, and said, "Splendid! Couldn't be better."

"Well, my dear," said Highland, "how about it?"

He was smiling to give her confidence. She smiled back, and nodded her approval of the plan.

"All right then, Doctor," said Highland, "tomorrow morning at 9:30 we'll be on hand for the job."

"Better be here by nine. Give you time to get undressed." And he shook his finger at her playfully as if she had been a child. "Don't you dare eat any dinner tonight or any breakfast tomorrow morning. You can have a swallow of water if you really need it. But nothing else." The playfulness and banter went out of his manner, and he said gravely, "That part is really very important, so please don't forget."

When they were outside in the street, she thanked her husband as if he had given her a pretty present. It made her feel so very grateful to be taken such good care of even if it was going to hurt like anything.

Of course the operation being decided on, she didn't cough even once more, between that moment and the next morning.

She had waked very early with a presentiment of evil, and of misfortune which she was unable to throw off.

When Bud came upstairs from his breakfast, she was dressed and had her bag packed. He laughed, and was rather noisy and boisterous for him.

"Bet you wish you'd had the real breakfast I had!" he said.

C Mary was sitting bolt upright in bed, speaking in a flat, colorless voice. "Yes," she said, "it's quite true, Mrs. Jessup. I wasn't a good woman before I married my husband; but I am a good woman now. I hope you'll let us stay."

Bud's breakfast wouldn't have helped her any, even if she had been hungry. He hadn't been able to eat any breakfast. He had felt that he would never want to eat.

There was quite a long wait after she had undressed. A nurse gave her a shot from a hypodermic to quiet her nerves and to make the going under part a little less struggling and choky. Then Bud came in and sat by her. She had been told to keep quiet and to talk very little so that the morphine or whatever it was would have a good chance to work.

Bud did the talking. He affected an indifference which he did not feel. He felt like the devil. He felt very much as he had felt when his boys were going to be born, only not so much so. They had been through this tonsil and adenoid business, too. But he had not gone through it with them. He had been in France at the time they had their operations.

"Care to see the operating room, Mr. Highland?" the nurse asked in her effort to be considerate.

He shook his head, and told the nurse that he had seen it.

"The doctor showed me. Never saw a better. A-i."

It was the only one he had ever seen, and he had backed out of it as quickly as he could. It was all glass and white enamel, and skylight, and shining instruments behind glass. Horrible!

The morphine had begun to work. The pupils of Mary's eyes had enlarged. This made her eyes look very dark and soft. She was blissfully comfortable. She could have dropped off to sleep with the utmost ease.

It seemed to him that he was very, very old, and that she was very, very young. It seemed natural to reach out, and pat her relaxed, loose-lying hand. She smiled.

It was just the way he himself would have tried to smile if he had been going into a disagreeable experience and had wanted to make somebody who was anxious about him feel reassured. It was just so he had smiled at his first wife when he left for France—thinking that she cared a little for him. [Continued on page 136]

Q. Mr. Dew was annoyed and showed it by applying the heel of his right hand suddenly under Mr. Smith's nose, nearly scraping that promontory off Mr. Smith's map.

Mr. William B. Dew, better known as Honey Dew, believed that a good big man was better than a good little man. Then he learned that a six-shooter made all men equal. But he never learned what you will recognize as perhaps the biggest lesson of life, that you cannot transplant happiness

Brothers Under the Sod

By Clifford Raymond

Illustrated by John Sloan

MANY YEARS before this writing, Mr. William B. Dew—Honey Dew—had been taught a principle of life by running his head into it with his eyes closed.

Frequently, it is the man who has a principle applied to him and not the man who discovers or first applies it who profits and progresses by it. This was so with Mr. Dew.

The Chinese say they discovered gun-powder. If they did they made it pretty soft for the Japanese. Because of Orville and Wilbur Wright of Dayton, Ohio, American aviators in France were able to borrow airplanes from the French to fight the Germans. We believe our Mr. Lake gave the Germans the submarine—or was it a colonial revolutionist?—and gave us a war because of it.

Mr. Dew's principle in life, before this showing up of his errors, had been:

"A good big man is always better than a good little man."

With that idea Mr. Dew ran his head into another principle.

Snit Smith was five feet, two inches and weighed 126 in front of the bar. Mr. Dew was six feet, one inch, and weighed 180. Mr. Smith was called Snit, and thus described because he resembled one of the thimble glasses of beer with which the hale and genial saloon-keeper used to pay the rent and the license.

Mr. Dew was in Grogan's saloon in Polk, east of Ashland, telling Grogan, two bartenders and ten citizens who admired him because he was buying drinks, how he had made a big bum out of a flat-foot from headquarters. He was telling it when Snit Smith came in and annoyed him.

Energetic small men often have genius in this. Snit was irritable this particular evening and the sound of any voice but his own distressed him. He made himself intimate to Mr. Dew's circle. He entered it under the elbows of the circle of citizens surrounding Mr. Dew until he lay alongside that bulk.

HE ASKED Mr. Dew where he got that stuff, the big cheese. His old brain was just as clear as a dumbbell, Mr. Dew's old brain was, and Mr. Dew would be complimented to be called a cheap steen.

Mr. Dew's number was generally known, Mr. Smith said. He was a stiff, a big stiff, a cheap bum and he, Smith, was there telling it. If he, Dew, thought he could make a bum out of anybody, even a bum from headquarters, he had another think coming and Mr. Smith wanted him to know it.

Mr. Dew was annoyed and showed it by using the heel of his right hand which he applied suddenly under Mr. Smith's nose, nearly scraping that promontory off Mr. Smith's map.

As Mr. Smith winced, with his eyes watering and his scraped promontory bleeding, Mr. Dew beat him up. He grasped the little man by the ears and kneed him in the stomach. He tried to insert his thumbs in Mr. Smith's mouth and rip his cheeks open, but Mr. Smith got one thumb between his teeth and nearly bit it off.

That made Mr. Dew dislike mayhem and he used his powerful punch to knock Mr. Smith down three times. He kicked him in the head twice, hauled him to the door and threw him far and wide into the gutter.

He then had Grogan dip his handkerchief in ice-water and he bound up the hurt thumb. Thus far he had proceeded ac-ording to his proved formula—a good little man was no match for a good big man.

There were some fifty patrons in the saloon and they all were grateful for a diversion.

Within fifteen minutes, Snit returned. He re-entered the front door with a whoop and uttered the following profound declaration which thereupon changed Mr. Dew's life:

"Smith and Wesson made all men equal."

Then he began shooting.

Mr. Smith shot up the place. Two bartenders, who could have handled him with ease, if he had been unarmed, were flattened down behind the bar. Grogan was in hiding. Mr. Smith was shooting up the place when Mr. Dew was on his way home with a considerable congregation only two jumps behind him in its eagerness to get away.

IN THIS obscure way and in the modest surroundings of Grogan's place the city gunman made his first appearance, a dramatic event and a portentous advent, but inconspicuous. It was an advent of a new type. The almost harmless but romantic gunman of the west—the west of fiction and of fact—had been transplanted to the alleys and the rat holes, to the dives and dope joints, to the feuds and saloon quarrels, to the industrial and labor controversies of metropolitan life.

Little old Snit Smith did all this. Honey Dew, rapidly on his way home, knew that something had indeed entered his life. There was something wrong with his idea that a good big man must be better than a good little man. It was all wrong. He recalled Mr. Smith's pregnant words, preliminary to the shooting:

"Smith and Wesson made all men equal."

They did and they didn't. Contraptions for equality constantly increase but they all arrive at the same conclusion: You can't keep a good man down. But he need not be a big man, physically, in order to be good.

Mr. Dew, running rapidly, thought rapidly. He had intelligence. The good man need not be a big man. The age of chivalry was gone. Snit had shot it to pieces.

Mr. Dew was a gunman by the time he reached his door knob. He bought himself a revolver and a packet of cartridges the next morning.

When he definitely in his own mind had changed his status from that of slugger to that of gunman, he knew that as he had more force he had more power, and as he had more power he ought to have more profits. That was mere justice to himself.

Honey's next big idea did not come all at once. He looked about a good deal and thought a good deal but when he got the idea he knew it was good. It was great.

Honey's reasoning went thus: There were the hod-carriers. Hod-carrying might be a skilled trade, but still any able-bodied man could put bricks in a hod and carry them up a ladder.

Hod-carriers unionized, were powerful. Mr. Dew realized that common labor could be unionized, by someone with a gun.

Window-cleaners, street-sweepers, janitors, ash-men, any body of men in any labor could be unionized and could enforce demands if force was behind them.

They did not need the integration of special skill in their work. All they needed was the integration of force which said that their demands had to be regarded with serious attention. Upon this principle Honey Dew could have organized school children, grasshoppers, spring chickens or flying fish.

Q In his early slugging days Honey Dew had taken a girl across the lake on a night boat to St. Joe and she objected strenuously and successfully to his tactics which certainly could not be called those of a gentleman.

It was a great idea. Honey knew it. It had come slowly but he knew it was sound. It would not work out all at once but it would work out. He had to establish a little terror with his gun and the less he used it the better.

He set out on his way and the scheme worked. He organized unions of the unskilled with his gun and controlled them with it. He bullied and blackmailed. He instigated murder and did some necessitous shooting himself. His extortions made him wealthy.

HONEY DEW was married. In his early slugging days, he had taken a girl across the lake on a night boat to St. Joe and she objected strenuously and successfully to his tactics which certainly could not be called those of a gentleman. He left her to shiver out the night wherever she could on the boat while he enjoyed the stateroom.

He did not speak to her again for two months but then he demanded that she marry him and she did. He had confidence in her, and he egotistically figured that it was comfortable to have confidence in one's wife.

Ella Mellon found that marriage with Honey Dew was coarser than it had occurred to her to imagine, but she was not hurt morally thereby, because she knew that marriage was a righteous state and she did not question a righteous thing. She had two babies, sang a great deal, saved money out of her allowance, cooked excellent meals and kept house so immaculately that Honey Dew was impressed.

Ella made him uneasily reverential in spite of his coarseness. When he first realized this emotion he rebelled. He certainly was not going to stand in moral awe of a woman who was his by legal right. He tried to degrade her. He could not do it. She was singing and clean. She knew she was his wife.

Before this Honey Dew had not had many complexities but some now had their origin in his confused emotions. He began to respect a woman. Even when he was first married and at that time not earning much money he had given Ella regularly an allowance for the house and it was fair in proportion to his earnings. He began to have another admiration for Ella when, after a year, he found that she had saved $200 and had it banked. She told him she had it and said that although she hoped to add to it, if he ever needed it he could have it.

She did not know exactly what his employment was from time to time. When his affairs began to get into the newspapers, he explained that it grew out of labor troubles and that the newspapers lied. Ella thought God was good to them.

Honey and Ella lived in the west side region where they had been raised, the region which means the Jefferson Street fish and fowl markets, Hull House, the hospitals and medical schools, Ashland Avenue which thought once it was competing with Prairie Avenue in the beau world—that was when Christine Nilsson was singing at the Old Columbia and the Auditorium, when Billy Boyle had a chop house in Calhoun Place. It also means Halsted Street and Blue Island Avenue. Blue Island Avenue used to mean imported Pilsner beer.

ELLA thought they had a nice flat. It had six rooms and had been wired for electric light. Honey thought it was good enough until he began to know that he had money and authority. His affection for Ella and love of himself asked that she look like a Christmas tree and live in a marble mausoleum.

When they went to the gas workers' ball where Honey Dew was presented with a diamond studded gold watch, they led the grand march.

Ella was very wholesome in her simple home-made finery, but Honey knew she was not the Queen of Sheba. She did not impose on the eyes. Their home did not demand reverence for solvency and Honey Dew knew it.

"We got to cut this," he said to Ella. "This isn't getting us anything. This is a bum part of town. If you live here you don't amount to anything."

"I like it, Will," said Ella. "It's good enough for me. We're comfortable and you've made so much money. We've done better than I ever expected. Maybe we'd better let well enough alone and live comfortably here."

C. Honey Dew did not speak to Ella again for two months but then he demanded that she marry him and she did. He had confidence in her and he, egotistically, figured that it was comfortable to have confidence in one's wife.

"Now, Ella," said Honey, kindly, "you take that to J. B. Forgan and see what he'll lend you on it. You don't know people. I do. I've been up against them. You've got to tell them what you are. Then they'll believe it. We ain't telling anybody anything living like this. People take you on your clothes and a house is a part of your clothes. You've got to make a front."

"I'm happy," said Ella. "I've got you and Stella and Arthur. People aren't going to like us where we go. We'll not know anybody there and maybe they won't want to know us. And our friends here won't ever go over there to see us."

"Yes, they will. I'll give them a big party once just to show them how we're fixed. But I don't want them to come much. I want the swells to come. Everybody goes where money is and we're going to show money because I've got it and can show it. Speed, Ella. That's what we're going to show, and class and that's what counts most with folks."

HONEY bought a house in Grand Avenue. It cost him $40,000. The price proved his solvency—his respectability.

Ella went to a Michigan Avenue dressmaker and was helpless in her hands. She was frightened by her sudden vision of prospects with her husband, a big, strong, wealthy man wanting a woman lovely enough to be his complement. She sensed enough of Honey Dew's accomplishments to know that he must be powerful and he wanted her to share his power.

Any man of her acquaintance who earned so much as $100 a week was extraordinary, and her husband, the way he gave her money, wanted her to spend money, and the way he spent money himself indicated him as a person of great opportunity and power in which she had little share.

This alarmed her because she did not believe she could rise with him. If he had a good job and she had the two children and they all had a comfortable flat, always with enough money to pay the bills promptly and to put enough aside against illness and the probable injuries to life, that would be happiness.

They, then, could have for ambition the education and bringing up of the children, live renewed in the youth, courtship and marriage of the children and again in their grandchildren. They might also build a house and have chickens. Such were rational prospects—but this of living up to a big man and being worthy of all his money was terrifying.

Whether because of lack of conscience or comprehensiveness of vision, the dressmaker made a Christmas tree of Ella, who was pleased and felt more confident. Mr. Dew, seeing her various gowns, was impressed. Ella, to him, was regal. She was some girl. He could be proud of her anywhere.

The clothes question, as Ella thought of it, was not so difficult as the moving from her comfortable neighborhood into the Grand Avenue home. She wished she dared try to persuade Honey against it. Again there was the fear that she might fail him and he might want another woman.

They moved. The daughter, being the mother again, shared the mother's apprehensions. The son was undisturbed. He had exhausted the old neighborhood and wanted a wider field.

Honey took the new surroundings merely as scenery. They did not mean his social life. He went as he always had done, in his car with his gunman chauffeur and his gunman companion, covered the west side, stopping at his accustomed time at the saloons where he always had stopped, saw all the men he was accustomed to see, and changed his life only as he was driven to the Grand Avenue house for dinner or, later, when he was driven there for a night's sleep.

"We're fine now, mother, ain't we?" he asked, as he looked about at the brilliant house.

"It is very grand, Will," she said, "but I'm lonesome."

"I'm not lonesome," said Stella, "but I am mad."

"What are you mad about, kid?" asked Honey Dew. "You ought to be mad! What more do you want? That's a grand piano, ain't it? Did you ever see anything but an instalment plan upright over on Forquer Street?"

Honey had started brightly and was ending pathetically.

"Stella doesn't mean she's mad," said Ella. "I think she's lonesome, too, and says it another way. I know it's wicked.

Ella was a wash-tub woman. She loved plain cleanliness. "You ought to look like something," said Honey. Ella's thought was rapid and comprehensive. He might be wanting another woman.

There are so many people who haven't got anything and we have so much more than we ever expected to have."

"Maybe I am lonesome," said Stella, "but I don't think it's that. I'm sorry, Pa, if you're hurt, but you can't make a home for mother and me just by buying a house over here on Grand Avenue. We had a home where we were, but we've only got a house here."

"How do you get that way?" Honey asked, in an almost timid uncertainty. "You always wanted to get ahead and be somebody ever since you were old enough to think. Your ma and I always wanted you and the lad to be more than we were, didn't we, honey? Now you are in a swell neighborhood and going to a swell school and you are just as good as anybody."

"FATHER," said Stella, "you've tried to do more than any man can do. You can't do everything for me and Arthur. You can do more for him than you can for me. He's strong and can make all the teams in his school. He plays football and baseball and basketball and hockey. There's a colored boy does the same thing just as well as Arthur. He and Arthur are about the best in the school and the other boys just take them as they are. In my school the girls don't take me for what I am."

She paused in an effort to make her father understand.

"I mean there are some things you can't do for us," she went on. "I want to do it for myself if I can. I want to be a doctor or a lawyer. Where we were, we could have been honestly something ourselves, but over here people just despise us. I can stand it because I just know I can be something useful some day."

"Stella, you cut that out," said Honey Dew. "You don't need to do anything for yourself. If you want to be a doctor go on and be a doctor. If you want to be a lawyer go on and be a lawyer. You and ma go and give a party. Invite everybody. They'll all come. Don't you worry. I'll see that they come."

Ella went to Stella's room, after Honey Dew, in a fur coat—two revolvers in the pockets—had gone in his car to a meeting.

"Arthur's so often not home to dinner," said Ella, "and doesn't come in till late."

"You don't go to sleep until he comes in," said Stella reproachfully. "You mustn't worry about us, mother. Arthur's bound to be all right."

"But I care as much about you as I do about Arthur, Stella."

"I'll be all right," said the girl. "I don't want any sympathy, but it's a little harder for me. I could work out of Forquer Street easier than out of Grand Avenue, but father can not know that and it's no use trying to tell him!"

THE ILLINOIS NATIONAL BANK was building a new home. The new bank building went ahead towards its twenty-story magnificence and then it stopped. It stopped almost dead. One day the steel workers were at work and the next day they were not. If they were, the terra cotta men were off. The wiring wasn't being done or there was trouble with the plumbers and steam fitters. Finally everything came to a standstill and nothing could be budged.

Mr. Angus McLloyd, president, did not understand things that could not be budged and he gave everyone in charge of construction such a bad time that it finally was important to let him get in close contact with circumstances himself. Mr. McLloyd was impatient and incredulous. He met Honey Dew at his own request.

Mr. Dew was ushered into his office, shook hands with him and sat down so innocently and awkwardly that Mr. McLloyd wondered how anyone ever had dared tell him that this man was holding up the $4,000,000 building investment of the Illinois National Bank.

"What, exactly, seems to be the trouble, Mr. Dew?" Mr. McLloyd asked.

"Nothin'," said Honey Dew. "What kind of trouble? Is there trouble?"

"I thought you knew," said Mr. McLloyd. "We don't seem to be able to go ahead with our building."

"I hadn't noticed," said Honey Dew, "except I thought you were getting along pretty well, considering."

"Considering what?"

Ella was so grand that she thought it might be difficult for anyone to take Honey away from her. Mr. Dew was impressed—Ella, to him, was regal. She was some dame. He could be proud of her anywhere

"The weather and the jams the men always get into—the jurisdictional jams. You're doing pretty well."

"We aren't doing anything."

"I noticed that," said Mr. Dew.

Mr. McLloyd thought he knew how to deal with his fellow men but he did not know how to deal with a man who was apathetic, who contradicted himself, who did not seem to want anything, who had not sought a loan, who did not need Mr. McLloyd or the Illinois National.

HONEY DEW had the half of a dead cigar in his mouth. He was bulked stolidly in his chair and he merely batted his eyes at Mr. McLloyd.

"It is outrageous that a great public improvement should be stopped for no reason," said Mr. McLloyd. "I don't understand it. Possibly if I did, some arrangements could be made."

Mr. McLloyd thought this was significant but Mr. Dew did not seem to perceive or receive fact, intimation or nuance.

"I wondered what you wanted to see me for," he said.

"To get these strikes stopped," McLloyd said. "You can do it. How is it to be done?"

"That's what you want to know, is it?" Mr. Dew asked. "Why talk to me? I'm not a builder."

"Let's suppose I have some information and some intelligence."

"Maybe you have, but why talk to me?"

"Because I know you can break or settle these strikes."

"Oh, you know that, do you?"

"I think I have been correctly informed," said Mr. McLloyd.

"Maybe you have been," said Mr. Dew. "I'm not saying that you haven't. What's it worth to you?"

Mr. McLloyd, thus approached, morally became an amphibious Christian trying to take to the water and at the same time remain on land. He used both hands in moral gestures of deprecation while he tried to find words that smothered his scruples but expressed his meaning.

"I'll deal with you," said Honey Dew suddenly, throwing the unsmoked half of his cigar on the rug. "I want something. I want Mrs. McLloyd to call on my wife and I want you and her to come and have a meal with us."

Mr. McLloyd looked at Mr. Dew with a composure which only a Scotch ancestry could have produced. That composure enabled him to keep silent without seeming to be awkward. Mr. McLloyd had taken a hard punch on the jaw and did not seem to be aware of it. This was defensive strategy at its best.

"I prefer to make this a business rather than a social matter," he said, when he felt that his head was nearly normal again. "Mrs. McLloyd would be pleased to know Mrs. Dew, but I couldn't tell her that it was the settlement of a strike."

"My woman does what I tell her," said Honey Dew.

Suddenly Angus McLloyd did not give a damn whether the Illinois Bank Building ever was built.

"Mrs. McLloyd," he said, "is not my woman. She is Mrs. McLloyd. You can get the hell out of here and I tell you I'll bust you and your whole damned system."

YES YOU WILL," said Honey Dew. "When I talk to you again, you'll not be invited to my house. We'll be invited to yours, Mr. McLloyd."

He walked out with his hat on his head and Angus McLloyd was so infuriated that for ten minutes he did not trust himself to push a button. When he did trust himself, he asked for Mr. Allen. Mr. Allen was the building manager and he believed in direct action.

"You may do as you like," Mr. McLloyd said. "I want this situation ended."

"Very well," said Mr. Allen. "All we have needed was your consent."

Mr. McLloyd was angry but Mr. Allen's casual attitude towards so great a question, an attitude intimating a certainty of settlement, aroused an alarmed curiosity.

"What are you going to do? What do you mean?" he asked. "I want you to settle it, but how are you going to do it?"

"I'd rather not tell you," said Mr. Allen. "It won't be pleasant and I don't know any reason why [Continued on page 124]

Q. Drawn by Walter J. Enright

Q. Seven states now contend for the use of a river which touches or drains each of them.

Q. They want a dam that arid spots may become fertile, but they don't want to sacrifice local interests to benefit another state

Q. Back of them all is the United States with far-reaching rights of its own, overlapping and complicating the rights of the original seven

Seven STATES &

A Big RIVER

By William Hard

SEVEN states within the United States are trying to agree on a treaty among themselves, sharing up a river. They are California, Arizona, Nevada, New Mexico, Colorado, Utah and Wyoming.

This river flows through—or alongside—six of them. It draws much water from many sources out of the seventh. It flows seventeen hundred miles from the head of its longest tributary to the sea.

It begins in lakes that are fed from snows that no summer ever wholly melts. It ends traversing a plain that no winter ever congeals. It comes from cold as of the Arctics to heat as of the Tropics. It passes through bare canyons, and when it leaves the canyons it passes through barren sands. By nature its course is a course of sterile desolation. By artifice when its waters are stopped by dams and led aside by ditches, it can create 7,000,000 acres of crops. It already creates some 2,000,000 acres.

After the irrigation project is carried out, these states probably will specialize on the following crops:

- |             |   |
|-------------|---|
| Arizona:    | Fresh vegetables such as celery and asparagus; cotton; oranges; grapefruit; lemons. |
| Nevada:     | Very small acreage for agriculture; mostly will be power for mines.                 |
| New Mexico: | Soya beans; potatoes; cauliflower; cantaloupe; sugar beet; hay; alfalfa.            |
| Colorado:   | Potatoes; melons; lettuce; berries; grazing.  |
| Utah:       | Apples; peaches; cherries; grazing land.  |
| California: | Dates; oranges; lemons; grapefruit; garden vegetables.                              |
| Wyoming:    | Grain for feed; grazing for sheep and cattle.                                       |

The size of the job can be indicated thus: the Colorado River could run for nearly two years, at its normal flow, without filling up the basin that would be created by the dams.

WITHOUT the dams, the river threatens the lives of 50,000 to 100,000 people. If it breaks away from its bed, they may be drowned. More likely, as they all own motors, they will escape to Los Angeles in their Fords. If you look at the accompanying map, you will see why Los Angeles thinks the engineering work will make her one of the most important cities in the United States.

The dam in Boulder Canyon will be seven hundred feet high. Some people want to build it by boring great tunnels in the O. Oliver H. Sharp, Governor of Colorado, is one of those most interested in the big reclamation project.

Q. Uncle Sam has told seven states to get together on the great new wealth from the biggest dam in the world. Such a question among seven foreign countries would often mean war walls of the canyon and by then blowing avalanches of rock out of those tunnels into the river below. Other people want to build it by the more customary method of going down to river bottom and building it up from there in solid concrete from foundation to parapet. It will be very narrow relatively to its height. Seven hundred feet high, it will be at its top only twelve hundred feet wide.

It will store enough water to prevent all danger of floods in the Imperial Valley below. It will store enough water to supply the people on the lower reaches of the Colorado with all the water they could reasonably need to supplement the water they now get from the normal flow of the Colorado in the dry season. It will store enough water to make the contract for developing the electric power from it a great national political question.

The bill introduced into Congress by Senator Johnson and Congressman Swing makes the whole of the Colorado River from the middle of the State of Colorado down to the Mexican border a national possession. It provides that along that whole stretch the Federal Government shall have the exclusive right to construct all dams and all reservoirs and all irrigation diversion works.

Here then are seven states moving towards a treaty for partitioning and apportioning the Colorado and here is the Federal Government moving towards an exclusive jurisdiction in much of the Colorado district. Between the treaty and the bill, this river ought at last to find out who owns it. The basin which it drains will then some day be the home of great multitudes of people who will make it seem much more reasonable to the rest of us that the Senate of the United States should consist of two Senators from each state. We now see the beginning of the final peopling of the basin of the Colorado.

The river is the possession of these seven states: Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, Nevada, Arizona and California, and the United States. It belongs to seven sovereign states and one super-sovereign state.

The seven sovereign states are now trying to put their thoughts about it into an interstate document. They have gone in for diplomacy. They have appointed delegates. The delegates have met. They have exchanged credentials. They have brought experts. One of them remarked the other day at the end of several hours of testimony:

"If the treaty would hurt my state, I am against it; if not, I am for it."

He is a patriot. If his state had an army and could use it, he might die in his boots defending the right of his state to every drop of rain that falls upon it and preventing the forces of the cruel foe from asserting any claim to any equality of consideration whatsoever in reference to any water flowing down from his land to theirs.

His monument might say:

"Here lies the man because of whom the brave men and virtuous women of our state can use up all the water in the Colorado River on their thrifty farms and in their God-fearing homes if they want to."

The super-sovereign state at Washington is able to head him off from that fame. The United States has appointed a delegate to be the presiding delegate in the interstate conference for the apportioning and partitioning of the flow of the Colorado.

The flow of the Colorado, besides creating 7,000,000 acres of crops, can create 6,000,000 horsepower of electric current.

The area drained by that flow is four times the area of New England. The city of Los Angeles, on the Pacific Ocean, wants some of the electricity that will be made in Colorado River power-houses. The city of Denver drinks water from hills that send part of their rainfall down towards the sites of those power-houses to help light the city of Los Angeles.

Denver lies near the north-eastern edge of the basin of the Colorado. Salt Lake City lies near its north-western edge. In the South and East, its limiting line is not far from El Paso, Texas. In the South and West, it approaches San Diego, California. Those four points—Denver, Salt Lake City, El Paso and San Diego—can roughly be said to be the points that pin the basin of the Colorado to the map.

PEOPLE in Wyoming, at the head of the Green River, which is the Colorado's most northerly tributary, live at an altitude of 7,500 feet. People in California, in the Imperial Valley, which is watered from the Colorado by means of a ditch that makes an international detour through Mexico, live at what can not really be called an altitude at all. It might be called a profunditude. It is a level 250 feet below the level of the sea. These people are sub-aquatic.

The Colorado impends over them. It casts its shadow upon them. They are not secured against it by the great ridge which it has built for itself with its silt. They are not secured against it by the levee which they themselves have built. The great river is too great—and too wayward.

It tires of its channels. With its silt, it makes new channels. It carries great quantities of this silt to its delta at its outlet across the Mexican border in the Gulf of California. It lashes it there into always shifting shapes.

The people of the Imperial Valley live at the river's mercy. Their works and they are in the power of a shift of silt in a river's bank. As a Greek chorus might say, and often did say, without ever getting contradicted, "Man is a bold and woeful animal."

Utah has designs on the Colorado River and Governor Charles R. Mabey is constantly on the job.

So is Governor Thomas E. Campbell, of Arizona.

William D. Stephens, Governor of California, has his eye on the project.

The people in Wyoming in the basin of the Colorado are given to driving cattle on forest ranges and they want water from the Colorado River in order to have irrigated spots on which they will grow green forage for more cattle, which they will drive out for the remainder of their feeding on more forest ranges. This is their sort of need.

THE PEOPLE in California in the basin of the Colorado want water from the Colorado in order to have irrigated spots on which they can grow (for instance) long staple cotton; and it is their additional desire that what water they do not want from the Colorado shall stay within the banks of the Colorado and leave the Imperial Valley unvisited.

They therefore are very willing that all other people in the basin of the Colorado—in Wyoming and in all the rest of the seven states—should join with them in a brotherly spirit to apportion the waters of the Colorado and to catch those waters, store them, subdue them, control and regulate them.

It happens thereupon that some of the other people on the upper reaches of the river are inclined to say:

"If our brothers along the lower reaches of the river should get large amounts of water in reservoirs down there, they will draw upon that water. Today they have barely enough water for their present fields. With new reservoirs, they will lay out new fields and they will file new claims on the flow of the Colorado for watering those fields.

"Then when we want to make new fields of our own along the upper reaches of the Colorado, we may find that we may have to go into court somewhere and defend ourselves against these brothers, who may then say that they have taken out 'prior appropriations' on the water which we want to use—water that runs right by our homes and hearths. Whose water is it? We must think."

It would be extremely unnatural if they did not. They do. But to encourage them to think faster, the Federal Government enacted a statute under which Mr. Hoover was chosen to preside over the Colorado River Commission and its delegates from the seven states, with a provision expressed or understood that the seven states must sign a treaty before this year is out.

What is now attempted in the case of the proposed treaty regarding the waters of the Colorado is that the delegates of seven states shall freely and independently sign it and that then the legislatures of seven states shall freely and independently ratify it and that then the Federal Government shall approve it.

MEANWHILE Senator Johnson, of California, and Congressman Swing, of California, approaching this field of brotherhood by a flank movement and stationing themselves for legislative purposes at a spot called Boulder Canyon on the course of the Colorado River, where it forms the frontier between Arizona and Nevada, have declared that there at that spot, according to a bill which they have introduced into Congress, there shall be a dam and a reservoir and a power-house for the control of floods and for the development of irrigation projects and for the manufacture of electricity on a scale commensurate with the grandeur of the Colorado, which has a mean annual run-off of 17,000,000 "acre feet."

The Colorado River lived without knowing its acre feet for many decades after white men first saw it. An acre foot is the amount of water that will cover an acre to the depth of one foot. The Colorado now blesses its upper reaches with cantaloupe and lettuces. We know now the number of acre feet that the Colorado carries with it along in its abyss from the region where the talk may center on the vegetable market to the region where the talk may swing to the long staple cotton market of Egypt. We sometimes think that romance and gages can not go together. We like the place that Samuel Taylor Coleridge found:

Where Alf the sacred river ran Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.

This idea of being "measureless" is fascinating to us. The Colorado is measured now to just about its last drop of water and its last grain of silt. It is scientifically known. Yet trainload after trainload of people come all the time in this

G. Governor Robert Davis Carey, of Wyoming, will see that his state doesn't get the short end of it.

G. Governor Emmet D. Boyle of Nevada is watching the river bank in the southern part of his state.

G. The development of the big dam scheme is being followed by Governor Mechem of New Mexico.

scientifically knowing age to the brink of the canyon of the Colorado to do nothing but look down and draw back and look down again.

Who knows if the people who look down over the brink of the canyon of the Colorado today are more awed or less awed by it than Francisco Silvestro Velez Escalante, who set foot on the rim of the Grand Canyon some sixty years before the British set foot on Plymouth Rock?

What we do know is that in the year of the ringing of our Liberty Bell in Philadelphia, Escalante went clear across the abyss and the basin of the Colorado and came to the lake that is now called Utah Lake, not very far from the city that is now called Salt Lake City, before he turned back and left the brilliant colors of the northern rocks and descended the staircase of vertical cliffs to the brilliant colors again of the desert flowers in the southern sands from which he started.

Thirty-two years later—in 1808—a certain other man came into the basin of the Colorado. He did not come from the South. The peculiarity of this man was that he came from the East. He came from the East and he made his entrance into the basin of the Colorado at a point in the region which is now the state of Wyoming. His name was Andrew Henry.

From that time on in the basin of the Colorado the names like Andrew Henry began to overlie the names like Francisco Silvestro Velez Escalante.

Then came the slow glacial pressure of the men from the East and the North. They went by inches and when they explored they measured and they took and they stayed. From them came Johnson and Swing with their dam and reservoir.

To return to the dam, then, it will be the tallest dam in the world.

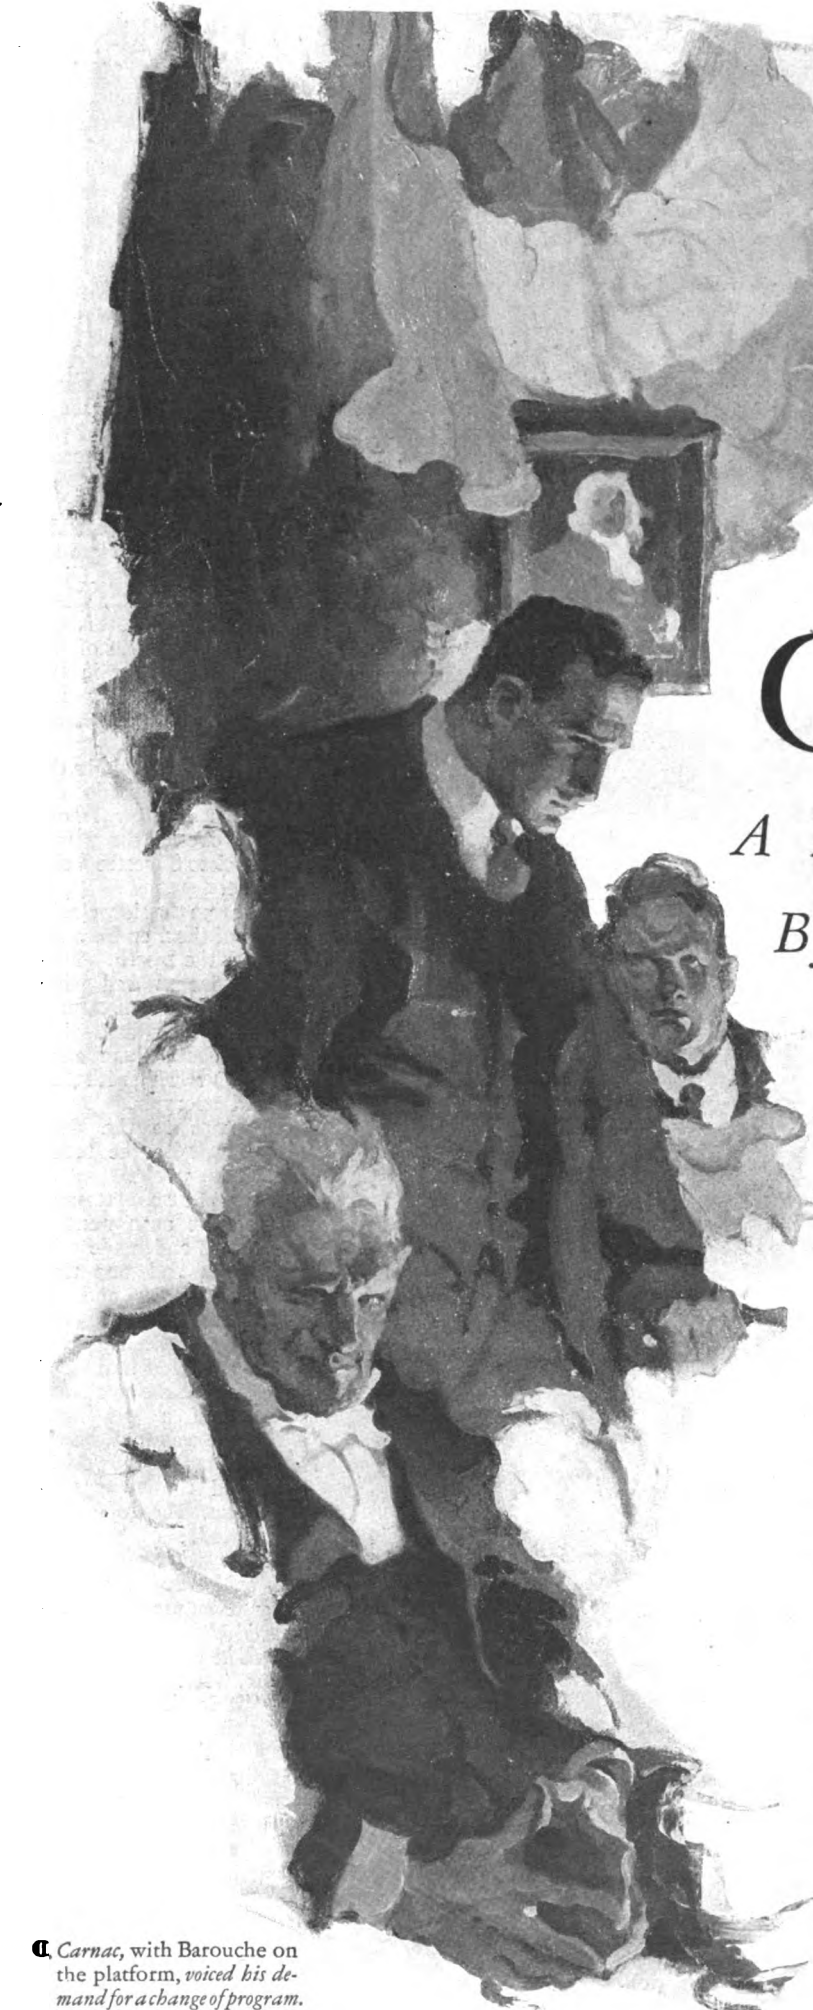

An eastern statesman says that he once went to Los Angeles and made a lot of speeches and was tired in the afternoon and lay down to sleep; but a committee of hospitality woke him up and took him sight-seeing. He came to a stand in front of a gas tank. "That," he was told, "is the largest gas tank in the world."

He told the story to a Californian. The Californian was puzzled.

"That's what they told me," said the statesman. "They took me out there and said, 'That's the largest tank in the world.'"

"But," said the Californian, "it is the largest gas tank in the world."

Behind the boast about the tallness of the dam lies the fact that a new empire, complete in itself, is to be created when a few men in overalls, with an oil can and a drill, a bunch of mules, some gravel, and a box of concrete, crawl along the sides of those bristling rocks, and hang a while in space.

Carnac's

A Novel of Canada

By Sir Gilbert Parker

C Carnac, disinherited by old John Grier, enters politics against Barode Barouche

OLD JOHN GRIER was dead. That was surprising, but the real shock lay in the will he left. Luke Tarboe, his new right-hand man, inherited the Canadian lumber king's business. True, there was twenty thousand a year for his widow, but for Fabian and Carnac, his sons, there was nothing. After all, it was no more than should have been expected. Fabian had quarreled with his father and gone over to the enemy, the Belloc lumber concern. Carnac had insisted upon being an artist, in spite of his father's bitter opposition. It was the quest for art that took him to New York and it was there that he had been tricked into a marriage with his model, Luzanne Larue. True, he had never lived with her, but the marriage stood, barring his way to Junia Shale, whom he loved. Of his marriage, he told only his mother. Then, quite surprisingly, Carnac decided to go into politics—to oppose for a seat in Parliament—the big man of the province, Barode Barouche, not knowing that, because of his mother's one mistake, Barode Barouche was his father. So, unwittingly, it was son against father. Eager for the fight, Carnac wrote at once to Headquarters, offering his services and asking for an appointment.

BEFORE THE day was done, headquarters had accepted Carnac as the solution in part of their own difficult problem. The three applicants for the post each hated the other; but all, before the day was over, agreed to Carnac as an effective opponent of Barouche.

One thing seemed clear to all—that Carnac's policy had elements of seduction appealing to the selfishness of all sections, and Carnac had an eloquence which would make Barouche uneasy. That eloquence was shown in the speech Carnac made in the late evening to the assembled executive. He only spoke for a

C Carnac, with Barouche on the platform, voiced his demand for a change of program.

Folly

and the Right of Youth

Illustrated by Walt Louderback

quarter of an hour, but it was long enough to leave, upon all who heard him an impression of power, pertinacity, picturesqueness, and appeal. He might make mistakes, but he had qualities that would ride him over errors with success.

"I'm not French," he said at last in his speech, "but I used to think and write in French as though I'd been born in Normandy. I'm English by birth and breeding, but I've always gone to French schools and to a French University, and I know what New France means. I stand to my English origin, but I want to see the French develop here as they've developed in France, alive to all new ideas, dreaming good dreams.

"I believe that Frenchmen in Canada can, and should, be an inspiration to all the rest of the country. Their great qualities should be the fibre in the body of public opinion. I will not pander to the French; I will not be the slave of the English; I will be free, and I hope I shall be successful at the polls."

CARNAC went to bed with the blood of battle throbbing in his veins. In the morning, he had a not unreasonable joy in seeing the headlines of his candidature in the papers. At first, as he looked at them, he was almost appalled, for never since he began life had he seen his personality so displayed. It seemed absurd that before he had struck a blow, he should be advertised like a general in the field. Yet commonsense told him that in standing against Barouche, he became important in the eyes of those affected by Barouche's policy, and who might agree to the program Carnac had arranged.

He had had luck, and it was for him to justify that luck. Could he do it? His first thought as his eyes fell on the headlines—he flushed with elation so that he scarcely saw—was for the thing itself. Before him there flashed a face, however, which at once sobered his exaltation. It was the face of Junia, a face from which there was no escape.

C. A rude, wilful fellow demanded, "M'sieu' Carnac Grier, where's your woman?" Carnac caught his breath and then said: "Isn't that a leading question to an unmarried man?"

"I wonder what she will think," he said to himself, with a little perplexity.

He knew in his heart of hearts, she would not think it incongruous that he, an artist, should become a politician. Good laws helped to make life beautiful, good pictures ministered to beauty; good laws helped to tell the story of human development; good sculpture ministered to the imagination and strengthened the soul; good laws made life's conveniences greater, enlarged activity, lessened the friction of things not yet adjusted; good laws taught their makers how to balance things, how to make new principles apply without disturbing old rights; good pictures increased the well-balanced harmony of the mind of the people. Junia would understand these things. As he sat at his breakfast, with the newspaper spread against the teapot and the milk-pitcher, he felt satisfied he had done the bold and right, if incomprehensible, thing.

But in another hotel, at another breakfast, another man read of Carnac's candidature with sickening surprise. It was Barode Barouche, father of his opponent.

So, after twenty-seven long years, this was to be the issue! His own son, whom he had never known, was to fight him at the polls! Somehow, the day when he had seen Carnac and his mother at the political meeting had given him new emotions. His wife, to whom he had been so faithful in one sense since she had passed into the asylum, had died, and with her going, a new field of life seemed to open up to him. She had died almost on the same day as John Grier. She had been buried secludedly, piteously, and he had gone back to his office with the thought that life had become a preposterous freedom.

So it was that, on the day when he spoke at the political meeting, his life's tragedy became a hammer beating every nerve into emotion. He was like one shipwrecked who strikes out with a swimmer's will to reach his goal. All at once, on the platform, as he spoke, when his eyes saw the faces of Carnac and his mother the catastrophe stunned him like a huge engine of war.

There had come to him at last, a sense of duty where Alma Grier was concerned. She was nearly fifty years of age, and he was fifty-six; she was a widow with this world's goods; she had been to him, how near and dear, for the brief hour of one exasperatingly joyful summer month, and then—no more. He knew the boy was his son, because he saw his own face as it had been in his youth, though his mother's look was also there—transforming, illuminating.

He had a pang as he saw the two at the close of his meeting filtering out into the great retort of the world. Then it was that he had the impulse to go to the woman's home, express his sorrow, and in some small sense wipe out his wrong by offering her marriage. He had not gone.

He knew of Carnac's success in the world of Art; and how he had alienated his reputed father by an independence revolting to a slave of convention. He had even bought, not from Carnac, but from a dealer, two of Carnac's pictures and a statue of a riverman. Somehow, the years had had their way with him. He had, at long last, realized that material things were not the great things of life, and that imagination, however productive, should be guided by uprightness of soul.

ONE THING was sure, the boy had never been told who his father was. That Barouche knew. He had the useful gift of reading the minds of people in their faces. From Carnac's face, from Carnac's mother's face, had come to him the real story. In the first days after that ill-starred month, he had gone to her, only to be repelled as a woman can repel whose soul has been shocked, whose self-respect has been abused.

It had been as though she thrust out arms of infinite length to push him away, such had been the storm of her remorse, such the revulsion against herself and him. So they had fallen apart, and he had seen his boy grow up independent, original, wilful, capable—a genius. He read the newspaper reports of what had happened the day before with senses greatly alive.

After all, politics was unlike everything else. It was a profession recruited from all others. The making of laws was done by all kinds of men. One of the wisest legislators in river-law he had ever known was a priest; one of the best advisers of the legislation of the medical profession was a woman; one of the bravest ministers who had ever quarreled with and conquered his colleagues had been an insurance agent; one of the sanest authorities on maritime law had been a man with a greater pride in his verses than in his practical capacity; and here was Carnac who had painted pictures and made statues plunging into politics with a policy as ingenious as his own, and as capable of logical presentation.

This boy who was bone of his own bone, and flesh of his own flesh, meant to fight him. He threw back his head and laughed. His boy, his son, meant to fight him, did he? Well, so be it! He got to his feet, and walked up and down the room.

There came a tap at the door. Presently, it opened and a servant came in.

"A woman has called," he said. "She wants to see you, m'sieu'. It's very important, she says."

Barouche shook his head in negation: "No, Gaspard."

"It ain't one of the usual kind, I think, m'sieu'," protested Gaspard. "It's about the election. It's got something to do with that—" he pointed to the newspaper propped against the teapot in front of Barouche.

"It's about that, is it? Well, what about that?"

He eyed the servant as though to see whether the woman had given any information.

"I don't know. She didn't tell me. She's got a mind of her own. She's even handsome, and she's well dressed. All she said was: 'Tell m'sieu' I want to see him. It's about the election—about Mr. Grier.'"

BARODE BAROUCHE's heart stopped. Something about Carnac Grier—something about the election—and a woman! He kept a hand on himself. It must not be seen that he was in any way moved.

"Is she English?"

The man shook his head. "She's French, m'sieu'."

"You think I ought to see her, Gaspard?" said Barouche.

"Sure," was the confident reply. "I guess she's out against whoever's against you."

Barouche smiled maliciously. "Well, show her up, Gaspard." Presently the door opened again, and Gaspard stepped inside.

"A lady to see you, m'sieu'," he said.

Barouche rose from the table, but he did not hold out his hand. The woman was young, good-looking; she seemed intelligent. There was also an element of cruelty in her face which only an experienced student of human nature could have seen quickly. She was a woman with a grievance—that was sure. He knew the passionate excitement, fairly well controlled; he saw her bitterness at a glance. He motioned her to a chair.

"It's an early call," he said with a smile. Smiling was one of his serviceable assets; it was said no man could so palaver the public with his cheerful good nature.

"Yes, it's an early call," she replied, "but I wished not to wait till you go to your office. I wanted you to know something. It has to do with Mr. Carnac Grier."

"Oh, that—eh!"

"It's something you've got to know. If I give you the means to win your election, it would be worth while—eh?"

The beating of Barouche's heart was hard, but nothing showed in his face. There he had control.

"I like people who know their own minds," he said, "but I don't believe anything till I study what I hear. Is it something to injure Mr. Grier?"

"If a lawfully married man went about as a single man and stood for Parliament against you, don't you think you could use that against him?"

For a moment, Barouche was silent. Evidently here was an impeachment of his own son, but this son was out to bring his own father to the ground. After a moment's study of the face with the fiery eyes and a complexion like roses touched with frost, he said slowly:

"Well, have I the honor of addressing Carnac Grier's wife?"

A look of relief crossed the woman's face. "I'll tell you everything," she said.

Then Luzanne told her story, avoiding the fact that Carnac had been tricked into the marriage. At last, she said: "Now I've come here to make him acknowledge me. He's ruined my life, broken my hopes, and—"

"Broken your hopes!" interrupted Barode Barouche. "How is that?"

"I might have married someone else. I could have married someone else."

"Well, why don't you? There's the divorce court. What's to prevent it?"

"You ask me that—you a Frenchman and a Roman Catholic! I'm French. I was born in Paris."

"When will you let me see your papers?"

C, Suddenly a strange expression crept over Luzanne Larue's face. "There's something of Carnac about you," she told Barode Barouche. "It's some look! It's something—but I don't know what it is."

"When do you want to see them?" the girl asked quietly. "Today—if possible today," he answered. Then he looked her steadily in the eyes. "To whom else here have you told this story of your marriage to Carnac Grier?"

"No one—no one at all. I only came last night, and when I took up the paper this morning, I saw. Then I found out where you lived, and here I am, bien sûr. I'm here under my maiden name, Ma'm'selle Luzanne Larue."

"That's right. That's right. Now, until we meet again, don't speak of this to anyone. Will you give me your word?"

"Absolutely," she said, and there was revenge and passion in her eyes. Suddenly, a strange expression crept over her face. She was puzzled.

"There's something of him about you," she said, and her forehead gathered. "There's some look! Well, there it is, but it's something—I don't know what."

A moment later, she was gone. As the door closed, he stretched his hands above his head.

"Nom de Dieu! what a situation!" he remarked.

TO most people, Carnac's candidature was a surprise; to some, it was a bewilderment, and to one or two, it was a shock. To the second class, belonged Fabian Grier and his wife; to the third class, belonged Luke Tarboe. Only one person seemed to understand it—by intuition; that was Junia.

Somehow, nothing Carnac did, changed Junia's views of him, or surprised her, though he made her indignant often enough. To her mind, however, in the big things, his actions always had reasonableness. She had never felt his artist-life was to be the only, and the final note of his career.

When, therefore, she read a telegram in a newspaper of the West announcing his candidature, she guessed the suddenness of his decision. When she read it, she spread the paper on the table, smoothed it as though it were a beautiful piece of linen, then she stretched out her hands in happy benediction. Like most of her sex, she loved the thrill of warfare.

There flashed the feeling, however, that it would be finer sport if Carnac and Tarboe were to be at war, instead of Carnac and Barouche. It was curious, she never thought of Carnac but the other man came throbbing into sight—the millionaire, for he was that now.

In one way, this last move of Carnac's had the elements of a master stroke. It was original; it was picturesque. She knew how strange it would seem to the rest of the world, yet it did not seem strange to her. No man she had ever seen had been at home in the world of men, and also at home in the secluded field of the chisel and the brush as Carnac.

She took the newspaper over to her aunt, holding it up. The big headlines showed like semaphores on the page. As the graceful figure of Junia drew to her aunt—her slim feet, in the brown, well-polished boots, the graceful figure, the flexible charm of the body, the long, full neck, and then the chin, Grecian, shapely and firm, the straight, sensitive nose, the wonderful eyes under the well-cut, broad forehead, with the brown hair, covering it like a canopy—the old lady reached out and wound her arms round the lissome figure. She read the telegram, and then the old arms gripped her tighter.

Presently the whistle of a train sounded. The aunt stretched out an approving finger to the sound. She realized that the figure round which her arms hung trembled, for it was the "through" daily train for Montreal.

"I'm going at once, auntie," Junia said.

"WELL, I'm jiggered!" These were Tarboe's words when Carnac's candidature came first to him in the press. "He's 'broke' out in a new place," he added.

Tarboe loved the spectacular, and this was, indeed, spectacular. Yet he had not the mental vision of Junia who saw how close, in one intimate sense, was the relation between the artist life and the political life. To him it was a gigantic break from a green pasture into a red field of war. To her, it was a supreme resolution which, in anyone else's life, would have seemed abnormal; in Carnac's life, it had naturalness.

Tarboe had been for a few months only; the reputed owner of the great business, and he had paid a heavy price for his headship in the weighty responsibility, the strain of control; but it had got into his blood, and he felt life would not be easy or interesting without it now.

Besides, there was Junia. To him, she was the one being in the world worth struggling for; the bird to be caught on the wing, or coaxed into the nest, or snared into the net; and two of the three things he had tried without avail. The third—the snaring? He would not stop at that, if it would bring him what he wanted. How to snare her! He looked at himself in the mirror.

"A great bulking figure like that!" he said in disapproval. "All bone and muscle and flesh and physical bombast! It wouldn't weigh with her. She's too fine. It isn't the animal in a man she likes. It's what he can do, and what he is."

Then he thought of Carnac's new outburst, and his veins ran cold. "She'll like that—but yes, she'll like that: if he succeeds, she'll think he's great. Well, she'd be right. He'll beat Barouche. He's young and brave, careless and daring. Now, where am I in this fight? I belong to Barouche's party and my vote ought to go for him."

For some minutes, he sat in profound thought. What part should he play? He liked Carnac, he owed him a debt which he could never repay. Carnac had saved him from killing Denzil. If that had happened, he himself would probably have gone to the gallows.

He decided. Sitting down, he wrote Carnac the following letter:

"DEAR CARNAC GRIER:

"I see you're beginning a new work. You now belong to a party that I am opposed to, but that does not prevent me offering you support. It's not your general policy I support, but it is you, the son of your father, that I mean to work for. If you want financial help for your campaign—or after it is over—come and get it here—ten thousand or more if you wish. Your father, if he knew—and perhaps he does know—would be pleased that you, who could not be a man of business in his world, are become a man of business in the bigger world of law-making. You may be right or wrong in that policy, but that doesn't weigh with me. You've taken on as big a job as ever your father did. What's the use of working if you don't try to do the big thing that means a lot to people outside yourself! If you make new, good laws, if you do something for the world, that's wonderful, it's as much as your father did, or, if he was alive, could do now. Whatever there is here is yours to use. When you come back here to play your part, you'll make it a success—the whole blessed thing. I don't wish you were here now, except that it's yours—all of it—but I wish you to beat Barode Barouche.

"Yours to the knife,
"LUKE TARBOE."

He read the letter through, and coming to the words, "When you come back here to play your part, you'll make it a success—the whole blessed thing," he paused, reflecting. . . . He wondered what Carnac would think the words meant, and he felt it was a bold, and, maybe, a dangerous play; but it was not more dangerous than facts he had dealt with often in the last two years. He would let it stand, that phrase of the hidden meaning. He did not post the letter yet.

FOUR DAYS later he put on his wide-brimmed Panama hat and went out into the street leading to the center of the city. There was trouble in the river reaches between his men and those of Belloc-Grier, and he was keeping an appointment with Belloc at Fabian Grier's office, where several such meetings had taken place without accomplishing anything.

He had not gone far, however, when he saw a sprightly figure in light brown linen cutting into his street from a cross-road. He had not seen that figure for months—scarcely since John Grier's death, and his heart thumped in his breast. It was Junia. How would she greet him?

A moment later, he met her. Raising his hat, he said:

"Back to the firing line, Miss Shale! It'll make a big difference to everyone concerned."

"Are you then concerned?" she quizzed, with a faint smile.

"I'm one of the most concerned," he answered with a smile not so composed as her own. "It's the honor of the name, that's at stake."

"You want to ruin Mr. Grier's chances in the fight?"

"I didn't say that. I said, 'the honor of the name,' and the name of my firm is 'Grier's Company of Lumbermen.' So I'm in it with all my might, and here's a letter—I haven't posted it yet—saying to Carnac Grier where I stand. Will you read it? There's no reason why you shouldn't." He tore open the envelope and took the letter out.

Junia took it, after hesitation, and read it till she came to the sentence about Carnac returning to the business. Then she looked at him with searching eyes.

"What does that mean?" she asked, pointing to the elusive sentence.

"He might want to come into the business some day, and I'll give him his chance. Nothing more than that."

"Nothing more than that!" she said cynically. "Well, it's

C. "The thing I want most in the world doesn't come to me," Tarboe told Junia, while his voice grew emotional. "I don't know what you are trying to tell me, and anyhow this is not the place—" Junia said and left him.

bravely said, but how could he become a partner if he can't buy the shares?"

"That's a matter to be thought out," he answered with a queer twist to his mouth.

"I see you've offered to help him with cash for the election," she said, handing back the letter.

"I felt it had to be done. Politics are expensive—they sap the purse. That's why."

"You never thought of giving him an income that would represent a little of what his father failed to do for him?"

There was asperity in her tone. She had a gift of acid speech. "He wouldn't take from me what his father didn't give him." Suddenly, an idea seized him. "Look here," he said, "you're a friend of the Griers, why don't you help to keep things straight between the two concerns? You could do it. You have the art of getting your own way. I've noticed that."

"So you'd like me to persuade Fabian Grier to influence Belloc, because I'd make things easy for you!" she said briskly. "I don't think I'll take a hand in this game, chiefly because—" she suddenly paused.

"Yes; chiefly because—"

"Because you'll get your own way without help. You get everything you want," she added with a little savage comment. A flood of feeling came into his eyes, his head jerked like that of a bull-moose.

"No, I don't get everything I want. The thing I want most in the world doesn't come to me." His voice grew emotional. She knew what he was trying to convey, and as the idea was not new, she kept composure. "I'm not as lucky as you think me," he added with a straight look.

"You're pretty lucky. You've done it all as easy as clasping your fingers. If I had your luck!" she paused.

"I don't know about that, but if I could reach out and touch you at any time, as it were, I think it'd bring me permanent good luck. You'll find out one day that my luck is only a bubble the prick of a pin'll destroy. I need someone to show me how to spend the money coming from the business. What is wealth unless you buy things that give pleasure to life? Do you know—"

He got no further. "I don't know anything you're trying to tell me, and anyhow this is not the place—"

With that she hastened from him up the street.

Tarboe had a pang, and yet her very last words gave him hope. "I may be a bit sharp in business," he said to himself, "but I certainly am a fool in matters of the heart. Yet what she said at last had something in it for me. Every woman has an idea where a man ought to make love to her, and this open road certainly isn't the place. If Carnac wins this game with Barouche, I don't know where I'll be with her—maybe I'm a fool to help him." He turned the letter over and over in his hand. "No, I'm not. I ought to do it, and I will."

AS ELECTION affairs progressed, Mrs. Grier kept withdrawn from public ways. She did not seek supporters for her son. As the weeks went on, the strain became intense. Her eyes were aflame with excitement, but she grew thinner, until at last she was like a ghost haunting familiar scenes. Once, and once only, did she have touch with Barode Barouche since the agitation began. This was how it happened:

Carnac was at Ottawa, and she was alone in the house in the late evening. As she sat sewing, she heard a knock at the front door. Her heart stood still. It was a knock she had not heard for over a quarter of a century, but it had an unforgettable touch. She waited a moment, her face pale, her eyes shining with tortured memory. She waited for the servant to answer the knock, but presently she realized that the servant probably had not heard. Laying down her work, she passed into the front hall to the door. There for an instant she paused, then opened it.

It was Barode Barouche. Then the memory of a summer like a terrible dream shook her. She trembled. Some old quiver of the dead days swept through her. How distant and how bad it all was! For one instant, the old thrill repeated itself and then was gone—forever.

"What is it you wish here?" she asked.

"Will you not shut the door?" he responded, for she stood with her fingers on the handle. "I can not speak with the door open and the night looking in. Won't you ask me to your sitting-room? I'm not a robber or a rogue."

Slowly, she closed the door. Then she turned, and in the dim light she said: "But you are both a robber and a rogue."

He did not answer until they had entered the sitting-room.

"I gave you that which is out against me now. Is he not brilliant, capable and courageous?"

There was in her face a stern duty.

"It was Fate, monsieur. Carnac does not know who his father is. When he and I went to your political meeting at Charlemont, it had no purpose. No blush came to his cheek, because he did not know. No one in the world knows—no one except myself, who must suffer to the end. Your speech roused in him the native public sense, the ancient fire of the people from whom he did not know he came. His origin has been his bane from the start. He did not know why the man he thought his father seemed almost a stranger to him. He did not understand and so they fell apart. Yet John Grier prized his ability and would have given more than he had to win the boy to himself. Do you ever think what the boy must have suffered? He does not know. Only you and I know!" She paused for a moment.

He thrust out a hand as though to stay her speech, but she burst out again:

"Go away from me. You have spoiled my life; you have spoiled my boy's life, and now he fights you. I give him no help save in one direction. I give to him something his reputed father withheld from him. Don't you think it a strange thing?" her voice was thick with feeling, "that he never could bear to take money from John Grier, and that, even as a child, gifts seemed to trouble him? I think he wanted to give back again all that John Grier had ever paid out to him or for him; and now at last, he fights the man who gave him life! I wanted to tell John Grier all, and I did not tell him because I knew it would spoil his life and my boy's life. It was nothing to me whether I lived or died. But I could not bear my boy should know. He was too noble to have his life spoiled."

BARODE BAROUCHE drew himself together. Here was a deep, significant problem, a situation that needed more expert handling than he had ever shown. As he stood by the table where her sewing lay, the dim light throwing haggard reflections on her face, he had a feeling that she was more than normal. He saw her greater than he had ever imagined her. Something in him revolted at a war being waged between his own son and himself. Also, he wanted to tell her of the danger in which Carnac was, how Luzanne had come, and was hidden away in the outskirts of the city, waiting for the moment when the man who rejected her should be sacrificed to her will.

Now that Barouche was face to face with Alma Grier, however, he felt the prodigious nature of his task. In all the years, he had taken no chance to pay tribute to the woman who, in a real sense, had been his mistress of body and mind for one short term of life. They were both advanced in years, and life and time had taken toll. She was haggard, yet beautiful in a wan way. He did not believe the vanished years had set up between them an impassable barrier.

He put his chances to the test at last.

"Yes, I know—I understand. You remained silent because your nature was too generous to injure anyone. Down at the bottom of his heart, cantankerous, tyrannical as he was, John Grier loved you, and I loved you also."

She made a protest of her hand. "Oh, no! You never knew what love was—never! You had passion, you had hunger of the body, but of love you did not know. I know you, Barode Barouche. You have no heart, you have only sentiment and imagination. You could not be true. You never knew how."

Suddenly a tempest of fire seemed to burn in his eyes, in his whole being. His face flushed; his eyes gleamed; his hands were thrust out before him with passion.

"Will you not understand that were I as foul as hell, a woman like you would make me clean again? The wild sin of our youth has eaten into the soul of my life. You think I have been indifferent to you and to our boy. No, never, never! That I left you both to yourselves was the best proof I was not neglectful. I was sorry; with all my soul, that you should have suffered through me. In the first reaction, I felt that nothing could put me right with you or with eternal justice. So I shrank away from you. You thought me just the brazen roué, who seized what came his way, who ate the fruit within his grasp, who lived to deceive for his own selfish joy. Did you think that? Then I say, if you did, I do not wonder you should be glad to see my son fighting me. It would seem the horribly right revenge Destiny should take." He took a step nearer to her. His face flamed, his arms stretched out. "I have held you in these arms. I come with repentance in my heart, with—"

Her face now was flushed. She interrupted him.

"I don't believe in you, Barode Barouche. At least my husband did not go from his hearthstone looking for what belonged to others. No, no, no, however much I suffered I understood that what he did not feel for me at least he felt for no one else. I had that consolation. To him, life was his business, and to the end it mastered his emotions. [Continued on page 123]

The Scalp Hunter

By Owen Johnson

Illustrated by James Montgomery Flagg

Ⓐ Skippy thought love was something—well, sacred, if you know what he meant. But that was before he met a charming summer-girl, heart-breaker extraordinary of vacation time

SKIPPY in his sentimental progress had now reached the point where, if he could not control the impulses of his sentiments, he could at least review the past with some instructive profit.

"Girls are queer things, aren't they?" he said ruminatively to Snorky Green, for the mood of confidence was on him.

"Queerer and queerer," said Snorky, considering the bosom of last night's dress shirt with a view to future service.

"They get you before you know it and as soon as they get you, they worry the life out of you. One way or the other they start to making you miserable just as soon as you show them you've fallen for them. Now why?"

"Woman has no sense of gratitude," said Snorky.

"And you can't be friends with them—well, just friends."

"I know," said Snorky, heavily.

"What gets me," said Skippy, "is why we fall and fall and fall."

"Habit."

"Well, perhaps."

"Sure, habit, that's all."

"But this is the queerest of all," said Skippy, yawning and stretching his arms deliciously. "How darned fine you feel when it's all over. You go to bed thinking the bottom's been kicked out of things and you wake up feeling so Jim-dandy rip-roarin' chuck full of happiness that you wonder what's happened, and then you remember that you're cured! Your time's your own. You can wear, do and say what you like, spend your money on yourself. You're free! Now it is queer, isn't it?"

"Like having a tooth out?" said Snorky.

"Exactly."

"Say what story did you cook up about me to Margarita Tupper?" said Skippy, tying the white cravat for the sixth time.

"Bygones is bygones," said Snorky, evasively.

"YOU MUST have had me robbin' a coach or skinning a cat," said Skippy, encouragingly.

"You were throwing yourself away there, old top," said Snorky, avoiding the direct answer. "Why in another week you'd 'a' been reading little Rollo and taking to crocheting—a girl who lisps like that, too! Whatever was eating you, anyhow?"

"She talked like a shower bath," said Skippy, unfeelingly, "but her eyes were lovely. Well, that's over."

"What's the use? You'll fall again."

"Never," said Skippy, firmly. Then he qualified it. "That is, not in the same way."

"There ain't no two ways," said Snorky with great firmness. "Sure there is. It's like swimming. You can dive in or you can sit on the bank and splash with your toes—savvy?"

"Ha, ha!"

"Wait and see. I know a thing or two."

Twenty minutes later, having assumed the full glories of evening dress, they departed for dinner at the Balons' across the way, in quest of new triumphs.

"SAY, PUT me on," said Skippy, who like all artists of the imagination was seized with an uncontrollable nervousness before facing an audience. "Who's in the party?"

"Only Charlie and Vivi."

"Vivi?"

"Real name's Violet, but she's dressed it up."

"What's she like—what's her line?" he asked seriously.

"Stiff as a ramrod—prim as an old maid, conversation strictly educational."

"Well, what does she look like?"

"Flabby as a cart-horse."

"Say, what the devil!"

"Grub's O. K. and there'll be fun after," said Snorky, by way of justification.

This being in a way a new experience in strange waters, Skippy's nervousness got the better of him. He ran over his conversational ammunition. There was of course Maude Adams to begin with and he tried hard to think of some book he had read—some work of sufficient dullness to serve up to this blue stocking atmosphere.

"Stop shootin' your cuff," said Snorky, applying his finger to the bell. "Don't you know anything about society?"

"Who's nervous?" said Skippy, indignantly.

His backbone stiffened to the consistency of the white manacle that imprisoned his throat, he shot back his cuffs for the twentieth time, and slid behind Snorky Green as he entered the parlor.

Something that was neither prim nor stiff nor in the least resembled a cart-horse bore down on them with a swish of ruffled skirts.

"Hello, Arthur. How nice of you to come. Dad and Mumsey are out so we're all to ourselves," said Miss Vivi Balon. "Mr. Bedelle? Oh, I've heard a lot about you!"

"Really now, what do you mean?" said Skippy with a long breath of relief.

Miss Balon held his hand just an extra minute as she said this, looking up into his face with an expression of the greatest interest. She was just over five feet, of the dreaded species of brunettes, with a thin upward-pointing little nose and the brightest of eyes.

"OH, I know a terrible lot," she said, giving to her mischievous glance just the slightest, most complimentary shade of apprehension imaginable.

Mr. Skippy Bedelle grew two inches towards the ceiling and looked for a mirror.

Two strictly plain young ladies, roommates of Miss Balon's from Farmington, were introduced as Miss Barrons and Miss Cantillon.

"Elsa Barrons is perfectly wonderful with dumbbells; look at her forearm. And Fanny isn't good-looking, but awfully clever," said Miss Balon, in a whisper which was already graded to the confidential pitch.

Brother Charles now sauntered in and shook hands with the magnificent condescension of a sophomore.

"Have a cigarette before dinner?"

He flashed a silver case and tendered it to Snorky who, being unprepared, hesitated and took one.

"Cigarette?"

"Love to, but I'm in training," said Skippy, quickly.

Charles, having arrived at the age when everything should weigh heavily upon a sophisticated appetite, bored with his sister, bored with sister's plain looking friends, and bored with sister's beaux, retired to the fireplace, draped himself on the mantelpiece and looked properly bored with himself.

The arduities of the opening conversation were fortunately interrupted by the announcement of dinner and Skippy, with Maude Adams in reserve, found himself at table between Miss Balon and the swinger of dumbbells.

"You're a Princeton man?" said Miss Barrons, after several long breaths.

Skippy apportioned the compliment to his manly air and the magnificent lines of the dress suit.

"No, I'm Yale. That is, I'm preparing," he said carelessly, and hoping that Snorky wasn't listening, he added: "Family didn't want me to go in too young, you know. So I'll take my time."

"Oh, yes, I know," said Miss Barrons, with an appreciative glance at his precocious brow. "I think that's much better, too. You don't have half as good a time if you go to college too young."

The subject being exhausted, Skippy counted up the forks while his companion, to appear at ease, asked for the salt to put in her soup.

"Do you know Jim Fisher?" she said, suddenly. "He's going to Yale next year."

Skippy did not know Jim Fisher.

"I wonder if you know a perfectly dandy girl?"

"Who's that?"

"Alice Parks."

Skippy did not know Alice Parks though she lived in New York City. Likewise, with a growing feeling of his profound social ignorance, he successively admitted that he did not know Cornelia Baxter, Frances Bowe or Harry Fall. Whereupon Miss Barrons abandoned him to converse with Charles who did know Alice Parks, who was so attractive, and Harry Fall who had such a strong character and seemed otherwise remarkable.

"WHAT the devil is there to talk about?" said Skippy to himself. There was Maude Adams, but how was he to get to her with any success?

"I'm just crazy about harps," said Miss Cantillon, who was clever. "I think they're wonderful."

"Harps—oh yes," said Charles Balon.

"Do you like them better than violins?" said Miss Barrons doubtfully.

"Oh, much better!"

"They're too big," said Snorky, wisely.

"Yes, that is the trouble. They are too big to carry round, but they are so melodious. I don't like the piano—it's so cold—and all, don't you think?"

While the conversation raged on the proper classification of musical instruments, Miss Balon turned from Snorky to Skippy and looked him once more in the eyes with her interested glance.

"Yes, I've heard a lot about you," she said.

"Really now?"

"You're a perfectly ghastly flirt," she said, lowering her voice.

"You give a girl a terrific rush for a week or two and then pop off without even saying good-by. Never mind, though. I'm warned in advance, you see."

Again the look, the intended look of trying to discover the secret of his fascination. It was quite unlike the way any other girl had ever looked at him. Other girls looked at you sidewise or averted their eyes when they met yours. But this was different. It was mocking, impertinent, insinuating, but it did not displease him. He saw that he had made an impression, an instantaneous impression. He mystified her perhaps, but he interested her intensely. For the first time, he had conquered with a look.

"Who told you?"

"That's telling."

"I'll bet I know."

"Bet you don't."

"Bet I do," Skippy insisted manfully.

Q. "Girls are queer things, aren't they?" Skippy said to Snorky, for the mood of confidence was on him.

"What'll you bet?" Miss Balon demanded, intent on winning.
 "Two pounds of chocolates against a necktie."

"Done! Who is it?"

"Someone here."

"Nope. You've lost."

"Who, then?"

"Someone who knows Dolly Travers," said Vivi with a mocking smile.

"Oh!"

"Brute," said Vivi, in the greatest admiration.

"Really I——"

"Now don't be modest—I hate modest men. It makes it twice as bad. She's very attractive, isn't she?"

"Very," said Skippy, feeling every inch a man.

"But she's rather young—for you, isn't she?" said Vivi, artfully suggesting his great age.

THEY put glasses on cows in Russia," said Miss Cantillon importantly. She had a reputation as a brilliant conversationalist to uphold.

This assertion woke up the table.

"Cows?"

"Glasses?"

"Fanny dear, how excruciating!"

Even the sophomore was surprised into expressing his incredulity.

"Colored glasses on account of the glare of the snow," said Miss Cantillon.

"Fanny!"

"Fact, in Siberia, of course. I read it in the papers."

"Cows can't live in the snow."

"But Siberia, isn't all snow?"

"Most of it is."

"Isn't it wonderful, the things she knows?" said Vivi, admiringly. "Do you like brainy women?"

"That depends," said Skippy, while he stopped to consider. "I don't know any."

"Oh, what a dreadfully cynical remark!" said Vivi, with another admiring look. "Heavens, I shall be frightened to death what I say to you. I'm sure you're awfully clever yourself. Perhaps I'll have a chance. Clever men hate clever women, don't they?"

"There is certainly something about my particular style of beauty that's bowled her over," thought Skippy to himself.

"Oh, I don't know," he said, fatuously unconscious of the virtues he conceded to himself.

"Dolly Travers was quite clever, you know."

"Brute!" said Miss Balon for the second time.

"Oh, come now——"

"Do you know what I think about you?"

"What do you think?"

"I think you'd be lots of excitement at a house party," said Miss Vivi, shaking her head. "Just for a few days. I imagine you'd give a girl the grandest sort of a rush, but as for believing a word you said—never! Not a word!"

"What do you mean?" said Skippy, immensely puffed up.

"It shows in your eyes," said Vivi, with a look of having at last deciphered a mystery. "Besides girls have spoiled you. You have had things too easily. No wonder you're conceited."

Miss Cantillon was discoursing brilliantly on a crowd that had been struck by lightning in Oklahoma and had fallen into a wheat field and set fire to the grain, which had precipitated a conflagration which had necessitated the calling out of the fire departments of two counties.

"You're offended now," said Vivi, in a contrite whisper.

"Someone's given you an awfully bad opinion of me," said Skippy, stiffly, frowning to show the displeasure he did not feel.

"Well it's true, isn't it?"

"It is not!"

"How about Jenny Tupper?"

"Oh that!" said Skippy, with a wave of his hand.

"You see you are a brute! Well, I don't mind. I like your hands."

Skippy took a precautionary glance at the end of his baseball fingers and then allowed them to come to rest on the tablecloth.

"Now you're trying to jolly me," he said, astutely.

"No. I always notice hands the first thing. They tell so much about your character. I saw yours at once."

"You can read hands?" said Skippy, who knew this much of the etiquette of the game.

"Yes, but not now," said Vivi, in a promissory tone.

Skippy's attitude towards social functions underwent a change of front. He began to feel confidently, vaingloriously at ease. He joined in the general conversation determined to rout the brilliant Miss Cantillon, who knew so many things. Now the rule for such pre-eminence is simple and some acquire it by cunning and others by instinct. Deny the obvious. Reputations have fattened on nothing else. When inevitably the moment arrived to discuss Maude Adams, and her latest play, Skippy announced that he did not like Maude Adams.

"Not like Maude Adams?"

There was a sudden silence and all eyes were turned expectantly towards him as to a manifestly superior intelligence. Finally the swinger of dumbbells voiced the question.

"But why?"

"Too much like Maude Adams," Skippy said, cryptically.

Vivi looked at him in admiration.

"How clever, I never thought of that."

"Well, I'm just frantic about Maude Adams!" said the athletic Miss Barrons, stubbornly.

"Because you like Maude Adams," said Skippy, as a clincher.

By ONE bold stroke he had become a personage and what is more, perceived that he had become one. Different topics were served up for his judgment. He pronounced flatly against colleges for women, woman suffrage and bobbed hair. Even Snorky Green was impressed; as for Miss Cantillon, she tried to stir up a little commotion by introducing the subject of the Lady from Narragansett who had removed freckles by water-melon rinds, but the effect was tepid and she relapsed into a listener as Skippy continued his eloquence.

U. "Queerer and queerer," said Snorky, considering the bosom of last night's dress shirt with a view to future service.

"Say, where did you get it?" said Snorky, in a whisper as they passed out to the veranda.

"Get what?"

"All this bright boy stuff!"

"I'll tell you how it's done, some time," said Skippy, magnificently to his bewildered chum.

"Do you like views?" said Vivi, coming to him as a moth to the brightest flame.

"That depends," said Skippy, who being still in a mood of negation was unwilling to concede anything.

MISS VIVI accepted this as an acquiescence, and it being early moonlight and dangerous underfoot, took his hand to lead him safely around the flower beds. Skippy, having just discovered the secret to success, encased himself in indifference and waited developments.

"Isn't it romantic! Don't you love it?" she said, arrived at a little summer house that jutted out over the darkling waters.

"It's rather nice," said Skippy, sternly repressing his emotional tendencies.

Vivi now ostentatiously disengaged her hand.

Q. "Splash your toes, old horse," said Snorky. "Vivi's an old stager. She collects 'em." "What?" asked Skippy. "Scalps!" said Snorky significantly.

"Is it safe now?" said Skippy, anxiously as soon as he was freed.

"How perfectly horrid of you," said the young lady in pretended indignation. "You make fun of everything, even the most sacred things."

The relevancy of this was lost on Skippy, who condescended to say to his romantic companion:

"View isn't half bad if the moon weren't so dreadfully lopsided."

"Unsentimental wretch! I suppose you want to go back?" said Vivi, reproachfully.

"Are there mosquitoes?"

"Just for that I'll keep you here until you're eaten up," said Vivi, plucking a spray of honeysuckle and inhaling it with a sigh.

"Isn't it wonderful? Don't you adore honeysuckle in the moonlight?" she added, transferring it to his inspection.

Skippy inhaled it loudly and announced that it was all right.

"Jelly-fish," said Vivi, throwing it away indignantly.

Skippy resented "jelly-fish."

"Well, you are! I never saw such a cold, calculating, unemotional brute. You're nothing but a great big icy brain."

"Better pull in on the infant phenom—Snorky might hear of it," he thought.

"Oh, I like it here," he said in a more romantic tone.

"Really?"

"Yep."

A long silence, and Vivi inhaling another sprig of honeysuckle and devouring the moon.

"How long you going to stay?"

"About a week."

"Oh!"

Another silence.

"You're so different."

"How do you mean?" Skippy demanded.

"Don't know, but you are—quite, quite different. You seem so much older than Arthur."

"Well that all depends," said Skippy, ready to draw on his imagination.

"You've seen a lot of life, haven't you?"

"Yes, I suppose so."

"I saw that—in your hands."

"I say, how about reading my character now?"

"No, not now; some time later, perhaps."

"Perhaps?"

"Well, I don't know if I'd dare. What are you doing tomorrow?"

"Nothing particular."

"Suppose we get up a hay ride and a picnic? The moon will be glorious."

"Bacon and roast corn? Hurray!" said Skippy, most unromantically.

Vivi got up suddenly.

"Let's go back."

"All right, but it's awfully dark," Skippy said.

"Follow me."

Skippy walked purposely into the first flower bed.

"Help, I'm lost!"

Vivi stood considering.

"Are you sorry?"

"Dreadfully. Ouch, I'm in a rose bush!"

"And you promise not to be cynical and aloof?"

"Cross my heart and hope to die," said Skippy, very well pleased with himself

IMMEDIATELY the hand was offered and retained. To be magnanimous, he gave it a little extra squeeze.

"That's not fair," said Vivi.

"All's fair in love and war," said Skippy, who, under the influence of outward conditions, momentarily forgot his rôle.

"My aunt's cat's pants," said Snorky, enviously, when they had departed. "You're getting to be a rapid worker, old top, you certainly are!"

"Oh, I've learned a thing or “Sacred to the memory of —” Skippy wrote in the sand, and wriggled away just as Miss Balon and Mr. Charles Brownrigger came up the beach.

two,” said Skippy, pompously and well satisfied with himself. “Splash with your toes, old horse,” said Snorky, shaking his head. “Look out, Vivi’s an old stager. She collects them.”

“What?”

“Scalps,” said Snorky significantly.

“Just watch me.”

“You don’t say so.”

“I’ve got her feeding out of my hand, gentle as a lamb,” said Skippy, remembering with a pleasant tickling sensation the mystified fascination of her way of looking at him.

“Cheese it,” said Snorky, shaking his head.

“Snorky, old gal,” said Skippy, “it’s easy when you know how.”

“And what’s the secret?”

“Don’t get tagged.”

“Elucidate.”

“Keep ’em running after you. It’s the first one who runs who wins every time.”

“Oh, simple as that?”

“Sure, that’s all there is to it.”

“Let ’em love you, eh?”

“Oh, well,” said Skippy modestly, but as he sought his bed he stole a satisfied glance into the mirror.

FOR THE next six days, Skippy was a very busy young man. He had a reputation to sustain. Miss Balon had given it to him and Miss Balon must not be disappointed.

Skippy borrowed a bicycle and departed from the home of his chum directly after breakfast, having likewise borrowed various brilliant bits of manly luxury which flashed from his ankles, his neck and his breast pocket. At exactly nine o’clock, as though by accident, Miss Vivi’s trim figure, daintily balanced on the smartest of Safety bicycles, appeared from the Balon driveway and then some such brilliant opening as this occurred:

“Why, Jack! What are you doing up so early?”

“Can’t you guess?” he asked with an appearance of wisdom.

“Where are you going?” Miss Balon would then demand.

“Same place you’re going.”

“Who asked you?”

“You’re going to.”

“How d’you know?”

“Somebody’s eyes have told me so,” said Skippy, growing bold.

VIVI WOULD pretend to be immensely offended, Skippy immensely concerned that she should be offended. There would be a long discussion whether he had really offended, whether he should be really forgiven and whether he really intended to renounce such airs of proprietorship.

By this time the two bicycles were close together with Skippy’s hands on her handlebars and the terms of peace were concluded by the young lady condescending to return to his appreciative gaze from beneath the brim of her hat whither she had taken refuge during the brilliant exchange.

For the twelve hours consecrated to each other’s society each day, Skippy denied what Vivi affirmed unless it happened that Vivi doubted what Skippy stated as a fact. Of course, nothing that was said really mattered, and each knew it. Words were only so many verbal flounders in the most fascinating of duels. Each played at the undying passion with open parades and each was only secretly concerned with tearing away a scalp.

They canoed together, walked together, picnicked together. When they came to the clubhouse, they came late and danced together on the porch to escape the exigencies of society. It was all very serious business, strenuous as training for the football team—but Skippy never relaxed. He had a reputation to sustain. Snorky gave him up for lost. He no longer sought to warn him.

Came the last day. Came the end of languid siestas on drowsy beaches, end of balmy moonlight [Continued on page 120]

THE HERE is no harder fighter than Bob La Follette.
The primaries are held September 5th.
Will his enemies get him this time?
The answer is, No!

THEY'RE Out to Get La Follette

By Richard Barry

THE PRESIDENT-ELECT, just resigned, was saying farewell to his late senatorial colleagues, and paused at the seat on the aisle in the front row where sits the sentinel from Wisconsin.

"Well, Bob," smilingly remarked Harding, on his way to the White House, "I hope in the future you'll be good."

With as kindly a smile, La Follette replied, "I'm afraid not. Instead, I'll keep on trying to make you good."

Within fifteen months we find La Follette, first on the floor of the Senate, then in that cockpit of the nation's politico-economic theories, Wisconsin, squarely against his titular chief on nearly every current issue—the railroads, the Four Power Treaty, the tariff, the soldier's bonus, and the Senator Newberry case.

It used to be "watch Maine in September to see how the nation is going in November." This year a cross drift is early in the political sky. On September 5th, the Wisconsin primaries will determine who is to have that state—La Follette or the administration.

There the economic policies of the Harding régime will be most sharply attacked and defended.

An ex-official of the Northwestern Life Insurance Company of Milwaukee said to the writer, "Some of us who fought La Follette in the early days became his beneficiaries after his insurance and railroad regulation acts got to working. I doubt if any responsible insurance or railroad official today in Wisconsin would like to go back to the conditions we fought so hard to maintain and which La Follette forcefully wrested from us. When big business is at the mercy of paid lobbyists, it is as bad for big business as for the people; we can see that now, but we didn't see it then."

THIS IS ALSO true of manufacturers who stubbornly opposed as "socialistic," La Follette's workmen's compensation act.

The present American system of direct primaries was invented by La Follette in 1897. Later he had the scheme written into a law, which, as Governor of Wisconsin, he signed.

Reaction can justly say that direct primaries have not proven to be a panacea for political ills. The writer asked La Follette recently how he now regards the idea which he originated.

"Every generation has to fight to maintain its political liberty," he replied. "This generation has at least one advantage over the last; it has the direct primary, a weapon forged for the use of the voter in that never ceasing contest he must wage if he will be free. Direct primaries have not failed, because people sometimes have failed to use them. The direct primary is not an automatic guarantee against corruption. Like any piece of machinery it must be used; disuse will bring rust and ruin."

Bryan paralleled much of La Follette's early progressivism, or democracy. Sometimes one; sometimes the other thought of a reform. Frequently they exchanged ideas. Bryan adopted the direct primary after La Follette had suggested it for the use of the Wisconsin voters.

One of Bryan's early original ideas was the direct election of United States senators, now accepted, country-wide, as the correct procedure. Although La Follette owed his public place to intense Republican partisanship, Wisconsin having always been an extremely strong Republican state, he immediately adopted the then despised "nostrum" of the nation's chief Democrat.

IN EVERY Republican convention since 1908, La Follette has presented a minority platform, one rejected by the convention. Yet observe what time, the healing of men's minds, and the spirit of change or progress have done to those measures.

In the recent words of La Follette to the writer: "I consider nothing worthy the absorbing attention of a United States senator that does not bear on the economic life of the people, and this does not exclude either their constitutional rights or international affairs."

Here are extremely short résumés of the La Follette platforms:

1908. Twelve of the 13 planks of the La Follette platform offered to and rejected by the Republican national convention are now law, 9 via Republican congresses. The other plank has been partially adopted.

1. Give initiative to Interstate Commerce Commission. Now law.
2. Suspend freight rate increase when challenged. Now law.
3. Establish railroad rate classification. Now law.
4. Make governmental valuation of railroads. Now law.
5. Create Tariff Commission. Now law.
6. Exempt labor organizations from anti-trust laws. This is the only one not fully legalized, though it has been partially so.
7. Direct election of U. S. Senators. Now law.
8. Publicity of campaign expenditures. Now law.
9. Regulation of telegraph and telephone rates. Now law.
10. Remedy mis-use of injunction in labor disputes. Now law.
11. Create Department of Labor. Now law.
12. Extend 8-hour law to government employes. Now law.
13. General employers' liability act. This finally got into the Republican platforms of '12 and '16 and is now law.

1912. Eighteen propositions were presented by La Follette to and were rejected by the Republican convention. Fourteen were new; 4 had been in the '08 platform. In the intervening 10 years 15 have been written into federal statutes, by either Democrats or Republicans; 2 have been partially adopted. The new planks then were:

1. Concerning definition of trusts. Paralleled in Clayton act.
2. Exempt coöperative farmers from anti-trust law. Now law.
3. Government railroad in Alaska. Now law.
4. Create parcels post. Now law.
5. Income tax admendment. Proposal modified in present law.
6. Woman suffrage. Now law. Got in '16 and '20 platforms.
7. Federal inheritance act. Now law.
8. Improvements in congressional library. Now law.
- 9-13. Concerned Federal Trade Commission. All but one now law.
14. Principal plank; concerned banking and currency; some of its provisions are now found in Federal Reserve Bank Act.
1916. The La Follette minority platform for this year, rejected as usual by the Republican national committee contained 17 planks; 15 had to do with the war.
1920. The broad highway again. Bear in mind that his slogan always has been, "the remedy for the ills of democracy is more democracy."

Ask this question, "how much of this program will be effected in ten or fifteen years?"

This minority platform was submitted to and rejected by the Republican National Committee at Chicago. It had 18 planks. Eight were aftermath of the war. Three reiterated previously desired legislation. Then he plunged boldly into the future with these:

1. Government ownership of stock yards, packing plants and all natural resources in which there is inherent natural monopoly.
2. Revise tax schedules to place greater exactions on wealth.
3. Popular election of all federal judges.
4. Initiative and referendum in national legislation.
5. Recall for senators and representatives.
6. A soldier's delayed payment.
7. A deep waterways from the Great Lakes to the Gulf.

BOIES PENROSE, so an intimate told the writer, was attached to La Follette through the human devotion of one strong man to another, yet they seldom agreed politically. When, early in the present Congress, some insurgents declared they would depose Penrose from his finance committee chairmanship, La Follette refused to join them. Penrose sought out his colleague from Wisconsin and expressed appreciation.

"Before you thank me," said La Follette, "let me explain my position. If I thought the thing you represent would be removed from the chairmanship by opposing you, I would be for it; but, if you were defeated, McCumber would succeed you, and, if McCumber were removed Smoot would succeed him. In my opinion there is no difference between you and McCumber and Smoot, and it is impossible to remove all three of you. Now, the public has been aroused with the prospect of seeing you go, and, if you did go, it would be lulled into a temporary satisfaction falsely believing good had been accomplished. Therefore, I am against any attempt to depose you as that would be deceiving the public."

PENROSE listened gravely. "A good argument, from your viewpoint," he admitted, "but, I want you to know, I am grateful just the same. So, now, tell me what I can do for you."

Realizing that Penrose's underlying feeling was kindly, and that he was speaking the only tongue he knew, that of political barter, La Follette replied simply, "You can't do anything for me."

"But I want to do something," Penrose insisted. "For instance, there is this disloyalty charge. Let me help you in that."

It should be noted, lest La Follette be judged as ungracious, that he was even then enduring his baptism of vitriol; that a nationwide torrent of execration, such as few men ever survive, was seething about him. (In fact, of the six senators whom Wilson had just denounced as "a little group of wilful men," he is at present the only one who was able to remain in public life.)

"If you attempt to assist me in that trouble or in anything else," replied La Follette to Penrose, in his deadly, quiet tone which seethed with suppressed violence, "I shall find a way to prevent it. I shall not permit your assistance, thank you."

Third majority place on the finance committee has come to La Follette since the death of Penrose, through the rule of seniority. He holds a similar place on the Interstate Commerce Committee. Third majority place formerly took its occupant to the conference committee with the house, the solar plexus of Congress. Since La Follette has advanced to it, the Senate has reduced the number of conference majority members from three to two.

Yet observe the danger to "old guard" complacency. If Townsend of Michigan is defeated this election, La Follette would become ranking member of the Interstate Commerce Committee (pre-supposing, of course, that he is re-elected). If McCumber should be defeated, which appears not unlikely, and if La Follette is re-elected, he would be ranking member of the finance committee. Then if Smoot should take the Appropriations committee, which seems likely (under the rules he cannot hold chairmanships of both Finance and Appropriations), La Follette would advance to the head of the senate finance committee—the seat of Aldrich and Penrose, the seat Aldrich said was more important than the speakership of the House, the seat Penrose declared he would not trade for the Presidency.

The writer asked La Follette's chief opponent in the Senate if this might not occur. "It will never be permitted," he declared. To the same question Smoot replied, "It is possible."

The present Chief Justice, who began his Presidential term buoyantly as a Progressive but ended it drably as a reactionary, promised La Follette he would veto, and then signed, the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. Later, during the war, to an associate, he said, "If you see La Follette going in, you know where he is coming out. He is not like the rest of us."

Reading a La Follette speech, one marvels that he should be called an extremist, or that he should be popular, for he deals strictly in facts, and in a prosaic way, addressing himself to the intelligence and not to the emotions.

HEARING him, produces a different effect. He makes a subject (his are all variations of the single thesis—the menace of wealth) pulsate with his own passion of understanding; he dramatizes it; but always within the severe limitation of a public prosecutor, bearing always in mind the laws of evidence.

When his sort of crusading was in vogue, he was lifted on the crest of a wave of popularity to the verge of the steps of the White House. This was in 1912. Then political styles changed, as styles always do change; and he was left high and dry.

Did La Follette change, as do most politicians, to meet the changing styles in politics? Take him in October, 1917, at the low ebb of his fortunes.

For opposing the war with Germany, a senate committee was considering charges towards expulsion; the Wisconsin legislature was debating public condemnation; clubs in Wisconsin to which he had belonged all his life actually did expel him; no newspaper in his state and almost none in the nation was for him; most of his prominent followers had deserted him. Those who contend that he was influenced by the fact that his state had a large German population, forget that there are more Norwegians than Germans in Wisconsin, and that the Norwegians were pro-Ally, and they also forget that if his German constituents did approve, they had no means of showing it.

At that moment, friendless, alone, La Follette addressed the Senate. Reiterating his previous opposition to the war, he declared his right to do so by showing that Lincoln, Clay, Webster and Seward had opposed the Mexican War, both before and after its declaration, both in Congress and on the stump. However, towards the close of that three-hour address occurred the distinctly La Follettian passage, the voice of the ever-consistent and never-stifled crusader against the menace of wealth.

"I have done some of the hardest work of my life during the last few weeks on the revenue bill," he said, "and it is a great disappointment to me that I could get no more from surplus incomes and war profits for soldiers and their families. I did all that I could and I shall continue to fight with all the power at my command until wealth is made to bear more of the burden of this war than has been laid on it by the present Congress. Concerning these matters there can be no difference of opinion. We have not yet been able to marshal the forces to conscript wealth as we have conscripted men, but no one has ever been able to advance even a plausible argument for not so doing."

SMOOT, who shares with Mann and La Follette the reputation of being the hardest working persons in Congress, said to the writer, in April, 1922, in response to a question as to whether La Follette had changed in recent years, "No change whatever, he never changes."

In May, 1917, Warren G. Harding, then Senator from Ohio, said to the writer in response to a question as to whether he thought La Follette could "come back," "I would not trust myself to predict what La Follette can or cannot do. He is capable of anything."

It is 1922. Thrice Congressman, thrice Governor, thrice Senator, La Follette is before the voters of Wisconsin for his fourth nomination as Senator. The fight will be in the Republican primaries. If he wins that nomination, he is conceded the election. What is his platform?

1. The La Follette record, including the platform of 1920.
2. Opposition to the administration's economic policy, as already revealed by his votes and speeches in the Senate.
3. At this writing it looks as if the railroad question would again be paramount with him in this campaign as it has been for over 30 years. He long ago invented the first practical steps which, like others he has devised, are now conservatively accepted as workable, but they are, he declares, only the first steps in the long march to the goal which he has held from the beginning and still holds—government ownership.

4. While his railroad program is a life work of constructive energy he always has some side line to attract attention and enliven the issue; a rivulet of reform pouring into the main stream. This year it is his cry for publicity in tax returns. He seeks to eliminate secrecy concerning great fortunes and their sources. If he wins this election that issue may be decided in his favor, for he is already on the verge of success with it. He came within two senatorial votes of securing a federal law for it recently, and he induced the Governor of Wisconsin to assemble the legislature in special session to consider it this spring, and lost only by a narrow margin of "stalwart" votes. What is the opposition?

- a. The existing "machine." The administration, represented by Lenroot, the junior Senator, controlling all the federal patronage, is sternly anti-La Follette.
- b. The press. The state has 43 dailies; 2 are for La Follette. It has over 360 weeklies and monthlies. All (except La Follette's Magazine) are against him.
- c. The pulpit. The Anti-Saloon League is sending out 1,500 preachers, ostensibly to speak on prohibition, but really to reveal what is a fact, that La Follette voted against the 18th Amendment and the Volstead Act.
- d. A practically unlimited money chest.

An idea of the amount of money being spent and of the arguments being used to defeat La Follette could be seen in the early months of 1922, before an actual candidate had been selected to oppose him.

Hundreds of enormous billboards throughout the state, both in cities and on country roads, were filled with arguments against him; not on printed posters, as is politically customary, but neatly painted to be read with ease.

In addition, there was an ingenious "country and city display follow-up ad scheme" to use a technical expression. This utilized three successive days of full pages each.

THE first day's page luridly described "The Horrors of Bolshevism"; the second's the hectic "Perils of Socialism" with the suggested inference that these were only next door to "Bolshevism"; the third, in properly dramatic sequence, after exposition and development, presented the dénouement—"Pitfalls of Radicalism." At the bottom of this page, in small type, occurred the statement that "radicalism" is only another word for "La Follettism."

These papers, at least in their business offices, perhaps never heard of Charles Oster, a French deputy and political writer, who made a study of the American Government a decade ago. In reply to a question from Louis Brandeis about his relation to French politics, he said, "At home I am called a conservative—I am there in favor of ideas like those of your Senator La Follette."

The open campaign against him will have five chief angles:

1. An opposing candidate selected at an unofficial state convention. This man is Dr. W. A. Garfield, a college instructor and a minister.
2. The administration policies, espoused by this candidate, and ably and soundly presented by Lenroot, with a host of other forceful leaders.
3. It will be contended that as a practical legislator La Follette is an "obstructionist."
4. That he is "wet," and that
5. He was pro-German during the war.

The answer for La Follette is:

1. Does Wisconsin still want in the Senate her greatest son, or will she substitute for him the respectable gentleman opposed?
2. One can sum up his opposition to the administration policies of '22 in his words of '12, "Not railroad regulation; not tariff or currency reform; not conservation—these and others are but manifestations of one great struggle. The supreme issue, involving all others, is—The encroachment of the powerful few upon the rights of the many."
3. Though he opposed the war he voted money to prosecute it; and, the legislation he prepared at that time, little of it passed, has nevertheless been studied by economists of every European country, while one of his war-time financial bills has had the approval of 300 economists in this. He would have been within his rights in absenting himself from all war proceedings, just as he was within his rights in voicing his opinions, as decided by [Continued on page 111]

C Fear

*is the most terrible thing in the world
and no fear is so great as that of a mother alone in a house at night with her child*

Mother at Bay

By Richard Washburn Child

Illustrated by G. Patrick Nelson

THE TELEPHONE, a wall instrument in the hall, tinkled half-heartedly and was silent.

Evelyn Margoson looked up from her magazine but she looked back again at once because, when the summer crowds were not occupying their country estates and villas on the Point, the telephone service relapsed into the usual rural inefficiency. No one would be calling her.

It was half-past nine. It was unpleasant without and the clammy, spectral, tragic atmosphere seemed to settle over the little bungalow like a blanket of menace. In half an hour more, she would have to nurse the baby.

She must not be frightened. Mothers must not be frightened. All through the winter, she had been there at Moss Neck. The baby had been born there. Of course, this was the first night Owen had not come home—the first time she had been left solely alone. Four and a half hours more! Then his train would let him down at the deserted station and he would almost run through the fog, up Jones's Hill and down Laurel Path towards the water. Then all would be comfortable again. He was sure to come! He would take her in his strong arms and tell her the result of the conference with that bear of a father of his—that old Owen Margoson, hard as nails, cruel, unreasonable.

So now the old gentleman, owner of those Pacific ships, had melted at last. He had come all the way across the continent. He had heard of the baby. As she thought of the insults that old man had heaped upon her, she put down the magazine and, seeing her reflection in the long hall mirror just outside the door, she looked at herself sternly and even considered that now, if she wished, she might have old Margoson with his financier's cold face down on his knees to her. She might hear him say something ridiculous such as "For God's sake, my heartless daughter-in-law, I have wronged you. Now let me look upon the face of my only grandchild." Somehow or other, the phrases of the melodrama were exactly the things people said at critical moments. She had never thought of it, and now she laughed.

The telephone tinkled again. She went out to it. There was a terrible buzzing on the line. "Hello," she said. All the wires were jangling as if there had been a terrific wind, and the wind's incoherent voice was shouting warnings at her. But there were no human words, not even the voice of any real wind on wires. This night was not horrible with wind; it was horrible with stillness. It was almost pleasant to listen to this blur and buzzing and snapping.

SHE HUNG up the receiver and turned quickly about. She thought she had heard a cough. It had not sounded like a baby's cough. Her baby never coughed. It was a faint cough. Perhaps it had come from the fog outside. An absurd idea! No one could be out here on the Point, especially on a foggy night like this.

The temptation to go to a window, push up the curtain and stare out into the fog, came to her just as one might be tempted to look over the edge of a skyscraper in order to be sickened by the dizzy height. She would see nothing, as she knew quite well. About eight, after she had cooked and eaten her own supper, she had looked out and saw only the tarnished, dirty, frosted silver of the cold salt mist, and drops of water that had condensed on the warm glass panes, and a few wet, dead, drooping leaves still left by the snow and ice, the wind and the whip of the sleet on the vines.

Straightening her backbone and drawing in a full breath, she went to the door behind which the other living soul in that house slept. She opened it cautiously, tiptoeing to the edge of that white coopy affair where the pink knitted blanket hung across the bottom to keep draughts away. The steady rays of the electric light from the other room fell upon the sleeping face of the infant, happy and free of "nerves."

That was done now; she had fed the baby. The fourteen pounds of diminutive boy had patted her with his hands without even opening his eyes. He knew as she knew; they were one and all one, these two; flesh of flesh, bone of bone. With a gasp, she realized that he was like a piece of her soul broken away to offer to the world and to the future—her immortality.

Now with the door closed again the electric light in the outer room, the living-room, appeared garish. Even under the Japanese shade it shone out now in a cruel glare as if some tensity had filled the house, rasping on the nerves. She listened. The night outside with its fog was nasty with a saturation of non-committal silence. She listened with nothingness beating in her ears. No, there was the drip, drip, drip of the faucet in the sink way back in the kitchen. She thought of the number of times she had put her hand on the brass of that faucet. Except when the baby had come she had done her own work.

THE TELEPHONE was tinkling again—little foolish tinkles, not even loud enough to make a bell-like sound, but merely nervous tinkles such as might be made by two wire nails dangling on a cord. She felt the strange terror of loneliness again. Three hours more. Then Owen would be home or at least on the wet gravel of the Laurel Drive, swinging along in eagerness to take her in his young arms.

She remembered the first time. Comfort could be found in retrospect. One forgot the night, the loneliness, the menacing fog, the pulsing of the silence, if one would only turn over the pages of the album. The mind's album of the past! The day in the country. All that followed that spring. The impulse! It had been his. He had been the one who had insisted on marriage and with all his whimsical and yet strong-willed persuasiveness. But she laughed. There had been no life apparently for her until he came.

She supposed she had been living—young, eager of eyes, sniffing at life with nostrils of the mind, and yet she had not lived at all until Owen came. It was their business—this marriage. What reason had old Margoson to telegraph as he did—insulting, vivid phrases—"no more money—must make your own way—did not consult me—a country girl who was an actress." She had studied dramatic art; to be sure; one might have thought she had carried a spear in a burlesque show! Hard times then. But were they? They were glorious. Penfield Gorman, Owen's roommate in college, had donated the bungalow while he was in Europe. She had done her own work. Owen had his first job and it would have paid for all his club bills if he had not resigned from them all. "Here's the club," he used to say when he came home. "More chummy and more exclusive than the Hare and Hounds."

THE TRAVELING clock in blue leather above the bookcase, told her it was quarter of eleven. She reveled in the thought that time was passing. Here inside all was light and warm. Not a sound from the baby. She folded her hands and looking down at them said to herself that she could not say whether they were as beautiful as her husband said they were; she had looked at them too much to have any judgment about it. At least they appeared to have a delicate color of health and youth and their motions were graceful. She held them up. "They're his, anyhow," she said. "His—and the other's."

At once the hands were invisible! A curtain of blackness had fallen down before her eyes like the result of an explosion. The lights had gone out. She tried the bracket lamp on the wall. Nothing. She tried the light in the hall. Nothing. The house was dark as the inside of a black felt hat. Then stumbling back around chairs, she felt over the table where Owen's tobacco can was to find the matches. "Of all nights!" she said.

Her own voice frightened her, for it was like the voice of an inferior in terror, whose terror communicates itself like a disease. She even struck the match after hesitation, as if the darkness were an explosive gas. The candle she found in the kitchen guttered and flared and crackled. It was less comforting than the electric lighting that had appeared so cruel in its tensity. Now the shadows leaped about the room in a dance, grotesque and horrible to her agitated mind.

Going to the window, she pushed up the roller curtain and tried to stare into the depths of the fog. The candlelight behind her, feeble as it was, seemed to make a pretense at piercing into that wet wall of dirty white murk.

Out of the fog, there had come that sound like a human cough. That, too, was imagination. Perhaps, if she listened, she would hear it again. She waited. Not even the sound of the sea came to her straining ears. There was nothing but the ghastly calm, the silence, and the fog.

The telephone tinkled again.

It broke this time into a trill. The trill became a resounding, echoing, startling summons.

Evelyn took up the cheap tin candlestick and went quickly to the instrument.

"Yes?"

She was trembling. Perhaps something had gone wrong. Perhaps Owen had been struck by something—an accident. Cling, clang! A distant clang. It was a coin box. Yes—a woman's voice, a strange voice, tense, full of impatience, anxious, strident, suggestive of realized fears.

"List-en."

Evelyn never forgot that curious pronunciation with its emphasis on the T.

"List-en."

"Hello."

"You? Mrs. Margoson? Huh? Answer! Where you been? Why didn't you answer all this time, what? Now list-en."

"Yes."

"You're alone, what? Oh, my Gawd, don't tell me he was right! You're alone?"

There was a buzzing on the wires.

"... I say he's comin' for your baby. List-en! You ain't got a chance. He'll take your baby if he has to kill you. He's full of heroin and he'll go the whole way."

ALICE THORPE walked out of the noisy street into the doorway of the Blue Ribbon.

There were chains enough of drug stores and the latest—the Blue Ribbon Service—opened its first large place in New York on the well-known corner where much of the after-theater crowd passes grumbling towards the subways, the elevated and home.

Just beyond the long onyx soda-fountain, seven imitation mahogany booths with coin-slot telephone instruments give out the odors of other people's perfumes, and thumb-frayed directories hang on chains for the convenience of the impatient whose fingers are all thumbs.

Towards these booths, Alice made her way. She had learned in her short career that a certain well-bred European and countess manner was useful always, and particularly useful at times when there might arise a question as to the class to which she belonged. Just now, her lower lip was cut and swollen, suggesting the impact of a careless or a cruel set of knuckles.

At normal, Alice was rather pretty and well cared for, in clothes and toilet. If one overlooked the fact that her eyebrows had been plucked out to form neat bows over her deep blue eyes in which a little of the animal at bay was expressed, one would have to be quite discriminating to discern that this little young woman, with her rich furs and carefully polished nails, was not merely one of the thousands of city bred daughters of affluence in the first generation.

It was now nearly eleven. This was the sixth time that Alice had passed on the way to the telephone booths whose sound-proof qualities had not concealed the stridence of her voice or the unrestrained madness of her jangling of the hook.

The moment she was inside the booth with the door swung shut, Alice cast all her manner and calm aside.

"The beast!" she said aloud. "He thought I'd stand for that. Thought I wouldn't squeal. Thought I wouldn't jump him. Kill me, eh? Well, let him find me first. I'm bad, but I ain't as bad as that. You have to have some kind of a heart or you're all rotten. I ain't all rotten. What was the number? I might have a baby myself, sometime."

Her long fingers were trembling, she wiped her mouth with a handkerchief heavy with the essence of clover. She heard the nickel clang down its groove with a start and a shudder of her whole tense body. Her dialect had changed. Artifice was gone. Her voice, in its anxiety, half frightened her own ears.

"Gimme long distance. Yes. I got change. Now listen. I want Connecticut. Yes. Connecticut. Moss Point, Connecticut. M-o-s-s Point. Three ring seven. Tell the lady there to ring 'em hard. They may be asleep, see?"

She waited, whispering to herself: "I never loved any man enough for this—I didn't. A mother's a mother. You have to stop somewhere. If he hadn't knocked me stupid, I'd have been out here by half-past eight when he left for the train. I'll beat you, Whippy. English Whippy, eh? Stuck on yourself, eh? Style an' everythin'? Regular club man you think you are with your stylish clothes and ways with women, you nasty beast."

C. Whippy felt her breath close to his lips. He did not realize until he heard the tick of the barrel of the revolver on the table, that she had it. Then came the flash and the impact that staggered him.

She was hysterical enough always. Life had been a kind of continuity of hysterics. It had begun when she was seven. She remembered throwing herself onto the floor in a rage, screaming and foaming, with her father, a stolid faced factory foreman, standing over her wide-eyed in wonder and perhaps regretting his marriage to a French-Canadian mother who had died without his really knowing anything about her.

Life had been hysterical, but usually there were no tears. Throwing cold-cream jars aplenty, but tears came seldom. She associated tears with something good in her. Something worth saving and, not counting on mere impotent rage being the source of tears, she believed now that her tears must come from pity.

"Poor little mite!" she exclaimed, still listening with an arm ache. "Poor little innocent thing!"

She jiggled the metal hook viciously.

"Look here, long distance. Now, listen. I've been tryin' all the evenin', see. Tell 'em to ring hard. Somebody there? Sure there is. It's my family. I live there. I know. Keep on ringin'. They gotta answer!"

Her voice went into a high guttural, unpleasant to hear. She had pretty, even teeth; they bit into the soft leather of her white gloves and snapped away. Her hand, suddenly released, knocked the orchid from its place where the lapels of her coat met. She crushed the orchid under one of her soles, grinding its soft pulpiness into the floor in meaningless rage.

"If there's a God in Heaven, he'll put this call through," she whispered. "I ain't asked for much—not often, I haven't! And I ain't asking for me now."

She argued it so that it carried conviction. She argued it staring at the round mouthpiece as if the will in her hard eyes could force from this rubber and metal and black paint and nickel an answer.

There! Something had clicked. A voice! "All ready with Moss Point. Forty cents, please."

Cling-clang-clang!

A woman's voice! "Yes?" Gentle, inquiring.

"Listen," said Alice, through her teeth. Above all, she was a lover of the dramatic. She hoped now to fill the part she had cast for herself. She would wring from this all the satisfaction she could. She spoke as an actress speaks to compel an audience, to hold it with a word—a word of command. "Listen!"

"So it's you? Mrs. Margoson. Answer me." Her voice broke in a pathetic complaint, the result of long tension. "Where you been? Why didn't you answer all this time? You alone, what? Oh, my Gawd, don't tell me he was right! You're all alone with your baby?"

She caught her breath. She was still weak. She felt the blood leave her face again. Her hands were cold. She was dizzy. It was not so easy to think clearly. She managed to mumble the essence of it all. She said:

"He's coming for the baby. Listen, you ain't got a chance. He'll take your baby if he has to kill you. He's full of heroin and he'll go the whole way."

It was terrible to tell a woman a thing like that. In a vague way, she realized the moment she had spoken that she was doing her work in the worst possible form.

"No, that ain't so. I heard you cry. Don't lose your nerve. It may break all right for you. Don't faint. Keep your nerve.

Now listen close to what I'm going to tell you," she explained.

Alice wiped her forehead with the palm of her gloved hand. The air was suddenly heavy with some kind of poison, but she did not dare to open the door. Nerve? She must keep her nerve, too. She must remember that she was talking to a woman who would have trouble in understanding—one of those unprotected stupid women. They needed friends most of all. Suppose this one had been Alice's own sister? She'd tell her everything. She'd make her understand. Better begin at the beginning. Where was it? Her head swung with the swift current of thoughts, events, which ran about like ants when an emergency and a crisis had come, all out of order.

"Your father-in-law," she said. "Hear me? He was on the train from Chicago yesterday. Tellin' everybody. An' the rotten luck! Ed Stillbrook who just got a shortened term out of the Cook County, happens to be on the train. He didn't know this old Margoson, but when he found out who he was—it was a washout! Ed is from the Pacific Coast. Been in St. Quentin. Yer father-in-law has a weakness—anybody can blackmail him. You didn't know? Certainly not. But when he begins to talk about this twenty-million-dollar grandchild of his—I! Are you listening? You understand? He told the whole story to about everybody in the smoker. Talkative. About you, too. Changed his mind about you. You're great stuff now. You alone, and doing your own housework, and so on. An' where you live, an' everythin'. An' Ed drinkin' it like a thirsty fish."

She was out of breath. She listened. The other voice was asking foolish questions, she thought—foolish questions, all in a faint, trembling voice. Let her talk? No, she must listen. What a story it was! At least it seemed so. It must be told. Vague, dramatic reasons made it necessary to tell the story at once.

"Listen!" Alice went on. "Wait'll I drop in another dime. Ed came into New York to meet his girl—his wife. She's the limit in the business. She's called 'The Wasp.' Hetty's her name. Been layin' low in the Bronx. Everybody's afraid of her. Knife, gun, anythin'. And clever. Dresses swell day times. If she sees a clear chance, she'll stick up a bank messenger just like a man would. That's her. One fault—talks—and she did it this time. Too much wealthy water last night and she told four. She was going out tonight in an auto and get the Margoson twenty-million baby and put it over in Brooklyn and go to Frisco and telegraph from there if thirty thousand was paid to her order with no questions within twenty-four hours—why then you'd get your baby back."

THE VOICE at the other end was talking now—begging for help, begging for brevity, begging wildly. But to Alice Thorpe's fevered mentality, the great necessity to press on in her own way was like a flood sweeping through her brain.

"Heaven help you! Keep still!" she commanded. "Don't you see that was my Harry's chance? He had the tip. If the Wasp acted quick, he could act quicker. She had told at least two—the Shott pair—who are squealers. That's her weakness—talkin'—especially when she's on a party. My Harry—English Harry, he's called—the beast!—he sees if he gets the child and there's any suspicion it will go on to Ed Stillbrook an' the Wasp. He never seen the Wasp in his life. There's nothing to connect him with her if she was taken in for the kidnappin'! Besides she boasted that with you alone there in that deserted country, she'd walk in herself with a handkerchief over her nose and mouth and a gun and walk out as free as air with the child in a blanket."

Alice had poured it forth, breathing hard, trying to remember, conscientious in her narrative, trying to make an innocent woman understand. She had ridden over all the protests. Now, out of breath, she listened herself.

"What shall I do? What shall I do?" came the agonized voice from far away. "Why do you tell me all this? When is he coming? When are they coming? What shall I do?"

Some theater-goer with a girl simpering on his arm was glowering through the glass door of the telephone booth at this woman who monopolized the instrument, no doubt to discuss with a woman friend the ins and outs of a bridge party, and who was there, and what was said. But Alice was thinking better now.

She heard the voice of the mother from far away, saying: "Why didn't you telephone the village—the station—Mr. Starrett—to send help to me?"

"What did I know about the station or Mr. Starrett?" snapped Alice. "I had to look you up in the telephone book. If I'd have squealed here in New York, I'd never been let leave town. Have some sense. If there's a chance, take the kid and beat it out into the bushes. Maybe he ain't there. He took the eight forty-five. If he comes let him have his way. He's a beast. Stylish and all that, but don't try anything. He's rough, and the drug is in him tonight."

"I can telephone."

"Yes, telephone. Tell central. Oh, my Gawd, I'm sick or I'd thought of that. Tell central. Do it quick. Before he comes! I'll hang up."

"Wait. Hold the line a minute," came the mother's voice in a wail of anguish.

There was a buzzing hum on the wire.

The voice again: "I want to listen. Someone is outside climbing up the trellis!"

Alice could hear the terror in the words—the awful terror. She almost believed she could hear the thumping of that woman's heart.

She said immediately and shortly, as a doctor might make an easy diagnosis: "He's come! Keep your nerve. God bless you. I'll hang up, and you telephone for help right away—first thing. Hurry! I know him. He cuts all the wires—light and telephone. So be quick!"

"Yes, I will." The voice was stronger and firmer now. "He shan't have my baby! Please tell me one thing. Just tell me one thing more and then I'll let you——"

1. Crouching in the fog, Whippy saw a window curtain in the bungalow suddenly lifted. A figure appeared, black and vague. "It's the wife," he said, and in his heart he pitied her.

Click!

Alice sprang at the instrument, jiggled the hook, uttered black words across red lips, pounded, got the operator.

"You cut us off!" she screamed. "Moss Point. Three ring seven. Quick. It's urgent."

There was that mocking hum.

Alice twisted her body around and threw its weight upon the inoffensive instrument.

"Hello," it said, calmly. "Were you the party who has been trying to get Moss Point, three ring seven?"

"Yes."

"The line is reported out of order."

Outside the telephone booth, the theatergoer with the simpering young woman was astounded to see that the booth was vacant. The receiver was dangling but the offensive monopolistic woman with the handsome furs was gone.

Only when he opened the door, did he know that her body had slid with all limp lifelessness to the floor.

"Say! Look!" he exclaimed stupidly. Reaching down he pulled her out as one lifts a meal sack.

"I'm all right," she said, opening her eyes. "But I see you're a gentleman, and you'll help me—you and this lady? It really was so stupid of me. I was just telephoning my house on Long Island to say I'd sent the motor back. I'm taking the midnight for Chicago and you will help me to a taxi, will you not?"

WHIPPY—English Whippy—did not like the fog. If he had been English in fact, he might have learned the atmosphere of London and felt at home in a murk. As it was, he had been born in East St. Louis and acquired his title from wearing spats. At one time, he had been a second class lightweight prize-fighter.

No one would ever know it now; he weighed nearly a hundred and eighty, his lips were thick, he had a double chin always carefully shaved and toilet-watered, and his clothes were those of a rather noisy kind, suggestive of pudgy millionaires who have inherited money rather than made it. Beneath the layers of fat, however, the muscular power and swiftness still persisted. Once a year, he went to Mount Clemens, Michigan, to stew out and retain his functions of a good agile brute.

Whippy was forty. He had suffered from malaria and though his chest muscles and biceps and shoulder meat was such that he could still deliver a swift snake-like and powerful impact with his fists, damp nights when mere drifting mists sank into woolen clothing like fine but heavy rain, were useful for the concealment of evil purposes but bad for comfort.

So far all had gone well. He had bought a ticket for Hartford and slipped off the train without observation. There would be no train until that which would bring the husband and that late local he would board with the child, climbing on the back platform, and would ride two stations to the place where the jitney car was waiting for him to chug back towards Bridgeport.

All that Whippy had to do now was to interrupt communication. A juniper hedge, dripping with the nasty, still mist, made a good wall between himself and the house. No wall was necessary; the fog was quite enough. The cigarettes that had stained his thick fingers yellow had tanned his throat, until the dry membrane cracked sometimes into the seat of violent coughing. He must not cough. Somewhere behind that lighted window, it might be heard and the one thing he must remember in the confusing, assuring, deceptive thrill of some drug in his veins, was that he must not act too quickly. He could prepare for the assault upon that unprotected house, but it would be utter folly to make himself known before three quarters of an hour before the one-thirty had pulled in at the station. To work too soon, would be to multiply the chances of a slip.

For preparation, however, there was no reason for delay. The telephone must be cut; and there could be no reason for suspicion if he cut it now. An exultation was still in his veins—a feeling of being irresistible, of being a king among men. He shut his fists. The knuckles were sore. Her teeth! Never mind. He knew his business. The telephone was dangerous. He moved from the dripping juniper hedge, feeling his way through the fog which sucked into the lungs, was almost like a thick liquid. Here was a pole. With his biceps still straining, he climbed the ten or twelve feet of that post which supported the service wire.

C. Going to the window, Evelyn stared long into the blackness. She could see nothing, but out of the fog there came that sound like a human cough.

"Let her try to get help now!" he said satirically, putting the jaws of his insulated nippers on the resisting wire.

Instantly, all the lights in the house disappeared!

It was his first error. He realized it as he dug his rubber heels into the post, trying to maintain his precarious position.

THE ELECTRIC LIGHTS! What a fool! No harm done," he said. "I might have known. The telephone wires come down there from that line of poles on the hill. Probably attached to the porcelains on the wall of the house, eh?"

Down in the soft bed of grass and leaves soggy with the winter's decay, he stood again listening, waiting.

"Oh, it won't mean nothing to her," he told himself. "Just a usual interruption of the service. Maybe a blown fuse! There she goes. She's got a candle!"

A flickering light moved behind the blinds of the noncommittal house. He pulled out his watch with the illuminated phosphorescent dial; it was nearly eleven. He knew quite well of the hour of the husband's return. Nothing to worry about. Perhaps it would be safe to smoke. No. There was a shade drawn up and a dark figure—the figure of a woman, peering into the night, into nothingness, into the sightless wall of silver frosted mist. The curtain was drawn again.

"She better take off her clothes and go to bed," he said, licking his thick lips. "She'll need sleep by the time I come in."

He took out a silk handkerchief of deep lavender, recalling the day he had bought it out of a window on Fifth Avenue—a day when he had felt that the thousand in his pocket would buy the world and all that therein is. This was the handkerchief he would tie over his nose and mouth.

Crouching in the fog, he saw a window curtain in the bungalow suddenly lifted again. A figure appeared black and vague; on the path of yellow light in the mist, a vague shadow was thrown for a moment.

"It's the wife. What's she lookin' for?" he said, yawning, and in his heart he felt pity for her. Pity, he distrusted. He had learned to distrust pity and soft feeling; he was wise enough after a multitude of experiences, to know that every flight of his sentiment ended in a crash. Never could he be so hard-boiled, as he called it, as in those moments just after he had believed that he had uncovered a fine, tender, generous, kindly side of himself that he was afraid to encourage—that he knew he must not encourage.

"She's gone," he said, as the curtain was drawn and the flickering candlelight grew fainter. "These telephone wires are lost in this fog. Can't see anything. I'll have to clip 'em next the house in order to make sure of 'em."

HE ITCHED all over and talked aloud in a low voice to himself. Whenever he was buoyed up this way, he always itched and talked incessantly to his own pleased, egotistical hearing in low, comforting, boastful, self-assuring words. All his skin seemed alive. He twisted inside his sleeves, trousers, undershirt. He took off his hat and smoothed his long black hair brushed straight back. With his mind set squarely, and with endless calm and confidence in his evil purpose, his hand nevertheless went forever feeling about. He fingered the nippers in his pocket, the silk handkerchief, rubbed his cheek, his chin, his wet cold nose, his elbow, touched the gun in his pocket.

Far away on the lonely road he had taken from the station, he heard the whine and clatter of shifting gears from some automobile. The headlights made a strange, faint glow in the fog before the machine passed down into a gully. Suddenly the sound and the glow were gone as if the fog were a sea into whose oblivion the vehicle had sunk.

"Didn't stop?" he exclaimed behind his teeth. "Naw! Nothing like that. She'd be too afraid to try to pull off anythin' after comin' to bein' roared down by Stillbrook for talkin' so much. Nothin' into it. That machine didn't stop. It just went down into that gully beyond the trestle bridge."

He pulled off his shoes, making a wry face at the necessity, and dropped them cautiously into the wet grass whose cold dampness now soaked up unpleasantly into his woolen socks. The hinge of the window blind served the grip of his fingers, while his meaty arms pulled him up to reach the copper gutter of the porch. His stockinged toes found a foothold on the sill and moved cautiously and noiselessly to the left, while his free outstretched hand waved in the mist, seeking gentle contact with the telephone wires.

ALL THE time, he was thinking how careful he must be, after he had got the child, to play the part of a solicitous father on the train—a solicitous father who, having had a serious operation on his ear, was so swathed in gauze that no one would ever recognize him again. Indeed, he could hear the conductor saying, "Pretty late for the young 'un," and his reply, "Sure. Other kid has the measles and this one goes to visit his grandma."

Well, no telephone wires yet. Perhaps the next window beyond would do. He tried it and here the waving hand, reaching nearly to the sill of the second story, touched the taut connection with its case of soft, black insulating material. The nippers feeling around caught the wire in their hungry metal jaws and severed it in one satisfying bite. Then he kept perfectly still for a minute or two.

"That's that," said Whippy, when he was once again behind the juniper hedge trying to pull the pointed patent leather, cloth-topped shoes over his wet stockings. "That's that. And it is immaterial to me whether she goes to bed or not. Let her sit up if she thinks it will help. When the time comes, she's got to face the music."

His watch said eleven-thirty now. Twelve would do. Midnight. A half hour to get the baby and quiet the mother, as he expressed it, and a half hour to go near the station and wait to get on at the end of the same train from which the young father would alight.

He could not understand why there was so much moving about of that candle in the house. It went from the front room and appeared again in the back windows where its light, falling through the closed blinds, made strange yellow slats on the fog. It came back again. It returned.

"Maybe feeding it," he suggested.

Ten minutes later the light suddenly disappeared completely—gone like a soul from a dead body. Now the bungalow was like a lump of shapeless solid in the mist.

"She's gone to bed," he concluded. "That's a cinch. She's gone to bed and now maybe I can get away with it without waking her."

FOR THE first time he thought of the nervous strain of carrying a squalling infant. He had something for the baby in a little vial in his pocket. Not too much, he remembered, just enough. He had thought of everything. A job like this was usually done by an amateur or some illiterate, as Whippy had said to Alice with his own lips. Usually there were grave risks. In this case, however, not so great because the old man would settle easily. Whippy already had a note to leave for the old man telling him how much it would cost to get the youngster back. He felt in his inside pocket to be sure. Yes, the note was there. He had thought of everything.

The time had come now!

He walked cautiously across the grass to the house and, having opened the blinds with swift cunning hands and one odd tool, he did the old trick on the window strips, so that the whole lower sash came out dangling on its weight cords.

He listened. The warm air within the house came out in a little puff into the fog and touched his cheek as he raised his body up to the sill. There he paused. There was something curious here! The air smelled pungent. It was laden with a pungent aromatic odor—a smell like something suggesting hospitals, a cool sickish smell, like ether.

THAT WAS none of his business—that smell. He put one stockinged foot down on the hardwood floor and felt about with the toes of the other for the center rug. Touching it, he moved over it until he felt the table edge.

At the moment he touched that polished surface, he stopped in the midst of the inky blackness like one frozen. Little warning tensions ran down to the termini of every nerve. He listened. He could hear water dripping into a sink far away. He could hear his own heart thumping inside his ribs as they were held extended in an interruption of a breath. He pulled at the gun in his pocket. Nothing could have come more clearly out of the mystery of that blackness than the sound of a short, derisive, woman's laugh.

It was unbelievable! A woman's laugh. The mother would have nothing to laugh about unless she were laughing in her sleep. Laughs are not menacing. He thought he had heard something menacing in this barely audible laugh.

"Light the candle, Whippy," a voice said suddenly. "You're late. Don't be scared, you poor nut. I ain't got a revolver nor a knife nor nothin'."

He remained immovable trying to take in the situation, trying to weigh it.

"You got a gun, Whippy. But you wouldn't shoot me. I bet you wouldn't."

There was a pause, then a scratching noise and a match touched to a candle wick opened an ever-growing circle of flickering light. Standing with her back to a closed door was a woman. She wore a man's felt hat. Like the long raincoat, it was still wet. In one of her hands hung nonchalantly by her side was a pair of motor gauntlets. She was still laughing silently and evilly. He could see the derisive, insolent curl of her pink lips and white teeth; he could not see anything in her eyes but anger and defeat.

"I know you, English Whippy," she said. "Take off that lavender disguise. You ain't ever seen me before but I've seen you. Ed Stillbrook's best pal pointed you out once. And I can never forget that double chin, Whippy. Ain't you the dirty dog to come out here and try to take this job away from me!"

Shesneered and tried to trick the wet strands of hair under her hat. Whippy made a mean thrusting motion with the point of his automatic.

"You wouldn't!" she said.

"Why?"

"Because you know my reputation, Whippy. You ain't got the grit. You're afraid I'm too good [Continued on page 109]

PLAY of the Month

Captain Applejack

By Walter Hackett

*LOTS of folks are calling
The Play of the Month
Their*

*Vest Pocket Theater
That is more than a habit
it's an education*

AMBROSE APPLEJOHN, forty and flat in a rut, felt the need of a change. It was borne in upon him, when two young girls offered him a seat in a crowded railway car, that he was getting old. His friend, Johnny Jason, told him he was not really old, but that the generations old house in which he had always lived, was ageing him. Routine had gripped him. "The same thing at the same time in the same way every day because he did the same thing in the same way yesterday, and the reason he did them yesterday was because he did them the day before—it wasn't years but monotony that was ageing him." Romance had passed him by. He had never felt the need of it. But at last he realized that it was the only thing worth living for. As he told his ward, Poppy Faire, "I crave adventure. I should like to match my wits against an arch villain. And then—love at first sight! I want to rescue a beautiful young woman—from some terrible danger."

POPPY (she is in love with Ambrose but he doesn't know it)—Do you mean you—you are going to be married?

AMBROSE—Well-er-well, I haven't planned quite as far ahead as that.

POPPY—If you rescue a foreign princess, you will have to marry her.

AMBROSE—I suppose I shall—it's the respectable thing to do—yes. But you know, somehow I never thought of marriage at all.

POPPY—Not even when you took the Rector's sister to dinner?

AMBROSE—That was a duty. When duty begins, romance ends. POPPY (dreamily)—Love at first sight. I wonder if there is such a thing!

AMBROSE—Jason says it has happened to him over and over. POPPY—Did he tell you what it is like?

AMBROSE—Yes. He says it is a most peculiar sensation. Overpowering but not painful. To illustrate: A strange woman enters this room—I am here alone. We exchange greetings and for a time discuss the most trivial subjects. Then something, a careless shrug of the shoulders, the quick birdlike turn of her head, breaks in on one's consciousness with a vague familiarity—the familiarity becomes a conviction—we have met before.

POPPY—But if you have met before, it isn't love at first sight.

AMBROSE—Not in this life, child. Aeons and aeons ago. "I was a king in Babylon and you were a Christian slave." This knowledge thrills you. Then follows a moment of intense excitement which communicates itself to every nerve—your hands touch—your eyes meet—something electric—a flash—

POPPY—Does it?

AMBROSE—Yes-er-so Jason says.

IN THIS mood, under the influence of Jason, Applejohn has advertised the old house for sale. The discovery of his intention is a great shock to his aunt, Mrs. Agatha Whatcombe, and a distinct disappointment to Poppy. But Ambrose craves adventure and the thing must be done. His rebellion, however, is not permitted to disturb the hard-set habits of his aunt and ward and they retire at the usual time. Lush, the butler, goes through his ordinary routine of closing the house for the night. Ambrose, true to his new rôle, refuses "Pilgrim's Progress" and "The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" and chooses "The Three Musketeers" for his late reading. At the instant of making his choice, there comes a loud and unexpected knocking at the outside door. Under the impression that a prospective purchaser of the house might be making a late call, Lush is ordered to admit the visitor. A handsome lady enters. Almost immediately and most convincingly, she faints in Ambrose's arms. When Lush is on the point of throwing water in her face, she revives. Upon recovering, she tells a most remarkable story. "Monsieur," she says dramatically, "I am Anna Valeska, the Russian dancer." This means nothing to Ambrose but he is polite. When the revolution came, according to Anna, she was in Moscow. The Bolsheviks kept her prisoner to dance for them. Then one day, Lenin, himself, offered her a fortune in jewels if she would act as his secret agent. Anna pretended to accept the offer, but secretly planned to take the jewels to England and return them to the rightful owner, the Grand Duchess Sonia. Discovering her perfidy, Lenin set his chief spy, Borolsky, "the greatest spy in all the world, cruel, ruthless, terrible," on her trail. If Borolsky finds her, she will be killed. He is after her. He has chased her into the country. He is at hand. She has momentarily eluded him and sought safety in Ambrose's old house. But he will come and he will have Anna and the jewels, which she is carrying in a case, even though he has to kill Ambrose first. As she makes this pleasant announcement, there sounds a loud knocking at the door. "Here he is!" cries Anna. "Save me, save me from that man!" Ambrose, promising to do what he can, hides Anna in an inner room and turns to meet the terrible Borolsky. He has longed for adventure and here it is thrown at his head. After all, it is not Borolsky, but a Mrs. Pengard whom Lush admits. Her car has broken down and she and her husband are seeking refuge from the storm while the chauffeur repairs it. Mr. Pengard does not immediately enter and the lady takes advantage of his delay to faint in Ambrose's arms. "What! Another of them," he cries as he drags the woman to the settee. When Mrs. Pengard and her husband are left alone in the room for a moment while Ambrose goes for a picture of the house, they instantly set about trying to find a secret panel in the book shelves. They succeed, but before they can explore it, Ambrose returns. Meanwhile the woman has unfastened the window, making their return possible, and as they go out, they tell Ambrose, innocent and unsuspecting, that they expect to return.

Aunt Agatha (Marie Wainwright) is profoundly stirred when Ambrose Applejohn (Wallace Eddinger) calmly admits having advertised the old home for sale because he "feels the need of a change."

C. "Timid as I am, d'you see—and hatin' trouble, I'll face the crew single handed, if I must. I'll slit 'em ear from ear," Ambrose tells Poppy (Phoebe Foster).

Ambrose is just felicitating himself, that he has escaped Borolsky, when Lush announces the arrival of the terrible spy.

BOROLSKY—I must offer my apologies for calling upon you at this late hour.

AMBROSE—Please don't.

BOROLSKY—Mr. Applejohn, are you a friend of justice?

AMBROSE—Well, I'm not a policeman.

BOROLSKY—The police, tch! Of what use are the police? It is because the police are useless that I am here.

AMBROSE—I can quite believe that.

BOROLSKY—I am searching for a lady.

AMBROSE—It's a wonderful pastime. (He is delighted with his own wit.)

BOROLSKY (fiercely)—It is not a pastime with me. No. Not this one. She has tricked—betrayed me and my friends and when anyone trifles with me, I always hunt them down and make them suffer. Remember that.

AMBROSE—But what has that got to do with me?

BOROLSKY—Mr. Applejohn, has a strange lady sought shelter here tonight?

AMBROSE—No.

BOROLSKY—Are you sure?

AMBROSE—Of course, I'm sure. You think I shouldn't notice a strange woman about the house? I'd make a point of noticing her.

BOROLSKY—Then I can only make my excuses and bid you good night.

AMBROSE—You are going so soon? That's too bad.

BOROLSKY (turns back at the door)—Mr. Applejohn, you have lied to me. (Produces Anna's handkerchief.)

This handkerchief, which I found on your settee, is the property of the lady I am seeking. She is here.

AMBROSE—Nonsense, nonsense.

BOROLSKY—The (Continued on page 132)

¶ The Broken Tambourine has won the fancy of Paris. M. Carrier-Belleuse's latest painting has unexpectedly attracted the attention of two continents.

The Picture that Made Paris Gasp

By Willard Huntington Wright

THE LATEST picture to attract the fickleness of the French public is Pierre Carrier-Belleuse's "Le Tambourin Brisé" (The Broken Tambourine). And behold herein another instance of the capricious irresponsibility with which the Goddess of Fame confers her favors upon the paintings of that ancient mausoleum of mediocrity and talent—the official Paris Salon.

To the average conventional painter the Salon is a kind of lottery. In all the years of its placid, orthodox existence neither prophet, sage nor oracle has been able to predict the outcome of its verdict. Moreover, an illogical and haphazard spirit has always seemed to mark the public's unofficial approval.

Regard the amazing case of "September Morn." Why, in the name of all that is sacred in the arts, should this slim flapper taking her morning plunge have fired the enthusiasm of two nations? Surely there is nothing new or startling in pictures of immodest ladies at their ablutions.

For decades Carrier-Belleuse has been a more or less familiar name at the Salon's vernissages. Like Harpignies, he belongs to the old school of safe and sane academicians. When the smoke of each successive battle in the ranks of the younger painters has cleared away, he is still at his easel, serene and unperturbed, carrying on the true and tried traditions of his masters. Born in 1851, he became a pupil of Cabanel and the decorator, Galland; and he exposed work in the Salon as early as 1875. Since then he has accumulated various academic honors and distinctions. But they have had little to do with the acclaim now being accorded his latest canvas.

However, the dusky maiden of this picture will not, I think, achieve the notoriety of her xanthous sister in "September Morn," despite the fact that "The Broken Tambourine" is much the better painting. It is more pleasing in design; its execution is more competent and vivid; and it is freer in treatment, even though not in dishabille! But even so, it belongs to a type of painting which went out of fashion along with hoopskirts, warming-pans and hair-cloth settees.

It was Manet, the first artist who dared put nudes and clothed figures together in a modern al-fresco setting (What a furore his "Déjeuner sur L'Herbe" created among the Sumners of his day!), who set the style in pictures wherein some small subsidiary object played the hero's part.

Today this practice seems old-fashioned, and smacks of mothballs and antimacassars. The broken tambourine, indeed! No one—M. Carrier-Belleuse least of all—cares particularly about the tambourine. It is the lovely and bewitching young woman who is the real center of interest and the raison d'être of the present painting.

Merton of the ## MOVIES

By Harry Leon Wilson

BOOK of the Month

Some books—like men—are born famous, some achieve fame and others have fame thrust upon them—and each month that one which is most deserving finds a place here as the Book of the Month

MERTON GILL mealed at the Gashwiler home. He ate his supper in moody silence, holding himself above the small gossip of the day that engaged Amos G. Gashwiler and his wife. What to him meant the announcement that Amos expected a new line of white goods on the morrow, or Mrs. Gashwiler's version of a regrettable incident occurring at that afternoon's meeting of the Entre Nous Five Hundred Club, in which the score had been judged adversely to Mrs. Gashwiler, resulting in the loss of the first prize, a handsome fern dish, and concerning which Mrs. Gashwiler had thought it best to speak her mind? What importance could he attach to the disclosure of Metta Judson, the Gashwiler hired girl, who chatted freely during her appearances with food, that Doc Cummins had said old Grandma Foutz couldn't last out another day; that the Peter Swansons were sending clear to Chicago for Tilda's trousseau; and that Jeff Murdock had arrested one of the Giddings boys, but she couldn't learn if it was Fred or Gus, for being drunk as a fool and busting up a bazaar out at the Oak Grove schoolhouse, and the fighting was something terrible.

Scarcely did he listen to these petty recitals. He ate in silence and when he had finished the simple meal, he begged to be excused. He begged this in a lofty, detached, somewhat weary manner, as a man of the world, excessively bored at the dull chatter but still the fastidious gentleman, might have begged it, breaking into the many repetitions by his hostess of just what she had said to Mrs. Judge Ellis. He was again Clifford Armytage, enacting a polished society man among yokels. He was so impressive after rising, in his bow to Mrs. Gashwiler, that Amos regarded him with a kindling suspicion.

MR. GASHWILER had, indeed, ground for suspicion, as Mr. Wilson makes clear. Only that afternoon, he had detected Merton, who was a clerk in Gashwiler's General Store, in the act of hurling one of the display dummies across the room. The unimaginative storekeeper, of course, could not know that Merton had no intention of destroying the dummy as a dummy; he could not know that the boy was merely practicing his theatricals, having his eye firmly fixed on the large field of the motion pictures. Serious and determined, he had even gone to the extent of taking a correspondence course in acting and at every leisure moment of the day he was busily engaged in perfecting himself in his chosen art. His one dissipation was a twice a week visit to Simsbury's picture theater. His one indulgence was the purchase of many magazines devoted to the work and people of the film world. His one extravagance had been a journey to Peoria to hear and see the star of the silent stage, Beulah Baxter. Of course there was the cost of the stills made by Lowell Hardy, Simsbury's artistic photographer, but that was part of his equipment and figured as legitimate over-head. With Lowell, he had made an appointment for the following Sunday secure in the knowledge that the Gashwilers would be away from home. His Far West outfit had just arrived fresh from a Chicago catalog house, and he was anxious to see the studies. This outfit consisted of high-heeled boots, spurs, a gay shirt, a gayer neckerchief, a broad-brimmed hat, a leather holster, and a pair of goatskin chaps. Arrayed in this costume, he permitted Lowell to make several photographs on Sunday. Then came the moment when it was desirable to get a few stills of himself and his horse. For the latter rôle, he impressed Dexter, Gashwiler's old raw-boned horse, grown indifferent to most of the affairs of life. Of course in all this western stuff, Merton was appearing as the famous star, Buck Benson, and Dexter was forced to be Pinto. But as Buck Benson, he could not remain forever on the ground; he must mount his faithful companion and be taken in the act of riding away.

FROM the barn, Merton dragged a saddle, blanket, and bridle. He had never saddled a horse before but he had not studied in vain. He seized Dexter by a wisp of his surviving mane and commanded, "Get around there, you old skate!" Dexter sighed miserably and got around as ordered. He was both pained and astonished. He knew that this was Sunday. Never had he been forced to work on this day. But he meekly suffered the protrusion of a bit between his teeth and shuddered but slightly when a blanket and then a heavy saddle were flung across his back. True, he looked up in some dismay when the girth was tightened. Not once in all his years had he been saddled. He was used to having things loose around his waist.

The girth went still tighter. Dexter glanced about with genuine concern. Someone was intending to harm him. He curved his swanlike neck and snapped savagely at the shoulder of his aggressor, who kicked him in the side and yelled, "Whoa, there, dang you!"

Dexter subsided. He saw it was no use. Whatever queer thing they meant to do to him would be done despite all his resistance. Still his alarm had caused him to hold up his head now. He was looking much more like a horse.

"There!" said Merton Gill, and as a finishing touch he lashed a coiled clothesline to the front of the saddle.

"Now, here! Get me this way. This is one of the best things I do—that is, so far." Fondly he twined his arms around the long thin neck of Dexter, who tossed his head and knocked off the cowboy hat. "Never mind that—it's out," said Merton. "Can't use it in this scene." He laid his cheek to the cheek of his pet. "Well, old pal, they're takin' yuh from me, but we got to keep a stiff upper lip. Yuh and me been through some purty lively times together, but we got to face the music at last—there, Lowell, did you get that?"

The artist had made his study. He made three others of the same affecting scene at different angles. Dexter was overwhelmed with endearments. Doubtless he was puzzled—to be kicked in the ribs one minute, the next to be fondled. But Lowell Hardy was enthusiastic. He said he would have some corking studies. He made another of Buck Benson preparing to mount good old Pinto; though, as a matter of fact, Buck, it appeared, was not even half prepared to mount.

"Go on, jump on him," suggested the artist. "I'll get a few more that way."

"Well, I don't know," Merton hesitated. He had never been aboard a horse. Perhaps he shouldn't try to go too far in one lesson. "You see, the old boy's pretty tired from his week's work. Maybe I better not mount him. Say, I'll tell you, take me rolling a cigarette, just standing by him. I darned near forgot the cigarette."

From the barn he brought a sack of tobacco and some papers. He had no intention of smoking, but this kind of cigarette was too completely identified with Buck Benson to be left out. Lolling against the side of Dexter, he poured tobacco from the sack into one of the papers.

Harry Leon Wilson receives the adoration of his old Pal. Obviously the dumb worshiper is trying to tell the brilliant satirist that he is eager to go with him into the "wide spaces, where men are men and one can give the best that is in him."

"Get me this way," he directed, "just pouring it out."

He had not yet learned to roll a cigarette, but Gus Giddings, the Simsbury outlaw, had promised to teach him. Anyway, it was enough now to be looking keenly out from under his hat while he poured tobacco into the creased paper against the background of good old Pinto. An art study of this pose was completed. But Lowell Hardy craved more action, more variety.

"Go on, get on him," he urged. "I want to make a study of that."

"Well—" again Merton faltered—"the old skate's tired out from a hard week, and I'm not feeling any too lively myself."

"Shucks! It won't kill him if you get on his back for a minute, will it? You'll want one to show, won't you? Hurry up, while the light's right."

Yes, he would need a mounted study to show. Many times he had enacted a scene in which a director had looked over the art studies of Clifford Armytage and handed them back with the remark, "But you seem to play only society parts, Mr. Armytage. All very interesting and I've no doubt we can place you soon; but just at present we are needing a lead for a Western, a man who can look the part and ride."

Thereupon he handed these Buck Benson stills to the man, whose face would instantly relax into an expression of pleased surprise.

"The very thing," he would say. And among these stills, certainly there should be one of Clifford Armytage actually on the back of his horse. He'd chance it.

He clutched the bridle reins of Dexter under his drooping chin, and overcoming a feeble resistance, dragged him alongside the watering trough. Dexter at first thought he was wished to drink, but a kick took that nonsense out of him. With extreme care Merton stood upon the edge of the trough and thrust a leg blindly over the saddle. With some determined clambering he was at last seated. His feet were in the stirrups. There was a strange light in his eyes. There was a strange light in Dexter's eyes. To each of them the experience was not only without precedent but was rather unpleasant.

"Ride him out in the middle here away from the well," directed the camera man.

Metta Judson, from the back porch, here came into the piece with lines that the author had assuredly not written for her.

"Geddap, there, you Dexter Gashwiler," called Metta loudly and with the best intentions.

"You keep still," commanded the rider severely and without turning his head. What a long way it seemed to the ground! He had never dreamed that horses were so lofty.

"There hold that," said the artist. "You're looking off over the Western hills. Atta boy! Wait till I get a sideview."

"Move your camera," said the rider. "Seems to me he don't like to turn around."

The artist seized Dexter's bridle and turned him half around. That wasn't so bad. Merton began to feel the thrill of it. He even lounged in the saddle presently, and continued to lounge while the artist packed his camera. What had he been afraid of? He could sit a horse as well as the next man.

"I'll bet they'll come out fine," he called to the departing artist.

"Leave that to me. I dare say, I'll be able to do something good with them. So long."

"So long," said Merton, and was left alone on the back of a horse higher than people would think until they got on him. Indeed, he was beginning to like it. If you just had a little nerve, you needn't be afraid of anything. Now he considered nothing less than riding, in the cool of early evening, up and down the alley upon which the barnyard gave.

It was the cutting remark of a thoughtless, empty-headed girl that confirmed Merton in his rash resolve. Metta Judson, again on the back steps, surveyed the scene with kindling eyes. "I bet you daren't ride him," said Metta.

"You know a lot about it, don't you?" parried Merton. He jerked Dexter's head up, snapped the reins on his neck, and addressed him in genial, comradely but authoritative tones: "Git up there, old hoss!"

Dexter lowered his head again and remained as if posing conscientiously for the statue of a tired horse.

"Giddap, there, you old Dexter Gashwiler!" ordered Metta. But Dexter would not yield to a woman's whim.

"I'll tell you," said Merton, now contemptuous of his mount, "get the buggy whip and tickle his ribs."

Metta sped on the errand, her eyes shining with the lust for torture. With the frayed end of the whip from the delivery wagon she lightly scored Dexter's ribs.

Dexter's frame grew tense, his head came up. Once more he looked like a horse. He had been brave to face destruction, but he found himself unable to face being tickled to death. He tossed his head and stepped into a trot towards the open gate.

Stirred to life by the tickling, Dexter now became more acutely aware of that strange restless burden upon his back, and he was inspired to free himself from it. He increased his pace as he came to the gate, and managed a backward kick with both heels. This lost the rider his stirrups and left him less securely seated than he wished to be. He dropped the reins and grasped the saddle's pommel with both hands.

All might have been well but, upon losing the stirrups, the rider had firmly clasped his legs about the waist of the animal. Again and again he tightened them, and now Dexter not only looked every inch a horse but very painfully to his rider felt like one, for the spurs were goading him to a most seditious behavior.

The rider clasped his mount ever more tightly. The deep dust of the alley road mounted high over the spirited scene and through it came not only the hearty delight of Metta Judson in peals of womanly laughter, but the shrill cries of the three Ransom children whom Merton had not before noticed. These were Calvin Ransom, aged eight; Elsie Ransom, aged six; and little Woodrow Ransom, aged four.

"Merton's in a runaway, Merton's in a runaway, Merton's in a runaway!" they shrieked, but with none of the sympathy that would have become them.

Suddenly they ceased, frozen with a new and splendid wonder, for their descriptive phrase was now inexact. Merton was no longer in a runaway. But only for a moment did they hesitate before taking up the new chant.

"Looky, looky. He's thrown Merton right off into the dirt. He's thrown Merton right off into the dirt. Oh, looky, Merton Gill right down there in the dirt where he threw him!"

Again they had become exact. Merton was right down there in the dirt and a frantic, flashing heeled Dexter was vanishing up the alley at the head of a cloud of dust.

The Bookshelf OF THE MONTH

THE BEAUTIFUL AND DAMNED, by F. Scott Fitzgerald, plays surprisingly upon the motif of great expectations. A wealthy grandfather is dominant in the molding of Anthony Patch's life, both before and after the disinheritance. Anthony's moral and mental collapse, and the failure of his marriage to the beautiful Gloria, are sketched against the background of New York's social indulgences, which seem well "liquored." Cut off without a cent because of his profligate life, it was a stroke of irony that his mind should have failed at the moment when the coveted millions came to him.

THE WILD HEART, by Emma-Lindsay Squier, furnishes intimate and moving pictures of the little friends of wood and sky. Sea-gull and rabbit, startled fawn and Henry the Heron, Timothy the Seal and Hector the Chicken-hawk, with the Princess, a tigress and Ethel a lioness, are presented as real live animals that Miss Squier knew and whose wild hearts yielded, with touching readiness, to the magic of love.

SIMON CALLED PETER, by Robert Keable, reveals the bitter struggle of a young chaplain in the World War. Conventional in thought and training, Peter Grabam went out to help the Tommies. There things were different from what he had imagined. In his abstract, hard and fast religion, there was nothing to which the soldiers could cling. Their attitude shook his faith. His hard struggle back to a new light came through the love brought to him by a nurse.

MY MEMORIES OF EIGHTY YEARS, by Chauncey M. Depew, carries a bewildering suggestion of the myriad miracle changes since 1842. More startling still are the names of the author's friends—most of them, now, just historical figures to the vast majority of his readers. Lincoln, Seward, Stanton, Chase, Greeley, Grant, Blaine—Senator Depew knew them all, and he has illuminated his pages with personal observations about each—his memory catching the far past to the present.

SO BY HARD and bitter experience, Merton Gill profited from his correspondence course in film acting. Came then a day when Merton told Gashwiler good-by. "Always remember that your old job is waiting for you," Amos said as the boy set his face to the West and started on his long journey to the Land of Promise.

He had little money and no friends and at the scene of the making of many pictures, he found that "only two companies were shooting on the lot." There were small bits for him a couple of times but there were long gaps and his small capital dwindled, became negligible, vanished completely. For a week he slept in out-of-the-way places on the lot and for three days he went without food. Gashwiler's assurance, in those days, rang in his ears but he held on, largely because it was easier to hold on than to let go. At that crucial moment, Flips (Sarah) Montague, a girl whom he had met occasionally around the lot, and disliked because she took life humorously, came to his aid.

Flips fed his starving stomach and persuaded Baird, a director, to give Merton a chance to do straight acting in a burlesque piece. That it was burlesque had to be carefully concealed from Merton—he had gone into the [Continued on page 134]

UNCLE WALT
Puts the Kibosh
on the Bogey Man

WHO'S Afraid!

By Walt Mason

Illustrated by
F. Strothmann

IT WAS a black, stagnant autumn night. There was no breath of air stirring, and it was hard work breathing. There were four of us at the Gallivant farmhouse: Mrs. Gallivant, whose husband was away from home on business; her visiting sister, Mrs. Putty, and the latter's blooming daughter, Isabella; and myself, the fiery, untamed farm hand, earning fourteen dollars a month by my Herculean labors with pitchfork and hoe.

We sat on the porch fanning ourselves until the mosquitoes, which were of the barred Plymouth Rock variety, drove us into the house; and all evening Mrs. Gallivant had kept our nerves taut by relating ghoulish tales of epitaphs and dead men's bones. She was a fine woman, and had won several prizes at the county fair on gilt-edged butter, but she had a decayed imagination that liked to hang around hearses and charnel houses.

The smoky lamp was giving a sickly light, and she was telling her favorite story of vampires she had known, when there arose from the cellar the most appalling noises that ever shocked human ears on a black and stagnant night. There was a rattling sound as of musketry, and back of it, and all around it, the most diabolical groaning and gurgling, as though people were being strangled to death.

We sat staring at each other for a time.

"We'll have to go down and see what's doing," said Mrs. Gallivant, at last, "and you," indicating me, "will have to go first, as you're the only male on the place. Let us arm ourselves and see who is being murdered."

Had they all been old women I'd have refused; but Isabella was young and attractive, and she evidently was expecting me to imitate the curves of Bayard, the knight without fear and without reproach, and I lacked the courage to show her how badly scared I was. Taking a rusty shotgun in one hand, and the family dog in the other, I led the procession down the cellar stairs. I tried to look like a hero but my feet were so cold they left imprints of hoar frost wherever I stepped.

Mrs. Gallivant followed with the smoking lamp, and by its sickly light, I discovered what was the matter. The old lady had put up a lot of tomato ketchup in bottles some time before, and placed the bottles on a shelf. She must have put too much hops and raisins in her ketchup, for it was fermenting and blowing the corks out of the bottles, and then slopping down to the floor. Hence the popping and gurgling. The sound seemed innocuous enough when we knew what made it; but when we had heard it from the room above, it was ghastly, grim, and ominous, suggesting ghosts and unholy things.

The lessons that influence us most are those gained by experience. I have read the works of many philosophers, and most of the stuff touching demonology, but that little episode in the cellar of a Kansas farm house did more to shake my faith in bogies, and to convince me of the uselessness of fear, than all I have read.

C. Taking a rusty shotgun in one hand, the family dog in the other, I led the exterminating procession down the cellar stairs. Mrs. Gallivant followed with the smoking lamp.

WE SHOULD all be happy as chipmunks in this world, but nearly all people are more or less unhappy because they are afraid of something. The honest workingman, who earns his bread in the sweat of his brow, is afraid that the mill will close; the owner of the mill has a snappy car and a cottage at the seashore, and should be happy; but he fears that there will be a slump in the demand for ready made cisterns, and his works will have to close down.

Yonder majestic female, just stepping into the department store, has everything a mortal can desire; yet she is worried, for she finds that she weighs eight pounds more than she did two months ago; the statesman in Washington is afraid that his constituents won't appreciate the way he is bleeding and dying for his country. We are all afraid of something; and the something usually is vague and indefinite, but it spoils the world for us.

When everything around us seems serene, and the bills are paid, and there is money in the bank, and we can't think of anything material to be afraid of, we rake up the old ancestral fear of dying, and lead it around by a string. This is the master-fear that has taken the sunshine out of life for generations of highly civilized men. It doesn't worry the fatalistic people who are supposed to be less civilized than ourselves. In Eastern countries, the voters hold to the theory that everything is written, everything preordained; it was written that they would be born, and they were born; it is written that they must die, and they'll die at the appointed time. It is something they can't alter or revise, so why worry?

We grow up with an ingrained fear of the tomb. Our pastors and Sunday school teachers tell us, from our earliest infancy, that intolerable horrors await nearly all of us after we die.

For years, I have been trying to overcome this fear, which was implanted in my bosom when I was less than three feet high, and at times I think I have succeeded, and I meditate calmly upon the Great Change, and think how nice it will be to rest under a willow, in a handsomely upholstered box, where no bore can get at me and no assessor can ask impertinent questions, and threaten to have me arrested for tax dodging. Sometimes I feel so serene over the whole business that I tell my neighbors I have no dread at all; when the summons comes I shall lay aside my trusty pipe and bequeath my pearl-inlaid corkscrew to a worthy nephew, and lay me down with a will, as Stevenson concisely phrased it.

But a week or two ago I was laid up with nine standard diseases, the ones you will find charted and diagramed in the almanacs. I had pale green pains all over me and the veterinarian who attended me looked so hopeless that the old fear came back, and I was pretty miserable for two or three days, thinking of undertakers and embalming fluid; but the veterinarian called in a healer who had achieved great cures, and between them they set me on the road to recovery, and no sooner had I been assured that I was going to get well, than the fear left me, and I put away John Bunyan's complete works, and resumed the perusal of "Hopalong Cassidy," by Clarence E. Mulford and went serenely on my way.

IN my normal condition, I am free of the Great Fear; when I am sick and more or less insane, the Fear returns. So perhaps I have triumphed, after all. We should be judged by our conduct and beliefs when we are sane and sound, not when a lot of doctors are pouring Bordeaux Mixture into us, through a funnel.

It is a grand and encouraging thing that people and denominations are rebelling against the creeds that thrive on human fear. One of the most prosperous churches in the world is growing at a phenomenal rate because it teaches serenity. Its people are not afraid; they know or believe that everything is right side up with care, in this world and the next; all they have to do is to play the game according to the rules, and they have nothing to be afraid of.

Recently, everybody was reading the newspaper stories of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's lectures on the next world, and they have caused much discussion, some indorsing and some scoffing. Whether we agree with the distinguished visitor or otherwise, the arguments of a man of such genius deserve respectful consideration; and it must be admitted that he has done great good in helping to allay a universal fear. It should be remembered that he is a physician as well as a spiritualist, and when he says that dying is no ordeal at all, there is comfort in his words.

No matter what ideas we entertain as to what happens after death, the process of dying and leaving this good old globe forever has always had its terrors. Louis XIV of France was tortured all through his life by this fear. Anybody who mentioned the word "death" in his presence was likely to be fired from his job as assistant postmaster, and it was certain that he'd never again have a chance to approach the Grand Monarch. Yet when the solemn hour came, and Louis was stretched on his downy couch, going through the motions of expiring, he was reminded of my experience in the Gallivant cellar; it was as easy as sliding down a cellar door. "Is this all there is to it?" inquired the great king, and the learned physician replied, "This is all; there's no trick to it, whatever," or words to that effect.

Sir Arthur says that dying merely involves a delicious languor; and having stepped from this world to the next, the man who has behaved himself can have any kind of a heaven he wants. There are houses in that shadowy land, and parks, and all the conveniences we are used to; and a man may smoke cigars, and make himself perfectly at home. Perhaps Sir Arthur hasn't the blue prints to establish all he claims, but his ideas of paradise are, in general, quite attractive.

II Ajax and Hoodoos

I DO not fear the morrow, though it may reek of sorrow and tragedy and care, but blithely I'll be wending; there is no use in rending my clothing or my hair. A lot of trembling voters, afraid of chugging motors, go slinking through the town; among the cars embattled they get all fussed and rattled, and henrys run them down. Men fear that balmy breezes will bring them fierce diseases, with deadly germs in crowds; and sure enough hay fever smites them as with a cleaver and puts them in their shrouds. Though hoodoos be assembling, I've banished fear and trembling, I sound defiant note; though Jonahs round me teeter, and chant a doleful meter, they can not get my goat. Oh, fearing is inviting all woes and troubles blighting to roost upon your dome; and they would treat me meanly but viewing them serenely, I shoo them from my home.

Clare Mason

The country is full of silver tongued orators, and they are lecturing on everything from the missing link to the desirability of the coinage of light wines and beer, and they are doing no good; they are telling us things we all know, and we could tell them better ourselves. They are not giving encouragement or solace to anybody. If they would go around the kerosene circuit urging people not to be afraid, to cast out all manner of fear, they would be contributing to the happiness of the world.

It's really a caution how much trouble you avoid by not being afraid of it. Most of the farmers I have known—and I have mingled with coveys of them—were slaves to fear. They were always squinting around the horizon to see if there was any sign of elemental disturbance.

When trouble does come, it's usually something you weren't looking for, and you see the folly of being afraid. A long time ago, there was a Harvest Home festival at Lincoln, Nebraska, and I was chosen as the Stuffed Prophet for the occasion. It was a great honor, and one I had coveted for years. There was a big procession of floats and chariots and brass bands, and the Stuffed Prophet rode on the highest float, and was sumptuously attired in kingly robes, and had a brass helmet on his head. Only citizens of high standing were chosen for this rôle, and when a man had once filled it, he felt that he had not lived in vain, and had a group photograph of himself made and hung over the mantel.

I felt a good deal like a queen of the May when I took my seat on the high float. My brass helmet was too small, and there was a high wind blowing, and I was afraid it would be blown off. I reflected that I'd be a ridiculous prophet if my helmet got away and I was worrying so much over this that I didn't see a wire which had been strung across the street, and it caught me under the chin and hoisted me off the float; and I fell about half a mile to the ground, where a mule kicked me with all four feet, and another float ran over me. When I recovered consciousness, the city firemen were spraying me from a chemical extinguisher. The helmet never got away for a minute; but the taxidermist had an awful time restoring me to my former shape.

Surely this shows the folly of fearing one thing so much that another can get you from behind.

MY own preference would be for a paved road reaching into the infinite distance, with a high-powered automobile to ride in; there would be free filling stations at proper intervals, and no speed cops to embarrass the traveler. After running over a pedestrian, it would not be necessary to stop the car and go back and give him first aid, or haul him to a hospital; in that happy land, pedestrians will have to keep out of the way, or take what is coming to them.

There is nothing to fear; that is the message Sir Arthur brought, and it is the wisest message in the world.

SCIENCE of the Month

By James Hopper & E. E. Free

You can hardly consider yourself educated these days unless you know what is going on in the world of science. This department keeps you abreast of the times

C. Probably when the need of measuring land arose, man took the next step—which was the use of a standard measure. This measure then may have been the King's foot.

Why LIGHT is Curved

An Easy Lesson in the Einstein Theory of Relativity

THIS is an attempt to tell as plainly as possible what the Einstein theory is about.

Science is concerned in giving man a more nearly correct perception of the Universe. It tries to help him to see more clearly the world in which he lives.

One way to see well is to have a right idea of the size of things. The progress of Science may be considered as the increase in man's ability to measure things.

At the bottom of the idea of size is the idea of length; of the distance between two points.

To a primitive man, the measure of distance between two points was probably physical effort; his fatigue. Did it tire him more to walk to the bank of the river than to the edge of the forest? Then he concluded that the distance between his cave and the river was more than the distance between his cave and the forest.

Immediately, we see how inadequate such a standard was. For instance, our primitive man might walk up a hill and then down the other side. By his fatigue standard, he would conclude that the distance between the bottom of the hill and the top (up which he toiled) was more than the distance between the top and the bottom (down which he slid). Yet by our present standard of measurement, each distance might be exactly one mile though his muscles doubted it.

In other words, the fatigue standard with which he measured gave correct results (approximately correct) only when he stayed upon the flat. It ceased to be adequate, it ceased to work, as soon as he got into the mountains.

Probably when the need of measuring land arose, man took the next step—which was the use of a standard measure. This measure may have been at first the King's foot. Then a piece of wood equal in length to the King's foot. Then, for convenience, a pole or rod kept by the King.

When the first man took the King's rod and found it went five times across the width of his field, and then found that that same rod went also five times across his neighbor's field, he decided that his field had the same width as his neighbor's field.

At the bottom of this method is an assumption. The assumption that things equal to the same thing are equal to each other.

This assumption, of course, is the product of experience. It is a "self-evident truth"; what the geometers call an axiom. That axiom is the very base of the geometry, developed by Euclid and his successors, with which we have measured things ever since the science came into existence.

AS TIME went on, and the necessity for more and more accurate measurement grew, the wooden measuring rod became the platinum-iridium bar, preserved in Paris, which is called the standard meter. But we were still measuring things with the geometry of Euclid. Still measuring with the Euclid geometry things on the earth and things off the earth.

Thus—till Einstein came. Just a few years ago.

Scientists were worrying at that time over an experiment which had them absolutely groggy—an experiment which will remain long famous as the "Michelson-Morley" experiment. According to all known physical laws, this experiment should have shown one thing. Yet, perversely, it persisted in showing another thing. Science was losing its mind, was tearing its hair.

Einstein, who was a mathematician with already a good many successes to his credit—this was in 1905—took a look at the thing, and saw where the trouble lay. He divined that it lay in the measurements. The measures applied, of course, were our old Euclid friends, then considered by man the best of measures, the only possible measures. Einstein saw that as a matter of fact they were inadequate; that they were not accurate enough. And said so.

The reader can imagine going to the primitive man, with whom we started, and saying to him kindly: "Bo-bo, your system of measuring distance by your fatigue is a poor one."

So you can picture Einstein going to the modern man, taking him kindly by the hand, and saying, "O you, Flower of the Accumulated Knowledge of All the Ages!

"That way you have of measuring things with your Euclid geometry is a poor one.

"Your standard, your Euclid geometry, is inadequate.

"It works pretty well as long as, staying upon the earth, you measure things of the earth.

"It becomes woefully inadequate when, leaping into space, you try to measure with it the Universe."

As you may believe, he was asked why.

"Because," he said, "your Euclid geometry, passing into space, takes no account of time.

"It takes account only of space. And things exist not in space alone, but also in time.

"Take for example a ruler. It occupies not only space, but it occupies time. When it ceases to exist—that is, when it ceases to occupy time—then it also ceases to occupy space. But as long as it exists, it occupies both space and time.

"To measure things right, you should have a measure which takes account of both space and time. And your Euclid geometry takes account only of space."

"But," said the others, "how is it, then, that, so far, our Euclid measure has worked quite well?"

"Because," came back the logical answer, "you have remained upon earth."

"Your Euclid geometry measures well enough when you stay on earth. It fails you when you leap up into space or descend within the miniscule world of the atom.

"Then your Euclid measure, which is only space, is no longer good enough; and you must, to measure accurately, make use of a measure which has in it both space and time."

Then Einstein set to work to make a measure to measure both time and space. It was, of course, a monumental labor, and one of genius. The old Euclid geometry concerned itself only with the three dimensions of space—length, width and height. Einstein worked out one in which time occurred as a fourth dimension.

Then he began to measure things with it.

The first thing was the Michelson-Morley experiment which, we have seen, was the scandal of science. Under the application of the magic measure, the scandal vanished, was resolved. The experiment was all right, always had been all right. The trouble had been in the measure applied. Measured with the new Einstein standard, the experiment said something logical, something in harmony with the known laws of the universe.

Einstein now turned his measure to a computation of the orbit of Mercury. About this planet, another scientific scandal existed. According to all calculations (with Euclidian measure, of course), the orbit of Mercury should have been so-and-so. Yet Mercury stubbornly insisted on traveling on an orbit which was not quite so-and-so. Einstein re-calculated what should be the orbit of Mercury, using in the calculation his measure. He found that, using his measure, the orbit of Mercury should be—just what it was. His calculated orbit and Mercury's actual orbit coincided. This was the second triumph for Mr. Einstein.

He now tried a little prophesying. "If my measure is a correct one," he said, "it follows, as the night the day, that light, whenever it passes a body exercising gravitation, must bend as it passes that body."

A year or two later, an eclipse of the sun gave the astronomers a chance to see if Einstein was right. They found that the light from the stars bent as it passed the sun in eclipse.

This about finished the last quibbler. The Einstein measure had pretty well proved itself.

C. When the first man took the King's rod and found it went five times across his field, and then found that the same rod went five times across his neighbor's field, he decided that the fields had the same width.

FINGER-TIPS TAUGHT TO SEE

French physician reverses evolution and makes blind soldiers see with their hands

THAT the blind can see with their fingers has long been a common metaphor. This is now claimed to be literally true. A French physician and scientist, Professor Louis Farigoule, believes that he has succeeded in educating finger-tips actually to see. Not merely to feel things very accurately and sensitively, but really to perceive light as eyes do.

The nerve endings in the retina of an eye, the nerves by which we see, are very much like the nerves of our skin, which provide our sense of touch. Way back in evolution when life was still on the floor of the sea, creatures had only one kind of nerves. They perceived contacts with other objects, touches, over the same nerves by which they perceived the difference between light and dark. Some creatures like this still survive.

Gradually, in the course of evolution, some animals developed seeing nerves. Certain spots on the body became especially sensitive to light. Later, lenses were provided in front of these spots, and the modern eye came into being and animals really saw.

DO CONTINENTS JUST DRIFT?

New theory is that land areas are not anchored, but move slowly here and there

THAT the continents, Asia, Africa, Australia, the Americas, and the rest, are not securely anchored on the earth's surface, but are drifting about—very slowly, of course—all over the face of the earth, as it were, is the new theory offered by Professor Alfred Wegener, a German scientist.

According to this theory, the real surface of the terrestrial globe is the rock level which is the bottom of the great oceans. Below this, the rock is not rigid but plastic—like a very thick liquid, such as melted asphalt. According to the Doctor's theory, on this viscous, plastic rock, the continents float about as icebergs float about in the sea.

Sometimes, thus floating through the Ages, one of them wanders too far north, and then it suffers an Ice Age; sometimes, drifting to the equator, it finds itself covered with tropical trees and flowers, with elephants and tigers and lions, the fossils of which, eons later, are discovered with wonder by men who find themselves on a continent which to them seems perfectly well anchored in the temperate zone.

CHLORINE KEPT A SECRET

Scientists for years failed to see the difference between two distinct sets of atoms

SOME of the elements of late have been discovered to be twins—or more. This is true, for instance, of chlorine—that element which became famous, or infamous, as the first poison gas that was used in the World War.

Chlorine has been well known by chemists for over a century. It was believed to be one—single, alone—every atom of it like every other atom of it and every atom of it an atom of chlorine and nothing else. But the chemists were wrong. They know now that there are two kinds of chlorine with two kinds of chlorine atoms so much alike that for long the very chemist who gave them life could not tell them apart.

How were they ever told apart, these chlorine twins? By their weight. One is heavier than the other—as one twin usually is. One twin has the atomic weight of 37; the other twin weighs only 35. By taking advantage of this difference in weight, Dr. W.

D. Harkins, and his associates of the University of Chicago, have been able to get the twins apart. The lighter brother, as it diffuses more readily than its twin, leaks out faster through the walls of a clay tube in which both are placed.

Scientifically, twin elements like these are called isotopes. The chlorine twins are the two isotopes of chlorine. Although the chlorine isotopes are the only ones that have been actually separated so far, other elements are now believed to have isotopes. Some elements have gone chlorine one better or more. Lead for instance has five isotopes. That is, it is quintuplets.

EGYPTIANS HAD TOOTHACHE

Investigator finds modern ills afflicted people who lived forty centuries ago

IN ANCIENT Egypt, three thousand or four thousand years ago, men suffered from many of the same diseases that afflict them today. So says Sir Marc Armand Ruffer, whose discoveries, the fruit of many years of research, recently have been published posthumously under the editorship of Professor Roy L. Moadic of the University of Chicago.

Dr. Ruffer's success in devising methods for softening the mummy's ancient dried-up tissues, so that modern laboratory methods could be applied to them, is as interesting as his findings. The bacteria that proved fatal to some Egyptian noble many centuries ago have been stained and identified under Dr. Ruffer's microscope.

Among the diseases identified by Dr. Ruffer are tuberculosis, rickets, pneumonia, the kind of rheumatism which produces deformities of the joints, heart disease, smallpox, kidney disease, cancer-like bone tumors and lung inflammation due to the inhaling of dust, this last being probably the first known instance of what modern doctors call occupational disease.

Bad teeth were common. The ancient Egyptians probably suffered as much as we do from toothache. Members of the royal family had dandruff and were bald.

Hardening of the arteries was common and apparently attacked its victims at an earlier age than is the rule today.

RADIUM A REVOLUTIONIST

Light wave, atomic, and conservation of energy hypotheses are upset by radioactivity

THE discovery of radium has revolutionized more scientific theories than any discovery for three hundred years. Every man owes it to himself to know with some accuracy the main facts about radium and radioactivity.

1. Certain elements, lately discovered, give out continuously heat and other radiations. These elements with these characteristics, are called radioactive.

3. Radium is obtained mainly from carnottite, an ore found in Colorado. It takes thirty thousand tons of this ore to yield one ounce of radium. The total quantity of radium now available in the world is less than a third of a pound.

4. Radium is being tried at present in the treatment of cancer.

5. Radioactivity is due to the explosion of atoms. The particles shot out are of two kinds, called respectively the alpha and the beta particles, the latter being electrons. Some of the radioactive elements also give out rays which are called gamma rays.

6. Radioactive elements are related; they can be grouped as families.

7. Each radioactive element is in the process of changing into another element. The speed with which this changing is done varies tremendously according to the element. Radium C<sup>1</sup>, for instance, lives only one millionth of a second before passing on into something else. But the atom of thorium lives over thirty billion years.

8. Radium, though rare, is very widespread. Traces of it are found in all rocks, and also in sea water.

9. The following scientific theories have been influenced by the discovery of radioactivity:

A. The atomic theory has had to be discarded.

B. New proof has been obtained for the Einstein theory.

C. Matter has been discovered to be Electricity.

D. An entirely new theory of chemical affinity has been developed.

E. The wave theory of Light is now seriously questioned.

F. The principle of conservation of energy is now suspected.

G. Estimates of the earth's age have been lengthened hundreds of millions of years.

H. We have a new explanation as to the source of the sun's heat.

BIG JOB FOR BOOKWORM

Articles on scientific subjects amount to 383,000 in sixteen years and are still coming

FOR over twenty years, the Royal Society of London has been working on a catalog which will list all of the articles devoted to scientific research that were published between the years 1884 and 1900.

So far, the Society has only reached the letter P. The last volume issued includes the papers of the writers whose name begins with a P.

For all the authors between A and P, the total number of papers amount to 279,902. The number of authors falling under these letters is 49,750.

It is obvious that even the most industrious scientist could not read and digest all of these papers. So, the professional scientist is perforce a close specialist. He limits himself to some minute corner of the scientific field, and is an expert only in that particular section.

BEYOND THE BEYOND

Astronomer finds that the diameter of our universe is three hundred thousand light-years

ASTRONOMERS believe that this stellar assembly, our universe, is a limited one. That a being traversing the universe would at length come to its edge; would come at last to the shores of a space in which there would be no more stars.

Man has measured it. Dr. Harlow Shapley, of the Harvard College Observatory, has been calculating the size of this stupendous assemblage of stars, most of them suns much larger than ours, probably satellited just as ours, and of which our earth, seeming to us so immense, is but a mote.

Professor Shapley believes its size to be not less than a diameter of three hundred thousand light-years. A light year is the length of space traversed by light in one year; and light travels one hundred and eighty-six thousand miles in one second.

X-RAY TURNED ON TIRES

Manufacturers watch change of fabrics in automobile shoes as process is carried on

WOULD you like to look through the rubber of your automobile tire and see if the fabric has broken, or is about to break?

Scientists have been applying the X-ray to the inspection of tire fabrics, just as surgeons use it to discover fractures of bones.

So far, the inventors of this new process, Messrs. Truesdale and Hayes, have made use of it mainly in the manufacturing of the tires but its use can be extended.

WHY IS A RAINBOW?

Beautiful and common phenomenon does not follow laws of light refraction

THE RAINBOW, that beautiful phenomenon which offers itself so often to Man, has in it the mystery that is inherent to all Beauty. At least, so says, in other words, Dr. W. J. Humphreys, distinguished meteorologist of the United States Weather Bureau. According to him, the rainbow baffles the physicist who would explain fully and clearly all of its details.

The basic cause of the rainbow is the refraction of light rays as they pass through rain. The rays, passing through the falling drops of water, are broken up into the spectrum colors, just as they are when they pass through a glass prism.

But when one tries to apply the known laws of the refraction of light to the details of the rainbow, one finds that they do not agree. The secondary and accessory rainbows, the varying sequence of colors in the bows, the different widths of the colored bands, and other details do not obey the supposed laws.

ANCIENTS SAW TEN STARS

Prehistoric drawing of pleiades found but cave-man saw three stars now invisible

It is reported that archaeologists, studying the extraordinary wall decorations of dwellings of prehistoric man in southern France, have found a representation of the remarkable group of stars familiar to every one as the pleiades, or "little dipper," or seven sisters.

It represents ten stars instead of the seven that are ordinarily visible to the naked eye.

In discussing the matter, a French archaeologist suggests four possible explanations: The prehistoric observer may have gone to the top of high mountains to inspect the heavens; and there the clearer atmosphere makes many stars visible that cannot be seen at sea level. Or it may be that the normal vision of the cave dweller was more acute. Again, it is conceivable that three stars of the group have changed in brightness sufficiently to become invisible since the time of the cave dweller—a period variously estimated at from twenty thousand to a hundred thousand years. Finally, the atmosphere of that early day may have been clearer.

NIGHT DOESN'T HURRY TIME

Clocks that seemed to gain during darkness were right and the blame falls on the stars

IT WAS announced recently in the newspapers that clocks had been found to move more rapidly at night than in the daytime. When clocks of astronomical observatories were checked each morning and each evening by comparing them with the stars, it was found that the clocks gained about one-tenth of a second during the night and lost the same amount during the day.

Of course, this error was too small to be of any practical importance except in the most accurate astronomical calculations, but it attracted much attention among scientists and the curious-minded fraction of the public.

The newest information is that the clocks were right after all. It was the stars that were wrong; or rather it was our observations of the stars that were wrong. Mr. W. B. Varnum, of the Carnegie Institution, has been studying the matter and has decided that it is due to a very slight change in the refraction of light in passing through the atmosphere.

Because of some factor, probably some effect of sunlight, the air about the earth bends the light coming from the stars a little differently in the daytime than at night. This makes a given star appear to the astronomer, to be in a place a trifle away from its real place in the sky. Accordingly, the exact time at which a star is in a given position, relative to the observer's telescope, is just a trifle wrong.

VOICES LEAPING THE GAP

Broken wire no longer stops communication as wireless repairs the breaks

FOR USE along its power lines, the General Electric Company had developed a telephone system that works even when there are gaps in the line.

Before, communication between the ends of a power line was at the mercy of accidents. The power lines, carrying in the form of high voltage the power derived from rivers and falls, cross wild regions, mountainous and almost impassable. Falling trees or avalanches, as they broke the power line, also broke the telephone wires which were strung on the same poles. The engineers at the ends of the lines, or along it, were cut off from each other just when they needed most to communicate.

This difficulty has been solved in the most ingenious way by making use of the "wired wireless" of General Squier. The power wire itself is used as a telephone in the following way:

Radiophone waves—like the ordinary broadcast waves—are sent along the power wire. If the wire falls down, or breaks, these waves simply leap the gap and go on.

So that, just when they most need it, the repair crews have their telephone and can more easily find the break.

LIGHT AGAIN A MYSTERY

Science grows suspicious of ether as transmitting medium for vibrations

JUST as the radio fans have adopted most firmly, as part of their lingo, the term "ether waves," science comes along and gives the conception a bad shake. Science at present is beginning to doubt the truth of the ether theory. It is beginning to doubt if the ether exists at all.

Only a little while ago, Dr. C. P. Steinmetz, physicist and electrical engineer, announced his conviction that the theory of the existence of ether not only clashed with newly ascertained facts, but that it was not necessary as an explanation of the movement of wireless waves, nor as an explanation of the movement of light.

Yet it was just for this—to account for the movement of light—that the ether was first invented by science. It has always been in a way, a huge guess. No one had ever seen, or heard, or felt, or caught it. It was simply thought that something like ether must exist to carry light across the interstellar space empty of matter.

But now the theory of the ether seems at variance with facts—with newly-discovered facts. The ether theory is very groggy.

If there is no ether, how does light pass through space? How does it reach us? How is the wireless wave propagated?

Science does not know. Light and its propagation have dropped back once more among the physical mysteries.

BURN ASHES TO ASHES

Experimenter has succeeded in salvaging the unburned coal from waste matter

EVERYONE knows that a percentage of the coal used in any stove or furnace fails to burn but goes through into the ashes.

That this lost coal, or some of it, can be saved is the implication of experiments by Mr. W. D. Green of Midvale, Utah.

Mr. Green took samples of cinders and applied to them the oil-floatation process which is used in the recovery of copper and other metals from ores. From forty to sixty percent of his cinders came back to him as useful coal or coke.

Q

H. G. Wells and other thinkers declare the fuel problem among the greatest yet to be solved.
This article tells what the coal question really is

Speaking of Our COAL BILL

By Arthur Gleason

THIS WORLD, in which we live is in the main a pleasant place, and the economic systems of food and shelter and amusement have in general worked. But, at that, human life is spotty, and there are minor imperfections even in our ordered bliss. One of the spottiest bits is the coal industry. The mining and marketing of coal trail enough trouble to annoy at times that patient and thick-skinned body, the public. Not enough to make the public think. To set the public thinking about its common business will require a special machinery.

The annoyance about coal has been sufficiently severe, however, to get the public angry, and clamorous for quick action. Coal operators are not popular favorites. In the steel trade, Judge Gary and Mr. Schwab have pleased their consuming public. Chicago packers have pleased their investing interests. Mr. Ford has pleased his labor force. But coal operators have pleased nobody, not even themselves.

If a coal visitor should ask in a level voice, "What seems to be the matter with the industry?" he would receive several noisy answers. If he were at a crossroads settlement like Washington, where all the opinions of the continent float in, he would hear of these ills and these cures:

Hard coal is a monopoly in the hands of a few railroads. High prices for Eastern home furnaces are the result of this monopoly. There should be a curb on this monopoly.

Soft coal is over-developed—too many mines by several thousand, too many miners by 150,000. What is needed is more of a monopoly. There should be a few trusts. There should be better selling agreements.

The union has tended to stabilize the industry. Extend it. The union is a menace. Destroy it.

EACH of the ills would be described to the visitor as the "basic" ill, the "underlying cause." If he were a patient man and put a few years into the study of the mess, he probably would emerge with no sharp summaries, but with this sense or "feel" of the situation: There is something special about coal that brings the same set of troubles, no matter how widely local conditions differ. Over-development brings troubles in the United States, but under-development brings them in Britain. A monopoly in hard coal brings them. Unbridled competition in soft coal brings them. "Big" business men bring them in anthracite. The lack of big business men brings them in bituminous. High wage rates at Pittsburgh bring them. Lower wage rates in Somerset, Cambria, and Mingo bring them. What is the mysterious nature and malady of this wealthy patient that he swallows every remedy and continues to exhibit all the symptoms?

Coal is a public character trying to behave like a private citizen. Coal by its nature is a public utility. A public utility is a universally necessary commodity or service, to which all the community must have approximately equal and ready access. Coal is transportation. It is the raw stuff of electricity and the creator of energy. It is domestic comfort and industrial power. The health of coal affects the health of all industry. A sick coal industry lessens the well-being of the nation. Coal must be recognized as a public utility, under Federal supervision.

The demands on coal are these:

A steady supply at a reasonable price to the consumer.

A good American life for the miner.

A proper reward for management and a proper return to the capital invested.

A safeguarding of the future of the industry.

NO REMEDY can be based on only one of these considerations. For example, high production at low cost would not in itself cure the sickness of coal. There have been times (as in 1914) when this meant the partial ruin of groups of responsible operators. It has meant the under-payment of labor. It could mean the continuation of wasteful mining practices, destroying a ton of coal for every two tons mined. To win the right coordination of changes in the industry will require facts and a plan. To put coal into the forefront of public attention and keep it there—this is a need greater than all others.

Spasms of agitation will not do this. A continuous exposure of the facts will. So the most useful thing that can be done is the creation of a permanent, continuous, compulsory, Federal fact-finding agency at Washington. No paper plan out of a fertile brain can be projected half so wise as a plan based on the facts, and checked up and corrected on the free flow of facts, each year, each month, each week. At present, no one knows the facts about coal. Those in partial possession of the facts believe that the complete investigation will show:

A very narrow margin of profits for soft coal operators (except for certain groups in the war years).

Royalties an unimportant item in cost of coal.

Marketing as an inefficient vicious system, where much of the cost attaches itself to coal.

Seasonal fluctuation as an unnecessary, over-rated element in the industry. Overcoming seasonal [Continued on page 108]

New Low Fares to South America

First Class Rates
Rio de Janeiro - $295
Montevideo - $345
Buenos Aires - $360

11 DAYS from New York is South America! If you have dreamed of a wonderful ocean trip, send the coupon below and let your Government tell you about the palatial Government ships that take you to the ten great republics of South America.

South America! Land of age old romance, land of exquisite beauties, land of a thousand extraordinary business opportunities and stupendous undeveloped resources! In September it will be the scene of a great world's fair—the Rio de Janeiro Centennial Exposition to celebrate Brazil's 100th year of independence. The countries of the world will be represented there, to partake of the festivities and to study the vast industrial potentialities of this great country.

$450 Round Trip to the Rio Exposition

Now—at the crucial time—the United States Government has reduced the fare to South America more than 25%! First class passage to Rio de Janeiro is now only $295. Reduction on round trip tickets. Special round trip fare to the Rio Exposition only $450. The trip is made in just 11 days—the fastest time.

Fastest time, low fares, and the finest ships! These great ships, operated for the Government by the Munson Steamship Lines, are the finest on the South American run. Their spacious staterooms are equipped with beds, not berths, hot and cold running water, electric radiators and fans. All rooms are on the outside; most have private baths. Diversion for every hour is provided by shaded promenades, library, card room, grand salon for dancing. Your Government has made possible the realization of your travel dream. Send the coupon below for detailed information.

For information regarding reservations address:

Munson Steamship Lines
 67 Wall Street, New York City

Send This Coupon

Send this coupon today for full information about the new reduced rates to South America and the new luxurious U. S. Government ships that take you there. You will be sent an authoritative booklet giving facts every traveler should know, a description of the new Government ships to South America and quotation on the new low rates.

Next Sailings Are:
S.S. Southern Cross
 July 22nd
S.S. American Legion
 August 5th
S.S. Pan America
 August 19th
S.S. Western World
 September 4th
 Fortnightly thereafter

INFORMATION BLANK
 To U. S. Shipping Board
 Information Desk C140 Wash., D.C.

Please send me full information about U. S. Government ships to South America and quote me the new reduced rates.

Name _____

Address _____

U. S. SHIPPING BOARD Information Desk C140
 Washington, D. C.

8% Preferred SHARES

AN INVESTOR in the 8% Preferred Stock of

Standard Gas and Electric Company

receives a high return with an unusual degree of stability, from a large organization whose securities have an active National market. The Preferred Shares are listed on the Chicago Stock Exchange.

Dividends are paid in March, June, September and December

Ask for Descriptive Circular HM11

H. M. Byllesby and Co.

208 South La Salle Street, CHICAGO
NEW YORK BOSTON
111 Broadway 14 State St.

"24 Hours a Day"

Just Off the Press

The utmost in "working value" of securities explained.

Read how it is possible to double income and profits without extra cash or risk.

"Financial Success"

"The Current," issued weekly, is bringing financial success to our customers.

An invaluable service that you will need always if you try once.

Ask for 133JJ NOW

DUNHAM & Co.

Investment Securities

Established 1911

43 Exchange Place, New York

6% or 12%

With bond prices going steadily higher you will no doubt be interested in a conservative plan that offers you an opportunity to obtain "100% More Income." A folder by this title sent free to investors.

Ask for H-52

R. J. McClelland & Co.

Investment Securities

60 Broadway, New York

(Continued from page 106)

demand is a serious marketing problem.

Such bad organization of the industry underground that the demand of the miners for a six-hour day and a five-day week is an extremist and Utopian appeal for more work than exists in some years.

Storage of coal, as offering one solution for the alternations of glut and shortage.

A dearth of technical engineering intelligence in the industry.

FOR PEACE and prosperity in the coal fields, it is proposed that both operators and miners be permitted to do certain things and make certain concessions. One of the suggestions at Washington is for the soft coal operators to receive permission to organize on a more efficient basis. Agreements to limit production and to carry on direct marketing would be necessary, and the Government would have to be a party to such agreements.

This systematic regulation of over-production would take two forms. One is a quiet, liberalizing interpretation of the Anti-Trust Laws. The other is the denial of transportation facilities to wild-cat shoe-string mining ventures. These changes would mean freezing out of the industry a number of irresponsible operators, and at least one quarter of the miners. Popular distrust of monopoly would be lessened only by close Federal supervision by experienced men of such changes.

Another of the suggestions for giving a constitutional government to coal is that future wage agreements should be made on a national basis. In such battlefields as West Virginia, it is believed that the United Mine Workers of America must be destroyed, or the non-union fields must be thrown open to the solicitations of the labor organizers. The industry will not be stabilized as long as it is two-thirds union, and one-third feudal system. The United Mine Workers are the strongest union in the United States. To destroy this union probably will not be a wise proceeding. The loss of life would be large. The miners who survived would be sullen, and ripe for revolutionary organization. If the miners are allowed to organize the non-union fields, then it will be possible to ask for the abolition of the check-off, which is a compulsory method of collecting union dues out of wages. This is a unionizing device which gives undue and unjust power to certain districts and leaders.

Wages must be based on regular work. Lower union wage rates and steady work are proposed. Irregular work and too little work are the curse of the soft-coal industry to operators and miners.

These are some of the drifting opinions about coal. Congress has had bad luck with coal. It has filled thousands of pages of print with small results. The public is inert and cannot yet shape a kick into a program. So the first steps in reorganization will fall on the Administration and the interested industrial groups. Later, the miners will be heard from. Some day, perhaps the public will become articulate.

Sooner or later, the doctor is a thrilling factor in the life of every family. That is why Hearst's International will run a series on "Doctors and Drug Mongers," starting with the September issue, ready August 20th.

Things You Want to Know About Investments

If you are interested in investments the financial department of Hearst's International offers you a careful selection of authoritative booklets published by leading financial institutions. They contain information of value to the investor—the man who believes in making his money work. Any of the booklets listed will be sent on request without cost. Here are a few of them.

State which ones you want and address:

FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT,
HEARST'S INTERNATIONAL,
119 W. 40th St., New York

Foreign Investments

Chilian Cedulae—8% Bonds Redmond & Co.
The Economic Conference and Foreign Securities Dunham & Co.
Mexican Securities Jerome B. Sullivan & Co.

Bank & Trust Co. Literature

Shawmut Service The Nat'l Shawmut Bank
Travel Suggestions The Equitable Trust Co. of N. Y.
Trust Service for Corporations Guaranty Trust Co. of N. Y.

Public Utility Securities, etc.

Bonds as Safe as Our Cities Wm. R. Compton Co.
Mid-Year Investments H. M. Byllesby & Co.
The Giant Energy—Electricity The National City Co.
Time-Tested Underlying Railroad Bonds, 5% to 10% F. J. Lisman & Co.
Electricity in Industry Bonbright & Co.

Real Estate, etc., Mortgages

Building with Bonds American Bond & Mortgage Co.
Caldwell First Mortgage Bonds, Caldwell & Co.
How Henry Wilkinson Became Rich G. L. Miller & Co.
"Interest," A Magazine The Cleveland Discount Co.
Investors Bonds The Investors Co.
Washington, the Heart of America The F. H. Smith Co.

Partial Payment Plans—Thrift

$80,000 in 25 Years R. J. McClelland & Co.
The Partial Payment Plan John Muir & Co.
Partial Payment Plans—Thrift "24 Hours a Day" Dunham & Co.
Ten Payment Plan H. M. Byllesby & Co.

General Investment Subjects

Suggestions for Conservative Investments Lee, Higginson & Co.
Non Callable Bonds Hornblower & Weeks
Byllesby Monthly News H. M. Byllesby & Co.
Analysis of the S. S. Kresge Co. Merrill, Lynch & Co.
Getting the Most from Your Money Babson's Statistical Organization
Investment Bulletin Henry L. Doherty & Co.
Investment Recommendations Guaranty Company of N. Y.
Investment Securities Kidder, Peabody & Co.
Investment Securities The National City Co.
Water Power—The Greatest of Our Natural Resources Spencer Trask & Co.
The Investor's Pocket Manual The Financial Press
The St. Paul Situation Rutter & Co.
The New South's Message to the Conservative Investor Caldwell & Co.

Richard Washburn Child's Story of a Woman's Courage—from page 92

A Mother at Bay

for you. You don't know the landscape here. You're late. The best thing you can hope for from the Wasp, old boy, is some kind of a split."

Whippy relaxed. In the sudden let-down of muscular tension and with a twist of his fat lips, he indicated that he was on a trading basis.

"Where's she?" he asked brusquely.

"In there."

She thumbed over her shoulder.

"Don't get nervous. I gave her a spongeful. Don't you smell it?"

He admired this stranger. They had talked to him about her—the wiry, tigress qualities in her five feet six, the determination behind that little forehead.

"I came in the kitchen door with one of them keys," she said good-naturedly. "Kitchen doors have the same kind of locks the world around. Then I waited in the pantry, scratching like a rat. She come and then—"

With cat-like motions, she acted the little drama indicating with crooked arm how she had throttled the other.

"THAT'S the story," she said firmly, and then with a little anxiety, disclosed inadvertently, she added: "You've had your lesson, Whippy. Now, beat it!"

"Uh—uh," he replied, wagging his head from side to side. "What's your hurry?"

"No hurry," she replied. "I'm not in your fix. I don't have to count on trains. I got an hour and a half yet because I'm traveling tonight in a six-cylinder."

"Where is it?"

"None of your business. When I go, the kid goes with me in style."

"Who's with you, on this? Not Ed?"

"None of your business either. If you want anything out of this—beat it."

"You're kind of white and tired," he countered in his best patting voice.

"It's the long drive. It tired me."

"Then you're alone!"

"He was conscious of a thrill of victory."

"How do you know? Remember, some men can't drive a car."

But her answer came after the delay that makes certain disclosure.

He sat down in an armchair.

"You say for me to beat it," he began, putting the weapon on the table. "Well, what do I get out of it?"

"Half. And it's sure. You get half."

"Too much," he sneered. "You've offered too much. You'd welch."

"Me—the Wasp—welch, did you say?"

It appeared to him that there was something glorious about her as she gave this challenge. All his later life, he had wondered what joy might be found in a woman who could dominate him. This was a real person. All the other girls he had known were cheap and shoddy by comparison.

"No," he said. "Let's quit that talk. I'm fair. Unless we can work together, there's nothing but trouble for everybody."

"You're married—aren't you, Whippy?"

"No, I'm shed of that," he said at once.

That was his way—to make an indirect appeal. He had been much loved in his course. He had ways. They were not the ways of a conscious trickster in the affections; they were of a higher art, flowing from swift instincts.

He got up, walked towards her, looked deep into her wide eyes, steadily, deep.

She breathed a little faster as she said, "Don't!" as if he had twisted her wrist or put his strangler's hands on her throat.

"Why do you look at me like that?"

she begged. "What am I to you?"

"I don't know," he said, pretending to be as helpless as she, "I don't know."

He sat down again. When he looked up, she had come and was bending over him.

"You're not fooling?" she said.

He had his moment of exultation. She would be his. Whippy had his power. He was drunk with it but he calculated with it, too. He must look out.

"Kiss me," she said.

"No. I don't dare. Not you! With you, there would be no end."

"Kiss me," she commanded in a whisper.

He bent over.

"No!" she commanded. "Take me in your arms. Put that thing on the table and take me."

He felt her breath close to his lips. His hands and arms, all free, enfolded her for a brief second pulling her closer.

He did not realize until he heard the tick of the barrel of the automatic on the table edge that she had reached it. He tried to slip his hand upwards to catch her white throat. He managed to seize its warm flesh and gasp, "You devil!"

Then came the flash and the impact that staggered him. He felt his right arm grow numb and a curious sense of hot molten metal rising ever higher into his neck. Things began to go on the bias. A great wind blew through his ears and filled his head. He staggered backward, conscious of an upholstered sofa. He fell onto it, all askew and plunged into the nothingness of complete dark and utter silence.

"I PUT the old hat under the faucet in the sink—the chloroform cough mixture poured in the corner—you—fiend!"

He heard other words. The Wasp, it appeared, was talking nonsense to him, viciously and derisively, but the nothingness of dark and the utter silence were more powerful than the Wasp.

Then there was a man's tones—clear, strong, stern. He opened his eyes. In the flickering candlelight, he could see a young man standing in the doorway still holding a key in his hand. The woman was there too with arms dangling and the revolver still gripped in tense fingers.

"What's going on here?" asked the man.

"Nothing," replied a high, fine voice, like the voice of a girl of eleven. "He—came—to take—the baby. So I shot him."

They fought for days—every time they met—the little pale-faced Adam and the worst man in the rough mining camp—and the stake was a girl. You can learn what happened after that in "The Boy Who Read Dime Novels," in Hearst's International for September.

When Listerine meets halitosis

THE distressing thing about halitosis (scientific term meaning unpleasant breath) is this: You're usually not aware yourself of whether you are guilty—whether or not your breath is just right.

Let Listerine put you on the safe side. It will do so quickly and pleasantly—unless, of course, halitosis is chronic with you, due to some deep-seated disorder which a doctor or dentist will need to correct.

This is what happens when Listerine meets halitosis: Halitosis most commonly is due to the acid fermentation of starchy and sugary foods in the mouth; to putrefaction of food particles retained about the teeth, or to excessive use of tobacco.

Listerine, by virtue of its peculiar antiseptic properties, halts both putrefaction and fermentation and removes disagreeable mouth odors.

It leaves the mouth and breath sweet, fresh and clean, putting your mind at ease as to whether or not you may be offending those about you.

How much better it is, then, to have Listerine at hand in your bathroom, to use it systematically and to be sure you are on the safe and polite side!—Lambert Pharmacal Co., Saint Louis, U. S. A.

LISTERINE
—the safe
antiseptic

Sir Oliver Lodge's Article on the Penalty of Self-Destruction — Continued from page 5

The Futility of Suicide

by temporary unconsciousness, as by drugs, but by what is thought to be the permanent unconsciousness of the grave.

We no more escape from existence when we die than when we emigrate. We change our surroundings, not ourselves; and in so far as our trouble is intimately associated with our own defects, our faults of character, our weakness, or our clinging vice, we shall find on arrival "at the other side" that all these things are still with us, that we have committed a futile crime; we must suffer punishment beyond what we had anticipated, and carry on an existence intensified by the pangs of helpless remorse.

THE ACT of death is easy; "a bare bodkin" will achieve that; "but that the dread of something after death—the undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns—puzzles the will." And so even if life seems to us a calamity—as it can seem only to unhealthy or to tortured souls—even so 'tis better to "bear those ills we have than fly to others that we know not of."

That is the rational conclusion, even if the country be regarded as still undiscovered and if the testimony of returned travelers be not accepted. If any voice from the emigrants be admitted, the conclusion is rational still, but it is emphasized and enforced by direct testimony that the act of self-murder is not only rash or risky but positively detrimental and definitely wrong.

Fault there may be, sin to be repented of, much of evil to be overcome—but crime is no remedy: it is a hideous and unnatural aggravation of the offense. No human being should be driven to crime by parental harshness or social stigma. Bad should be made better, not worse. Live and atone—help others—perform your duties; those are not counsels of perfection, they are counsels of common sense. Shirk no responsibilities; live out your life to the utmost. Oblivion is inaccessible. You cannot attain it. It is selfish as well as futile to wish for it.

The consequences of your acts remain: why should you alone escape them? In the effort to attain the impossible you are courting disaster and plunging yourself into agonies of remorse. If you have led an ill-spent life, reform it; do not seek to terminate it by a still more ill-advised death. You think that you will not know of the troubles which you have left behind for survivors, but you will. You will see the results, and bitterly lament them. Too late you will long for the power to make things better, a power which you have flung away.

It may be asked by readers who have followed some of my psychic work whether I have ever had communication from one who had taken his own life. Well, I have. The earliest case was that of a brilliant young fellow, a student of science and a keen experimenter, who was overweighted with the undoubted difficulties of his subject, and who overworked at unwholesome hours and led a life not conducive to longevity. A most impulsively generous man he was—I never knew a man to whom money meant less, nor one from whose pockets it more speedily evaporated. It was not that sort of thing that troubled him at all; he was devoted to science and in a minor way was very ambitious.

Probably the ambition was not "minor" at all, but I thought it was. He had no belief in a future life, nor any ideas about religion—at least, not to my knowledge. He was not what is called a saint, but no one could have been more kindly disposed nor kinder hearted. What then caused the calamity? I can think of no reason save hopelessness to rise to the heights of his ambition and master the intricacies of his subject. He would live and sleep in the laboratory, having rigged up a hammock for that purpose, but he could not do mathematics, could not even read them, beyond the elements of school work.

Was it this that depressed him? Or had he a taint in his blood? I know not; but he made several attempts to kill himself during a tour abroad, and at last succeeded.

What was his experience after? He found himself in captivity, in some sort of reformatory, apparently. He momentarily escaped, to speak to me, rushing impulsively and affectionately forward, as was his wont; but he was taken back, and I have not heard from him since. I trust that he has recovered his balance, that he has realized his mistake even more clearly than he did at first, and once more has become his old and better self. Peace to him, and Good Will.

BUT there are other evil things which assault and hurt the soul: and defect of soul must be remedied here. Suicide is no remedy for that. It does but aggravate the evil, it may make it more persistent, and undoubtedly pains and penalties must inevitably follow. Not for always! No, by no manner of means! There is no condition of utter hopelessness. Even the worst characters must have glimmerings of good; and these are fostered and strengthened wherever they show themselves, whether here or elsewhere.

"The soul is its own star.
Our acts our angels are,
For good or ill."

"When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness and doeth that which is lawful and right he shall save his soul alive."

Ancient sayings of this sort sum up racial experience, and surely convey a large element of truth.

Depression is due partly to something bodily wrong, no doubt; but how much of depression is the result of unwise or ill living? There are ways of destroying the body without actually killing it. Its health may be impaired, its power of resistance weakened, its organs inflamed or reduced to impotence. All this is in our power, and all this is folly little short of crime. There have been those who have abused their bodies hoping to strengthen their souls, but this, too, is a blunder.

The episode of incarnation involves the interaction of soul and body together—that is what our earth life is for—and to abuse or lower the vitality of either is a form of blasphemy. Let the lower be subject to and serve the higher, by all means, but do not seek to escape from the privileges and opportunities afforded by their conjunction—a conjunction which has made possible our short life on this wonderful and beautiful planet.

THE POSSIBILITIES of existence are infinite. What they can be at moments we already dimly realize. We have all had moments of insight bordering on ecstasy. Why should these be so few and fragmentary? They show what is possible. The possible may be made actual. And when Saints tell us of the mystery of Deity, and of the Beatific Vision, surely something of what is here suggested must be meant. Not something for which we have no imagination nor any trace of experience, but something to which we only attain at our very highest moments, and then only for a brief instant. Deity may, nay must, involve more than we can even conceive—human experience is sadly hampered by our animal ancestry and manifold shortcomings—but that it rises to the highest of our conceptions we may confidently expect; and as we rise in the scale of existence, this it is which will become to us more and more real.

The value and worth-whileness of existence can not be over-estimated. The very pains and sufferings of this present life are a witness to the grandeur of that for which it is a preparation. Those who arraign the Deity for allowing human suffering, little realize what the future has in store. Many lofty souls must have already risen to the conception and to the experience; only they are beyond our ken.

Existence is surely as large and magnificent now as it will ever be in the future; the Universe is a going concern. Existence, yes, magnificent enough: but not our individual existence—not yet. The realities are all there, it is we who must attain to them. We can do so only by obeying the rules, by doing our bit, by biding our time. There is no short cut, there is no hurrying the eternal process. Our spirits must work out their appointed destiny; and the period spent in a material body is a valuable and helpful contribution to the progress of the soul.

But mark! If death is offered to us on our way, we need not shirk it. That may be one of our highest opportunities. The self-foreseen death of the man or woman who risks life at the call of duty—be it that of physician or nurse or soldier or fireman or sailor or mine-rescue worker—that is no suicide. Such a death may rise to the heights of heroism, and may shine as an inspiring example down the ages. Yea, has not such a death been universally regarded by Christendom as the most effective, the strongest agency towards the salvation of mankind?

La Follette

[Continued from page 86]

the Senate—the vote being 95 to 1.
4. He is for the repeal of the Volstead Act, but refuses to make an issue of the liquor question. Incidentally, he is himself an abstainer, but advocates personal liberty.

5. The war is over.

Can he be re-elected?

A political reporter, long intimate with the state, said to the writer: "I know how to read between the lines of the Wisconsin press. All of these papers that are obliged to obey their backers and oppose La Follette know how their readers feel. It is clear (between the lines) that no one has a chance against La Follette. It is nothing new for him to have the interests, the prominent politicians, the press and a big fund against him. It has been the same with him for thirty years. I predict he will have the biggest vote of his career."

What gives La Follette his power?

The people there know him; he has been educating them for long, long years; he has taught them "to read between the lines." They do not judge him by one campaign or on a single issue.

Here is an incident, selected at random, as specimen of the method by which he is perpetuated as a political force:

Scene: the little town of Antigo, central Wisconsin. Time: the last senatorial election. La Follette appeared in the opera house, normally holding 700. At 8:04 he began speaking to (perhaps) 800 about the railroads—nothing else. At 10:17 he stopped, looked at his watch, and said, "Now we will have a few minutes' intermission so that those who wish to go out may leave quietly."

No one moved. He then talked from 10:20 to 11:45. Again he repeated his offer. From the rear of the hall, an elderly couple reluctantly arose. "Bob," called the old farmer, "we don't want to go, but, less'n we start now, we won't get home to milkin'." The places instantly were taken by waiting ones from outside.

La Follette then said, "Now I'm going to talk on the 16 hour law and unless you're railroad men you had better go home, for I intend to be technical."

No one left. Then he talked steadily until 12:35, when he called out, "Come, boys. Tell me where I'm wrong. You know the subject as well as I do."

A lanky old section foreman from the center of the hall drawled, "Hell, Bob, you know there ain't any answer."

A reactionary Senator from New England, Moses, of New Hampshire, said to the writer, "I disagree with his later policies, but I am frank to say it would be a grave error for Wisconsin herself to defeat La Follette. He is now next to the ranking member of the two most important committees of the senate so far as economic legislation is concerned. He has gained his place by seniority after seventeen or eighteen years of service and a new man would have to start at the bottom."

A New York supporter, after hearing what Moses said, added, "He is our safety valve. Where else is a commanding figure which, while scrupulous about law and order, yet points the hopeful way to political revolution?"

1,820,000 Telephones Moved

In the telephone business every day is "moving day." Telephone subscribers are probably the most stable and permanent portion of our population; yet during the past year one telephone out of every seven in the Bell System was moved from one place of residence or business to another at some time during the year.

The amount of material and labor, and the extent of plant changes involved in "station movement" are indicated by the fact that this item of service cost the Bell System more than $15,000,000 in 1921.

To most people, the connecting or disconnecting of a telephone seems a simple operation of installing or removing the instrument. As a matter of fact, in every case it necessitates changes in the cables and wires overhead or underground. It also necessitates changes in central office wires and switchboard connections; in subscribers' accounts and directory listings; and frequently requires new "drop" lines from open wires or cables.

The problems of station movement are among the large problems of the telephone service. Because of the double operation of disconnecting and re-connecting, the work involved is often twice as great as in the case of new subscribers. With nearly 2,000,000 changes a year, it is only by the most expert management of plant facilities that Bell service is enabled to follow the subscriber wherever he goes.

"BELL SYSTEM"

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

One Policy, One System, Universal Service, and all directed toward Better Service

THE authorized agents of the Periodical Sales Company, 538 South Dearborn St., Chicago, Illinois, with branches in twenty principal cities, are authorized to solicit, and accept, yearly subscriptions to Hearst's INTERNATIONAL, at the regular subscription price of $3.00 per year.

HEARST'S INTERNATIONAL

119 West 40th St.

NEW YORK

Bernice Brown's Story of Another Kind of Love—Continued from page 36

The Big Clumsy Swede

she said. "Get right out of my way."

It was sundown before she returned. "Tomorrow," she said, "I finish my garden, if I work like nigger." She dropped down onto a chair by the table and the light from the lamp fell upon her. There were shadows under her eyes—one seldom sees these on a country girl—and her hands had fallen into her lap with the stillness of great exhaustion.

Waldemar knelt down and tried to unlace the coarse boots but his fingers only knotted the cords.

"Clumsy one," she said, smiling at him.

THE NEXT day was misty and cold, one of those August days that come sometimes in Minnesota, gray and raw with the prophecy of winter. Vanda shivered and put on her shawl when she went out to feed the chickens. By afternoon, it had begun to drizzle.

"Perhaps it will snow yet," she said. Waldemar was getting ready to go to town. A wave of apprehensive tenderness swept over her. "Why go today?" she said. "You will catch bad cold, sure t'ing."

Her interest pleased him, but he only laughed. "I can not work out. It is good time to fetch the wire and plow-blade."

After he had gone, Vanda put her house in order. It was different now from that first time she had seen it. Curtains of Turkey red calico hung at the windows. On one wall hung a metal crucifix, hand wrought and very old, on another an enormous sent-free calendar depicting a scene in the Swiss Alps. Curiously Vanda looked at it now. "I will see that with him," she thought. Then she whispered, "Gee," and lost in reflection, she did not move for a long time.

At six-thirty, Waldemar had not returned, or at seven. A quarter before eight, she heard the grinding of wheels on the gravel. In an instant, he appeared in the doorway. His hair was tousled and tiny drops of moisture clung to his face and to the coarse wool of his jacket. He was laboring under great excitement.

"What is it, Waldemar?" she said, anxiously in her voice.

"Vanda, Vanda," he repeated. "They have come, the tiny chicks from Minneapolis. I got them at the station. It is so cold now. They will die, maybe."

Vanda pushed him aside and went out. Under a corner of the dripping canvas, she peered into the crates.

Then she lowered the canvas flap again and came back to the kitchen. "Get the lantern in the barn," she said, "and light this one. I take out the lamp. Then bring the boxes into the hen house. We make it warmer with the lanterns. Bring me at once clean straw." She looked at him an instant, then she shook her head. "No," she said, "I will get it. All my wishes can not make you move faster."

Like a great tattered banner, she carried a pitchfork full of straw. Strands of it had fallen on her hair and shoulders and the air was sweet with its fragrance. Adroitly she arranged her burden.

"It is so rough," she said, "like sticks.

Wait——" and she pushed by him. In an instant she returned with a great pillow stuffed with goose feathers. "See," she said as she ripped open the end. "See, I told you it might snow today." At once, the air was filled with a smothering whiteness. "Have a care for the lanterns," she commanded him.

For an hour she worked with the intensity of a surgeon performing a long operation. It was past nine when the last tiny, fluttering occupant had been given food and water and stowed away in the downy whiteness. Finally, Vanda straightened her tired back.

"It is necessary for you stay here and watch the lanterns. I am afraid something might happen. Soon it will be warm enough." He followed her with his eyes into the darkness. "I must go back to the sick ones." In the kitchen, she beat over the fruit basket anxiously. One tiny ball she lifted up to her cheek. "I did not find you soon enough, eh?" she whispered.

For a long moment, she crouched there, then she stood up slowly. Outside in the darkness, he was waiting for her, waiting. She looked dully around the room, at the stove and the bed and the chairs, at the cheap colored picture, at the crucifix. Then she took down her shawl from the hinge on the door where it hung.

IT HAD stopped raining but fast-sailing, white-rimmed storm clouds raced after the moon, captured it and raced on. Her head bare, Vanda ran across the grass of the pasture to the main road. The lights of an automobile streamed to meet her, turning into patches of silver the pools of water. She was out of breath when she arrived and her skirt and arms were mud spattered. "Vanda!" He was at her side in an instant. "Sweetheart." A long moment, she lay in his arms. He did not kiss her. It was enough that they had found each other again. Overhead, drove the storm clouds, like great, strange birds, and the moments passed.

She loosened his arms from around her and they faced each other. At last he looked at her, incredibly. "Vanda——" he caught both her wrists with his hands, "Vanda, Vanda——"

Finally, she nodded. "It is true. I am not coming." Her face was white but her eyes were calm. "I love you. You know. But you do not need me." She lifted her shoulders in a quaint little appeal for silence. "I have learned this tonight, but it has always been true, I t'ink. To some women, it is more to give than to have given to. Do you understand? You I love but him I can help. See now?" Again there was a moment of silence. "I can not talk fine enough maybe to tell you."

"Vanda." He could only repeat her name. He wanted her but now he stood before her baffled, powerless. He was like a man who sees a thief steal his treasure and can make no move to defend it. "Vanda, honey," he said, "can't you see what it is you are doing? It's not only me you send away, but you, too. It is the magic of life you snuff out like a candle."

He was standing close to her but he did not touch her. Between them stood already a barrier a thousand times more real than a wall of stone. Between them stood the barrier of a greater need.

Again she shook her head. "No, I am sure, sure." Her eyes never wavered. "And I go now."

Though he held her again in his arms, he knew she had said good-by, that they had lost each other.

"Vanda, Vanda, little one," he repeated. Her arms held him with a strength he had never suspected, the strength of hopelessness. He knew he would never feel them again around him, never touch her hair with his lips, never even see her.

Finally, she broke away and he stood without moving. For a brief space, the lights of his automobile followed her, but she knew his eyes kept on staring long after she had disappeared into the blackness of the night.

In the kitchen again, she washed the mud from her arms and changed her dress. She seemed to move very slowly. "I am tired," she thought. "It is late."

Then she went out to the hen house. Waldemar stood waiting. "It is hot in there now, like the hell," he explained.

Again she inspected her charges. "Good," she said finally. "Bring the lamps, now."

She followed him back to the kitchen. He seemed incredibly big in the darkness, walking between the two glowing lanterns. In the kitchen, he turned down the wicks, snuffed out the flame with his fingers and made fast the door. As he passed the stove, he stopped and looked down at the peach basket.

Finally, he turned around. "It is damn' lucky for them," he pointed with his great hand, "you are here." Then he came a step nearer and in his eyes was the same look she had seen that first night at the lunch counter when she had bandaged his hand for him. "Vanda, it is me who is damn' lucky, too."

He sat down by the table and began tugging off the great boots, stiff and crackled with many wettings. Without moving, she watched him.

At once there was a curious ache in her throat and it was difficult to swallow. Slowly she came over to him. She pushed the tousled hair back from his forehead, finally she drew his head against her side. Her face was old, at once, and in her eyes was the hopeless look of those first pioneers, left behind on the plains, when the rest of the band went westward. Like them she saw the last fleck of sun on the white-roofed wagons as the trail curved beyond the horizon.

She looked down at the man beside her and smiled. "Perhaps it is lucky for you," she said, "you are great, clumsy Swede."

George Sand was the greatest French woman novelist. Her books live with those of Balzac, Dumas, Dickens and George Eliot. Now there has come to light a manuscript by George Sand—written in the flush of her genius and dealing with love and tragedy in old Florence. This hitherto unpublished story will appear in Hearst's International for September.

The Drug Store Around the Corner

"The injured man was extricated and carried by the bystanders into the drug store near by. There he received first aid and was made comfortable while awaiting the ambulance."

SO ENDS the last paragraph of almost every other newspaper account of an automobile accident in city streets.

It may be that you, like the rest of us, read such stories as this and apportion your sympathy to all you think deserving, forgetting entirely the one figure who never fails in these cases. That is the druggist—an A. D. S. man, most likely—the one whose public service makes possible the last newspaper paragraph.

Again and again he lets his customers take care of themselves while he devotes all his attentions to the prostrate man.

Crowds follow the injured man into the store, bringing with them excitement and general commotion. But the druggist waves them aside while he bandages the sufferer.

As the ambulance stretcher goes out the door, the crowd goes with it.

The store is empty.

EDITOR'S CORRECTION

In an entirely justifiable enthusiasm for the magnitude of the conception, the editor in charge of this advertisement last month, in speaking of the A. D. S. National Formula Committee, stated that all the 48 State Committees were already in action, which, unfortunately, is not the fact. Difficulties in organizing so vast a machine have delayed the coordination of the state committees; but have not at all interfered with the splendid National Committee, which is carrying on the important work of collecting and selecting the best formulae from all over the United States.

It never worries the A. D. S. man that the accident brought him nothing but work and took all his customers away. Such thoughts don't worry the man who runs the right kind of drug store 'round the corner!

At some time you, like the rest of us, have taken to him one of those atrocious prescription scrawls handed to you by your physician.

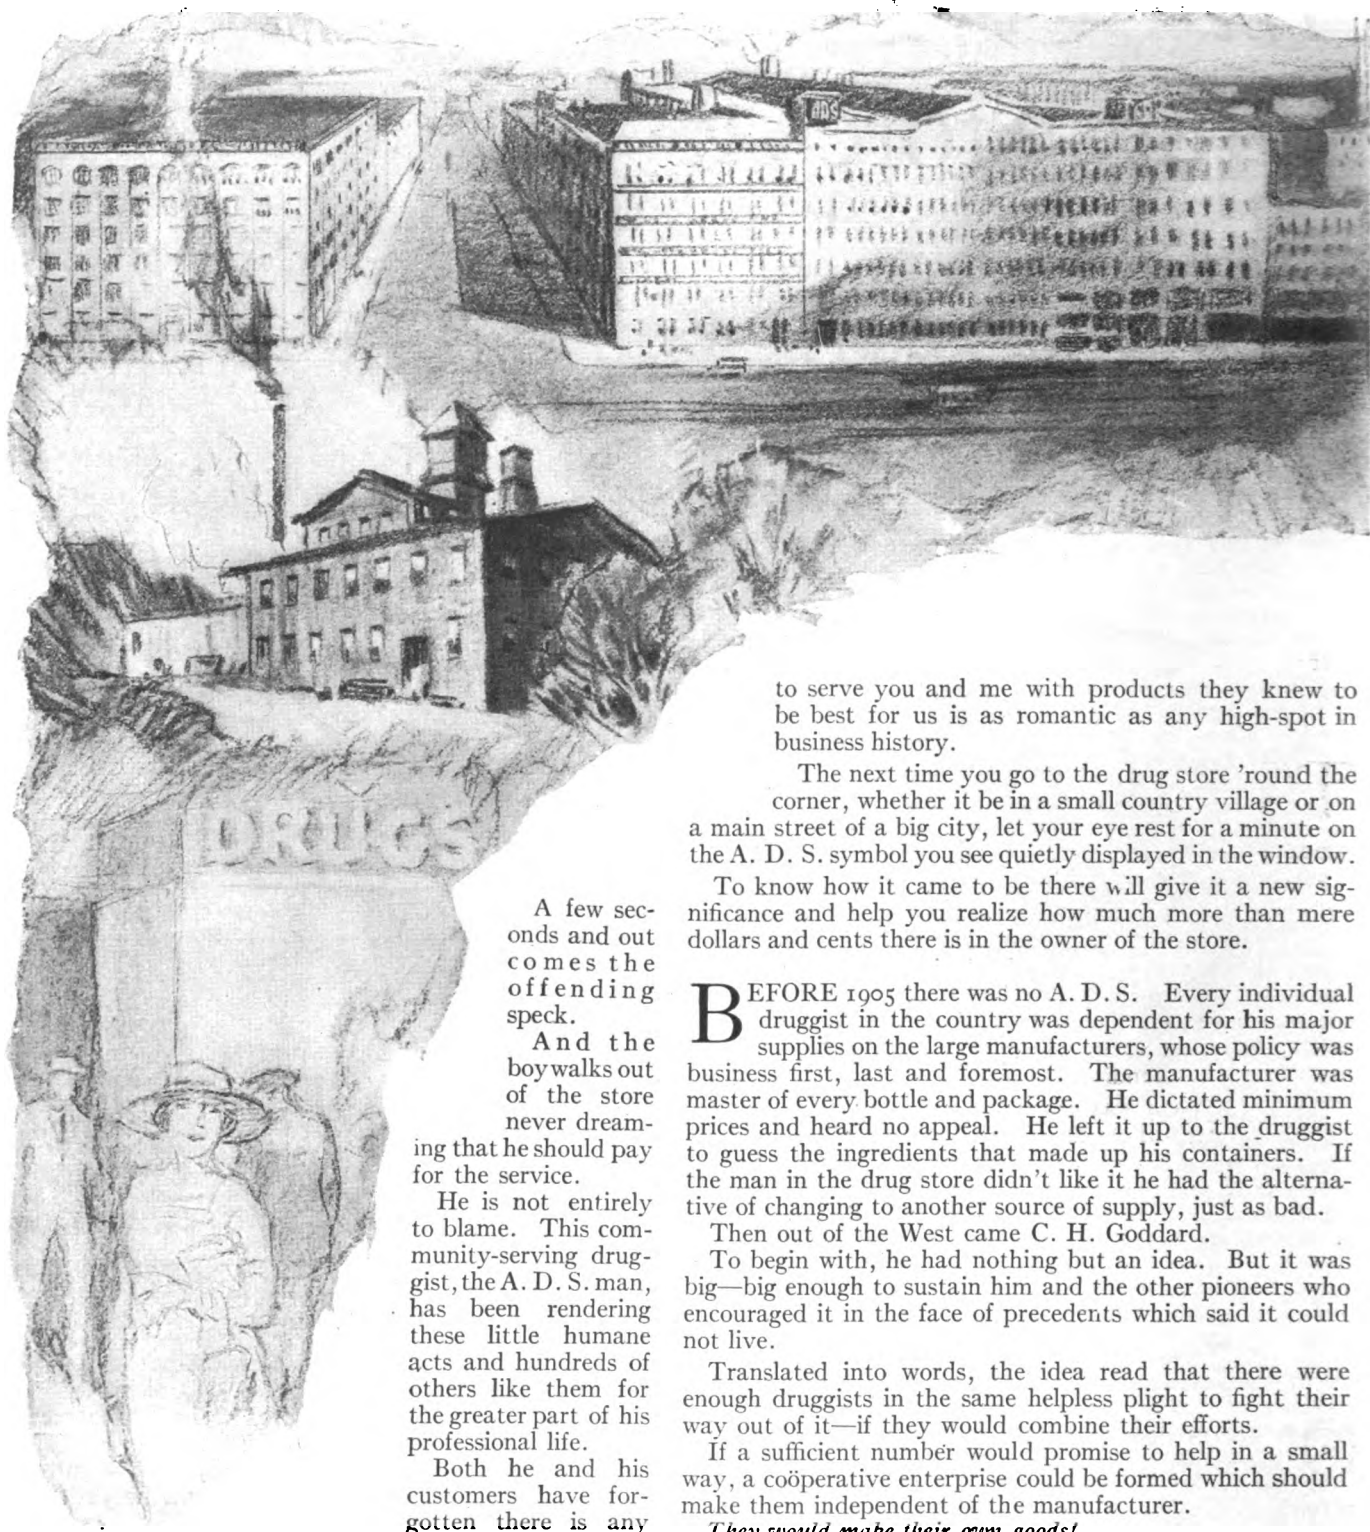

En route you have tried to decipher a word or two and failed. Yet when the man in the A. D. S. drug store opened it up there was no bewilderment on his face.

He read it at a glance, nodded, and told you just when your medicine would be ready.

BUT if your prescription is not urgent, it will have to stand for interruption in the hands of this, the right kind of druggist, when his pet free case comes along. A boy walks into the store.

"Doc, I've got something in my eye. Everybody in our house has tried to get it out and can't." And he discloses an eye bloodshot to the pupil.

"Hold steady, son," he says, "try to keep it open till I find it. Just a second longer."

A few seconds and out comes the offending speck.

And the boy walks out of the store never dreaming that he should pay for the service.

He is not entirely to blame. This community-serving druggist, the A. D. S. man, has been rendering these little humane acts and hundreds of others like them for the greater part of his professional life.

Both he and his customers have forgotten there is any kind of payment due.

HERE you have the idealism, the altruism without ostentation which served and serves now as the cornerstone for the organization whose symbol you see representing 26,000 druggists and physicians of these United States. In other words the A. D. S., or the American Druggists Syndicate.

It is a brotherhood of druggists, 26,000 of them counting the physicians too, banded together to follow one idea of public service and determined that none but themselves shall dictate what quality shall go into the products sold over their individual counters.

The story of the fight put up by your druggist and mine and the rest of the A. D. S. organization to win freedom to serve you and me with products they knew to be best for us is as romantic as any high-spot in business history.

The next time you go to the drug store 'round the corner, whether it be in a small country village or on a main street of a big city, let your eye rest for a minute on the A. D. S. symbol you see quietly displayed in the window.

To know how it came to be there will give it a new significance and help you realize how much more than mere dollars and cents there is in the owner of the store.

BEFORE 1905 there was no A. D. S. Every individual druggist in the country was dependent for his major supplies on the large manufacturers, whose policy was business first, last and foremost. The manufacturer was master of every bottle and package. He dictated minimum prices and heard no appeal. He left it up to the druggist to guess the ingredients that made up his containers. If the man in the drug store didn't like it he had the alternative of changing to another source of supply, just as bad.

Then out of the West came C. H. Goddard.

To begin with, he had nothing but an idea. But it was big—big enough to sustain him and the other pioneers who encouraged it in the face of precedents which said it could not live.

Translated into words, the idea read that there were enough druggists in the same helpless plight to fight their way out of it—if they would combine their efforts.

If a sufficient number would promise to help in a small way, a coöperative enterprise could be formed which should make them independent of the manufacturer.

They would make their own goods!

Every druggist member would have his vote on what goods should be made; how they should be made; how they should be distributed; how they should be priced and how the profits should be shared.

ONLY a little over sixteen years ago Mr. Goddard found himself alone with this idea and a typewriter in a single room he had rented in the Metropolitan Building, New York City. With one finger he was tapping off his first letter inviting the druggists of the country to help him help them.

In his letter he asked them to obligate themselves to buy stock in the new organization.

He asked them to obligate themselves to buy merchandise.

Into this letter went the idea, the hopes of the man behind it—and the fate of the drug store 'round the corner.

THE mailing of that circular letter was the real birth of the A. D. S. After a wait that tried the soul of the man praying for answers, eleven hundred affirmative responses came drifting in.

Eleven hundred druggists gave their word of honor that each would buy a hundred dollars worth of stock and twenty-five dollars worth of merchandise.

And thus the A. D. S. began to function. From a mere idea it literally jumped to an organization with a capital and surplus exceeding $200,000, with eleven hundred partners, each one of whom was an active sales agent trusted implicitly by his hundreds of customers.

From then on it was a series of jumps. True, some of them were over stiff obstacles, placed in the path by fighting competition, by trade conditions and by that ever present enemy of progress—inertia.

But the active interest of the man in the drug store 'round the corner overcame them.

He had an advantage held by no other kind of manufacturer.

He had first-hand information of what his customers needed, supplied by the personal touch which the A. D. S. insists must always be maintained by its members.

ON THIS sound basis, the A. D. S. has grown into an organization of 26,000 druggists and physicians owning and operating four huge manufacturing plants in four different States. Its main offices and plant in Long Island City alone cover over twelve acres of floor space.

Reduced to terms of money, this brotherhood of druggists can be said to represent assets of approximately $7,000,000, of which $1,250,000 are in cold cash, bonds and Treasury Certificates. And there are no debts, other than small current accounts.

But, regardless of even greater expansion, which seems as inevitable as tomorrow, the A. D. S. will never become a series of chain stores.

Mr. Goddard, the president, the Directors and every individual druggist are forever on their guard against that.

The organization was built on the faith which the men, women and children of the neighborhood have in the owner of the drug store 'round the corner and the products he sells on his own recommendation.

That faith must be kept alive at all costs.

Your A. D. S. druggist has voted on every product he sells under his own organization's trade name—through its Formula Committee—makes the final selection after exhaustive tests, reaching a result which is the consensus of opinion from the entire organization of 26,000 druggists and physicians. The same thoroughness, the same democracy enters into prices. Your druggist can put his finger on the costs. He knows what each item costs to make, to ship and to sell. He knows that the margin of profit is reasonable.

THESE are the reasons why he and the others who make up the 26,000 will never permit the A. D. S. to become chain stores. Lost in the links of the gigantic chain, your drug store man would become a mere impersonal purveyor of merchandise from a distant manufacturer to you. He would know neither the content nor the effects of the matter he sold you.

Put your A. D. S. druggist to the test the next time you enter his store. Pick up a package from the nearest counter. Whether it's Chlor-E-Dixo tooth paste or a household remedy, a powder or an appliance, ask him how it came to be made.

Ten to one he will give you the interesting story behind it.

You will hear of the scores of people who demanded something like that. How druggists in other parts of the country were receiving similar requests, and of the weeks and weeks of painstaking A. D. S. investigation and testing before the final ingredients were chosen.

Likely as not, you will also learn of the small margin of profit he makes on each sale, for he takes a particular pride in the economical operations of his company.

In its early days the entire A. D. S. line comprised only six items. Compare that with the three thousand or more products carried today and sold in quantities of hundred thousands and you will have some idea of the organization which your druggist 'round the corner has helped build up on sheer understanding of the public needs.

THIS druggist of yours has one other ambition for his A. D. S. which he shares with the other 25,999 members. He is anxious for the privilege to make a particular boast. He is looking forward to that day in the near future when he can say that he and other stores of his kind can afford to sell you the highest quality of drugs and sundries they are selling you today, at a price so low that it will seem unprofitable in the eyes of the competition.

That is the objective of 26,000 A. D. S. men.

And it is rapidly being approached. These ardent druggists are following with enthusiasm the working of the old economic law which says that an increase in quantity production brings about an automatic reduction in the cost of the product.

They are sending in orders at a rate which will soon have the plants working with the speed of a munition factory. These plants are now about to increase their output somewhere in the neighborhood of 25%.

And every A. D. S. druggist is on his toes watching this production curve with feelings akin to enthusiastic impatience.

As it should mean, with his cooperation, a substantial reduction in cost to him, which reduced price he in turn can pass on to his customers—the public.

Your druggist and mine, therefore, displays the new price tag with a sense of personal victory. At every purchase he hands you and me the few cents he has saved for us with a pride that is a little beyond our appreciation. To him it is a demonstration of the soundness in the Big Idea, which, back in 1905, was sneered at by competition and looked on as ridiculous by those who said it couldn't be done.

(To be continued)

COMPLIMENTARY COUPON—This coupon entitles the reader of Hearst's International Magazine, who signs on the blanks below, to one full-size tube of

CHLOR-E-DIXO—the Tooth Paste for Acid Mouth

Free With purchase of a single tube from any A. D. S. druggist when he displays this scientific A. D. S. product, as above.

Famous stars of the stage and screen use and endorse Chlor-e-dixo. Made by AMERICAN DRUGGISTS SYNDICATE, Long Island City, New York.

Name.....

Street..... City.....

This coupon will only be accepted wherever a CHLOR-E-DIXO campaign is on during 1922.

Donn Byrne's Story of the Wife Who Sat in Judgment—Continued from page 51

Paul and Ruth and Solomon

riage, as the sheerest piece of luck, and he had wasted his young wife and his heritage, and the friendship of Colin Fraser, for a man is not as careful of the money he wins betting on horses, as he is with money solidly earned. He had never been ude to Marge, never brutal, never even cold. She had just become casual to him. There was no other woman.

"He had changed, too," she thought.

He had always been a regular Bull of Bashan of a man, but now he was heavier than ever—a fattiness showing about the ankles and wrists. His hands were steady on a rein no more. In the black curls, there were gray streaks, that had made them outrageously common. The face was bloated a little, and the eyes a trifle bloodshot, and the mouth relaxed. He was never drunk, but he was never sober, and his voice had grown louder and more boisterous.

"Be damned to this!" he would shout. "And be damned to that!" Of course every one knew that this was only his manner, but, nevertheless, none ever provoked him far. One did not quite know what was behind it now. What was behind it, Marge knew. It was what had occurred late at night on the bridge over Owen-darragh, the dark and bubbling river.

SOMETHING of the like was sure to come. He was drinking too hard. Gambling too much; for what stakes, she was left in ignorance, but she knew he had been playing with Belfast merchants and Englishmen, with officers of the garrison and sporting men of outlying localities. He wasn't careful in his friends any more. He would drink with a pig-jobber just as quickly as with Sir Colin, her brother. Jockeys and minor satellites of the racing world had grown familiar towards him. Poor Rory, the luck was not as good as it had been. Fate was calling in her loans.

"But he wouldn't let me!" she cried out. She had wanted to influence him, to make him see the natural sanity of life—that the bracing sea was better than strong waters, and that there was as much interest in his own horse as there was at race courses. Herself, now, without any vanity, there were few women as good-looking as she. Tall and graceful, built for the mistress of a house: her glistening auburn hair, like rare Chinese silk; her eyes of a deep blue bordering on the green of the sea; her skin so white—there was no defect in her, except perhaps that the nose was a trifle large for a woman, and the chin a little determined, but those made up her wonderful profile.

"He wanted to be as he was!" She understood now that it was with no idea of cutting down, he had married her. He had taken her as a godsend, and gone along his own carefree way.

She had never grown angry or rancorous, as other women might have done, at his manner of living. When she married she had been aglow with life and love. All the months were June to her, with the cinnamon bees singing in the clover. Full moons, and the little wavelets chanting epithalamia against the moonlit shore. She had given herself freely and magnificently, and to her husband's lips had arisen the facile celtic love song:

"My Star of Antrim! My Star of Ulster! My Star of all the world! Your hair is red as gold, and your eyes are wonderful and deep as the sea. And your puckered mouth is like some dewy rosebud opening to the dawn." He kissed her slim soft hands.

"Don't waste them, Rory. Don't waste them," she had laughed, drawing his lips from her fingers.

ALL THAT had passed, as a day passes, or a month or a season. It had been, and then, after fading gently, no longer was. A phenomenon that had passed, and that she was glad had occurred. It was unthinkable to her to mourn for it, to grow angry, to think that her life was blighted because it was no more. That it had been short was no more wonder than that a certain summer had been short. There was just one thing had bothered her—she had wished to have a child and thought Providence unkind to her. Now she was glad, and thankful. She blessed God! She blessed His infinite wisdom.

Back of the house, towards the stables, one of the boys was raising his voice bitterly over something about "the little mare." A gaunt deerhound went snuffing down one of the garden paths, and the maid gathering the roses still sang:

I have stockings of silk;
Shoes of bright green leather;
Combs to buckle my hair;
And a ring for every finger.

No, she analyzed, there was no more of it left. Love between Rory and herself had just come and gone; rushed in, abided a while, and gone away gently, and all there was left of the visit to her husband and herself was a something—a fondness.

But this got her nowhere, she thought impatiently, this thinking about love. However, here it was—her husband had killed a man. None knew of it but she, counting out the little Catholic clergyman, who, she felt, would be dumb as a stone. She knew the man he had killed, a grotesque, fat creature, shambling, shallow-eyed, a furtive person, hated by all the neighborhood. He had made his money in America, God knows how. Yet for his life, the life of her husband Rory was forfeit to the law.

"Wives, be subject unto your husbands," she remembered the instruction of Paul, "as unto the Lord, for as Christ is the head of the Church, so the husband is head of the household." Or some such formula. So it was for Rory to judge for himself what was to be done, and she had no part in it, but to acquiesce. To do otherwise would be to commit treason, as Peter did when he denied his Lord, and Peter wept at every cockcrow until his death, and was crucified head downward, though he was bishop of Rome. So terrible a thing was treason.

Paul would have her silent, though silence was criminal. "Back, woman!" the savage Jewish convert would have snarled at her, so-hateful to him was her sex. A woman was nothing without her husband. Even Solomon, whom they called the Wise, had defined her position, "The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her," he spoke the praise and properties of a good wife—"she will do him good and not evil. . . ."

Ruth, the Moabiteess, exemplar of married women, clung to the mother of her dead husband, saying: "Entreat me not to leave thee. . . . thy people shall be my people." A woman was to her husband as a satellite to a planet, having no independent being.

"Love, honor and obey," she smiled a little wistfully, remembering her promise.

She had loved a man, and been taken by him in marriage, and unto him now she was bound for better or worse. His fortunes were her fortunes, and his life hers. So went the law and immemorial custom, and so all good stories ran. Were she to ask a hundred women, the answer would be the same. "Say nothing about it, dearie. Hush, for God's sake! Are you mad?" They would account it a virtue to defraud the law. "He's your husband, isn't he?"

PAUL AND RUTH and Solomon were of old, but the world over, she felt, the rule was the same today. Were she to conceal this evil, though it was as grievous as to merit the hangman's noose, and were it to be revealed later, there was not one but would praise her, not a man, woman or child, not a single one.

A commotion rose at the back-door of the house. A blind beggar—a dark man of the Glens, went the phrase—was begging of Shiela Dhu, the housekeeper, and was asking for the mistress.

"Musha then, 'tis to herself I'd like to be speaking, just the wee word."

"Herself you'll no be speaking to. You've got the bite and sup. Off with ye."

"And where is himself? Himself, the master of this house?"

"And where is himself?" Shiela Dhu cackled in savage sneering. "Yerra, where would himself be but where they do be racing horses, and passing the punch-bowl, and card-playing and dicing until the dawn of day?"

She must stop that, Marge said to herself. Old Shiela had no right to talk of her master in such a manner. But Marge did not rise. She sat listening dully to the blind beggar going down the drive.

"A hard life it is surely," he was complaining, "to be going traveling the Nine Glens of Antrim from the crack of dawn until the dying of the day, and not to be knowing whether it's the sun that's in it, or the moon itself, save by the way the heat does be playing on the ground. A lonely life it is for the three of us—for me and the dog and the stick in my hand—"

DIAMONDS-WATCHES
CASH or CREDIT
LOFTIS
BROS. & CO. ESTD. 1858

Genuine Diamonds GUARANTEED
Send for Catalog
Everything explained. Over 2,000 illustrations of Diamond-set Jewelry, Pearls, Watches, etc. Any article sent prepaid for Free Examination. Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.

Our immense Buying Power for our Chain of Stores and our large Mail Order House enables us to make lower prices than small concerns.

We invite comparison of quality and prices. You will be convinced that you can do better with LOFTIS.

LIBERTY BONDS ACCEPTED AT PAR

The handsome articles shown are SPECIAL BARGAINS selected from our "All Best Sellers." Diamonds are dazzling, blue white, perfect cut. Mountings are all Solid Gold. Furnished at prices given, and up to any price you wish. Order by Number.

DIAMOND RINGS: 1—White Gold, $100. 3—White Gold, $75. 10—White Gold, or Green Gold with Diamond set in White Gold, $37.50. 11—Yellow Gold, Diamond set in White Gold, $150. 6—WEDDING RING: Platinum, $25. Green or Yellow Gold, $10. 7—WATCH, 17-Jewel, gold-filled, guaranteed 25 years, $27.50. 12—WATCH, 17-Jewel, White Gold, 15-Jewel, $35; 17-Jewel, $45.

CREDIT TERMS: One-fifth down, balance divided into equal payments within eight months.

LOFTIS
BROS. & CO. ESTD. 1858
108 N. State St., Chicago, Ill.
Stores in Leading Cities

Beautifully Curly, Wavy Hair Like "Nature's Own"

Try the new way—the Silmerine way—and you'll never again use the ruinous heated iron. The curliness will appear altogether natural.

Liquid Silmerine is easily applied with brush. Is neither sticky nor greasy. Perfectly harmless. Serves also as a splendid dressing for the hair. Directions with bottle. At drug and department stores $1.

Parker-Belmont Powder Compact $1.00
Parker-Belmont Rose Compact - 1.00
Parker-Belmont Beauty Cream - 1.00
Powdered Barriflower (depilatory) - 1.00
Parker, Belmont & Co., 2358 Clybourn Av., Chicago

An Easy Way to Remove Dandruff

If you want plenty of thick, beautiful, glossy, silky hair do by all means get rid of dandruff, for it will starve your hair and ruin it if you don't.

The best way to get rid of dandruff is to dissolve it. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp, and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most, if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and three or four more applications should completely remove every sign and trace of it.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop, and your hair will look and feel a hundred times better. You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store. A four-ounce bottle is usually all that is needed.

The R. L. Watkins Co., Cleveland, Ohio.

But Colin! She saw her brother, older than she, grizzled as a badger, with the hawklike governing face, the powerful jaw and nose, the searching gray eye, the head that righteousness and honor held high. "A hard man," his opponents said. "A big man," was the report of the country. "A great one," the Orange brethren claimed. He might be all these things to all the world, but to Marge he was only her brother Colin.

She remembered with a queer little tug at her heart when Colin swam from Ireland to Scotland on a summer's day—she was only a little "girsha" then, but she remembered the stir.

She remembered standing by Colin when his wife died, and he was going about a crazed man, she treating him gently as a child. "There was love," she had thought awesomely. Who could be closer than they two? For was not she his sister, and as natural and as necessary as the day?

HOW CLOSE they had been together. He was twelve years older than she, but that had been no barrier. It had seemed only a reserve strength and experience on which she could draw. She had told Colin of men who proposed to her, of doubts in her heart; of debts she had accumulated, which had seemed terrible to her, but Colin had helped her with a laugh. All her life, she had known Colin and loved Colin, and been loved and protected by him, and she had never thought of it before.

"Rory, my husband, is a stranger," she said with a sense of shocked discovery. "Colin!" Her face grew very white. There was a strange contraction about her heart. She knew Colin better than anyone did—better, she said to herself with a queer note of jealousy, than his dead wife had known him. The thing the world called hard in his character was that upright, meticulous sense of honor that was as definite and as terrible as a drawn sword. His word was never lightly given, but it was his bond, as fixed as an oath on the Eucharist.

Even that office of his, justice of the peace, was sacred to him. He had been entrusted with it by the government of the realm, and it was an honor to administer and uphold the peace. Not a beggar but would receive full justice from him, not the most ragged beggar in the street. Not a noble but would suffer by the law should he transgress it—not a noble in the Nine Glens. It was Colin's pride that he administered justice and kept the peace of the district. And this matter of the gombeen man had worried him more than he cared to show.

"He was a ruffian, a good-for-nothing, a scab on the community, Marge," Colin had said. "But I have a trust to that dead man that his murderer shall pay."

"But, Colin, dear," she had said, "don't take it to heart. If the police can't find who did it, it's not your fault."

"The police are subordinate officers of mine. The trust is mine. It's bigger than that even. It's—well, it's big to me as I think of it now."

Yes, assuredly she understood him better than anyone else. It was Colin's honor that was at stake.

"I am betraying Colin," she thought. Were she not to move over to that telephone in the sitting-room, the strange crooked thing on its box, mouthpiece and receiver in one—very like a doctor's device—and call him and tell him straight away, she would leave a mark on the honor that was more to him than his life—the thing the Frasers had kept unspotted for years and decades and centuries.

"But Rory! My husband! I should be betraying him!"

If she were to do that thing, the eyes and the hands of womankind would be turned from her. What did it matter that Colin was the brother she had known all her life, and whom she loved so? Beside him Rory was merely a stranger.

"Your brother's honor!" Women would shake their heads. "He's your man!"

All would be against her, women and little children in the street and they would say vile things, suggesting a hidden lover somewhere, and holding her name to be spat at until her dying day. All the preachments would be against her; the preachment of the fanatical ragged-bearded Paul; the sublime words of Ruth, and Solomon, there was no going past the wisdom of Solomon.

"He is your man" she could hear hypothetical voices say. "It is your husband's life. As for your brother—it's only his honor."

It was very simple, after all. She sat with her head in her hands reviewing it, and life swung by her as insignificant as a clock's pendulum. A hornet buzzed angrily on the terrace, and from the highway came the spank-spank-spank of a horse in a dog-cart. A stable-boy outside raised his voice discussing the points of the mare between the shafts.

"She may have the height and she may have the build, but she can na jump. D'ye mind the right foreleg, I ask you? Do you mind that?"

AND WERE all the world to know it, none would blame me for hiding it. Not Colin even! Not even he! A sudden sob came from her. "Least of all Colin. Least of all, he!"

She arose suddenly. She went to the telephone. She picked it up. She called for her number in a firm voice.

"Is that Garryday Abbey. Is Sir Colin Fraser in? This is his sister."

"He's not in now, Miss Margery."

"Is that you, Rorke? Please tell my brother, when he comes in, to ring me immediately."

"Yes, Miss Margery."

"Tell him it's very important. Tell him—tell him—just tell him that—"

"Yes, Miss Margery."

"That I know who killed Miles Hanlon—the gombeen man."

It seemed to her as she put the telephone receiver down that the whole world must be changed somehow, rocking to its foundation and the planets crashing together in space, so ill and faint did she feel. But nothing had changed. She was herself. The hornet still buzzed on the terrace, and the deerhound snuffed along the garden walk. The maid was finishing her song, coming in now with a bunch of roses:

I know where I'm going,
I know who's going with me,
I know who I love
But the de'il knows who I'll marry.

The Strange Adventures of No. 25 H—Continued from page 48

Henry Ford's Jew-Mania

is a private wire in the apartment of our friend J. I have played in luck in this particular, and I believe that I will be able to establish the fact, yes or no, within a few days. As it happens the electrical engineer of the building where our friend J lives is a very good friend of the police sergeant. This engineer was formerly on the police force here and did duty under this police sergeant.

"We called at the building last night but the engineer was out. We left word for him to get into touch with the police sergeant. By Monday or Tuesday, we should know definitely. I advised my friend, the sergeant, that we would have to foot the expense personally, unless it was definitely established that there was a private wire; but that in that event, we would be able to pay him and his friend liberally for proof of the fact."

The detectives were busy a good long time over this fancy of the sick President in the White House, with one end of the telephone at his ear, while he received influence from the Supreme Court Justice at the other end of the secret 'phone. An ordinary person, who was neither a detective nor a Jew-maniac, could have found out in eleven minutes that Mr. Brandeis had no secret telephone at all. Nay, more, he had not even the ordinary personal telephone. He used, and uses, only the house telephone of the apartment building in which he has his apartment and his office. But if human sense had at any moment been shown, the bottom would have dropped out immediately of the great campaign against the Jews, which Mr. Ford is still keeping up. He has run out of "material," bless his innocent heart, but his publication still advertises every week the valuable stuff that the paper has collected.

Some of the Jew-baiters went even beyond the attempt to prove that President Wilson, Colonel House, and the heads of the Democratic Party were in the hands of the Jews: they undertook to point out that the Republican Party also would soon be under the same control, and they therefore started an agitation for the nomination of General Leonard Wood "on a straight American, anti-Jew platform." This brought an indignant denial from General Wood himself, which we reproduce on page 45 and which reads:

Thank you for your letter of July twenty-fourth.

I regret exceedingly that a circular such as you enclose, one headed "LEONARD WOOD—Jew Finance, masquerading as the Old Guard, has nominated Senator Harding, etc., etc.," has been circulated. Your letter brings me the first information I have concerning it.

I have done everything possible to build up a spirit of national solidarity and to prevent the rise of racial or religious animosities.

I shall be very glad to have you send this communication to the American Legion Headquarters, Indianapolis, for such use as they choose to make of it.

Sincerely yours,
LEONARD WOOD.

The Dearborn Independent had no intention of stopping with the proof that President Wilson was a Gentile front. It also undertook to show that President Taft, his predecessor, was a Gentile front.

We decorate page 44 with facsimiles of these contributions from Ford's paper.

The same Russian "Black Hundred" influence that was coaxing Henry Ford against American liberals was at the same time working hand in hand with American reactionaries. We find Henry A. Wise Wood, famous as a standpatter of the so-called "100 per cent American type," sending copies of the Lusk Committee report on socialism to F. Hunter Creech, the Washington Ford operator. We find the American Defense Society, bulwark of American standpattism, sending to their members copies of the famous faked Russian Protocols, which were prepared for an American publishing house by associates of Boris Brasol, well known to readers of this series as leader of the Tsarist émigrés.

This same Brasol is an officer in two Russian societies that found money where-with to bail out of the Tombs prison, in New York, last spring, the Russian Cosack Semenov. With one hand Brasol assists Henry Ford; with the other he assists Ralph Easley, of the National Civic Federation, one of the most persistent and sly persecutors of liberalism that we have in our free country. We find Brasol writing articles for Easley, attacking Liberalism and Semitism alike, and we find Easley later promising that he will cut from Brasol's material all the anti-Semitic parts. Brasol works in and out of this series, and next month he looms large, as the Protocols are to be the topic of that article. Here was trickery and mystery in good measure. One Russian had made a half-deal with Mr. Daniels to sell him thirteen new Protocols! Right in the midst of the negotiation, this man of mystery departed from the United States, giving this short warning:

"Mr. Charles Wallace Smith:

"I am leaving today, April 15, for Seattle, where I arrive on the 20th. I am taking the Fushima Maru. Please telegraph everything that has to do with business to the Fushima Maru. Write in Russian words with English letters. Miss de Bogory will do this for you. I must know definitely about, and receive, the agreed amount monthly. Greetings to Mr. Daniels.

"D. RODIONOFF."

Did the detectives permit Mr. Rodionoff to drop out of their lives? They did not.

The Protocols and their introduction into the United States by Russian monarchists, will be dealt with in the next article in the Ford series. Large parts of these Protocols were published by Mr. Ford. Men on his sleuth payroll spent much time and money in the effort to secure further Protocols and substantiating material. Hearst's International for September, ready August 20th.

It's toasted. This one extra process gives a rare and delightful quality — impossible to duplicate

Guaranteed by

The American Tobacco Co.
INCORPORATED

Owen Johnson's Story of the Susceptible Skippy—Continued from page 83

The Scalp Hunter

nights, moonlight sails, moonlight picnics; end of intimate whispered half laughing, half serious intimacies à deux. Tomorrow, separation and a man's life to take up again in all seriousness.

Mr. Skippy Bedelle and Miss Vivi Balon separated themselves from the unromantic middle-aged crowd around the tennis courts and made their way up the beach. They walked in silence, oppressed by the greatness of their grief, from time to time their shoulders touched in mute dumb understanding.

He carried a beach chair, four sofa cushions, two rugs, her work-bag, and a box of chocolates.

He made a back of the chair, spread the rug and installed her solicitously.

"Have a chocolate?"

"Thanks."

"Jelly or nut?"

"Nut. Thanks."

They munched in silence.

"That's the trouble with summer," said Skippy at last.

"Yes, isn't it?"

"It's rotten."

"Oh, why must everything end?" said Vivi, wildly.

"I can't realize that tomorrow—"

"You'll forget, men always forget."

Skippy shook his head.

"Yes. You'll write a letter or two, and then—heigh ho!"

"LOOK HERE, you don't mean that," said Skippy, turning on her.

Vivi's eyes dropped before his righteous indignation.

"No—no, I don't mean that."

"Then don't talk that way—just now."

"Forgive me—Jack?"

"What?"

"You do forgive me?"

"Of course."

"You're going to do wonderful things at school," said Vivi, trying to be brave.

"Do you think they'll let you come down to the Andover game?"

"I don't know about the game—but I'll probably be a the Prom!"

"Gee, you'll be a knockout there!"

They ate more chocolates, while Skippy debated how to lead the conversation into the softer strain before bestowing on the object of his affections (for value exchanged of course) the sacred emblem of the Philomathean Debating Society.

Suddenly Skippy remembered. His fingers relaxed on the pin. He brought forth his hand. "Say, you promised to read my hand, you know."

"Did I?"

"Sure you did."

Miss Vivi sat up and carefully pillowed the squat calloused hand in her soft one.

"Well?" said Skippy, anxiously.

"Shall I tell all?"

"Everything."

"You have a very strong will—very obstinate and not easily influenced. Ambition will be your god and you will sacrifice—" Vivi hesitated.

"You will sacrifice everything to your ambition—friends, family, the woman who loves you and even yourself, if necessary."

"Oh, cease!"

"It's here in your hand," said Vivi, shocked at the discovery. "Women will play very little part in your life. It's not that you haven't a lot to give; you have. See this bump? That's affection. It's very developed."

"Say is all that there?" said Skippy beginning to be alarmed.

"That and more," said Vivi, warming up. "You are very loyal, not at all conceited, brilliant, intellectual qualities, and you will make a success—" Here Vivi paused and turned his hand over.

At this moment from down the beach came a shrill whistle, imitative of the whippoorwill, insistent, querulous.

"Good heavens, it's four o'clock!"

"All right, I'm on. Who's the little bird?" said Skippy.

"Jack!"

The whippoorwill rose to shriller heights.

"It's Charles Brownrigger," said Vivi, trying to appear embarrassed, "and he's come round to say good-by."

"Oh, indeed."

"I had to let him say good-by," said Vivi, imploringly, to the young sultan.

"How long's it going to take?" said Skippy, drawing out his watch.

"Oh, about twenty minutes."

"I'll wait exactly half an hour. Four-thirty to the minute."

"I do believe you're jealous, Jack Bedelle!" said Vivi, expectantly.

"Jealousy has no part in my nature," said Skippy, loftily.

She picked up the pink parasol and hastened down the beach. Skippy fished out the Philomathean Debating Society pin and slowly attached it to his cravat.

"Half an hour was a mistake. Fifteen minutes is enough for a mut like Brownrigger. I should have been firmer. When a girl gets you to waiting for her—she has you going and coming."

He slipped off his shoes to empty them of sand and in doing so filled the gaily colored work-bag that was Vivi's. His toilette finished, he took up the bag to clean it in turn. As Fate had decreed at the first touch, a book tumbled out and lay with opened pages before him. It looked most suspiciously like a diary. He averted his eyes and then his glance came slowly back to it.

"Here, that's not square," he said to himself angrily, torn by a mighty temptation. He leaned over and closed the book abruptly. The next moment he was staring at three gilded words that confronted him with the suddenness of Belshazzar's vision.

THE CHAP RECORD

A sudden brain storm swept over the emotional nature of Mr. Skippy Bedelle, of the sort which in modern legal etiquette is held to excuse all crimes. He knew what a chap record was. He had found one in his sister Clara's bureau and had been lavishly paid for his silence. He opened it, and this is what he read:

HARRY FELTON. June 30th—Sept. 6th.

Good looking in a soapy sort of way, but dull, good dancer, agonizingly slow at a twosing. Takes what you give him and is grateful. Good for last minute calls.

JOE RANDOLPH. July 2d—August 6th. Awfully lavish and liberal. Spoiled and hard to keep in place. Useful later. Salt away for College Prom.

CHARLES BROWNRIGGER. Xmas to—. Terribly proper and easily shocked. Every girl an angel. Seeking a good influence. Good only for concerts and lectures.

CHARLES DULER. Easter vacation. Professional flirt. Tried hard for him but no go. On to all the old tricks. Too much alike.

HECTOR CRISOLM—May 3d to May 6th. Three day rush fast and furious. Nice teeth and eyes, cold English style in daytime but wilts rapidly in the moonlight. Dreadfully exciting. Au revoir!

HAVING thus wandered through the carnage, Skippy braced himself and turned to the B's.

JACK BEDELLE. August 20th—. Dreadfully young and conceited, feed him on flattery—nice eyes but funny nose—poor conversationalist but works hard—dreadful dancer. Pretends indifference but awfully soft in spots. Hooked him in twenty minutes.

Skippy laid the book down in his lap and glanced up the beach which showed no signs of an advancing parasol. Then he looked at his watch which indicated exactly the half hour. He sat a long moment thinking. Then he opened the book and at the paragraph devoted to him he added:

"Easy to hook is hard to hold."

But this did not satisfy him. He stood up, and suddenly inspired, sank to his knees and hurriedly gathered together the sand into a mound capable of burying Miss Vivi's little body. Across it he laid the opened book. At its head he placed the box of chocolates as a headstone. Then below he wrote in the sand (symbol indeed of transient lover):

SACRED TO THE MEMORY OF

VIOLET BALON

SLAIN BY HER OWN HAND
August 27th, 1896.

Then as a masterly afterthought he added savagely.

GONE AND FORGOTTEN.

Mr. Skippy Bedelle then wriggled away through the sand dunes just as Miss Vivi Balon, with malice aforethought, came up the beach accompanied by her latest conquest, Mr. Charles Brownrigger.

Some folks would say that New York is nothing but one big false front, but when you find two young people like George Fair and Miss Robinson trying to keep the pace you will see how New York gets its reputation. See "In the New York Manner," by Lucian Cary, in Hearst's International for September.

How to Shampoo Your Hair Properly

*How You Can Make Your Hair Beautiful—
Keep It Soft and Silky, Bright, Fresh-Looking and Luxuriant*

THE beauty of your hair depends upon the care you give it. Shampooing it properly is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh-looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why discriminating women, everywhere, now use Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful and attractive you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method:

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, put two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water. Then wet the hair and scalp with clear warm water. Pour the Mulsified evenly over the hair and rub it thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly—

Use plenty of lather. Rub it in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips

The final rinsing should leave the hair soft and silky in the water

When thoroughly clean, wet hair fairly squeaks when you pull it through your fingers—and feels light and fluffy to the touch.

always using clear, fresh warm water.

Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before.

Two waters are usually sufficient for washing the hair, but sometimes the third is necessary.

You can easily tell, for when the hair is perfectly clean, it will be soft and silky in the water, the strands will fall apart easily, each separate hair floating alone in the water, and the entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage—and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

Keeping A Child's Hair Beautiful

CHILDREN should be taught, early in life, that proper care of the hair is essential.

The hair and scalp should be kept perfectly clean to insure a healthy, vigorous scalp and a fine, thick, heavy head of hair.

Get your children into the habit of shampooing their hair regularly once a week. Put two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water. Then wet the hair and scalp with clear warm water. Pour the Mulsified over the hair and rub it in vigorously with the tips of the fingers. This will stimulate the scalp, make an abundance of rich, creamy lather and cleanse the hair thoroughly. It takes only a few seconds to rinse it all out when through.

You will be surprised how this regular weekly shampooing with Mulsified will improve the appearance of the hair and you will be teaching your child a habit that will be appreciated in after-life, for a luxurious head of hair is some thing every man and woman feels mighty proud of.

MULSIFIED
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO

Tire Competition ~ Good, Bad and Indifferent

THE average American was raised on the idea that the more people who competed for his trade the better off he was.

Like many good ideas, it has several sides.

They all show themselves clearly in the tire business.

* * *

There are tires which prefer to compete largely on a price basis. Believing that the public is more interested in the dollars and cents they pay than in the worth of what they get.

On the other hand, U. S. Royal Cords believe differently.

And car-owners who use Royal Cords have a plus feeling which they get both from actual experience, and because they realize the integrity of the manufacturer.

People don't think of Royal Cords as high-priced tires. They think of them as better tires.

In the man who knows what a good, faithful product the Royal Cord is, the tire that makes price its main argument, hardly arouses more than a little curiosity.

* * *

So which is better?

A tire that thinks a man has no judgment beyond his pocket-book?

Or a tire like the U. S. Royal Cord — which credits the public with the instinct for quality, and the sense to find out true economy?

---

Prices on United States Passenger Car Tires and Tubes, effective May 8th, are not subject to war-tax, the war-tax having been included.

---

United States Tires
are Good Tires

Copyright
1922
U. S. Tire Co.

U. S. Royal Cord Tires
United States  Rubber Company

Fifty-three
Factories

The Oldest and Largest
Rubber Organization in the World

Two hundred and thirty-five Branches

Carnac's Folly

"I have no faith in you! In the depth of my soul, something cries out: 'He is not true. His life is false.' To leave me, that was right; but, monsieur, not as you left me. You pick the fruit and eat it, and spit upon the ground the fibre and the skin. I am no longer the slave to your false eloquence. It has nothing in it for me now, nothing at all, nothing."

"Yet your son—has he naught for me? If your son has genius, I have the right to say a part of it came from me. What right have you to say that all that's good in the boy is yours—that the boy, in all he does and says, is yours! No, no. Your long years of suffering have hardened into injustice and wrong."

Suddenly, he touched her arm. "There are young women, women as young as you were when I wronged you, who would be my wife now—young, beautiful, buoyant; but I come to you because I feel we might still have some years of happiness. Together, where our boy was concerned, we two could help him on his way. That is what I feel, my dear."

WHEN he touched her arm, she did not move, yet there was in his fingers something which stirred ulcers long since healed.

"Do not touch me," she said. "The past is buried forever. There can be no resurrection. I know what I should do, and I will do it. For the rest of my life, I shall live for my son. I hope he will defeat you. I don't lift a hand to help him except to give him money. You are fighting what is stronger than yourself. One thing is sure, he is nearer to the spirit of your race than you. He will win, because he has not misjudged things as he sees them. But yes, he will win!"

Her face suffused with warmth, became alive with a wonderful fire, her whole being had a simple, overwhelming tragedy.

Once again, and perhaps for the last time, she had renewed the splendor of her young womanhood. The vital warmth of a great idea had given an expression to her face which had long been absent from it.

He fell back from her. Then passion seized him. The gaunt beauty of her roused a spirit of contest in him. The evil thing in him, which her devoted love for her son, had almost conquered, came back upon him. He remembered Luzanne, and now with a spirit alive with anger, he said to her:

"No, no, no, he can not win." He stretched out a hand. "I have that which will keep for me the place in Parliament that has been mine; which will send him back to the isolation whence he came. Do you think I don't know how to win an election? Why from east to west, from north to south in this Province of Quebec, my name, my fame, have been all conquering. Let me put this to you. Suppose he did defeat me, do you think that would end my political life? It would end nothing. I should still go on."

A scornful smile came to her lips. "So you think your party would find a seat for you who had been defeated by a young man who never knew what political life meant till he entered on this campaign? You think they would find you a seat? I know you are coming to the end of your game, and when he defeats you, it will end everything for you. You will disappear from public life, and your day will be done. Men will point at you as you pass along the street and say: 'There goes Barode Barouche. He was a great man in his day. He was defeated by a boy with a painter's brush in his hand.' He will take from you your livelihood. You will go, and he will stay; he will conquer and grow strong. Go from me, Barode Barouche," she cried, thrusting out her hands against him as it were, "go from me. I love my son with all my soul. His father has no place in my heart."

There had come upon him the wild passion of revenge. It had mastered him before he spoke and while she spoke, but as she finished, the understanding spirit of him conquered. Instead of telling her of Luzanne Larue, and of what he would do if he found things going against him, instead of that, he resolved to say naught. He saw he could not conquer her. For a minute after she had ceased speaking, he looked at her in silence, and in his eyes was a remorse that would never leave them. She was master.

Slowly, and with a sense of defeat, he said to her: "Well, we shall never meet again like this. The fight goes on. I will defeat Carnac. No, do not shake your head. He shall not put me from my place. For you and me there is no future—none; yet I want to say to you before we part forever now, that you have been deeper in my life than any other woman. I will use every effort to win back—"

He said no more. Catching up his hat from the chair, and taking his stick, he left the room. He opened the front door, stepped out, shut it behind him, and, in a moment, was lost in the night.

WHILE these things were happening, Carnac was spending all his time with the constituency. Every day was busy to the last minute, every hole in the belt of his equipment was buckled tight. In spite of his enthusiasm, he was, however, troubled by the fact that Luzanne might appear. Yet as time went on, he gained confidence. There were days, however, when he appeared, mentally, to be watching the street corners.

One day at a public meeting, he thought the sensation had come. He had just finished his speech in reply to Barode Barouche—eloquent, eager, masterful. Youth's aspirations, with a curious sympathy with the French Canadian people, had idealized his utterances. When he finished, there had been cheering, but in the quiet instant that followed the cheering, a habitant got up—a weird, wilful fellow who had a reputation for brag, yet who would not have hurt even an enemy.

"M'sieu' Carnac Grier," he said, "I'd like to put a question to you. You've been asking for our votes. We're a family people, we Canucs, and we like to know where we're going. Tell me, m'sieu', where's your woman?"

Having asked the question, he did not sit down, but remained stolidly standing.

"Where's your woman?" the habitant had asked. Carnac's breath came quick and sharp. There were many hundreds present and a good number of them were foes. Barode Barouche was on the same platform. Not Carnac only was stirred by the question, for Barouche, who had listened to his foe's speech with admiring anxiety, was startled.

"Where's your woman?" was not a phrase to be asked anyhow, or anywhere. Barouche was glad of the incident. Ready as he was to meet challenge, he presently realized that his son had a readiness equally potent. He was even pleased to see the glimmer of a smile at the lips of the slim young politician, in whom there was more than his own commingling of temperament, of wisdom and wantonness and raillery.

AFTER A MOMENT Carnac said: "Isn't that rather a leading question to an unmarried man?"

Barouche laughed inwardly. Surely it was the reply he himself would have made. Carnac had showed himself a born politician. The audience cheered, but the questioner remained standing. He meant to ask another question.

"Sit down—sit down, jackass!" shouted some of the more raucous of the crowd, but the man was stubborn. He stretched out an arm towards Carnac.

"Bien, look here, my son, you take my advice. Pursue the primrose path into the meadows of matrimony."

Again Carnac shrank, but his mind rallied courageously, and he said: "There are other people who want to ask questions, perhaps." He turned to Barode Barouche. "I don't suggest my opponent has planned this heckling, but he can see it does no good. I'm not to be floored by catch-penny tricks. I'm going to win. I run straight. I haven't been long enough in politics to learn how to deceive. Let the accomplished professionals do that."

He waved a hand disdainfully at Barouche. "Let them put forth all that's in them, I will remain; let them exert the last ounce of energy, I will prevail; let them use the thousand devices of elections, I will use no device, but rely upon my policy. I want nothing except my chance in Parliament. My highest ambition is to make good laws. I am for the man who was the first settler on the St. Lawrence and this section of the continent—his history, his tradition, his honor and fame are in the history books of the world."

"If I should live a hundred years, I should wish nothing better than the honor of having served the men whose forefathers served Frontenac, Cartier, La Salle and Maisonneuve, and all the splendid heroes of that ancient age. What they have done is for all men to do. They have kept the faith. I am for the habitant first and last and all the time."

He sat down in a tumult of cheering. Many present remarked that no two men they had ever heard, spoke so much alike.

There had been at this public meeting, two intense supporters of Carnac, who waited for him at the main doorway. They were Fabian's wife and Junia.

Barode Barouche came out of the hall before Carnac. His quick eye saw the two ladies, and, as he was about to pass them, he raised his broad brimmed hat like a Stuart cavalier, and smiled.

"Waiting for your champion, eh?" he asked with cynical friendliness. "Well, work hard, because that will soften his fall." He leaned over, as it were confidentially, to them while his friends craned their necks to hear what he said: "If I were you, I'd prepare him. He's beaten as sure as the sun shines."

Junia was tempted to say what was in her mind, but her sister, Sibyl, who resented Barouche's patronage, said:

"There's an old adage about the slip 'twixt the cup and the lip, Monsieur Barouche. If I were you, I shouldn't be too sure. He's young, and he's got a better policy than yours."

"And he's unmarried, eh?" Barouche remarked. "He's unmarried, and I suppose that matters!"

There was an undercurrent of meaning in his voice that did not escape Junia.

"And Monsieur Barouche is also unmarried," she remarked. "So, you see, you're even there."

"Not quite even. I'm a widower, you know. The women don't work for me as they work for him."

"I don't understand," remarked Junia.

"The women can't all marry him."

"There are a lot of things that can't be understood by just blinking the eyes, but there's romance in the fight of an unmarried man, and women like romance even if it's someone else's. There's sensation in it."

Barouche looked backwards to where Carnac was slowly coming down the center of the hall. Women were waving their handkerchiefs and throwing kisses towards him. One little girl was pushed in front of him, and she reached out a hand in which was a wild rose.

"That's for luck, m'sieu'," she said.

Carnac took the rose and placed it in his buttonhole. Then, stooping down, he kissed the child's cheek.

Outside the hall, Barode Barouche winked an eye knowingly. "He's got it all down to a science. Look at him—kissing the young chick. Nevertheless, he's walking into an abyss."

Barode Barouche, confident that he holds the trump card, faces the campaign with no misgivings. But will he dare use Luzanne Larue to defeat his own son—and revenge himself on the mother? At worst, Carnac is resourceful and he is out to win. See Hearst's International for September, ready August 20th.

Clifford Raymond's Story of the Equality of Men—Continued from page 67

Brothers Under the Sod

you should know about it. If there were any other way, I would not use this one. I haven't any compunctions in a case of this sort, but I don't think you need to know what is done."

Mr. McLloyd had an alarm and it acted on his sense of caution.

"I trust in your judgment," he said. "I thought I could handle the situation and I can't. If you know how, you do it."

Mr. Allen went back to his office and asked his secretary to get S. M. Smith on the telephone for him immediately. S. M. Smith was Snit Smith.

HONEY DEW maintained a number of his old habits. One was that of dropping in at McGhee's place at Thirty-third and Indiana Avenue.

He traveled in his own car and in addition to his chauffeur who was a gunman, he had always a gunman guard, a fellow who could draw quickly or shoot without drawing, through his pockets.

He had his car stopped at McGhee's habitually at six or six-thirty in the evening and his chauffeur and guard went in with him. He could leave his car unprotected anywhere. No car thief would dare to take Honey Dew's car.

This evening as he entered McGhee's with his companions at his elbow, he saw Snit Smith at the bar. He had not seen the Snit for several years. He thought of him as an ugly, stupid little fool. He had an idea and had made no use of it. He had been gunning around, doing cheap murders and getting nothing beyond his board and lodging.

Even in McGhee's, Honey Dew always took a look at the land, strategically. There was nothing out of ordinary this evening, that he could see, except Snit Smith. There were some strangers in the place but they did not seem to be unusual.

He went up to Snit and touched him on the shoulder.

"Hullo, Snit," he said. "Have a drink?"

"Hullo, Honey," said Snit genially.

"Sure I'll have a drink. How's the boy?"

"Getting round slowly, Snit," said Honey Dew, conversationally. "No jazz-ing. Just getting round, you understand."

"I've got kidney feet myself," said Snit. "Forty-five is old age these days. Ain't it a fact, Honey?"

"No, it ain't," said Honey Dew. "I'm fifty and I never felt better in my life. I'm good for fifty more."

"Pretty soft for you, but I'm not that way. I'm getting to feel old. Let's sit down and have the drink. I like to rest my feet once in a while."

Snit motioned to a table in a corner and led the way there.

"I'm sure getting old," he said, as they were served their drinks. "No more rough stuff for me. I'm through."

"You poor fish," said Honey Dew. "I never felt better in my life."

"I know," said Snit, "but you're a real guy. A good big man is better than a good little man. The best I ever could be was a good little man, and not so damned good at that."

"Pretty good, pretty good," said Honey Dew. "I'll tell the world you taught me a lot the night you pulled a gun."

"I'll say I did," said Snit laughing. "They say you're good now but a bit slow on the pull."

"Slow, hell!" said Honey Dew.

"That's what I say, but they do say you're slow."

Honey Dew had liquor in him and was grandiloquent and expressive.

"Slow, slow hell," he said, angrily. "How's this?"

He flashed a gun out of his pocket, across the top of the table. It was not the draw which he would have made in trouble. It was flashy and intended to show speed and a brilliant technique. As such it was observable, to anyone who happened to be looking towards the table from any part of the room. What any such person, seeing and not hearing, naturally would think was that Honey had pulled a gun on Snit.

Honey's gesture was just completed when there were four shots rapidly fired and he sank inertly in his chair. His chauffeur and his body-guard were at the bar. They seldom left him so much exposed, but Snit had seemed negligible. They had seen the flash of Honey's gun and had started towards him when the strange shooting began, strange because it was not Honey's gun, although he had the draw, which was shooting, and it was Honey who was collapsing.

Astonishment stopped them in the flash of a second. There was general movement of alarm and confusion in the room. When Honey's guards had recovered and were moving again, three strangers were ahead of them and clumsily in their way. Under this cover Snit went out the side door. Honey Dew, with his hand on the table and holding an unsmoked revolver, was dying.

FOR THE FIRST time since Ella and her children had lived in the big house on Grand Avenue, it was alive. That was because Honey Dew was in his casket.

Death is a luxury in the emotions of the living. Ella's old friends on the west side came to support her. Honey's friends came to keep his wake. His adversaries came to express their condolences.

There was a shifting, changing line of automobiles all day on the block in which Honey had bought his grand house.

All the big men of the labor world came, and interspersed with them were representatives of their opponent, Capital. Mr. Allen of the Illinois National Bank came to leave a note for Ella at the door. It contained a sympathetic expression from the font of so much financial responsibility to the widow of so lawless a power.

The conspicuous fringe of the procession which came to the house in Grand Avenue which Honey Dew had bought was important but evanescent. It recorded itself decorously and solemnly and departed in the semblance of grief.

When Mr. Allen told Mr. McLloyd of the Illinois National Bank that Honey Dew had been killed, Mr. McLloyd had an instant of flinching.

"It was almost inevitable," said Mr. Allen. "These outlaws come to their own settlements. One does not like to condone murder but this one certainly has saved us a lot of trouble."

"Do you know this man, this Snit Smith, the papers say shot Dew?" Mr

McLloyd asked with a show of interest. "Just by general repute. There's an amusing story that years ago he made a gunman of Dew, who was only a slugger, by shooting him up."

"Where is this Smith?"

"He's disappeared. They always do. The police can't find him."

Mr. McLloyd again decided that a little knowledge was not a dangerous thing but that too much knowledge might be. He stopped his questioning.

"That does not concern us," he said. "We have no responsibility in this but we can be glad that our outrageous delays have stopped, if they have. That's all, isn't it, Mr. Allen?"

"Yes, practically, but there's another thing I'd like to have you consider," said the building manager. "Dew was really an important man. He was quite an influence. They are going to make his funeral important. His wife is broken-hearted. Evidently, she was attached to him. I guess she loved him. He seems to have been nice to her and ambitious for his family. They think it will do her good if he has a fine funeral. It will clear up the situation. Several circuit and superior court judges will go. We think that it is a good occasion to show respect for the masses represented by Dew."

There was a puffed and almost purplish aspect to Mr. McLloyd's face.

"Mr. Allen," he said, "you are talking like an ass. The man was a criminal."

Mr. Allen was not abashed by the charge. "It is important," he said, "that you go to the funeral."

"You are crazy," said Mr. McLloyd.

"I am quite rational and hope to persuade you. Dew is dead because he could not find in life what he can be given at his funeral. It is good all around that he gets what he wanted."

"You are an irreverent maniac," said Mr. McLloyd.

"I'm serious," said Mr. Allen. "A point is going to be made of this funeral. It is important that this organization be represented. We've had dealings with Dew."

Mr. McLloyd thereupon used an expression he never had used before and never expected to use again.

"A fat chance," he said.

There were ten thousand people at Honey Dew's funeral. It had first page space for a column in every afternoon newspaper. There were a hundred or more names in the list of locally important persons which had been given to the reporters at the ceremony. In the list, along with the names of a half-dozen judges, many public officials and well-known men of affairs, Mr. McLloyd saw his own name and he made no protest.

That evening Snit Smith was found shot through the head.

His own gun was beside him. It was clean. He had drawn, but not quickly enough. Someone had thought that Honey would sleep better if Snit slept also.

Safe With a Rubba-Float

LET the youngsters get used to the water first. Let them paddle and splash and have a good time with a Kleinert's Rubba-Float to hold up their heads safely.

Then — when they have really learned to love the water, teach them how to swim—with less and less air in the Rubba-Float and finally none at all.

A Kleinert's Rubba-Float is air tight whether wet or dry, and is fastened comfortably and securely with stout tapes. It cannot collapse or come off in the water.

Grown-up beginners like Rubba-Floats, too, because they are strong enough to be reliable and can be adjusted to give much or little support as required.

Ask at any smart shop in town for the latest styles in Kleinert's Millinery for Mermaids—caps, hats, bandanas—all guaranteed waterproof if they're Kleinert's.

Kleinert's

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

I. B. KLEINERT RUBBER CO.
Dept. L, Box 181, Sta. D., N.Y.C.
Canadian Office:

84 Wellington St., West, Toronto

Send for Kleinert's Book of Better Ways
—1922 news of bathing caps, tourist cases, household aprons, bibs, gifts, etc.

F. Britten Austin Sees Revolt Near—from page 21—and Asks Will Portugal Blow Up Next?

empire. Our pride in it is almost the only thing left to us. Portugal may lose its empire—it will never voluntarily surrender any part of it!"

"There is one thing we might do," he said, after a pause. "If England would grant us a loan, we might engage ourselves to allow her to establish a temporary naval base in the Azores should she go to war with America—or, alternatively, we might, on the same terms, promise the same facilities to the United States in the event of such a war. But such facilities would be only of a temporary nature."

At the time I write, the head of the Portuguese Government is Sr. Antonia Maria da Silva, formerly one of the Carbonaria Triumvirate that overthrew the Monarchy, and now popularly credited with a desire to dissociate himself from his former comrades. His opinions on Portugal today are worth setting in juxtaposition with those of Sr. Cunha Leal.

"The financial situation?" he said, and smiled engagingly. "The statements in the Portuguese and foreign press are far from representing accurately our position. Fundamentally, the financial situation of Portugal is one of the best in Europe. Admittedly, we are in temporary difficulties. But we have immense resources in Angola and we are now doing our utmost to develop and exploit those resources."

One cannot argue matters with the head of a foreign government. For many years past, the surpluses from one or two of the Portuguese colonies have just about balanced the deficits of the remainder.

There is no sociological barometer more sensitive than the foreign exchanges. In 1914, the Portuguese escudo (even after five years of revolution the accumulated resources of the country had not been dissipated) still stood at par a trifle over one dollar to the escudo. Today the escudo stands at twelve to the dollar. This severe depreciation, appalling to the Portuguese themselves and highly embarrassing to foreign traders, has occurred almost entirely since the war ended.

It is calculated that at the present time the Portuguese hold sterling to the value of 250 million U. S. dollars in British banks. This capital, vast for such a small country as Portugal, is of course withdrawn from the commerce of the nation. The Portuguese who own it prefer to keep it in a safe place. In the meantime, their country is sliding towards bankruptcy and no escape is visible.

"And the internal condition?" I asked.

"As you see for yourself, public order is perfect," he replied.

"There is no reality then in the 'Red' menace so often talked about?"

"Unfortunately, there is. There is a disquieting Bolshevik movement in the country, which is undoubtedly subsidized from foreign sources. But we have forces at hand sufficient to deal with the situation, I assure you."

As I wrote the last words of this article, Sr. Cunha Leal was asking the Prime Minister, in the Chamber of Deputies, when he proposed to end the Group of the Thirteen and the Carbonaria.

Upton Sinclair's New Novel of The Stranger in Our Midst—Continued from page 30

They Call Me Carpenter

"Business," said Carpenter, still pondering. "Then it's business—"

"Yes, business—" put in T-S. "Dat's it!" And he lowered his voice, and looked round once more. "It's time ve vas talkin' business now! Mr. Carpenter, I be frank vit you. I put all my cards on de table. I seen de papers shoost now, vot vunderful t'ings you do—healin' de sick and quellin' de mobs and all dat—and I t'ink I got to raise my offer, Mr. Carpenter. If you sign a contract I got here in my pocket, I pay you a t'ousand dollars a week. Vot you say, my friend?"

"That is very kind of you, Mr. T-S, and I thank you for the compliment; but I fear you will have to get someone else to play my part."

Said T-S, "I vant you to t'ink, Mr. Carpenter, vot it would mean if you had a t'ousand dollars every week. You could feed all de babies of de strikers. And vot's more, I pay you five t'ousand cash on de signin' of de contract. You can go right in now vit dese strikers—maybe you could beat Prince's vit all dat money!" Then, as Carpenter still shook his head: "I give you vun more raise, my friend—but dat's de last, you gotta believe me. I pay you fifteen hund'ed a week. I ain't never paid so much money to a green actor in my life before, and I don't t'ink anybody else in de business ever did."

"My friend," Carpenter said, "along time ago there was a prophet, and he was offered the world. The story is told us—'Again the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; and saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.' You recall that story, Mr. T-S?"

"No," said T-S, "I ain't vun o' dese lit'ry fellers." But he realized that the story was not complimentary to him, and he showed his chagrin. "I tell you vun t'ing, Mr. Carpenter, if you vas to know me better, you wouldn't call me a devil."

Suddenly the other put his hand on the great man's shoulder in a gesture of comradeship. "I believe that, my friend; I hate the sin but love the sinner. Suppose you come and have lunch with me?"

"Lunch?" said T-S taken aback. "I went to dinner with you last night. Now you come to lunch with me."

"Where at, Mr. Carpenter?"

Said Carpenter, "When I went with you, I did not ask where."

CARPENTER signed to me and to Everett the secretary, and the four of us went out of the room. I was as much mystified as the picture magnate, but I held my peace, and Carpenter led us to the elevator, and down to the street.

We turned the corner, and soon I saw what was before us, and almost cried out with glee. It was really too good to be true! Carpenter, in the course of his talks with strikers, had learned where their soup-kitchen was located, the relief headquarters where their families were being fed; and he now had the sublime audacity to take the picture magnate to lunch among them!

Nor was that all. As we pushed our way into the place, Carpenter turned to the magnate, and without a trace of embarrassment, said: "You understand, Mr. T-S, I have no money. But we must pay—"

"Oh, sure!" said T-S, "I'll pay!"

"Thank you," said the other; and he turned to an official of the union with whom he had got acquainted in the course of the morning. He introduced us all, not forgetting the secretary, and then said, "Mr. T-S is the moving picture producer, and wants to have lunch with you."

"Oh, sure!" said the official, cordially.

"He will pay for it," added Carpenter. "He has brought along a thousand dollars for that purpose."

T-S started as if someone had struck him; and the official started too. "What?"

"He will pay a thousand dollars," declared Carpenter. "I is a fact, and you may tell the people, if you wish."

"My Gawd, no!" cried T-S wildly.

But the official did not heed him. He faced the crowd and stretched out his arms.

"Boys! Boys! This is Mr. T-S, the picture producer, and he's come to lunch, and he'll pay a thousand dollars for it!"

THERE was a moment of amazed silence, then a roar from the company. Men leaped to their feet and yelled. And there stood poor T-S—not enjoying the ovation!

"Give it to them," whispered Carpenter; and the magnate, thus held up, took out the roll of bills, and turned it over to the trembling official, who leaped onto a chair and waved the miracle before the crowd. "A thousand dollars! A thousand dollars!" He counted it over before their eyes and called out louder than ever, "A thousand dollars!"

Carpenter, followed by T-S and the secretary and myself, went down the line of tables, shaking hands with many on the way, and being patted on the back.

But I knew that T-S had never yet paid a thousand dollars without getting something for it, and I was not surprised when, after he had gulped down his meal, he turned to his host and, disregarding the company demanded, "Now, Mr. Carpenter, do I git de contract?"

Carpenter had had his jest, and was through with it. He answered, gravely, "You must understand me, Mr. T-S. You don't want a contract with me."

"I don't?"

"If I were to sign it, it would not be a week before you would be sorry, and would be asking me to release you."

"Vy is dat, Mr. Carpenter?"

"Because I am going to do things that will make me quite useless to you."

"Dat can't be true, Mr. Carpenter!"

"It is true, and you will realize it soon. I assure you, it won't be a day before you will be ashamed of having known me."

T-S was gazing at the speaker, not certain whether this was something very terrible, or only a polite evasion.

"Mr. Carpenter," he averred, "if all de world vas to give you up, I wouldn't!"

Said Carpenter, "I tell you, before the cock crows again, you will deny three times that you know me."

WHEN I got back to the Labor Temple, I learned that there was to be a mass meeting of the strikers that evening. It had been planned some days ago, and now was to be turned into a protest against police violence and "government by injunction."

It appeared now that the leaders were considering inviting Carpenter to become one of the speakers at their meeting.

The matter was settled a little later, when Mary Magna drove up to the Labor Temple in her big limousine. Mary, for the first time in the memory of anyone who knew her, was without her war-paint; dressed like a Quakeress—a most uncanny phenomenon! She had not a single jewel on; and before long I learned why—she had taken all she owned to a jeweler that morning, and sold them for something over six thousand dollars. She brought the money to the fund for the babies.

T-S was still hanging about, and at first he tried to check this insane extravagance, but then he thought it over and grinned, saying, "I git my t'ousand dollars back in advertising!" When I pointed out to him what would be the interpretation placed by newspaper gossip on Mary's intervention in the affairs of Carpenter, he grinned still more widely.

"Ain't he got a right to be in love vit Mary? All de world's in love vit Mary!"

The end was not yet. Suddenly, there was a commotion in the crowd, and a man pushed his way through—Korwsky, the secretary of the tailor's union, who, learning of Carpenter's miracles, had rushed all the way home, and got a friend with a delivery wagon, and brought his half-grown son post-haste. He bore him now in his arms, and poured out to Carpenter the pitiful tale of his paralyzed limbs. Such a gentle, good child he was; no one ever heard a complaint; but he had not been able to stand up for five years.

SO, OF COURSE, Carpenter put his hands upon the child, and closed his eyes in prayer; and suddenly he put him down to the ground and cried: "Walk!" The lad stared at him, for one wild moment, while people caught their breath; then, with a little choking cry, he took a step. There came a shout from the spectators, and then—Bang!—a puff as if a gun had gone off, and a flash of light, and clouds of white smoke rolling to the ceiling.

Women screamed, and one or two threatened to faint; but it was nothing more dangerous than the cameraman of the Independent Press Service, who had hired a step-ladder, and got it set up in a corner of the room, ready for any climax!

It came time when the rest of us were ready for dinner, but Carpenter said that he wanted to pray. Apparently, whenever he was tired, and had work to do, he prayed. He told me that he would find his own way to Grant Hall, the place of the mass meeting; but somehow, I didn't like the idea of his walking through the streets alone. I said I would call for him.

I cast about in my mind for a body-guard, and bethought me of Old Joe. His name is Joseph Camper, and he played center-rush with my elder brother in the days before they opened up the game, and when beef was what counted.

So I telephoned him to meet me. We had dinner, and at seven-thirty sharp, our taxi drew up at the Labor Temple. Half a minute later, who should come down the street but Everett, T-S's secretary!

"I thought I'd take the liberty," he said, apologetically. "I thought Mr. Carpenter might say something worth while, and you'd be glad to have a transcript."

"Why, that's very kind of you," I answered, "I didn't know you were interested in him."

"Well, I didn't know it myself, but I seem to be; and besides, he told me to follow him."

I went upstairs and found the stranger waiting in the room where I had left him. I put myself on one side of him, and the ex-center-rush on the other, with Everett respectfully bringing up the rear, and so we walked to Grant Hall.

The hall was packed, both the floor and the galleries; there must have been three thousand people. I noted a big squad of police, and wondered what was coming.

I saw Mary Magna come in, with Laura Lee, another picture actress, and Mrs. T-S. They found seats; and I looked for the magnate, and saw him talking to someone near the door. I strolled back to speak to him, and recognized the other man as Westerly, secretary of the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association.

It was not my wish to overhear their conversation, but it worked out that way partly because it is hard not to overhear T-S, and partly because I stopped in surprise at the first words: "Good Gawd, Mr. Westerly, vy should I want to give money to strikers? Dat's nuttin' but fool newspaper talk. I vent to see de man, because Mary Magna told me he vas a vunderful type, and I said I'd pay him a t'ousand dollars on de contract. You know vot de newspapers do vit such t'ings!"

"Then the man isn't a friend of yours?" said the other.

"My Gawd, do I make friends vit every feller vot I hire because he looks like a character part?"

At this point there came up Rankin, one of T-S's directors. "Hello!" said he. "I came to hear your friend the prophet."

"Friend?" said T-S. "Who told you he's a friend o' mine?"

"Why, the papers said—"

"Vell, de papers 're nutty!"

Then came one of the strikers who had been in the soup-kitchen—a fresh young fellow, proud to know a great man. "How dy'do, Mr. T-S? I hear our friend, Mr. Carpenter, is going—"

"Cut out dis friend stuff!" cried T-S irritably. "He ain't my friend."

I strolled up "Hello, T-S!" I said.

"Oh, Billy! Hello!"

"So you've denied 'im three times!"

"Vot you mean?"

"Three times—and the cock hasn't crowed yet! That man's a prophet."

The magnate pretended not to understand, but the deep flush on his features gave him away.

The chairman of the meeting was a man named Brown, the president of the city's labor council. He was certainly respectable enough, prosy and solemn.

The chairman introduced the president of the Restaurant Workers, a solid citizen whom you would have taken for a successful grocer. He told about what had happened last night at Prince's; and then he told about the causes of the strike.

A couple of other labor men spoke, and then came James, the carpenter with a religious streak. He had a harsh, rasping voice, and a way of poking a long, bony finger at the people he was impressing. He was desperately in earnest, and it caused him to swallow a great deal, and each time his Adam's apple would jump up.

THE ORATOR quoted a speech of Algon de Wiggs before the Chamber of Commerce, declaring that the restoration of prosperity, especially in agriculture, depended upon "deflation," and this alone; and suddenly James, the carpenter with a religious streak, launched forth:

"Go to now, you rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that are coming upon you! Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten! Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust on it shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as if it were fire. You have heaped treasure together for the last days. Behold the hire of the laborers, who have reaped your fields; you have kept it back by fraud, and the cries of the reapers have entered into the ears of the Lord! You have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; you have nourished your hearts, as in a day of slaughter. You have condemned and killed the just—"

At this point in the tirade, my old friend the ex-center-rush, who was standing in the wings with me, turned and whispered, "What kind of a Bolshevik stunt is this, anyhow you've brought me to?"

I answered, "Hush, you dub! He's quoting from the Bible!"

President Brown of the Western City Labor Council arose to perform his next duty as chairman. Said he:

"The next speaker is a stranger to most of you, and he is also a stranger to me. I do not know what his doctrine is, and I assume no responsibility for it. But he is a man who has proven his friendship for labor, not by words, but by very unusual deeds. He is a man of remarkable personality, and we have asked him to make what suggestions he can to solve our problems. I have pleasure in introducing Mr. Carpenter."

Whereupon the prophet fresh from God arose from his chair, and came slowly to the front of the platform. There was no applause, but a silence blended partly of curiosity and partly of amazement. His figure, standing thus apart, was majestic; and suddenly I noted a curious thing—a shining as of light about his head.

It was so clear and so beautiful that I whispered to Old Joe: "Do you see that halo?"

"Go on, Billy!" said the ex-center-rush.

"You're getting nutty!"

"But it's plain as day, man!"

I felt someone touch my arm, and saw

TO HAVE AND TO HOLD (No. 312)

A Picture That's Winning New Fame for HARRISON FISHER

A NEW Fisher picture that is breaking all previous records for popularity!

In its bright, masterfully arranged coloring, it's a gem. Send 25 cents today for a perfect full-color reproduction. Size 11x14 inches, printed on heavy white pebbled paper, suitable for framing. Or 30c. for this picture and our new catalog showing 200 others.

Cosmopolitan Print Department
117 West 40th Street, New York City

WE TEACH COMMERCIAL ART

Properly Trained Artists Earn $100 a week and up. Meyer Both College—a Department of the Meyer Both Company—offers you a different and practical training. If you like to draw, develop your talent. Study this practical course—taught by the largest and most widely known Commercial Art Organization in the field with 20 years' success—which each year produces and sells to advertisers in the United States and Canada over ten thousand commercial drawings. Who else could give you so wide an experience? Commercial Art is a business necessity—the demand for commercial artists is greater every year. It's a highly paid, intensely interesting profession, equally open to both men and women. Home study instruction. Get facts before you enroll in any school. Get our special booklet, "Your Opportunity"—for half the cost of mailing—4c in stamps.

MEYER BOTH COLLEGE
of COMMERCIAL ART

Michigan Ave. at 20th St.
Dept. 24, CHICAGO, ILL.

BIG MONEY AND FAST SALES. Every Owner Buys Gold Initials for his auto. You charge $1.50, make $1.35. Ten orders daily easy. Write for particulars and free samples. AMERICAN MONOGRAM CO. Dept. 108, East Orange, N.J.

BOARDING SCHOOL

You can secure reliable information, free of charge, about any School anywhere. We have personally visited the leading Schools throughout the country. In your letter state age and tuition fee you expect to pay.

KENNETH N. CHAMBERS, Director
HARPER'S BAZAR SCHOOL BUREAU
119 West 40th Street New York City

a little lady with anti-vivisection tracts peering past me. "Do you see his aura?" she whispered, excitedly.

"Is that what it is?"

"Yes. It's purple, and that denotes spirituality."

I thought to myself, "Good Lord, am I getting to be that sort?"

Carpenter began to speak, quietly, in his grave, measured voice. "My brothers!" He waited for some time, as if that were enough; as if all the problems of life would be solved, if only men would understand those two words. "My brothers, I am, as your chairman says, a stranger to this world of yours. I do not understand your vast machines and your complex arts. But I know the souls of men and women; when I meet greed, and pride, and cruelty, the enslavements of the flesh, they can not lie to me. And I have walked about the streets of your city, and I know myself in the presence of a people wandering in a wilderness. My children!—broken-hearted, desolate, and betrayed—poorest when you are rich, loneliest when you throng together, proudest when you are most ignorant—my people, I call you into the way of salvation!"

He stretched out his arms to them, and on his face and in his whole look was such anguish, that I think there was no man in that whole great throng so rooted in self-esteem that he was not shaken with sudden awe. The prophet raised his hands in invocation: "Let us pray!"

"Oh, God, our Father, we, Thy lost children, return to Thee, the Giver of life. We bring our follies and our greeds, and cast them at Thy feet. We do not like the life we have lived. We wish to be those things which for long ages we have dreamed in vain. Wilt Thou show the way?"

HIS HANDS sank to his sides, and he raised his head. "Such is the prayer. What is the answer? It has been made known: Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: For everyone that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. These are ancient words, by many forgotten. What do they mean? They mean that we are children of our Father, and not slaves of earthly masters.

"What are the fruits of mastery? They are pride and pomp, they are luxury and wantonness and the shows of power. And who is there among you that can say to himself, these things have no roots in my heart? That man is great, and the deliverance of the world is the act of his will."

The speaker paused, and turned; his gaze swept the platform, and those seated on it. Said he: "You are the representatives of organized labor. I do not know your organization, therefore I ask: For what are you united? Is it to follow in the footsteps of your masters, and bind others as they have bound you?"

He waited for an answer, and the chairman, upon whom his gaze was fixed, cried, "No!" Others also cried, "No!" and the audience took it up with fervor. Carpenter turned to them.

"Then I say to you: Break down in your hearts and in the hearts of your fellows the worship of those base things which mastership has brought into the world. If a man pile up food while others starve, is not this evil? If a woman deck herself with clothing to her own discomfort, is not this folly? And if it be folly, how shall it be admired by you, to whom it brings starvation and despair?"

"Before me sit young women of the working class. Say to yourselves: I tear from my fingers the jewels which are the blood and tears of my fellow-men; I wash the paint from my face, and from my head and my bosom I take the silly feathers and ribbons. I dare to be what I am. I dare to speak truth in a world of lies. I dare to deal honestly with men and women."

"Before me sit young men of the working class. I say to you: Love honest women. Do not love harlots, nor imitators of harlots. Do not admire the idle women of the ruling class, nor those who ape them, and thereby glorify them. Do not admire languid limbs and pouting lips and the signs of haughtiness and vanity, your own enslavements."

DO NOT think that I am come to bring you ease and comfort; I am come to bring strife and discontent to this world. For the time of martyrdom draws near, and from your Father alone can you draw the strength to endure your trials. You are hungry, but you will be starved; you are prisoned in mills and mines, but you will be walled up in dungeons; you are beaten with whips, but you will be beaten with clubs, your flesh will be torn by bullets, your skin will be burned with fire and your lungs poisoned with deadly gases—such is the dominion of this world. But I say to you, resist in your hearts, and none can conquer you, for in the hearts of men lie the past and the future, and there is no power but love.

"You say: The world is evil, and men are base; why should I die for them? Oh, ye of little faith, how many have died for you, and would you cheat mankind? If there is to be goodness in the world, someone must begin; who will begin with me?"

"My brothers: I am come to lead you into the way of justice. I bid you follow not in passion and blind excitement, but as men firm in heart and bent upon service. For the way of self-love is easy, while the way of justice is hard. But some will follow, and their numbers will grow; for the lives of men have grown ill beyond enduring, and there must be a new birth of the spirit. Think upon my message; I shall speak to you again, and the compulsion of my law will rest upon you. The powers of this world come to an end, but the power of goodwill is everlasting, and the body can sooner escape from its own shadow than mankind can escape from brotherhood."

He ceased, and a strange thing happened. Half the crowd rose to its feet; and they cried, "Go on!" Twice he tried to retire to his seat, but they cried, "Go on, go on!" Said he, "My brothers, this is not my meeting, there are other speakers—" But they cried, "We want to hear you!" He answered, "You have your policies to decide, and your leaders must have their say. But I will speak to you again tomorrow. I am told that your city permits street speaking on Western City Street on Sundays. In the morning I am going to church, to see how they worship my Father in this city of many mobs; but at noon I shall hold a meeting on the corner of Fifth and Western City Streets. Now I ask you to excuse me, for I am weary." He stood for a moment, and I saw that his eyes were dark and hollow with fatigue, and drops of sweat stood upon his forehead.

He turned and left the platform, and Old Joe and I hurried around to join him. We found him with Korwsky, the little Russian tailor whose son he had healed. Korwsky claimed him to spend the night at his home. I asked Carpenter to what church he was going in the morning, and he startled me by the reply, "St. Bartholomew's." I promised that I would surely be on hand, and then Old Joe and I set out to walk home.

"Well?" said I. "What do you think of him?"

The ex-center-rush walked for a bit before he answered, "You know, Billy boy," said he, "we do lead rotten useless lives."

"Good Lord!" I thought; it was the first sign of a soul I had ever noted in Old Joe! "Why," I argued, "you sell paper, and that's useful, isn't it?"

"I don't know whether it is or not. Look at what's printed on it—mostly advertisements and bunk." And again we walked for a bit. "By the way," said the ex-center-rush, "before he got through, I saw that aura, or whatever you call it. I guess I'm getting nutty, too!"

THE FIRST thing I did on Sunday morning was to pick up the Western City Times, to see what it had done to Carpenter. I found that he had achieved the front page, triple column, with streamer head all the way across the page:

PROPHET IN TOWN HEALS SICK, RAVES AT RICH, AMERICA IS MOBLAND, ALLEGED IN RED RIOT OF TALK

There followed a half-page story about Carpenter's strenuous day in Western City, beginning with a "Bolshevik stump-speech" to a mob of striking tailors. It appeared that the prophet had gone to the Hebrew quarter of the city, and finding a woman railing at a butcher because of alleged extortion had begun a speech, inciting a mob, so that the police reserves had to be called out, and a riot was narrowly averted. From there the prophet had gone to the Labor Temple, announcing himself to the reporters as "fresh from God," with a message to "Mobland." He had then healed a sick boy, the performance being carefully staged in front of moving picture cameras.

The account of the Times did not directly charge that the performance was a "movie stunt," but it described it in a mocking way which made it obviously that. The paper mentioned T-S in such a way as to indicate him as the originator of the scheme and it had fun with Mary Magna pawning her paste jewels.

Carpenter's speech at the labor meeting branded him a "Bolshevik." You can imagine what the public said and did when the strange visitor got that reputation. See Hearst's International for September, ready August 20th member anybody which is so blonde for one of our people."

Montague Glass's Funniest Story—Continued from page 18

No Cards

"It runs in my family," Mrs. Wittkowsky replied. "Me and my sister was like a couple of Swedes already, and Goldie here is the same way. She don't use nothing but once in a while a little ammonia in the water on her hair."

"Then it's natural, that hair which you got it?" Uncle Ellis said.

"Ain't you gallant?" Mrs. Wittkowsky said. "What do you think—we used peroxide yet?"

Uncle Ellis was about to say that as far as he was concerned, she could use electroplating, when it suddenly occurred to him that it wouldn't sound right to talk that way, and since it was the first time in his life that he had ever stopped to consider before saying anything, this moment of hesitation marked a turning point in Uncle Ellis's career. Immediately thereafter, he did what, for Ellis November, was a most startling thing. He took Mrs. Wittkowsky's plump hand in both of his and patted it tenderly.

"Such an idea would never enter my head in a hundred years," he said, and at once reflected that this was no way to break off Cyril's engagement. Not having held a lady's hand in many decades, if in fact ever, he found it much easier to hold on than to let go, and at last Mrs. Wittkowsky withdrew it gently of her own accord and let it rest in her lap.

"GOLDIE LEBEN," she said, "the chicken is already to put over for lunch. It should ought to cook slow."

Goldie nodded and left the room with the breakfast tray.

"She's a good girl," Mrs. Wittkowsky said with a tremulous sigh, "and why she should act this way now, I don't know."

"Act what way?" Uncle Ellis asked.

Mrs. Wittkowsky shrugged.

"Why, you know as well as I do, Mr. November," she said, "that boy is in no position to get married, and he never will be, neither—a good-looking Schlemiel like that, you understand."

Uncle Ellis eyed her suspiciously. He was beginning to think that he had been shamelessly tricked when of a sudden genuine tears began to course their way down Mrs. Wittkowsky's cheeks.

"For God's sakes, Mr. November," she said, "couldn't you do nothing? My daughter is making good money now. She's got talent and everything, but it's only a matter of a few years, and she wouldn't be able to get such a salary no more."

She laid her hand on his arm.

"You got to excuse me that I am talking this way," she continued, "but I want to see Goldie that she should settle down and marry a decent, respectable young man that could give her a home and everything. Cyril is all right—but you know as well as I do, Mr. November, what future has he got for himself anyway?"

The expression on November's face changed from suspicion to amazement.

"You mean you don't want your daughter to marry my nephew?" he exclaimed not crediting his senses.

"Don't misunderstand me, Mr. November," she said. "It ain't that I got objections to his family or anything. Personally, I like him, and I hope he does well and everything, so I tell you what I would do, Mr. November; I got in savings bank a little money—not much, y'understand, but if you would got any influence over the boy and could persuade him he should go out West or somewhere and leave my daughter alone, I would stake him to a thousand dollars so he should start a little business. Now, what do you say, Mr. November?"

FOR another few seconds, Uncle Ellis looked earnestly at her. As the mother of an actress, he reflected, it was barely possible that Mrs. Wittkowsky was doing a little acting on her own account. At last, he became convinced of her genuineness.

"And supposing I had myself a little money," he said. "Would that make any difference to you or your daughter?"

Mrs. Wittkowsky shrugged her shoulders lightly at the suggestion.

"It ain't a question of money, Mr. November," Mrs. Wittkowsky protested. "It don't make no difference to my daughter how much money you say you've got. All she wants is to marry your nephew and she would work her fingers to the bone with two shows a day to support him if necessary—so crazy is she about him—a brainless Schlemiel like that, without sense, without gumption, without nothing. Just a wax figure he is—that's all."

Uncle Ellis raised himself from the pillow and assumed as much dignity as anyone could assume who lacked a collar and necktie and whose shoulders were draped in a lady's duvetine walking coat.

"All right, Mrs. Wittkowsky," he declared. "You've said enough about my nephew, which maybe I have got money, and maybe I ain't, but my nephew is my nephew, and I ain't going to lay here and listen to such remarks. I tell you that."

"But, Mr. November," she pleaded, "if you had a daughter like Goldie, not only good-looking but a good housekeeper, would you want her to marry a no-account young feller like your nephew?"

"And what would you say if I was to tell you, Mrs. Wittkowsky, that when I was his age, I was the spitting image of my nephew?" Uncle Ellis retorted, and Mrs. Wittkowsky shrugged her shoulders.

"Well," she said, "of course, for a man your age—and no doubt you had a lot of trouble, although certainly I never seen you except this once, which when you are feeling more like yourself, Mr. November, maybe you look different, but it ain't fair to judge a man that has just had a fainting spell and everything."

Uncle Ellis flapped one hand feebly.

"Looks I ain't talking about at all," he said. "In the real estate business looks don't get you nowheres, and I left off caring how I looked thirty-five years ago already when my wife died."

Up the Saguenay River "Niagara to the Sea"

The most satisfying trip in America for health and recreation. Almost 1,000 miles of lakes, rivers, and rapids, including the Thousand Islands, the exciting descent of the marvelous rapids, the historic associations of Montreal, Quebec with its famous miracle-working shrine of Ste. Anne de Beaupré and the renowned Saguenay River with its stupendous Capes "Trinity" and "Eternity," higher than Gibraltar.

Send 2c postage for illustrated booklet, map and guide, to John F. Pierce, Pass. Traffic Mgr., Canada Steamship Lines, Ltd., 200 C. S. L. Building, Montreal, Canada.

CANADA STEAMSHIP LINES

A Thousand Miles of Travel
A Thousand Thrills of Pleasure

WHITING-ADAMS BRUSHES

USED BY THE
U. S. ARMY AND NAVY

Used By RAILROAD AND STEAMSHIP COMPANIES

Used by Manufacturers of CARS, AUTOMOBILES, CARRIAGES

There are actually several million persons in the United States who are continually using Whiting-Adams Brushes.

Send for Illustrated Literature
JOHN L. WHITING-J. J. ADAMS CO.
Boston, U. S. A.
Brush Manufacturers for Over 113 Years and the Largest in the World

AGENTS-$5 to $15 DAILY

Introducing NEW STYLE GUARANTEED HOSIERY—latest modes and shades—Nude, camel, silver, etc. Big Profits. Repeat orders bring you regular income. You write orders—WE DELIVER AND COLLECT. Experience unnecessary. J. R. Sutton made $14.60 first day. Lee Higgins $21.45 first day (Sworn proof furnished). You should do as well. Outfits contain all colors and grades including full fashioned silks.

MAC-O-CHEE MILLS CO. Desk 908, Cincinnati, Ohio

FILMS DEVELOPED
Mail us 20c with any size film for development and 6 velvet prints. Or send 6 negatives any size and 20c for 6 prints. Prompt service. Roanoke Photo Finishing Co., 330 Bell Ave., Roanoke, Va.

Salesmen
Sell our wonderful tailored to order, $28.50, virgin wool suits and o'costs direct to wearer—all one price—$20.00 cheaper than store prices. You keep deposit. Everything guaranteed. Big swatch outfit free; protected territory for hustlers.
J. B. SIMPSON, Inc., Dept. 127, 851 W. Adams St., Chicago

"Then you was also married once," Mrs. Wittkowsky said.

"For not quite a year," Uncle Ellis said.

"Nebich!" Mrs. Wittkowsky exclaimed.

"And after that," Uncle Ellis continued, "well—you know how it is. You are a widow yourself."

Mrs. Wittkowsky nodded. Her tears began to flow anew, and therewith for the next few hours both of them forgot their differences in recounting the details of the two illnesses which had terminated their respective marital happiness.

In this fashion, the morning passed so rapidly and pleasantly that before Mrs. Wittkowsky had exhausted her recollection of the names and addresses, residential and business, of those who had attended her late husband's funeral, Goldie was at the door with Uncle Ellis's lunch. It consisted principally of paprika chicken with Knackerl, and in spite of what the doctor had advised, Uncle Ellis had three helpings of it. Later he topped it off with two portions of apple strudel, containing not only apples, but raisins and blanched almonds, to say nothing of the hard sauce.

ALMOST immediately afterwards, he fell asleep and when he woke up at five o'clock, he felt so much better that he insisted on going home at once.

"But supposing you should have one of them spells again?" Mrs. Wittkowsky protested, with concern.

"I ain't never had one of them spells before," Uncle Ellis said, "and I ain't never going to have no more of them."

He buttoned the neckband of his shirt and started to put on his collar and tie, but not being accustomed to tying neckties in the presence of ladies, he fumbled with it rather awkwardly in front of the mirror over Mrs. Wittkowsky's bureau.

"Here, let me do that for you," she said, and before Uncle Ellis realized what was happening, he was standing meekly with his chin raised while Mrs. Wittkowsky made a neat bow out of his rusty black tie.

"I ain't done such a thing in fifteen years," she said.

"And I ain't had it done for me in thirty-five," Uncle Ellis replied.

"You both act quite natural over it," Goldie remarked, and it was on the tip of Uncle Ellis's tongue to say that women were never too old for such meises when, for the second time that day, he found himself hesitating on the score of politeness, and instead he merely grinned.

"She ties a good-looking bow—I'll say that for her," he said.

"And now how about coming here Sunday afternoon?" Goldie asked abruptly.

Mrs. Wittkowsky gazed at him anxiously as she waited for him to answer.

"Well, I'll tell you," Uncle Ellis said, "I'd like to talk the thing over first. That's what I came for today—but—but—well, I didn't get a chance."

"But what's there to talk over?" Goldie asked, looking puzzled.

"Never mind!" Mrs. Wittkowsky interrupted. "He's got a right to talk it over if he wants to, ain't he?"

"Suppose I come here again tomorrow some time," Uncle Ellis suggested. "I'll be up around noon."

He took his hat and hesitated for a moment at the door.

"And I must say I am much obliged for all you done for me," he said. "I put you to a whole lot of trouble, and—well, anyhow, I'll be here around noon, or maybe a little afterwards."

An hour later when he entered his apartment on One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Street, Miss Rossmeyer came out of the kitchen followed by an odor of cooking which Uncle Ellis immediately recognized as gedamfte Kalbfleisch slightly scorched.

"T'phooee!" he exclaimed with disgust. "Shut that door."

"Say!" Miss Rossmeyer cried, "people was ringing you up all day trying to get ahold of you. Where was you anyway?"

"Never mind where I was," Uncle Ellis replied. "Throw that stuff out and make for me two poached eggs and some decent toast and coffee."

He hung up his hat and coat and walked into the parlor, followed by the indignant Miss Rossmeyer.

"What do you mean—throw that out? What comes over you lately, Uncle Ellis?" she said. "I don't understand you at all."

Uncle Ellis sat down and favored his niece with a malignant glare.

"Sure you don't understand me," he retorted. "You think that instead of a human being, I'm a garbage can. That ain't food what you are cooking there. That's—that's—soapmakers' supplies."

He opened the evening paper as though dismissing the subject, and then thought better of it.

"Furthermore, you shouldn't kid yourself, Selina," he said. "The hair ain't dyed—neither one of 'em."

WHEN Uncle Ellis rang Mrs. Wittkowsky's doorbell the following day, shortly after noon, he had come to no decision as to the stand he ought to take with respect to Cyril's engagement. He could not make up his mind whether to oppose it on general principles or favor it out of family pride. Of one thing, however, he was certain, and that was that he intended to eat at least one more of Mrs. Wittkowsky's exceptionally good luncheons.

He was fortified in that resolution by Selina's coffee which had been particularly poisonous that morning. Furthermore, she had attempted a hash out of the previous evening's gedamfte Kalbfleisch whose odor alone had been sufficient to abort Uncle Ellis's appetite for breakfast, so that he had left the house with nothing to stay his stomach but a half a teaspoonful of bicarbonate of soda in a tumbler full of lukewarm water.

He was therefore prepared to eat Mrs. Wittkowsky's luncheon first, and discuss the impending marriage afterwards, but this was not to be, for as soon as she opened the door it was obvious that in her present condition she was too disturbed mentally to serve as much as a bowl of crackers and milk. Her eyes were red with weeping, and her lower lip trembled piteously as she greeted Uncle Ellis.

"Well, Mr. November," she said, "it's no use. She wouldn't listen to me at all."

She led the way into the parlor and sinking down on the sofa proceeded at once to water its satin pillows with her tears. It might be supposed that Uncle Ellis was entirely unmoved by this spectacle, but strangely enough he found himself profoundly affected by Mrs. Wittkowsky's tears. In fact, to Uncle Ellis, they were no more like Miss Rossmeyer's tears than Mrs. Wittkowsky's coffee was like Miss Rossmeyer's coffee, and so he was moved to take her hand in consolation.

"Listen, Mrs. Wittkowsky," he said. "You'll make yourself sick. After all, your daughter has got to get married some time to somebody, and the whole thing is a gamble anyway. Many a woman has got married to a business man with a good business, and along comes a couple of rotten seasons, y'understand, and what is it? Am I right or wrong?"

He began unconsciously to pat Mrs. Wittkowsky's hand. It was a singularly plump, white hand for a woman of her age who did such excellent cooking.

"In fact," he continued, almost in spite of himself, "the only safe bet for a woman is to marry somebody who has got his money in something which ain't affected by business conditions like improved real property, or good real estate first mortgage loans, up to sixty percent of a conservative appraisal, y'understand."

Mrs. Wittkowsky nodded mournfully.

"But where is a girl like Goldie, which has got no dowry except what she has saved herself, going to find such a man, Mr. November?" she asked, and at that vital moment, there came from the kitchen a strong odor of cooking. Uncle Ellis had not smelled it in thirty years, but he recognized it nevertheless. It was brown stewed fish, sweet and sour, and had it been nitrous oxide gas, it could not have more potently confused his senses.

"About Goldie, I ain't talking about at all," he said. "Goldie is young and Cyril is young, and they got their whole lives before them, Mrs. Wittkowsky, but you and me, we ain't so young no longer."

"Why, Mr. November," Mrs. Wittkowsky said, "what do you mean?"

"Listen, Mrs. Wittkowsky," Uncle Ellis said, "when Goldie gets married, you are going to be an awful lonely woman—as lonely as I am now. You wouldn't have nobody to take care of you, and you wouldn't have nobody to take care of."

By this time, Mrs. Wittkowsky was sitting bolt upright on the sofa, and it seemed to Uncle Ellis that she moved almost imperceptibly as though making room for someone to sit beside her. At any rate, Uncle Ellis thought he perceived such a movement and accepted the implied invitation. It was more than five minutes before either of them spoke.

"Don't be afraid that I couldn't give you a good home and everything," he said at last as he passed his arm around her ample waist. "This year, with everything I could deduct that it was possible to deduct, I paid an income tax on pretty near eighteen thousand dollars."

On the following day, Uncle Ellis visited the office of Sam Fischelmann.

"Well, Fischelmann," he said, "I suppose you seen it the announcement in the paper, about Cyril's engagement?"

Fischelmann nodded. "And I suppose you want to change your will."

"You suppose right."

"And no doubt you want to leave everything to your niece," Fischelmann said.

"Now you are supposing wrong," Uncle Ellis declared, and Fischelmann suddenly turned away his head to hide the shock.

"Then what do you want to do?" he asked, with such bogus nonchalance that it deceived Uncle Ellis not at all.

"Don't be scared, Fischelmann," he assured him. "I know all about your schemes with my niece, and I wouldn't do nothing to stop you. All that I want from you is to marry her quick and get her and her cooking out of my house."

"Why, what's the matter with her cooking?" Fischelmann asked.

"Maybe for a husband, she would cook all right, but it don't agree so good with an uncle," Ellis November said. "So therefore, Fischelmann, do what I tell you, and draw my will this way:

"All my property I leave for life to my beloved wife, and when she dies, it goes in equal shares to my niece and my nephew."

Fischelmann sat back in his chair and stared incredulously at Uncle Ellis.

"What's the matter with you?" he asked. "Are you sick or something? Your wife has been dead over thirty years."

Peter Van Antwerp looked such a boob letting the card sharps take his two thousand. As if that weren't enough he demanded another little play—and it turned out to be some little game. See "Each According to His Lights," in Hearst's International for September, ready August 20th.

The Nightmare Room

Conan Doyle's Story of the Unexpected End—Continued from page 10

should have seen this—he should have understood it. It was on him that the responsibility lay.

His heart softened towards her as it would to a little child that was in helpless trouble. For a time he had paced the room in silence, his lips compressed, his hands clenched till his nails had marked his palms. Now with a sudden movement, he sat beside her and took her cold and inert hand in his.

"You shall choose between us, dear," he said. "If really you are sure—sure you know—that Campbell could make you happy I may not be the obstacle."

"A divorce!" she gasped.

His hand closed upon the bottle of poison. "You can call it that," said he.

A new strange light shone in her eyes as she looked at him.

"Archie," she cried, "you could forgive me even that?"

He smiled at her. "You are only a little wayward kiddie, after all."

Her arms were outstretched to him when there was a tap at the door and the maid entered in the strange silent fashion in which all things moved in that room. There was a card on the tray.

"Captain Campbell! I will not see him."

Mason sprang to his feet.

"On the contrary, he is most welcome. Show him up this instant."

A FEW minutes later a tall, sunburned young soldier was ushered into the room. He came forward with a smile upon his pleasant features, but as the door closed behind him and the faces before him resumed their natural expressions, he paused irresolutely.

"Well?" he asked.

Mason stepped forward and laid his hand upon his shoulder.

"I bear no ill will," he said.

"Ill will?"

"Yes, I know all. But I might have done the same myself had the position

"That wife has," Uncle Ellis replied, "but the lady what I am leaving my property to now hasn't been dead yet or don't expect to be. So therefore you should please describe her in the will as my beloved wife, Sarah November, nee Mrs. Sarah Wittkowsky."

He smiled derisively at Fischelmann.

"Yes, Fischelmann, that was a great idea you and Selina had it. You thought you and her would get away with all my property, didn't you?" he said. "But you ain't going to. All you get is half, and you've got a good long wait ahead of you for that much even, because with the way my Sarah cooks, her and me ain't going to die for a number of years yet, Fischelmann."

He whacked his derby hat on his head.

"And by that time," he concluded, "all you get out of my estate you will earn ten times over, in indigestion alone."

been reversed," Mason quietly told him.

Campbell stepped back and looked a question at the lady. She nodded and shrugged her shoulders. Mason smiled.

"You need not fear that it is a trap for a confession. We have had a frank talk upon the matter. See, Jack, you were always a sportsman. Here's a bottle. Never mind how it came here. If one or the other of us drinks it, it will clear the situation." His manner was wild, almost delirious. "Lucille, which shall it be?"

THERE HAD been a strange force at work in the nightmare room. A third man was there, though not one of the three, who stood in the crisis of their life's drama, had time or thought for him. How long he had been there—how much he had heard—none could say. In the corner farthest from the little group, he was crouched against the wall, a sinister snake-like figure, silent and scarcely moving save for a nervous twitching of his clenched right hand. Intent, watching eagerly every new phase of the drama.

"Are you game, Jack?" asked Mason.

The soldier nodded.

"No, no!" cried the woman.

Mason had uncorked the bottle, and turning to the side table he drew out a pack of cards.

"We can't put the responsibility on her," he said. "Come, Jack, the best of three."

The soldier approached the table. He fingered the fatal cards. The woman, leaning upon her hand, bent her face forward and stared with fascinated eyes.

Then and only then the bolt fell.

The stranger had risen, pale and grave. All three were suddenly aware of his presence. They faced him with eager inquiry in their eyes. He looked at them with something of the master in his bearing.

"How is it?" they asked all together.

"Rotten!" he answered. "Rotten! We'll shoot the whole scene again tomorrow."

Sani-Flush

Cleans Closet Bowls Without Scouring

Use Sani-Flush and save yourself the labor, unpleasantness and danger of cleaning your closet bowl by old-fashioned or half-way methods.

Sani-Flush cannot injure the bowl or connections. And it cleans thoroughly, removing discolorations, incrustations and odors from both the bowl and the otherwise inaccessible trap. Always keep Sani-Flush handy in your bathroom.

Sani-Flush is sold at grocery, drug, hardware, plumbing and house-furnishing stores. If you cannot buy it locally at once, send 25c in coin or stamps for a full sized can, postpaid. (Canadian price, 35c; foreign price, 50c.)

THE HYGIENIC PRODUCTS CO.
Canton, Ohio

Canadian Agents
Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd., Toronto

DR. EASENWEIN

Short-Story Writing

A Course of Forty Lessons, taught by Dr. J. Burg Easenwein, Editor of The Writer's Monthly. One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time. Hundreds are selling right along to the leading magazines and the best producing companies. Also courses in Play Writing, Photoplay Writing, Verification, Journalism, etc.

150-Page illustrated catalogue free. Please Address

The Home Correspondence School
Dept. 205 Springfield, Mass.
ESTABLISHED 1897 INCORPORATED 1904

Cuticura Soap

—IS IDEAL—

For the Hands

Soap, Ointment, Talcum, etc. everywhere. For samples address: Cuticura Laboratories, Dept. D, Malden, Mass.

The Play of the Month—Continuing from page 95—Walter Hackett's Melodramatic Comedy

Captain Applejack

woman I seek is here. I mean to search this house until I find her. (Turns away)

AMBROSE (taking revolver from under papers on desk)—Pardon me, but you are not. You are going now.

BOROLSKY (his hands up)—Very well, I will go. Do you mind if I have a cigarette? (In getting and lighting a cigarette, he catches Ambrose off his guard and seizes the revolver.) Now will you tell me where she is?

AMBROSE—It isn't loaded. My motto is safety first. (Lush enters.) Lush, show Mr. Borolsky the door.

BOROLSKY (puts revolver back on table)—Thank you so much, and good night. We shall see each other again soon. I shall make a point of it. (Goes out)

AMBROSE—Most unpleasant fellow.

ANNA again joins him. During their short conversation, Ambrose thinks he is experiencing the symptoms of love at first sight. Poppy appears. She is, of course, jealous of Anna but thrilled at the recital of Ambrose's daring. In the end, Anna agrees to stay all night as it is not safe for her to go out. So at last peace settles down upon the house.

Then into the darkened room, through the unlatched window, come Mr. and Mrs. Pengard. They go straight to the secret panel and try to open it, but while working at the panel, Pengard drops his jimmy with a crash, and, fearful of being discovered, the two leave hastily.

They are scarcely gone, when Ambrose and Poppy appear. When they find the open window, he is really alarmed. Next they find the half-open secret panel and they at once examine it. Out of its depth they draw an old sheet of parchment. Upon reading it, Ambrose discovers that his family was founded by a notorious pirate, Captain Applejack, who changed his name to Applejohn. The parchment tells of a treasure hidden in the house.

AMBROSE—They will return, Poppy. Telephone the police station and tell them to send some men here quick.

POPPY (at telephone)—Hello, hello, hello.

AMBROSE—Can't you get them? Let me try. (Takes the 'phone) Hello—Hello—Poppy, the wire is dead! It has been cut!

UNABLE to get help, there was nothing for Ambrose to do but sit up and keep guard. Poppy remained, and as they waited she read to him from the parchment:

"And off the island of Escanaba, we captured the Portuguese Brigantine Faraleone—her crew put up a gallant fight, but we killed all hands save one—a woman—the daughter of the captain, a haughty wench, but comely."

As his ward reads, Ambrose falls asleep. Poppy wakes him by turning on the alarm clock which she had brought down to keep her guardian awake. Then she suggests that coffee might help so she goes to get it. In vain Ambrose fights against sleep. He dreams he is Captain Applejack and has just come into the possession of a great quantity of rare jewels. In his dream, Borolsky appears as the mate of his ship and Poppy as the cabin boy.

AMBROSE (sees Borolsky)—So you are still there, my mate, are you?

BOROLSKY—Still here, Captain.

AMBROSE—Boy, boy, fetch me some grog, blast ye.

POPPY (off stage)—Aye, aye, Captain.

AMBROSE—Hell, stir your stumps. (To Borolsky) Well, are you deaf, man?

BOROLSKY (sulking)—No.

AMBROSE—Then you heard me order you on deck with the crew? I'll have no insubordination aboard my craft. Hark ye, mate, I am a mild man—and timid, lovin' peace and adverse to brawlin', d'you see?—but if you don't go at once, I'll cut your black heart out, blast ye. (Borolsky goes.) Scum, scum!

POPPY (enters with grog)—Here's your grog, Captain.

AMBROSE—Give it here (drinks). Warm-in' to the innards, d'you see!

POPPY—Aye, aye, sir.

AMBROSE (as men pass cabin's window) Bustle along, ye lily-livered lubbers, blast ye! Scum! (He takes out chest of jewels from secret cabinet.) Feast your eyes, boy. It's the booty I captured from the Portuguese Brigantine.

POPPY—Blow me tight! Captain, an' I whisper a word to you, you'll not beat me?

AMBROSE—Nay, lad, 'tis my pleasure always to be kindly. Say on.

POPPY—The crew—they know of this treasure. The crew says an' ye do not share with them, they will rise against you. You will not brave them?

AMBROSE—Aye, that I will—timid as I am—d'you see—and hatin' trouble, I'll face them single-handed. What I have, I keep. Now, lad, go tell the bosun to fetch hither the Portuguese woman we captured on the Brigantine. I am in mood for dalliance.

ANNA, as the Portuguese woman in Ambrose's dream, is brought in and old Captain Applejack tries to win her confidence but only succeeds in so enraging her that she tries to murder him. Borolsky, who wants both the woman and the treasure, heads a mutiny. At last, as the crew hesitates between him and Borolsky, Applejack says they'll cut cards, the winner to get all including the woman and the loser to die.

AMBROSE (producing cards)—Here are three decks. The high man wins, two best out of three. Cut!

BOROLSKY (cuts)—The Knave!

AMBROSE (cuts)—The ten!

BOROLSKY (cuts again)—The queen! The black queen!

AMBROSE (cuts)—The ace! Now we are even. (Borolsky frightened tries to escape. The crew, led by a big negro, throw him back to the table.) Cut—you mincing sea-louse—cut the cards at once, I say.

BOROLSKY (cuts)—The king! The king!

AMBROSE (cuts)—The ace! (Borolsky is seized by the crew.) Take him away, men. Let pirate justice be done. (lets cards fall from his hand one at a time) Aces, all aces, d'you see!

AMBROSE is still dreaming when Poppy returns with the coffee. He cannot believe that his recent experience has been a dream. During the remainder of the play, Ambrose frequently lapses into the choice phraseology of Captain Applejack.

His talk with Poppy is interrupted. The lights are extinguished and a moment later someone glides into the room. When the lights flash up, they find it is Anna. She tells a plausible story about wakefulness induced by her fear of Borolsky. She has come down to find a safe place to hide her jewels. Ambrose shows her the secret cupboard and puts her jewel box in it. The jewels are barely hidden when Borolsky, accompanied by a policeman, returns. At Anna's request, Ambrose leaves the three alone.

Then the three appear in their true characters of burglars in search of the parchment and the treasure. They are interrupted by the entrance, through the window, of the charming Pengards. The two groups of robbers reach an agreement to split the treasure, but it can't be found. Anna agrees to vamp Ambrose and get the parchment.

Anna, left alone, calls in Ambrose, and tries to steal the parchment from his pocket. Enraged, she warns him: "Some men can resist money—some men can resist women—no man can resist a gun. I'll give you ten minutes to think it over," and she disappears through the window as Poppy comes running in.

POPPY—Ambrose, Ambrose! There are some men in the garden. They're coming here for you. Ambrose, no matter what happens, I'll stand by you.

AMBROSE (under the influence of his dream)—Brave lad, brave lad! I love ye. (Recovering himself) You don't seem frightened, Poppy. You're wonderful!

POPPY—Of course, I'm not. It's only because you are here.

AMBROSE—Poppy, you are wonderful.

POPPY—Ambrose, you never said anything like that to me before.

AMBROSE—Well, I don't see how I overlooked it.

POPPY—But after you're gone away—

AMBROSE—I'm not going away.

POPPY—Ambrose, then you are not going out into the world to find romance?

AMBROSE—No. To think that what I've always longed for has been at my side all the time and I didn't see it. I always thought of you as my ward. I never—

POPPY—S-s-s-sh!

AMBROSE—(He crosses to the table.)—Poppy, my revolver is gone! Did you have Lush called?

POPPY—Yes; he's watching the front door and cook is at the scullery window.

Lush hurries in to tell them there is a man coming up the drive. Armed with the coal shovel, Ambrose prepares to give the intruder a warm welcome. The precaution turns out to be unnecessary as the visitor is his friend, Jason. He explains that the parchment is a fake—one that he himself had prepared and hidden in the house in order to give the place an air of romance and so make easier the selling. He obtained a similar parchment from an old retainer of the Applejohn family and had merely copied it. He then produces the real parchment and Ambrose finds there is writing under the seal.

AMBROSE (reading)—“To the one who has the wit to find this message”—that’s me—“go to the southeast room overlooking the cliffs”—that’s this room—“and stand with your back against the secret cupboard where the secret parchment was hid. Turn a semicircle to the left. Take four paces forward. Face due north. And the treasure is within your grasp.” (opens panel)—There’s no treasure here.

POPPY (searching cupboard)—No, there’s nothing here. Wait a minute. Here’s a loose brick—(As she moves brick the wall falls out disclosing secret hiding place.)

JASON—Look at the bags!

AMBROSE—See, there is the treasure!

POPPY—Ambrose, they’re pearls.

AMBROSE—S-s-sh! I hear somebody.

At Ambrose’s suggestion then, Jason goes out to rouse the coast-guards and bring help. Poppy then gives a new warning:

POPPY—Oh, Ambrose, there is a man got through the scullery window.

AMBROSE—What has become of cook? (Pengard enters) Well?

BOROLSKY (At the same moment he has come through the window.)—We have come for the parchment. Give it up.

AMBROSE—You must give me time.

BOROLSKY—So that your friend who slipped away just now can bring assistance?

AMBROSE—Then he did get away.

BOROLSKY (threatening him with revolver)—Yes, but he won’t be back in time. Give me that parchment.

AMBROSE—I don’t remember where I’ve hidden it.

BOROLSKY—Come, Applejohn, give in.

AMBROSE—Very well, I will give it to you (crosses to book shelves—stops). I must have put it in my pocket. (Hands parchment to Borolsky)

BOROLSKY (examining it)—This is a fake. Look at the water-mark—1920.

PENGARD (as the telephone rings)—They’ve mended the telephone.

AMBROSE (at telephone)—Yes, Jason come quick. They are here.

BOROLSKY—Put that ‘phone down.

AMBROSE—Too late, Borolsky.

BOROLSKY—I’ll kill him, so help me. (Pengard drags him out.)

AMBROSE—So perish all who cross me path.

POPPY—Oh, Ambrose, to think that the telephone was repaired in time.

AMBROSE—But it hasn’t been repaired.

POPPY—But the bell? I heard it—

AMBROSE—That wasn’t the telephone.

POPPY—What was it then?

AMBROSE (takes out the alarm clock and starts it ringing)—Aces—all aces!

[Curtain]

AROUND THE WORLD

by Specially Chartered

CUNARD LINE NEW STEAMSHIP

“SAMARIA”

A CRUISE DE LUXE

Strictly Limited to 400 Guests

Jan. 24th to May 31st, 1923. Sailing Eastward from New York

THIS magnificent Golden Jubilee Cruise will commemorate the 50th year since Thomas Cook, the founder of our organization, conducted his first party around the world.

For over four months our guests will travel amidst the wonderful sights and sites along the Seven Seas—a Cruise covering 30,000 miles.

A superb itinerary embracing—Madeira, Gibraltar, Algiers, Naples, Port Said, Cairo and the Pyramids; Bombay, Ceylon, Calcutta, and other towns in India; Rangoon in Burma, Belawan in Sumatra; Batavia in Java; Singapore in the Straits; Saigon in French Indo-China; Manila, Hongkong, Canton, Macao, Shanghai; Nagasaki, Kobe, Yokohama; Honolulu and Waikiki; San Francisco, Balboa, Panama Canal and Cristobal.

Most attractive shore excursions and entertainment aboard. No crowding, no rushing, no confusion.

This will truly be an epic holiday of luxury, wonder and leisure.

Full Information and Literature on request

THOS. COOK & SON

245 Broadway

New York

561 Fifth Ave.

BOSTON
PHILADELPHIA

CHICAGO
SAN FRANCISCO

LOS ANGELES
MONTREAL

TORONTO
VANCOUVER

THE Book to Take to the Country This Summer:

The WILD HEART

By

EMMA-LINDSAY
SQUIER

with a 10-page introduction by

Gene
Stratton-Porter

Illustrations by
PAUL BRANSOM

“The Wild Heart,” says Father C. F. McGinness in The Catholic Bulletin, “is as clean as a hound’s tooth and as refreshing as a breeze from the ocean at sundown. We heartily recommend this book to every school, college, man, woman and child who appreciates Nature at her best and humor at its most whimsical.”

WITH dozens of marginal decorations and large illustrations by Bransom, and with Mrs. Porter’s remarkable introduction (which alone would be worth printing in booklet form), “The Wild Heart” belongs in every library and makes a wonderful gift book for anybody who will be near nature this summer.

Wherever good books are sold
$2.00

Cosmopolitan Book Corporation
Publishers

119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y.

Order your copy today
$2.00

Book of the Month—Continuing from page 99—Harry Leon Wilson's

Merton of the Movies

From Gray Hair and middle-aged appearance to the attractiveness of youth in 15 minutes.

Inecto Rapid is the discovery of Dr. Emile, Pasteur Institute, Paris, and differs from all other hair colorings because it repigmentizes the hair shaft instead of only coating the surface. It is specifically guaranteed to color gray, faded or streaked hair to its original shade in fifteen minutes. The color is absolutely permanent and so natural it cannot be detected from nature even under a microscope. It cannot injure the hair or interfere with growth and is not affected by sunshine, salt water, shampooing, perspiration, Turkish Baths and does not prevent permanent waving. 97% of the best European hairdressers use it as well as the finest American parlors. Thousands of women apply it in the privacy of their own homes.

SEND NO MONEY

Write for particulars with proof and our "Beauty Analysis Chart" Form AX1. INECTO Inc., Laboratories and Demonstration Salon 33-35 West 46th Street, New York, N. Y.

Elinor Glyn says—

"Thousands who don't dream they can write really can. YOU have ideas for stories and photoplays—why don't you turn them into cash? There are just as many stories of human interest right in your own vicinity as there are in Greenwich Village or the South Sea Islands. And editors will welcome a story or photoplay from you just as quickly as from any well-known writer if your story is good enough. They will pay you well for your ideas, too—a good deal bigger money than is paid in salaries. You can accept my advice because millions of copies of my stories have been sold. My book, 'Three Weeks,' has been printed in every tongue, except Spanish. My photoplays are known to millions. I do not say this to boast, but merely to prove that you can be successful without being a 'genius.' I believe thousands of people can make money in this absorbing profession. I believe this so firmly that I am going to show YOU how easy it is when you know how. Simply write to my publishers, The Authors' Press. They will send you a handsome little book called 'The Short-Cut to Successful Writing.' This book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. No charge—no obligation. Write for it NOW." Just address Elinor Glyn's publishers: THE AUTHORS' PRESS, Dept. 169, Auburn, N. Y.

Reduce Your Flesh in Spots Arms, Legs, Bust, Double Chin

In fact the entire body or any part without dieting by wearing DR. WALTER'S

Famous Medicated Reducing RUBBER GARMENTS

For Men and Women
Anklets for reducing and Shaping the Ankles, $7.00 per pair. Extra high $9.00.
Send ankle measurement when ordering.
Bust Reducer, $2.00
Chin Reducer, $6.50
Send for Illustrated Booklet!
Dr. Jeanne O. Walter
353 Fifth Avenue - New York

PATENTS

SPECIAL OFFER Free Opinion as to Patentable Nature

Send for Record of Invention Blank and our Three Books, mailed FREE

Highest References, Prompt Attention, Reasonable Terms

VICTOR J. EVANS & CO.
PATENT ATTORNEYS

764 Ninth WASHINGTON, D. C.

movies to give the public something better and finer. It was serious business and he would tolerate no fooling with the pictures. So Flips and Baird entered into a conspiracy to use Merton in burlesque and make him think he was acting straight. Baird was the more willing to engage Merton because of a striking resemblance to a film favorite, Parmalee, whose acting the boy was, unconsciously, to burlesque.

FROM the dressing-room, arrayed in the Buck Benson outfit, unworn since that eventful day on the Gashwiler lot, Merton accompanied Baird to the set where they would work.

"I'm mighty glad to see you so sincere in your work," Baird assured Merton. "A lot of these hams I hire get to kidding on the set and spoil the atmosphere."

"Here we are; this is where we begin the Western stuff," Baird said. Merton recognized the place. It was the High Gear Dance Hall where the Montague girl had worked. The name over the door was now "The Come All Ye," and there was a hitching rack in front to which were tethered half-a-dozen saddled horses.

"First, I'll wise you up a little bit," said Baird. "You've come out here to work on a ranch in the great open spaces, and these cowboys all love you and come to town with you every time, and they'll stand by you when the detective from New York gets here. Now, let's see—I guess first we'll get your entrance."

Cameras were put into place and Merton Gill led through the front door his band of rollicking good fellows.

The scene was shot and Baird spoke again: "Hold it, everybody; go on with your music and you boys keep up the dance until Mother's entrance, then you quit and back off."

Merton was puzzled by this speech, but continued his superior look, breaking it with a very genuine shock of surprise when his old mother tottered in at the front door. She was still the disconsolate creature of the early scene in New York, shot the day before—bedraggled, sad-eyed, feeble, very aged, still she carried her bucket and the bundle of rags with which she mopped. Baird came forward.

"Oh, I forgot to tell you. Of course you had your old mother follow you out here to the great open spaces, but the poor old thing has cracked under the strain of her hard life, see what I mean?"

"You have a good home on the ranch for her, but she won't stay put. She follows you around, and the only thing that keeps her quiet is mopping, so you humor her; you let her mop. It's the only way. But of course it makes you sad. You look at her now, then go up and hug her the way you did yesterday; you try to get her to give up mopping, but she won't, so you let her go on. Try it."

Merton went forward to embrace his old mother. Here was tragedy indeed, a bit of biting pathos from a humble life.

The old lady wept—but was stubborn. She tore herself from his arms and knelt on the floor. "I just got to mop, I just got to mop," she was repeating in a cracked voice. "If I ain't let to mop, I get rough till I'm simply a scandal."

It was an affecting scene, marred only by one explosive bit of coarse laughter from an observing cowboy at the close of the old mother's speech. Merton Gill glanced up in sharp annoyance at this offender. Baird was quick in rebuke.

"The next guy that laughs at this pathos can get off the set," he announced, glaring at the assemblage. There was no further outbreak and the scene was filmed.

There followed a dramatic bit that again involved the demented mother. "This ought to be good if you can only do it the right way," began Baird. "Mother's mopping along here and sloshes some water on this Mexican's boot—where are you, Pedro? Come here and get this. The old lady sloshes water on you while you're playing monte here, so you yell 'Caramba!' or something and kick at her. You don't land on her, of course, but her son rushes up and grabs your arm—here, do it this way." Baird demonstrated. "Grab his wrist with one hand and his elbow with the other and make as if you broke his arm across your knee—you know, like you were doing joojitsey. He slinks off with his broken arm, and you just brush your hands off and embrace your mother again. Then you go back to the bar, not looking at Pedro at all, see? He's insulted your mother and you've resented it in a nice, dignified, gentlemanly way. Try it."

Pedro sat at the table and picked up his cards. He was a foul-looking Mexican and seemed capable of the enormity he was about to commit. The scene was rehearsed to Baird's satisfaction and then shot. The weeping old lady, blinded by her tears, awkward with her mop, the brutal Mexican, his prompt punishment.

The old lady was especially pathetic as she glared at her insulter from where she lay sprawled on the floor, and muttered, "Caramba, huh? I dare you to come out doors and say that to me!"

"Good work," applauded Baird when the scene was finished. "Now we're getting into the swing of it. In about three days here we'll have something that exhibitors can lean up on, see if we don't."

Three days later when they were again at work, Baird provided Merton with a pair of spurs. Baird said they were very rare old spurs. Their distinguishing feature was their size. They were enormous and their rowels extended a good twelve inches from Merton's heels after he had donned them.

The first effort to walk in them proved bothersome, indeed, for it was made over ground covered with low-growing vine and the spurs caught in this. Baird was very earnest in supervising his progress, and even demanded the presence of two cameras to record it.

Merton tried again and again, stumbling as the spurs caught in the undergrowth. The cameras closely recorded his efforts, and Baird applauded them. "You're getting it—keep on. That's better. Now try to run a few steps—go right towards that left-hand camera."

He ran the few steps but fell headlong. He picked himself up, an expression of chagrin on his face.

"Never mind," urged Baird. "We must get this right."

WITH no suspicion on Merton's part that he was appearing as a humorous character, the Buckeye Comedy film was finished. Another picture was made, Merton working at a decidedly increased salary, and under contract. Flips and Baird worked hard to keep the boy in ignorance of the real nature of his work, but they became possessed of a dread of the time when he, seeing the exhibited film, would discover their duplicity and behold himself as a comedian. Before that nerve-racking day arrived, Merton, now sure of himself and of his future, found he could not get along without Flips. So, because of his love and his gratitude, he bought her a beautiful wrist-watch and one evening at her home tried to give it to her.

THE LIGHT shone across Flips's eyes and revealed them to him, shadowy and mysterious. Her face was set in some ominous control. At last she looked away from him and began in a strained voice, "If anything happens to me—"

Merton thought it time to end this nonsense. He clutched the gift. "Sarah," he said lightly, "I've got a little something for you—see what I mean?" He thrust the package into her weakly yielding hands.

She studied it in the dusk, turning it over and over. Then with no word to him, she took it to the light and opened it.

"I never saw such a man," she exclaimed. "After all you've been through, I should think you'd have learned the value of money. And anyway it's too beautiful for me. And anyway I couldn't take it—not tonight, anyway."

"Of course, you can take it tonight," he said in masterful tones, "after all you've done for me."

"Now you sit down and listen," she ordered after a minute. "You go and see yourself in that picture tomorrow night—and then if you ever see me again you can give me this—" she put the watch in his hands. "Yes, yes, take it. I won't have it till you give it to me again."

THE NEXT night Merton saw the picture and his world rocked under him. He had given the best that was in him in the effort to make something finer and better. He had learned the lines from a film magazine, but the sentiment was his own. Here now he saw himself as a comedian in a burlesque piece. True, the audience around him roared its delighted approval and he overheard warm words of praise for himself. He heard the applause that night and at the lot next day, whither in a white passion he had gone to find Baird, he heard more praise and the nice things slowly drove home. Another company came to offer him a contract. So gradually his self-esteem stirred again. All the while he was trying to remember the name of a book and it came at last—The Tragic Comedian. That fitted. Then in desperate resignation, he went to see Flips.

He rang the Montague bell twice before, he heard a faint summons to enter.

"Hello, Kid," he began brightly. "Here's your wrist-watch."

Her doubting glance hovered over him as he smiled down at her. "You giving it to me again, Merton?" She seemed unable to conquer a stubborn incredulity.

"Of course I'm giving it to you again. What did you think I was going to do?"

"I won't touch it," she declared, "I won't touch it until you give me a kiss."

"Sure," he responded brightly.

At last she turned her eyes up to his. "Well?"

"Well?" he repeated coolly.

"OH, STOP IT!" There was a vigorous impatience in her tone. "You know well enough what I was afraid of. And you know well enough what I want to hear right now. Shoot, can't you?"

"I suppose you and Baird had it between you all the time right down to the very last, that I thought I was doing a serious piece," he said. "A serious play with a cross-eyed man doing funny stuff all through. I thought it was serious, did I? Didn't you people know that I knew what I could do and what I couldn't do?"

He broke off, conscious suddenly that the girl had for some time been holding a most peculiar stare rigidly upon him.

"Merton," he heard her say, and she gave a little knowing nod of the head and opened her arms to him. Quickly he knelt beside her while the mothering arms enfolded him. A hand pulled his head to her breast and held it there. Then she rocked gently, a hand gliding up to smooth his hair. Without words she cherished him thus a long time. The gentle rocking back and forth continued.

"IT'S—IT'S like that other time you found me—" His bluster was gone. He was not sure of his voice. Even these few words had been hard. He did not try more.

"There, there, there," she whispered. "It's all right, everything's all right. Your mother's got you right here and she ain't ever going to let you go—never going to let you go."

It was not until he was about to leave when he stood at the door while the girl readjusted his cravat, that he broke ever so slightly through a reserve that both had felt congealing about a certain topic, one about which there would be little talk.

"You know," he said, "I happened to remember the title of a book this morning; a book I used to see back in the public library at home. It wasn't one I ever read. Maybe Tessie Kearns read it. Anyway she had a poem she liked a lot better written by the same man. But I never read the book because the title sounded kind of wild, like there couldn't be any such thing. The poem had just a plain name; it was called 'Lucile,' but the book by the same man was called 'The Tragic Comedians.' You wouldn't think there could be a tragic comedian, would you? Well, look at me."

She looked at him with that elusive, remote flickering back in her eyes, but she only said, "Be sure and come take me out to dinner. Tonight I can eat. And don't forget your overcoat. And listen, don't you dare go looking for furniture till I can go with you."

You will want this GIFT we have for you!

A novel of the sort you will want to read again and again is this most popular of Peter B. Kyne's books which we are offering you without cost—

Kindred of the Dust

by

PETER B. KYNE

Yours Without Charge

KINDRED OF THE DUST is the story of the Outcast girl, Nan of the Sawdust Pile, and of Donald McKaye, the young Laird of Tye whose love for Nan is greater than his pride of clan. The old Laird whose hopes are wrapped up in his son tries to save him from Nan by force, only to find that Nan is ready to give him up. It is then that the balance is shifted between Donald's love for Nan and for his Father, but in the end they all come to a recognition of their "kindredship."

YOU will never forget these three characters about whom this fascinating story is written. And you will long remember the stimulating atmosphere of pine woods and salt sea in which the tale unfolds.

How to Get the Book

Send us the subscription of a friend to Hearst's INTERNATIONAL Magazine and we will send you a copy of this great book. The subscription must be other than your own as we do not give premiums. Enclose remittance at the rate of $3.00 per subscription; you may send in more than one and we will send you a book for each.

USE THE COUPON FOR CONVENIENCE

HEARST'S INTERNATIONAL,
DEPT. 822
119 WEST 40TH STREET,
NEW YORK CITY

Gentlemen: Enclosed find (insert amount of your remittance) for which please send Hearst's INTERNATIONAL one year to the friend whose name appears on the attached list. Send copy of "Kindred of the Dust" to me.

Name.....

Street No.....

City.....

State.....

Gouverneur Morris's New Novel of a "Good" and a "Bad" Marriage—Continued from page 61

The Better Wife

The nurse reappeared in the open door with the statement:

"They'll be ready in a minute, now, Mrs. Highland."

"Good thing to get it over with," said Highland in a bold, almost a loud voice. "Next thing we'll have you shouting for ice-cream. Why, your throat won't even be very sore."

Now the doctor came, alert, cheerful, perhaps a little eager. He was all in white and very shiny.

"Do I get the ether in here?"

He shook his head, and laughed. "Will you come now? Everything's ready."

Mary swung her feet over the side of the bed and sat up. She was a little tremulous now, but game.

BUD FOLLOWED them to the end of the hall. She turned at the door of the operating room and smiled over her shoulder at him. There seemed to be quite a number of white figures in the operating room; but he couldn't count them. Already the door was closing and he was outside.

"Don't be long, Doctor," he said cheerfully, and to his wife, "So long, dear, and good luck to you."

The door closed; but he could hear her voice. The voice only, not what it said. It must have been funny, because it caused laughter. Men and women were laughing in there. He felt like choking.

"The kid's game," he murmured, in a strained voice; "game."

She had indeed gone to her ordeal with real dignity. He walked slowly back to the room in which they had waited and to which she would be brought when it was over. He leaned his forehead against the window pane and looked out.

Nasty things, operations. Any operation, even a slight one.

He found that he was swaying to and fro, between his forehead for one purchase, and his feet for the other. There must be some sort of a parade or celebration going on somewhere. No. It was just his heart. That came of course from not eating any breakfast. He wished that he had looked at his watch. Surely it couldn't take this long to snip out a couple of tonsils and adenoids and things. Well, he might as well confess the truth: he'd give anything if he could change places with her—be the one to stand the ether and the cutting and the pain, while she got all the benefit.

He would have felt the same about any other poor little kid that he was seeing through a bad time. It wasn't because she was Mary. What funny things life springs on a man. He had got drunk and had married a painted lady, and had taken her to a hospital to have her tonsils out. He wondered if any other man of his acquaintance had ever taken a painted lady to have her tonsils out, and,—oh, there was no use denying that he felt nervous as a cat! That specialist fellow might be a peach, but he was slow as mud! She had never been a painted lady—only a painted child.

Bud swallowed. Then he swallowed again to make sure. Well, that was funny. His throat had a sore lump on each side when he swallowed. He couldn't have caught cold. He never did. Well, hardly ever. He supposed it must come from having throats so much on the brain.

At least twenty minutes must have passed since he had last looked at his watch. What could be going on in there? He looked at his watch again. Two minutes only had passed. That made him see himself as a comic figure but he could not laugh. Men were such awful asses about other people being hurt.

Perhaps things would be easier if he went and stood outside of that closed door at the end of the hall. It was funny and choky with ether, and very hot. He couldn't hear a sound. Did ether ever escape from control and asphyxiate everybody in sight—the surgeon and all his assistants? What would happen if he knocked and asked how they were getting on? He would feel like a fool. That was what would happen.

He heard one brisk business-like clank—steel against steel. He wondered what happened to one, if one smoked a cigarette in a hospital? There was no sign saying that one mustn't. Better not. Only it would surely quiet his heart down. It was going like the engine of an automobile when you throw out the clutch and don't let up on the accelerator.

HELPLESS and unconscious, and at the mercy of a lot of strangers! Didn't people under ether talk sometimes and give away things? Maybe the surgeon, and all those, knew all about her now.

From the room, there came suddenly a sound of people stirring. It was a little like the sound in church when the benediction has been said, and it's a beautiful June day, and everybody is crazy to get out. The door was suddenly opened.

He had wondered how they would get her back to bed. It was very simple. The narrow white enamel operating table had wheels. The surgeon was white, satisfied, drenched with sweat. One nurse had already begun to clean things up.

Mary was still deep in the ether sleep. She looked thin, and pale. Her face had a silly, simpering, deprecating expression. Arrayed on a folding of gauze, the surgeon's chief assistant displayed to Highland the things that had been taken out of his wife's throat. With a blunt instrument, he indicated which was which, and what was what.

"Mighty well rid of 'em, I can tell you," he said, briskly.

She was in the narrow bed now, her head on one side, with the thinnest kind of a pillow under it. Her eyes and mouth came open at the same moment; but her eyes had an empty expression and seemed to see nothing.

She was the color of granite. There were deeper gray shadows under her eyes, and another which followed along the lines of her mouth.

Highland remembered that only a little while before when she had walked off so bravely to the operating room, she had been a pretty woman, with color in her cheeks under a coat of clear tan. He would not have known that she had been pretty then, but for the contrast obtained by seeing her now.

"Has she stopped bleeding?" he asked.

"Very likely," smiled the nurse. "A clot soon forms."

"She looks——"

"They all do." Miss Experience said.

From down the corridor, came the loud cry of a child in fear.

"It's tonsil morning," said Miss Experience, who couldn't have been more than nineteen years old. "Funny thing," she added, "the children of well born and educated parents make very little fuss. The doctor does a lot of charity work among the poorer classes—that's one of them yelling now. Better shut the door."

SOON AFTER that, Mary recovered consciousness and knew him. He touched her cheek with the tips of his fingers. He was afraid of breaking her. He smiled firmly. This was meant to help her bear the pain, and to tell her that everything was all right. He resembled one of those advertisements for tooth paste.

"Throat sore?"

"Mm."

"Very?"

"Mm."

The fumes of blood and ether that reeked from her were very disagreeable. His own throat was painfully sore. He wondered how soon it would be decent to leave her and go out for a breath of air.

After saying "Mm" for the second time, she had closed her eyes and fallen asleep.

"Best thing she could do," said the nurse. "We gave her some codeine. So her throat doesn't really hurt her much."

Nothing is so comforting as experience!

The next time she waked, Mary said that she was very sick.

"Still confused from the ether."

But the next time she smiled at him, and her eyes had lost the vacant look.

He bent close, and very likely only because there was a third person within hearing, addressed her with an endearment that sounded gentle and tender.

"You're fine, Honey," he said. "Everything's all right. Don't try to talk. The nurse says you could have a tiny bit of ice to hold in your mouth. Would you like that, do you think?"

Her eyes had something the expression of a wise dog's eyes who knows that he is not being hurt merely to give his master pleasure, but for his own good.

She choked again and they found she was still bleeding.

She urged him to go away. She'd be all right. He was very much tempted, but he leaned close and whispered so that even the nurse could not hear!

"Will it be the least mite easier for you if I stay?"

If she hadn't had to swallow just then, she would have tried to persuade him, that—no, it would be easier if she knew that he was taking a good walk and not bothering about her. But the act of swallowing had hurt awfully and had caused her to clutch at his hand. She said: "Would you mind awfully for just a little while?"

He guessed he wouldn't mind, he said. He was glad she wanted him.

About two o'clock, however, she felt ever so much better, and persuaded him to go out for a while.

Her throat was only very sore, there had been no bleeding for a long time. She was well enough to get up and go back to the hotel. If she had been ten years old, they would have let her. Funny what a lot of difference a few years one way or the other makes with tonsils!

He had a refreshing and invigorating walk; at six o'clock, he went out again to get a bite of dinner. He stayed with her till nine. She was perfectly comfortable. She could swallow now, and did frequently, without screwing up the corners of her eyes. He didn't know how grateful she was and everything. He'd taken such good care of her. He was just as gentle as the nurse and not a bit clumsy.

The nurse came in just as he was saying good night. That being the case, he leaned impulsively over his wife and kissed her lightly on the forehead.

"Mind," he said, "you are to have some one telephone if you want me for anything."

He strode off to the hotel, much relieved in his mind; and feeling the least little bit self-satisfied. He felt that getting somebody else's tonsils out was an achievement.

"THAT YOU, Doctor? Anything wrong?"

The telephone at the head of his bed had waked him from a deep sleep. He gathered that his wife had had or was having a hemorrhage. It happened sometimes, and wasn't very serious. He mustn't be alarmed. But she was worried, and the doctor had thought best to tell him.

"Tell her I'll be right over."

He was frightened, and excited. It must be serious or they wouldn't have waked him at two o'clock in the morning to tell him it wasn't. He hurried into his clothes. He shivered as all high-strung animals do when they are excited. Going up in the elevator to pay that memorable call on Fisher, he had shivered in the same way.

Mary had lost a lot of blood. In the dark, she had thought it was only phlegm that she kept spitting up, and so she had not rung for the nurse. He had talked with the doctor before seeing her.

"It's only bad luck," he told her, "and nothing to worry about. They can't seem to find just where the bleeding is, and——"

In the crisis that he now faced, Bud Highland's alarm was real. The danger threatening his second wife was real. Will any awakening come to him? Will this fear stir him to more than companionship? See Hearst's International for September, ready August 20th.

Frank Ward O'Malley on Nature Lovers—Continued from page 56

From Broadway Back to Buttercups

One explanation of the instant disappearance of our Jersey onion crop from local markets is that the simple Jersey natives at last have hit upon a method of turning the onions into applejack. I have even heard neighboring purchasers of the later Volstead vintages of applejack insist that the new bootleg applejack also explains what becomes of our big local catches of fish. I don't know anything about it. Only our guests drink.

The economic and agricultural statistics which I here have submitted will not, I hope, lessen the prideful glow warming the breast of any other city slicker as he enters for the first time his own artistically remodeled farmhouse in the country.

The glow often lasts until the morning after you move in—which is about the time you begin to telephone for the village plumber. All the rest of your life you will be telephoning for the village plumber—yes, and for the village carpenter or painter, mason, furniture repairer, privately paid garbage collector, paper-hanger, windmill engineer, coalman, electrician, automobile surgeon. When a country home isn't a wide-open roadhouse for city transients, it is a county convention of the local unions of the Allied Building Trades.

The New York landlord, any big town landlord, asks in rental for a whole year only a part of what we pay out in six months to the convening local Allied Building Trades for repairs. It seems inconceivable now that even that maddening landlord who had his last quarrel with me at the door of our elevator shaft furthermore paid all my coal bills in the city, all my bills for painting, paper-hanging, carpenter work, plumbing repairs, electric fixtures; paid our real estate taxes and insurance bills; freely gave us hot water, window shades, window screens; bought our refrigerator for us. The New York landlord is one of nature's noblemen.

I'll all but kiss the next New York apartment house landlord I have. We expect to have one shortly. The country and country life are marvelous, of course; and if the country primary schools were of better quality, we wouldn't think of moving back to the city for anything. But after the last week-end guest had been helped aboard Number Six, northbound, last Monday night, I got to thinking things over while sitting on the dark porch and waiting for the lone nightly thrill of watching the Atlantic City express pass south without hesitating.

Our children are respectively three and two years old now. They'll soon be ready for school, and I want them in a good one. We are therefore getting ready to move back to the city at once, but we make the move only for our children's sake.

Frank Ward O'Malley, far from the Broadway he used to know, heard rumors of its latest wickedness—but what he found made him sigh for the good old days when life was life on Broadway and no one dreamed of covering his tracks. Now he finds "Sinning in Silks and Sanctity" is all the rage. See Hearst's International for September, ready August 20th.

August Munsey Out July 20th

THE MAN HUNT Hulbert Footner's Liveliest Novel Begins

In this story the author of "BLACKMAIL" and "THE OWL TAXI," has written about a hunted lover who may or may not have wished to be haunted, as the case may be. Ask her; she knows.

THE RAINBOW CHASER

by

GEO. F. WORTS

makes the fur fly in Florida. The hero blew in when the heroine wasn't looking and took her away when she was. There is an auto stunt in this story that will stand your hair on end, and a love-scene that only Worts could have written—a Complete NOVELETTE.

10 SHORT STORIES

TWENTY-FIVE CENTS

AUGUST
MUNSEY

The Authorized Agents of the National Circulating Co., 245 West 47th St., New York, N. Y., are authorized to solicit, and accept yearly subscriptions to Hearst's INTERNATIONAL Magazine at the regular subscription price of $3.00 per year.

Hearst's INTERNATIONAL
119 West 40th Street New York

DENBY MOTOR TRUCK COMPANYManufacturers of Denby TrucksDETROIT, MICH.

May 25th, 1922.

The International Bulletin,
 % International Institute of Economics,
 119 West 40th Street, New York.

ATT: Mr. R. H. Waldo, Publisher.

Dear Sir:

Please permit us to congratulate you and your organization on the very excellent way in which international business conditions are presented in your June issue (volume 1, Number 1) of the International Bulletin.

This publication is the most concise exposition of international trade conditions we have yet seen. We note that future numbers of the Bulletin will be sent to subscribers of Hearst's International Magazine, and we would like to inquire as to the subscription price of such publication, in order to secure further issues of the International Bulletin.

Very truly yours,

DENBY MOTOR TRUCK COMPANY.

 Pres. and Gen. Mgr.

ASM M

THE LETTER reproduced above is typical of a number that have come to us from important manufacturing concerns. The executives of these houses have been quick to see the importance of the work that we have undertaken in making known to the American public actual conditions in foreign lands.

We shall be glad to hear from other executives who wish to take advantage of this service. The subscription price of $3.00 a year is asked in order that mere curiosity seekers may be eliminated. Sample copies of The International Bulletin will be sent gladly upon any request directed to us on a business letterhead.

THE INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF ECONOMICS

119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y.

Hearst's International

A LIBERAL EDUCATION

"The final aim of Truth in Advertising is to make the printed advertisement as dependable and as widely accepted as is the printed dollar bill."

- 1.—GUARANTEES, without reservation, every printed statement of its merchandise advertisers.
- 2.—GUARANTEES their statements in transactions involving promise, purchase, service or delivery to the customer.
- 3.—GUARANTEES their advertised products purchased direct, or through retailers.
- 4.—GUARANTEES to refund your money, plus ten per cent as a fee to you for furnishing the facts in any case where, in your opinion, the advertiser or the product has not made good.

Is this offer too good to be true?

Is it possible that we are offering a value too great to be credible?
Do people shy at the thought of getting too much for their money?

WE recently mailed several thousand circulars to book-lovers. We described and pictured these thirty volumes of the Little Leather Library honestly, sincerely, accurately. But we received relatively few orders.

Then we mailed several more thousand circulars to booklovers, this time enclosing a sample cover of one of the volumes illustrated above. Orders came in by the hundred! The reason, we believe, is that most people can not believe we can really offer so great a value unless they see a sample!

In this advertisement, naturally, it is impossible for us to show you a sample volume. The best we can do is to describe and picture the books in the limited space on this page. We depend on your faith in the statements made by the advertisements appearing in HEARST'S INTERNATIONAL; and we are hoping you will believe what we say, instead of thinking this offer is "too good to be true."

What this offer is

Here then is our offer. The illustration above shows thirty of the world's greatest masterpieces of literature. These include the finest works of such immortal authors as Shakespeare, Kipling, Stevenson, Emerson, Poe, Coleridge, Burns, Omar Khayyam, Macaulay, Lincoln, Washington, Oscar Wilde, Gilbert, Longfellow, Drummond, Conan Doyle, Edward Everett Hale, Thoreau, Tennyson, Browning, and others. These are books which no one cares to confess he has not read and re-read; books which bear reading a score of times.

Each of these volumes is complete—this is not that abomination, a collection of extracts; the paper is a high-grade white wove antique, equal to that used in books selling at $1.50 to $2.00; the type is clear and easy to read; the binding is a beautiful limp material, tinted in antique copper and green, and so handsomely embossed as to give it the appearance of hand tooled leather.

And, though each of these volumes is complete (the entire set contains over 3,000 pages), a volume can be carried conveniently wherever you go, in your pocket or purse; several can be placed in your handbag or grip; or the entire thirty can be placed on your library table "without cluttering it up" as one purchaser expressed it.

What about the price?

Producing such fine books is, in itself, no great achievement. But the aim of this enterprise has been to produce them at a price that anyone in the whole land could afford; the only way we could do this was to manufacture them in quantities of nearly a million at a time—to bring the price down through "quantity production." And we relied for our sales on our faith that Americans would rather read classics than trash. What happened? O'FR TEN MILLION of these volumes have already been purchased by people in every walk of life.

Yet we know, from our daily mail, that many thousands of people still cannot believe we can sell 30 such volumes for $2.98 (plus postage). We do not know how to combat this skepticism. All we can say is: send for these 30 volumes; if you are not satisfied, return them at any time within a month and you will not be out one penny. Of the thousands of readers who purchased this set not one in a hundred expressed dissatisfaction for any reason whatever.

Send No Money

No description, no illustration, can do these 30 volumes justice. You must see them. We should like to send every reader a sample, but frankly our profit is so small we cannot afford it. We offer, instead, to send the entire set on trial. Simply mail the coupon or a letter; when the set arrives, pay the postman $2.98 plus postage; then examine the books. As stated above, your money will be returned at any time within 30 days for any reason, or for NO reason, if you request it. Mail the coupon or a letter NOW while this page is before you, or you may forget.

Little Leather Library Corp'n

Dept. 599, 354 Fourth Avenue
New York

Little Leather Library Corp'n, Dept. 599
354 Fourth Avenue, New York

Please send me, on approval, the set of 30 volumes of the De Luxe edition of the Little Leather Library. It is understood that the price of these 30 volumes is ONLY $2.98 plus postage, which I will pay the postman when the set arrives. It is understood, however, that this is not to be considered a purchase by me. If I am not satisfied, after examining the set, I will mail the books back at your expense within 30 days, and you are to return my money at once. It is understood that there is no further payment or obligation of any kind.

Name.....
Address.....
City..... State.....

Many people who have been asked to guess the value of these books have estimated, before we told them the price, that they are worth from $50 to $100 for the complete set. These records are on file for inspection of any one interested.

THE AUTHOR

ROBERT HERRICK is a distinguished American, both as an educator and as an author. "Together," written some years ago, is perhaps the best-known of his literary achievements. Now Mr. Herrick has written a new novel, "Her Own Life," a study of a contemporary woman's search for freedom. It is our pleasure to announce its serial publication, with illustrations by Dalton Stevens, in Hearst's International beginning next month in the October Number.

THE ARTIST

In This Number:

Another International Literary Discovery—An Unpublished Play by George Sand—See page 8

NORMAN HAPGOOD'S Editorials 6

Three Distinguished Serials

They Call Me Carpenter 39
By Upton Sinclair

Illustrated by Lucius Wolcott Hitchcock

Carnac's Folly 76
By Sir Gilbert Parker

Illustrated by Walt Louderback

The Better Wife 55
By Gouverneur Morris

Illustrated by Henry Raleigh

Seven Short Stories

A Point of Contact 5
By A. Conan Doyle

Illustrated by C. B. Falls

The Boy Who Read Dime Novels 18
By William Slavens McNutt

Illustrated by David Robinson

The Gioconda Smile 24
By Aldous Huxley

Illustrated by F. R. Gruger

In the New York Manner 33
By Lucian Cary

Illustrated by Charles D. Mitchell

When a Girl's Thirty 49
By Katharine Dayton

Illustrated by Baron de Meyer

The Last Man Child 64
By Emma-Lindsay Squier

Illustrated by Dalton Stevens

Peggy 70
By Henry Holt

Illustrated by Frederic Dorr Steele

A World Survey in Articles

Doctors and Drug-Mongers 15
By Dr. Paul H. De Kruif

Is Northcliffe Through? 29
By Norman Angell

Henry Ford's Jew-Mania Part IV 45
By Norman Hapgood

Trembling Europe 53
By Vicente Blasco Ibañez

Sinning in Silks & Sanctity 61
By Frank Ward O'Malley

A Coal Miner's Life 82
By John Brophy

What's All the Shootin' For? 94
By Walt Mason

Poor Little Rich John Bull 101
By James H. Collins

Play, Book, Art and Science

Balieff's Chauve-Souris 86
The Bat Theater of Moscow

Simon Called Peter 91
By Robert Keable

The Vienna Workshop in America 85
By Willard Huntington Wright

Latest Reports on Psychic Research 96
By James Hopper and E. E. Free

The Seltsame Song 52
A poem by Thomas Hardy

Cover Design for this Issue Painted by W. T. Benda

Drawing by C. B. Falls

¶ And he told Ulysses: "You have crossed the path of David, second King of the Hebrews, together with his young son, Solomon."

A Point of Contact

By A. Conan Doyle

A CURIOUS train of thought is started when one reflects upon those great figures who have trod the stage of this earth, and actually played their parts in the same act, without ever coming face to face, or even knowing of each other's existence. Baber, the Great Mogul, was, for example, overrunning India at the very moment when Hernando Cortez was overrunning Mexico, and yet the two could never have heard of each other. Or, to take a more supreme example, what could the Emperor Augustus Caesar know of a certain Carpenter's shop wherein there worked a dreamy-eyed boy who was destined to change the whole face of the world? It may be, however, that sometimes these great contemporary forces did approach, touch, and separate—each unaware of the true meaning of the other. So it was in the instance which is now narrated.

It was evening in the port of Tyre, some eleven hundred years before the coming of Christ. The city held at that time about a quarter of a million of inhabitants, the majority of whom dwelt upon the mainland, where the buildings of the wealthy merchants, each in its own tree-girt garden, extended for seven miles along the coast. The great island, however, from which the town got its name, lay out some distance from the shore, and contained within its narrow borders the more famous of the temples and public buildings. Of these temples the chief was that of Melmoth, which covered with [Continued on page 114]

NORMAN HAPGOOD on the

The Craze for Cures

THE doctor is present at birth and at death. He comes when the life of a dear child lies in the balance, and he consults with us about the recurrent headache. The difference in the home between an able family doctor and a quack (or semi-quack) may be a difference in happiness beyond estimate.

The series, to which we publish this month the introduction, is of no use to those who wish the name of some pill, or some new medical nickname, by resort to which magic relief can be brought to heart-disease and hiccoughs, to erysipelas and earache, to corns and constipation. It is of no value to a fool. To those, however, who realize that the choice of a doctor is one of the most important of acts, and that medicine has exact technical bases, the series is indispensable.

He who reads, with a trifle better than moron attention, the expert and varied articles in the series, will see emerging clearly the principles that should guide an intelligent person through the maze of medicines and the delirium of fake doctors. Never have medicines been so many: of this multitude only a few mean anything. It is easy to know which ones are real.

Among those who will gain most are earnest doctors, not themselves living in an atmosphere of research, who will be grateful to be shown how they also have fallen victims in a false drug traffic.

Indeed, one of the ironies of this story is that what appears as progress sometimes is merely the new form of an old idea. In the brilliant campaign of fifteen years or so ago, in which Samuel Hopkins Adams published his articles on "the Great American Fraud," there was dealt to the patent medicines a blow from which the effect remains. Selling to the public carboic acid and water as a cure for consumption, carditis and cramps is not as easy as it was. But newer and subtler methods of fraud have taken the place of the earlier, cruder forms. The foremost frauds are now "ethical." That means they are advertised not direct to the public but in the medical press. Which makes this continued story a new tale, sad at once and diverting.

Make it Smaller

DOES any candidate wish our vote for President, Senator or Governor? Then let him put forward a practical idea for making our cities smaller. The ordinary approach is this: "Our city is too crowded. Let us boom it and make it bigger." The statesman who proposed to reduce the population of his city would get no votes except of those who think. He might get the votes of one-half of one percent of the total adult white registered population. He would be lucky if he did.

Russia

OF ALL the Russian Émigrés known to the present writer, the one who has best understood the situation since the Revolution of 1917 and best predicted the course of events along the most important lines is a young man named D. S. Navashin.

This young man went to Genoa as the financial expert of the National Ukrainian Committee. He was the leading spirit in having an agreement reached between the National Ukrainian Committee, the Soviet Government of the Ukrain, and the representatives of the Moscow Government. That agreement passed unnoticed, but it is a model of the attitude toward Soviet Russia that should have been taken by the great powers and that, had it been taken, would have saved untold demoralization, hunger, and death.

The National Ukrainian Committee of Paris draws up a statement in which it begins by saying that it does not share the communist ideas of the Moscow Government, but that nevertheless it feels that the closest bond between the Ukrain and Soviet Russia alone can give territorial, economic, and political safety. It speaks energetically against all foreign intervention, against all forcible attempts to overthrow the Soviet Government. Civil war, it says, can bring nothing but ruin and subjugation.

The responsibility for the American-Russian policy is in a peculiar state. Mr. Harding has favored de facto recognition since before he was elected. The whole matter of formulating policies and flooding the country with propaganda has been left in the hands of Mr. Hoover. If Mr. Hoover is to conduct such intensive propaganda, and really determine the national policy, it might be well for the Administration to state definitely that on the subject of Russia, power and responsibility are lodged in the Department of Commerce.

Jews at Harvard

REACTIONARIES and radicals are often equally sweeping. The radicals who have accused Harvard of reaction in the Jew problem are talking noise. It is the business of a University not only to distribute knowledge but to maintain a culture. The Jews have an intensive culture of their own. The Jews will approve of a sieve that will add cultural tests to mere tests of industry, but they, like all liberals, see moral and intellectual death in discrimination by race. Moreover, as a matter of mere fact, is there any such emergency as President Lowell thinks?

The Grandgent Committee, now at work, can be trusted to face the question of cultural standards with advantage not only to the Christians but to the Jews as well: not only to Americans of long residence here, but to newcomers, whether Poles, Russians, Italians, or French-Canadians. They will no doubt find some test that will protect University standards without singling out one race.

The Jews, on their side, should not be too sensitive. An example of Jewish broad-mindedness will be given next year when David Belasco, a Jew, produces the Merchant of Venice, with another Jew, David Warfield, as Shylock. Jewish opposition to the Merchant of Venice has been a phase of that over-sensitiveness to criticism nearly always shown by people put by circumstances on the defensive. The ideal attitude is to rejoice in the merits of one's people and to accept with serenity criticism and difference.

Craze for Fool Cures

Harding as a Type

WHEN a class governed, there was a demand for statesmen of genius. Modern democracies, with universal voting and universal half-education, often prefer men of ordinary ideas and somewhat more than ordinary abilities. These men get along better than leaders of more personal contribution. Not trying themselves to contribute, they register rather than form the will of the majority. Fox said, "Burke is a wise man, but he is wise too soon." Of the London Times, Bagehot says: "Did you ever see anything there you had never seen before? . . . Original theories give trouble . . . So the most influential of constitutional statesmen is the one who most felicitously expresses the creed of the moment."

For a college debating society a promising topic would be: "Which is better for the development of the American soul, presidents of the type of Cleveland and Wilson, or those of the type of McKinley and Harding?"

There is only one reason we refrain from giving the answer; we do not know what it is.

Censors

A RUSSIAN censor, in the old days, was reading a magazine in Poland. He found a poem about a bird in a cage, singing of liberty.

This song did not look right to the censor. Singing of liberty in Poland was suspicious. In place of "singing of liberty," he substituted "singing of the Tsar."

That harmful license exists, in the press, on the screen, in the theater, is undeniable: but the official censor is a dangerous cure. It is better to trust the principle so well condensed by Santayana:

"By excess of evil, evil dies."

It is wiser for public opinion to help an evil to kill itself than to fly to the opposite evil of bureaucracy. The war gave us experience enough of leashes and muzzles.

Dickens for America

SUPPOSE you were picking types of genius to throw dazzling light on the times in which we live.

Surely Aristophanes, the scathing and riotous genius of mirth, a humorist of the first order, would immediately have the ear of a world seeking sanity.

Next, perhaps, would come a graphic novelist making all our classes and conventions as picturesque and graphic as Dickens made those of his day. Next to Shakespeare, no writer in English compares with Dickens in the number of characters that are household words.

Imagine what it would mean if a popular novelist should appear whose stories developed out of his characters and their environment, representing the United States as last-century England was represented by those leisurely stories through which move Micawber, Fagan, Squeers, Sam Weller, Oliver Twist, Nickleby, Bill Sykes, Copperfield, Barnaby Rudge, Dick Swiveller, Pickwick, Pecksniff and Mrs. Gamp. Such an artist today would be food and inspiration for every family in this land.

Drama

"D RAMA," said a great playwright, "should be symbolical." He was doing the stage the honor of treating it as the home of literature.

"To be sure," said Henry Irving once at a dinner to the present writer, "there are great parts in melodrama. Hamlet is a great part." The famous actor was laughing, but his meaning was clear. Strip from the tragedies Irving had in mind the symbolic poetry, the reaching beyond the literally true, and what you have left is little more than what we often call melodrama. They were old plays before Shakespeare touched them, and they would have remained unknown forever, except for falling under the eye of a genius who connected the acts he saw, the personages he read of, with the mystic meaning and burning beauty of this world.

Lonely or Alone

TO BE willingly alone is an attribute of greatness. There is no evidence at all that Lincoln was a lonely man. Alone and apart his nature was, but that is wholly different.

Ibsen says somewhere that the greatest man is most alone. Pascal, one of the deepest of thinkers, declared that the worst evils of human fate come from our inability to be happy when by ourselves. What does this mean? Leonardo da Vinci pointed the answer when he said: "If you are alone, you belong altogether to yourself." It depends, then, on what is in us. Those particularly endowed, either by genius or by temperament, have in themselves possibilities that they need to think out, feel out, intimately live out. Amusement, diversion, has its place, but actually to require much of it is fatal to what is highest. The soul, if it is to reach its full intended growth, must get on well with itself. It must not dread its own company.

The Nature of Comedy

H UMORE, much defined, meant to Rabelais, "a certain jollity of mind, pickled in the scorn of fortune." To Meredith, it was the smile of experience looking at the existence of men. If, then, it connects itself with the essence of life, there must be in it a background that is serious. The greatest humorists, on the whole, have been melancholy. The sadness of clowns has become traditional. We are told that Molière was sad. Swift, the foremost of English satirists, was morose.

In this respect, humor is but subject to the law of life. All things have their shadows. It was Montaigne who said, "Even pleasure is painful when it is deep."

Keats touched another form of this truth when in a letter he asked: "Do you not see how necessary a world of pain and suffering is, to school our intellect and make it a soul?"

Goethe wrote a poem, and Beethoven set it to music, the gist of which is that life should be filled with joy, sorrow, and thought.

High comedy and tragedy look at the same realities. Both see deep, but one of them smiles.

¶ "Let the little dear be carried home to his mother!"

A Newly Discovered PLAY By GEORGE SAND

Illustrated by Wilfred Jones

¶ A Conspiracy of 1537

LITERARY discoveries are always of interest. This one, moreover, is part of an historic love story. It is an unpublished play by the greatest woman author since Sappho. When George Sand wrote it her lover was Alfred de Musset. The two quarreled, but George Sand left this manuscript with him. Out of it Musset made his famous Lorenzaccio. In it Sarah Bernhardt has played the young Prince. This present publication shows that when George turned her back on Alfred and broke up the Venice romance, she left with her erstwhile lover one of the foundations of his fame.

I ASSURE you, gentlemen, the riot this morning was very serious," declared the Cavalier of Marsili.

"What!" scoffed Valori, an emissary of the Pope. "A few boys, art students or artists with no more beard on their faces than talent in their heads, who imagine exaltation takes the place of genius, a bunch of law students from Bologna with wild mustaches and ink-stained cuffs? Why, a breath of wind could knock down that handful of empty-headed, hungry-mouthed good-for-nothings!"

MARSILI—But the masses are discontented.

VALORI—That's in their nature. What does it matter as long as we have a well-paid, well-fed Imperial garrison at our gates and troops devoted to the Government within our walls? Everyone knows that an iron scepter has more effect on Florentines than a golden one.

There are gathered on this morning of January 6, 1537, in the palace of Alexander of Medici, the Grand Duke of Florence, Malatesta Baglione, Military Commander, the Cavalier of Marsili, Valori, an emissary of the Pope, several nobles in the service of the Duke, a few rich Florentines and a number of foreign noblemen.

While Marsili and Valori are discussing the outbreak, the

C. "Aside from you two, I hate and pity the world."

Duke of Florence, followed by his retainers, enters the room.
 THE DUKE—Well, gentlemen, what's the matter? Some more noise this morning?

MALATESTA—Some friends of the proscribed met at the Santa Reparata and tried to stir up the people. But the Florentines, true to Your Highness, dispersed them, insulted them, and had it not been for the intervention of the soldiers they would have dealt roughly with the rioters.

THE DUKE—Then why did they interfere?

VITELLI—I thought Your Highness, in your wisdom, might prefer to sentence the rebels yourself.

THE DUKE—Yes, that's true. To rid oneself of one's enemies is a real joy, Vitelli. Have them thrown into the dungeons immediately. (Turning to Valori) Has Your Excellency heard from Rome this morning?

VALORI—Clemens VII sends Your Highness a thousand benedictions. His Holiness prays for your long prosperity. But he fears that you are courting very grave danger by trusting certain people too blindly.

THE DUKE—I see what you're hinting at, my dear Papal emissary! A few rotten branches ought to be cut, eh? Go ahead, do not hesitate to tell me.

VALORI (very cautiously)—Treason flourishes when vengeance sleeps, Your Highness.

THE DUKE—That's your usual indirect way of asking for a man and a rope, one hanging on the other. Who is the rich merchant that excites the appetite of the Holy See?

VALORI—It's not a merchant but a patrician.

THE DUKE—They're harder to get and cost more.

VALORI—The Pope requests Lorenzo of Medici, a fugitive from his justice.

THE DUKE—Bah! Lorenzino, little Lorenzo, Lorenzaccio, the wicked, as the Florentines call him? He's my favorite and my cousin, don't you know that?

VALORI—He's the scion of a hated branch of your family, and his dagger, always ready to carve the way for rebellion and revolution, has often been plunged into the heart of a master.

THE DUKE—You're jesting when you speak of Lorenzo with a dagger! A fan is what he should hold in his soft white hand!

VALORI—Your Highness must forgive me if I insist. The Roman Court is very much surprised that the only pardon ever bestowed by you on a traitor precisely happened to fall on an enemy of Clemens VII.

THE DUKE—But what does the Pope complain of? Is he still angered at the mutilation of the statues on Constantine's arch? Are those old bits of stone so precious that the schoolboy, who in a moment of wine and madness thought it would be fun to cut their heads off, should be sentenced to death? By Saint Cosimo! How I laughed when I thought of the Pope's holy anger! As Cardinal Hippolyte de Medici explained to His Holiness, the responsibility for Lorenzo's death would fall back on the Pope, who is also a Medici, and who, by the way, was the one who aided and abetted Lorenzo in escaping from the Roman jail. Now the Pope asks for Lorenzo's head. Why this change of favor? It is not long since Lorenzo's witty sarcasms were applauded at the Vatican like the clever sayings of a spoiled child. He did not know when to stop; went too far and was condemned to hang. Now, after having pardoned him, the Pope wants to send him to the gallows? How inconsistent!

VALORI—The Holy Father imagined that the fact of having been so near death would have taught Lorenzo to hold his tongue, no matter where he sought refuge. But no sooner does he get a foothold at your Court than he revels in libidinous jests at the Church and people consecrated to God. The Pope has every reason to feel hurt because you so openly favor such a reviler of religion.

THE DUKE—And the Pope is all the more anxious to avenge outraged religion since such vengeance would incidentally be a balm to his own wounded pride. But to speak seriously. There is no reason for the Pope to hate Lorenzo now, for no one is in such a humiliating position at my Court. His apparent stoicism is a blind. In his heart he suffers, I know. How can he remain deaf to the people's hatred, to his family's indignation?

There he is now. Look at him, broken-down, listless, exhausted. Look at his pinched, lead-colored features, his frail body worn-out by continuous orgies, the dull, stupid expression of his eyes. Is that the ardent, cutting mind the Pope condescends to fear? His relatives blush for him, his mother weeps over him, and when he passes in the streets the people of Florence cry: "There goes the vile Lorenzaccio, his master's spy and blackguard."

LORENZO (approaching)—Highness, I humbly kiss your hand.

THE DUKE—Why this humility? Let's be cousins, once and for all. The envoy from Rome, by the way, just spoke of the magnificent harangue Franceco Molza delivered against you at the Roman Academy.

LORENZO—I have been told that this harangue, delivered in a Latin equal to Cicero's best, was received in the solemn manner that befitted its important subject. The Italian spoken in Rome or Tuscany was not considered strong enough to scourge the mutilator of the statues of ancient Rome. The academician excoriated the vandal in Latin, and the latter ought, perhaps, to be grateful that he was denounced and held up to reprobation in the language that is the least understood in the Academy.

VALORI—Perhaps that was why two perfectly good edicts were published in pure Tuscan, one by the Caparions, enjoining the mutilators to leave the city of the Caesars at once, and the other by the Senate, offering a prize to whoever was successful in ridding Italy of him.

LORENZO—Really quite unnecessary measures. The ennui one breathes in Rome and the hypocritical stiffness of the aristocracy suffice to drive away any man who is not blinded by them.

VALORI—A man such as you should have an arm as strong as his wit. I'm surprised to see that with such sharp words on your lips you have no sword by your side.

LORENZO—I am not in the habit of carrying a sword.

VALORI—Then you should beware of what you say, for the man who is unable to defend himself should not attack.

LORENZO—I'm not a soldier, but a lover of science. I leave the useless show of arms to those who have not enough brains to defend themselves otherwise.

VALORI (drawing his sword)—You have so much brains that no one ever fights with you on equal terms.

THE DUKE (laughing)—Let's see now, Lorenzo whether your brain will protect you like a coat of mail!

LORENZO—Give me a sword!

THE DUKE—Bravo! It's your first duel, Lorenzino. I will be your witness.

Lorenzo takes a proffered sword and after a sickening glance at the weapon he falls to the floor.

VALORI—Scoundrel! Your cowardice shan't save you!

THE DUKE—Hold on, Excellency! You're not going to kill a man already dead with fright?

ALL THOSE PRESENT (drawing near)—What a shame; what an indignity!

THE DUKE—Indignity? No. Misfortune. The poor young man was born with that infirmity. The mere sight of a weapon makes him faint away. Let the little dear be carried home to his mother. Be sure to calm her fears by telling her that the steel didn't even touch the tip of his coat.

Q. "You are. . . Your Highness is a great prince."

A few hours later in the home of the Soderini Medici, Lorenzo is found moodily staring out of the window. His mother is sewing and his young sister Catterina is reading Titus Livius, the story of Virginia.

The two women discuss the book and draw Lorenzo into the conversation, which later turns on his own strange behavior.

CATTERINA—Always dreaming! What is the matter with you, Lorenzo? Why are you so sad? You, Lorenzino, who used to be so gay and who always talked and played with me before, you never even speak to me now. How cruel you are! You're unhappy, so you don't want me to be happy. Come and sit down here, Lorenzo, next to mother. Don't you see she's sad because you don't speak to her?

LORENZO—Why cry for me, Signora? I'm really not worth it. Am I not cursed and excommunicated? If you lived up to your Christian duty you wouldn't shelter an enemy of the Church. Don't you know the Pope has put a price on your son's head? Do you think you'll go to heaven, you who help shield the victim of a pontiff's vengeance?

MADONNA MARIA—Enough, Lorenzo. I can see your heart is deeply wounded!

LORENZO—You're right, Madonna. If I could tear it out of my body I would grind it in the dust with my feet. Catterina, read the story of Brutus.

CATTERINA (with surprise and displeasure) — But that's a story of blood and murder.

LORENZO—I like it.

At a knock at the door Catterina admits Bindo Altoviti, Lorenzo's uncle, and Giulio Capponi, a citizen of Florence. They have come, Bindo tells the women, to make one last attempt to arouse Lorenzo. "Would it might be of some avail," cries his mother, as she and Catterina leave the room.

BINDO—Lorenzo, I've come to beg you to give the lie to the infamous story they are telling about you everywhere.

LORENZO—And what's the story? Is it a bit more worthy of its originator than those of which I've been the hero so far?

BINDO—They say you stood for the insults of the valet of the Roman Court, Valori. They even say that at the mere sight of his drawn sword. . . .

LORENZO—Enough, enough. The story is quite true.

BINDO (amazed)—And you can admit it without blushing?

LORENZO—Without blushing in the least. Why should I feel guilty at being unable to overcome a purely physical repugnance, something quite independent of my will?

BINDO—What an odious hypocrite, a cowardly flatterer you are! We've seen you burning with ideas of glory, and impatient to the point of fury, at the mere shadow of an insult! We've seen you flourish the sword with the greatest skill. In those days, the desire of making a name for yourself was the only passion that devoured your restless and untamed soul. Our great Strozzi predicted that your name would live among the heroes of liberty.

Now your time has come. Today you've got to give us a final answer. You know what it is about. Alexander's crimes have tired the people. The plot is ripe, ready to burst. A chief is needed, a man who can satisfy the people and the nobles. Here is a representative of the people who asks you to come with us and save the country.

CAPPONI—Sir Lorenzo of Medici, if you give us your word we will all believe in you. It is true your assiduity at Court has made us doubt your devotion to the public weal. But Sir Altoviti, your uncle, has reassured us, telling us that you observe the Duke at close range in order to master his plans and frustrate “Bring me a doublet lined with sable, and perfumed gloves.”

U. "Look. I was not lying. There is the Duke!"

them. That is a noble and generous purpose which gives you our absolute faith. We know you won't go back on the noble Soderini blood, nor on that branch of the Medici which sprang from the great Cosimo.

LORENZO (yawning)—Leave my ancestors in peace, my Republican friend! I am more of a patriot than you—nobility of birth does not impress me. However, I consider you extremely imprudent in confiding your plans to me, Alexander's favorite, on the basis of no guarantee other than that I am my father's son!

BINDO—Lorenzo, such sacrilegious scepticism makes me blush for you. Frivolous and caustic words are no answer to a frank and open proposition. For a long time we've been puzzled as to your real feelings for Alexander. Remember, if you don't come out openly for us, we'll suspect you of having tried to lead us on to reveal our plans in order to betray us. And remember, that if you come with us, you will no longer be the puppet of a hated monster but the head of a powerful republic.

LORENZO—The head of a republic? I? What an idea! Will both of you gentlemen allow me to explain the situation as I see it? In the first place, Signor Altoviti, you would like to place a man of your choice at the head of the government—a licentious and extravagant court would offend your ideas of economy and austerity less, I know, if you occupied a position there in keeping with your birth and ambition. But you count on the backing of the Capponi family, and the rich merchants of Florence. There you make a great mistake. For here is Niccolo Capponi's brother, the last of the Republic. You ought to know that he will never agree to the reestablishment of the principality when everything tells them they ought to occupy an office to which their popularity and past services entitle them.

Secondly, to you, Capponi, I would say that you want to see the reestablishment of a popular government because you would be one of the most important people in it, because it is always pleasant to emerge from a hated and lauded obscurity, because vengeance, too, is sound and beneficent, and because you would wash away the traces of Florentine blood with floods of Spanish blood. All that is very wisely conceived and planned.

But you are very foolish in counting on the backing of the patrician families. They will never be satisfied with a republic, and especially not with yours. Look at Signor Altoviti, for instance. He asks me to be your leader merely in order to do away with the chances of Cosimo de Medici, his other nephew. If Cosimo were out of question, it would be an easy matter, later on, to vote the disqualification of the mad Lorenzaccio, and in that event I see no one so fit to hold the ducal scepter as Signor Altoviti himself.

IN the third place, to both of you, I would give a prudent and wise bit of advice: don't count too much on the people. Remember the Pazzis who paid for killing the tyrants by being torn to pieces and carried on pickets while the people, whom they meant to free, heaped mud on their palpitating remains. Believe me, try to rein in your ambition and don't try to hide it quite so much under a cloak of philanthropy. No one who knows the world could be misled by you. Such are the sentiments of your humble servant, who kisses your hands.

BINDO—Enough. We come to make you a flattering offer and you reply by insulting us. Either you apologize or you settle this matter with us on the field of honor.

LORENZO—Indeed not. I was not born a swordsman. Blame it on God, who did not create courage in me. I admit it would be to your advantage, now that I know your secret and you have reason to fear me, to do away with me. But try to be calm and profit by the advice a madman can give.

¶ "Captain Cesena and Biamo, the Hungarian, Ferdinand, the Andalusian, follow me."

A PAGE (announcing solemnly)—His Royal Highness, the Grand Duke of Florence.

CAPPONI and BINDO (paralyzed with fear)—Heavens! We've been betrayed!

LORENZO (looks at them with ironic scorn, then walks to greet the Duke)—To what do I owe the great favor of having my master condescend to visit his humble servant?

THE DUKE—You were taken ill at the Palace this morning and I was anxious to make certain there had been no evil effects.

LORENZO—I am confused at so much kindness! The gracious visit of Your Highness comes all the more appropriately since it enables me to present two citizens of Florence, both equally anxious to offer their humble respects. One is my uncle, Bindo Altoviti, who regrets that his long stay in Naples prevented him from bowing, sooner, before Your Highness. The other is Giulio Capponi, who came to beg me to present him to Your Highness, that he might put at the feet of Your Highness the protestations of devotion and fidelity from the city of Florence.

THE DUKE—Really? The homages of two subjects who I had imagined openly favored the rebels, would be most agreeable to me, I can assure you, if sincere.

LORENZO—Your Highness can rely on them. The two faithful subjects wished to be presented today in order to disavow all participation at this morning's uprising and to express their satisfaction at the prompt way in which it was crushed. (To Bindo and Capponi) Don't let the unexpected presence of so great a prince in this humble house perturb you so. Tell him that I have interpreted your sentiments faithfully.

BINDO (confused)—Exactly. Your Highness must believe that my nephew. . . .

THE DUKE—Very well. We are glad to see an ally of our house make the first move, and we beg him to accept the direction of our next mission to our royal father-in-law, Emperor Charles V.

BINDO (bows deeply)—I appreciate the magnitude of the honor bestowed on me and Your Highness can count on my devotion.

THE DUKE—Enough. As for you, Capponi, we now think your influence is immense. We request you to use it in our service. We offer you, if you succeed, exemption from all taxation present and future, for you and your whole family.

CAPPONI—Ah! Prince, that is really too much. You are—Your Highness is a great prince.

THE DUKE—All those whom I've enriched say the same thing. Don't allow my presence to detain you any longer.

THE DUKE—Look at the low merchant and the treacherous nobleman! One avaricious and the other vain! What an odor of treason, what a stench of the populace they've left behind! Open the windows, Lorenzo; I seem to feel that plebeian breathing in my face. But why are there no women around? Sometimes I see them in the window and their eyes fascinate everyone.

LORENZO—Yes, my mother was famed for her beauty. But Your Highness must have seen her from afar, only, for now she is famed for her virtue, only.

THE DUKE—Who speaks of your mother! She's not the only woman in this house. Tell me, where is your sister, Lorenzo?

LORENZO—My little sister?

THE DUKE—Why call her little? She's at least fifteen. My experienced eye is not mistaken!

LORENZO—Really, she's only a child, you know.

THE DUKE—A child who inspires a man's passion. Lorenzo, I want you to know what I really came for. I hoped to see her.

LORENZO—By what magic did that little girl inspire Your Highness with such curiosity?

THE DUKE—It's not curiosity. Call it love, the most violent love, the most insane passion I ever felt in all my life. For days I've lived in a fever. I gaze at her, as she sits there in the window, while the wind plays in her long black hair, or when, in church, her eyes lowered under the half-closed veil, she seems more beautiful and more naïve than the Virgins our old Michael-Angelo dreamt of in the days of his youth. And then, when she gets up and walks lightly over the stone floor of the temple, the petulant gaiety of her youth still subdued by meditation and prayer, she seems like a quick, flexible swallow about to soar into the air through the arched doorway of the church.

Go fetch her, Lorenzino, let me lay my arm around her bosom, let me with my two bare hands make a tight belt around her slender waist, let me breathe the perfume of her shining hair! Fetch her! I'm tired of the women you've found for me, and I'll never ask you to find any others if, today, you arrange for me to meet this treasure!

LORENZO—Today? That won't be easy. The child is timid and you'll have to train her from the beginning. Besides, her mother is incredibly vigilant. It's almost impossible to separate them. Give me a few days.

THE DUKE—I can't bear the thought of further delay. I've suffered too much and waited too long, already. I'm not suffering from one of those caprices which, for a day, stir up my dulled senses. Remember that if you have scruples—a most foolish thing for you to have—your sister will be mine, none the less, sooner or later. Love knows no obstacles, and especially not mine. And remember that if you shorten my cruel waiting you'll get anything you want, the highest office in the Government, or Cosimo's fortune in spite of the law, or your enemy's head. Try!

LORENZO—I don't need promises. Your Highness knows very well that if it is humanly possible, Lorenzo will serve you.

THE DUKE—Hurry! Tell her the Duke of Florence is dying of love for her. Tell her he'll cover with pearls and precious stones her somber locks, her budding breast and her soft white arms. Tell her he'll give her the finest horse that ever ran at a Neapolitan fête, the most beautiful comb of all Spain, cloths of gold and embroidered veils from Constantinople. . . . You're dreaming? You don't answer?

LORENZO—I'm trying to find a way. If I could get her away from her mother a moment. A woman is always a woman, and virtue melts before riches like wax before a fire.

THE DUKE (loosening his purse from his belt)—Take this gold, to begin with, and tell her to ask for the fortunes of twenty families! But hurry!

LORENZO—I obey. But Your Highness must not meet my mother's clairvoyant eyes. If she suspects the slightest the child will be sent to a convent or to the Strozzi. In two hours I hope to give Your Highness a favorable reply.

THE DUKE—I rely on you. And rely on my recompense.

LORENZO (alone)—Yes, rely on me! I swear by heaven and by hell, by my mother's breast and by eternal damnation that you will meet me today. You've set your own hour. Oh, my beloved Master, I thank Thee!

AT FOUR o'clock on the same day the most terrifying sounds could be heard coming from Lorenzo's room, and its occupants are none other than Lorenzo himself and Michael del Favolaggino, called Scoronconcolo.

SCORONCONCOLO—Master, haven't we played enough at this queer game?

LORENZO—No, I want them to hear us a long time this afternoon. Cry more loudly.

SCORONCONCOLO—Help! Murder! Lorenzo, of the Devil!

LORENZO—Keep at it! Stamp your foot! Do like I do! (He stamps his feet wildly and cries in a muffled voice) Traitor! Murderer! You've killed me! I'm assassinated! I'm dying!

SCORONCONCOLO (makes a frightful noise, knocks down the furniture, jumps from one end of the room to another)—Help, help! Where are my guards! Help! He's cut my throat!

LORENZO—Louder! One would think you were afraid of shouting. Are you sure the neighbors hear us?

SCORONCONCOLO—Satan, in the depths of hell, can hear us! (He wipes his brow) By my damned soul! What a game you've invented, Master! Why do you make me shout and swear in this room every day?

LORENZO—I've told you hundreds of times. I like to shock the neighbors. The first day they heard us make such a noise they rushed to see what was the matter. Was anything as silly as their fury when, after having looked everywhere for the man we were killing, they realized we were laughing at them? I remember how I roared in their faces! Now that they don't come around any more, I like it even better! I'll swear they flee to the cellars for their siestas! I seem to hear my good neighbors: "That reprobate of a Lorenzo is raving mad, the devil in person is in the house with him! Some day we'll see them both fly up the left chimney!"

SCORONCONCOLO—Say what you like, but no one ever took such pains to annoy his neighbors. There's something you're hiding from me. I've seen too much of the world not to guess something is wrong. You've got some scheme, Master, that you won't confide to me. That's wrong of you.

LORENZO—Well, tell me what you think. If you guess half, I'll tell you the rest.

SCORONCONCOLO—First of all, Master, you have an enemy. Where is the man, great or small, who hasn't one? I have one, the hangman, and if I can slip the rope that you saved me from around his neck, I swear I won't miss him! But that's beside the point. You've an enemy. You've said it a hundred times. I've often seen you, coming back from the palace, stamp your foot and curse the day you were born, swallowing your rage, tearing your breast with your nails, and I've said: When it comes to the point, one of two men must give way to the other. Why should you let yourself be stepped on like a worm? Master, do away with the man who is in your way! You're getting thin and growing melancholy. I've felt like that four or five times, myself, and this is the doctor who cured me (he pulls out his dagger). The last time I used it was at Padua, because of a—

LORENZO—Let me have a look at that dagger. What does "Syrvo a mi Senor, soy viva," mean?

SCORONCONCOLO—That's the Spanish for "I obey my master and I'm quick."

LORENZO (lifting the dagger and examining it with a tense expression)—By the holy mass, Scoronconcolo, it's a good blade if it speaks the truth!

SCORONCONCOLO—Try it, Master, and you'll see.

LORENZO—Friend, you've guessed my malady.

SCORONCONCOLO—I'll cure you at once. What's his name?

LORENZO—Never mind his name!

SCORONCONCOLO—Even if it were the Pope! I'd crucify Christ all over again for you!

LORENZO—Rejoice, then. It's a powerful man, a favorite of the Grand Duke.

SCORONCONCOLO—Even if it were the devil! Even if it were the Grand Duke himself!

LORENZO—Today?

SCORONCONCOLO—This minute.

LORENZO—In an hour. Take this purse of gold. He himself is paying you!

SCORONCONCOLO (opens the purse and looks in)—And well, too! He can count on me!

LORENZO—Listen. I forbid you to touch him if I kill him by the first stroke. If I were strong like you, I wouldn't ask for assistance. But the boar will fight. If I miss him, he'll crush me, weak as I am. I don't care about my life. But I want his! If he escaped. . . . Swear that if he comes into the room he won't go out alive!

SCORONCONCOLO—I swear by the Eucharist, by Saint Plutro and the jaws of hell!

LORENZO—I'll fetch him and bring him here at once. This is where he'll fall.

SCORONCONCOLO—There, great God! And here is the blade that will find his heart! Where shall I wait for you, Master?

LORENZO—In the corridor.

SCORONCONCOLO—But what if Madonna Maria were to see me? She doesn't like me.

LORENZO—Never mind! The women are out and when they come back everything will be over.

SCORONCONCOLO—Amen!

An hour later Lorenzo is in the Grand Duke's room.

THE DUKE—God in heaven! She agreed!

LORENZO—Furious at first, then angry, then tears, then sighs, then many reflections, a long embarrassment, finally an avowal whispered very low, with a blush on her forehead.

THE DUKE—And it's for tonight?

LORENZO—No. This very moment. Let's hasten while my mother is in church praying and meditating on the Holy Epiphany. Follow me alone, discreetly. I'll take you into the house, hide you in my own room.

THE DUKE—Dear Lorenzino! Let's hasten! Here, there! A doublet and a cape! I'm going out! [Continued on page 134]

Q This introductory article starts a series which gives scientific guidance through the army of quacks and the forest of FAKE CURES. Q Next month's article will treat The Vitamin Craze. Q The Truth About Syphilis comes after that. Q Ponce de Leon and the Ring-tailed Monkey divides the false from the true in the cures by glands. Q The other topics are equally important. Q When the series is ended the intelligent reader and the intelligent doctor will have their bearings as the highest science of the day points them out

DOCTORS and Drug-Mongers

By Dr. Paul H. De Kruif

THE GROWTH of the drug industry in the United States is one of the most miraculous of the romances of commerce. Thirty years ago the suffering American had about 2600 remedies at his disposal. Now he, or his physician, can have choice among more than 45,000.

A statement by the Department of Commerce shows that more than four hundred million dollars' worth of drug products were manufactured in the United States during 1921.

If only a small number of this great array of balsams really cured disease, we might expect this phenomenal increase in remedies to be accompanied by a corresponding decrease in the number and terror of our afflictions. This, however, is not the case. For, despite the great advances that have been made in knowledge of the cause and prevention of various diseases, the actual cure of most of them remains a mystery.

Of the great number of healing agents so assiduously advertised and so industriously hawked about, not more than fifty are really necessary in the treatment of all human maladies. And the majority of these needful drugs only relieve pains and soften symptoms. The number of definitely curative items is surely not more than a dozen.

COMPETITION exists among drug-mongers as in all other branches of commerce and industry. This is one of the most important causes of the great number of remedies. Take for example the meritorious laxative, phenolphthalein. In an orderly and sensible world, phenolphthalein might be expected to go only by that, or possibly some more simple name. But under our system of competition, in the hands of zealous drug-mongers this laudable substance has rejoined in a glittering array of aliases, such as Phenolax, Purgen, Purgatol, Purgen Konfect, Laxine, El Zernac, Purgotin.

In essentials these products are the same, they are phenolphthalein. They differ from it only in the fancy name, and in price, which is almost always much higher than the staple drug.

Doctors, in general, are just as gullible as laymen. The ailing female listens to and believes in the alluring promises of Lydia Pinkham. The up and coming young physician, eager to keep abreast of the march of science, is prone to harken to the clever blandishments of drug manufacturers, who flatter him by appealing to his scientific acumen and his desire to progress. So the doctor is bombarded incessantly by tons of advertising literature. This comes to him from drug venders, who make a great noise of being "ethical." By ethical they mean they advertise only to doctors and not to the public.

But it is well known that their austere protests of virtue conceal a beautiful joker. This is best illustrated by the famous nostrum known as "Fellows' Syrup of Hypophosphites." This remedy

Nervous debility, nervous exhaustion, and all asthenic affections of the nervous system, so prevalent to-day, will respond to treatment which will replenish the reduced mineral reserves of the system and supply the necessary phosphorus to restore degenerated nerve cells

FELLOWS' SYRUP OF THE HYPOPHOSPHITES.

"The Standard Tonic for over fifty years," contains the basic elements to ensure normal metabolism, together with the dynamic agents, quinine and strychnine, which make it a true stabilizer of shaken nerves

Samples and Literature sent upon request.

FELLOWS MEDICAL MANUFACTURING CO., Inc.
26 Christopher Street New York, N. Y.

was originally advertised to the public. Its success was modest. Then lay advertising was withdrawn, and an elaborate scientific hocus-pocus explanation of its virtues was concocted. It was based on a medical theory which fifty years ago was known to be absurd. But the compound with its pseudo-science, was now "ethically" hawked to doctors only. They began prescribing it by the thousands. Patients, after paying for doctor's calls and getting nothing but a prescription for Fellows' Syrup, began to ask, "Why pay the doctor's fee, as well as the price of his remedy?" So they began going directly to the drug stores, with the result that gallons, barrels, and hogsheads of this essentially bogus balsam were being sold. Its great success was really due, then, to the doctors, who sanctified it in the minds of their patients by prescribing it.

¶ Are the Druggists to Blame?

IT MIGHT be thought that the drug stores are largely responsible for this traffic. The writer, after discussing this matter at length with numerous pharmacists, finds that this is not true. Druggists aim only to "give doctors and public what they want." They generally do not attempt a propaganda for patent or proprietary medicines. Nor, on the other hand, do they try to discriminate in favor of really meritorious drugs. Their rôle is largely the passive one of the distributor.

While a great part of their income derives from the sale of drugs of dubious merit, they would soon go on the rocks financially, were they to take up the banner for reform. Many of them know that they are doing no public service in helping to make us a nation of aspirin-eaters, but let a pharmacist resolve to sell this and similar drugs only on a doctor's prescription, and his road to bankruptcy would be a short one.

EVERYONE is acquainted with the enormous advertising propaganda that extols the peculiar virtues of "Aspirin-Bayer." Aspirin was originally the patent, now the trademark name of a substance chemically known as acetylsalicylic acid.

This drug properly made is always the same, no matter what its name. But in 1920 you paid sixteen cents an ounce for acetylsalicylic acid and 85 cents an ounce for Aspirin-Bayer. Assuming that it is relatively simple to prepare the staple drug accurately, we pay more than five times the price of the staple for the privilege of swallowing a pill marked "Bayer."

The accompanying table illustrates the great difference in price between the official drug, that the physician can obtain

Wholesale List Prices—April 1920

| Proprietary   |            | Non-proprietary               |            |
|---------------|------------|-------------------------------|------------|
| Aspirin-Bayer | $0.85 oz. | Acetylsalicylic Acid          | $0.16 oz. |
| Phenacetin    | 0.65 oz.   | Acetphenetidin                | 0.27 oz.   |
| Atophan       | 3.50 oz.   | Cinchophen                    | 2.00 oz.   |
| Kelene        |            |                               |            |
| (10 grams)    | 0.56 tube  | Ethyl Chloride (10 grams)     | 0.45 tube  |
| Duotal        | 1.90 oz.   | Guaiacol Carbonate            | 0.80 oz.   |
| Urotropin     | 0.60 oz.   | Hexamethylenamine             | 0.21 oz.   |
| Sulfonal      | 1.70 oz.   | Sulphonmethane                | 0.80 oz.   |
| Trional       | 1.90 oz.   | Sulphon-Ethyl-Methane         | 1.00 oz.   |
| Diuretin      | 1.75 oz.   | Theobromine-Sodium Salicylate | 0.70 oz.   |
| Aristol       | 1.80 oz.   | Thymol Iodide                 | 1.00 oz.   |

HEARST'S International

and prescribe if he wishes, and its trademark brother, which a great number of doctors employ instead. They do this either through ignorance or through some ill-founded faith in the superiority of the name.

In past centuries, to a much greater extent than at present, doctors were aided in their war against disease by the amateur efforts of old crones, good wives, witches, and mountebanks of all sorts. These two groups helped each other mutually in the building up of the imposing and preposterous pharmacy of those days. Some of the most definitely useful drugs of today were discovered by physicians among the yarbs that bekdames and soothsaying old women had used for hundreds of years.

So, the grandames of Shropshire, in England, had known for centuries that foxglove was good for dropsy. This knowledge came to the notice of an English physician named Withering in 1776. He applied the humble herb to the treatment of heart disease with great success. Today we know that the curative value of fox-glove is due to digitalis, a drug admitted by everyone to have saved the lives of thousands of sufferers from this affliction.

But for every one of the really useful remedies that old crones discovered, thousands and tens of thousands were absurd and had no effect on the course of disease beyond their action on the patient's morale. Yet it was believed for hundreds of years that the lungs of foxes were of great benefit to people with asthma and that oil of puppies, mixed with a stew of earth worms, had a marked curative effect on many diseases.

It is common to believe that, when a patient improves after a dose of a remedy, his improvement is due to the remedy. While this may be so, it is by no means necessarily true. For it is well known that the patient might have got well of himself, without any treatment whatever. In a word, old crones and doctors, quacks and eminent professors, are always in danger of falling into the trap of this error in thinking.

¶ The Power of Mind on Body

Another factor helps to keep alive the reputations of charlatans, and to encourage the use of spurious drugs. This is the factor of the mysterious power of the mind over the body. It is the common experience of physicians that the fighting spirit of patients is of great importance in many diseases. Let a patient grit his teeth, spit on his hands, double up his fists, and determine to live, and he frequently pulls through.

The power of mind over body may be encouraged by the engaging personality of a doctor. This is a fortunate fact, and it is regrettable that modern medicine tends more and more to neglect this important task of physicians. But it is imperative to defeat the present exploitation of the public by drug-mongers. One of the ways to do this is to distinguish the personality factor from the drug factor in the treatment of disease.

The following example will show how to distinguish truth from falsehood and how to fight errors of the kind just described.

Sodium Salicylate is a drug which has proved its usefulness in rheumatic fever. It does not cure this dreadful disease, but it is very effective in the relief of pain and other symptoms. This remedy is obtained from two sources. First, it can be prepared from the "natural" oil of wintergreen. Second, it can be made in the laboratory, from coal tar, as one of the by-products of the manufacture of illuminating gas.

The Sodium Salicylate from oil of wintergreen is exactly the same as sodium salicylate from coal tar. When the two products are carefully prepared, expert chemists are unable to tell which is which. But while they are the same chemically, they differ enormously in price. The "natural" salicylate, from the oil of wintergreen costs twenty-two dollars a pound, the "synthetic" salicylate, from coal tar costs forty-five cents a pound.

Now in spite of the fact that these compounds are identical in every way, excepting in price, a curious belief arose among doctors that the more expensive drug was in some mysterious inexplicable way much superior to its cheaper coal-tar brother.

In 1912 the Council on Pharmacy and Chemistry resolved to find out once for all whether there was any foundation to the manufacturer's claims. So samples of the "natural" and "synthetic" salicylate were carefully prepared by an expert chemist. Each product was so labeled that its source was known only to the representatives of the Council. That is, the powders, instead of being marked "Natural" and "Synthetic" were labeled "A" and "B."

The products so prepared were now sent out to a group of the best doctors in the land. They were requested to give "A" and "B" to their patients with rheumatism, and to note whether any difference existed between the effects of the two.

Fifteen complete reports were received. The physicians conducting the test knew they were using sodium salicylate, but did not have knowledge of the source. They were not disturbed by a hunch in favor of one or the other. The result, when the reports were all received, was a smashing demonstration that there was no difference.

This report was published prominently in the Journal of the American Medical Association and so reached the great majority of the doctors of the land. It might be expected that such a crushing demonstration, made without the chance of bias or favoritism, would silence the false claims of the makers of "natural" salicylate.

Not at all. The demonstration was deliberately ignored, or worse, given the lie. This is shown by the accompanying advertisement of the W. S. Merrell Company. The result of the "blind test" was published in 1913. This advertisement was found in a druggist's gazette in 1922.

This test divided the drug-mongers definitely into sheep and goats. The Merrell Company clearly places itself among the latter species.

It is hopeful to find that all manufacturers do not indulge in such forthright flouting of the truth. Inquiry in regard to the natural salicylate was made from the pharmaceutical houses of Merck and of Squibb. Here is the facsimile of the reply of Merck. A similar answer was received from Squibb.

Mr. C. B. Smiles,
Rochefeller Institute for Medical Research,
66th Street & Avenue A.,
New York City.

Dear Sir:

Answering your favor of the 9th inst., - the Council on Pharmacy and Chemistry of the American Medical Association, after extensive trials by many physicians, states that no difference can be detected clinically, either in therapeutic or toxic effects, between salicylates made synthetically and those made from "Natural Oil." (Journal American Medical Association, Sept. 20th, 1913, page 979).

In view of the above we no longer sell the products made from "Natural" Oil of Wintergreen and are, therefore, not in a position to give you, as you request, data concerning the comparative sale of sodium salicylate made from the true Oil of Wintergreen and that made from Ethyl Salicylate.

Regretting our inability to be of service to you in this instance, we remain,

Yours very truly,

Attested: MERCK & CO.

The vicious circle of advertising testimonials on poor evidence, credulity of doctors, more advertising, wider use of the drug, is illustrated by the history of ichthyol.

Ichthyol is an evil smelling substance whose exact chemical composition is unknown. It was first used by peasants of the Tyrolean Alps, and was obtained by them from certain bituminous shale deposits, which contained the fossil remains of fish.

It made its way from a folklore status to the dignity of official use, mainly through its praise by a famous German skin doctor named Unna. This great man pronounced Ichthyol to be valuable in the treatment of various diseases of the skin.

The "Ichthyol Company of Hamburg" was formed, an active propaganda of advertisement began, and the dance was on. The peasants of the Tyrol had very probably used it because it smelled abominably, just as good wives still believe that the rancorous odor of asafetida drives away the evil demons of disease.

The medical profession, both abroad and here, was scarcely more critical, and soon the merits of the concoctions were being whooped up for an endless variety of diseases. It cured chilblains and lumbago, it was beneficial in tuberculosis and typhoid fever. It was death on erysipelas and eczema. Whooping cough succumbed to its beneficent influence and the terrors of rheumatism fled before it.

The medical journals were filled with solemn treatises extolling its virtues. Mumps and measles and migraine were said to yield to its soothing and disease-dispelling effect. It "improved the general condition and increased weight." The writer has, after painful search, enumerated thirty-eight separate diseases that are cured or greatly benefited by it!

There IS a Difference

WHEN you get a prescription for Sodium Salicylate "True" or "Natural", the physician wants Merrell Sodium Salicylate made in our laboratories from oil of birch distilled in our own birch mills.

There is a difference and the physician knows it. He knows that Merrell's true salicylates made from natural birch oil produce less irritation to the gastric tract, less heart depression and are more quickly absorbed, more rapidly eliminated and therefore tolerated in larger doses over longer periods of time, than the synthetic coal tar product.

An extensive advertising campaign on Merrell's Natural Salicylates is now going to physicians.

Ask the Merrell Salesman about our special salicylate offer.

Order from your jobber.

FOUNDED 1828
THE W. S. MERRELL COMPANY
CINCINNATI, U.S.A.

Nowhere in the vast literature on this subject is it possible to find a common sense study of its actual value. Hardly anywhere does one discover a careful fellow who, having, let us say, eight patients with eczema, anoints four of them with Ichthyol and four with sterile mud, and then observes which group shows the greater improvement.

It has been believed, for example, that Ichthyol is important in increasing weight. A German doctor named Zuelzer gave the drug to thirty patients over a period of three months. Eight are reported to have gained weight! How many would have become portly had no Ichthyol been given?

Ichthyol is still sold by the pound, the hoghead, the ton. The Hamburg Company has prospered greatly.

Knowing the success of the Hamburg Company, modifications of Ichthyol with fancy names were placed on sale, both in this country and Japan. Atreol, Hirathiol, Ichtyform and Ichthalbin, Ichthyat and Ichtytar, all fought to take away the supremacy of the original Hamburg Ichthyol. Some of these have been submersed in competition but others survive and prosper greatly.

The mongers of "Ichthyat" stated that their product was essentially identical with the original Ichthyol, but that it was far superior to it in its curative properties. If Ichthyat is "essentially identical" with Ichthyol, its curative action must be the same. It is clearly preposterous to compare the curative activity of anything with that of Ichthyol as a standard, since the genuine curative merit of Ichthyol still awaits definite proof.

Physicians should awake to the fact of their exploitation by drug-mongers, but they cannot fight such exploitation effectively without warring against their own gullibility. They must learn, in the words of Hatcher, "to make accurate observations take the place of vague impressions. . . . Such as 'the medicine seemed to do good,'" and they should know that statements without supporting evidence are wholly valueless no matter how eminent their author may be.

The medical profession is just now under fire from a pack of quacks and rogues. It knows that its use to the nation is great, and that the camorra of chiropractors, faith healers, and quackish rascals are parasites on our citizens. But its battle against cults and "isms" and quackery could be waged more strongly, were the profession to clean its own house.

Q. We all need Vitamins. But where are we to look for the real thing? Not in the drug store. See Dr. De Kruif's article, "The Vitamin Craze," in Hearst's International for October.

C Nora was nineteen years old when, an orphan, she arrived in Dawson, alone. She was as much at home in the tough mining camp as she had been in the deadly desert. On Adam Cravath's arrival at the camp she served him ham and eggs and fell in love with him

The Boy

By William

Illustrated by

ADAM CRAVATH was a slender, diffident, intense boy with an inordinate capacity for enjoyment of adventure tales. From earliest childhood he devoured adventure stories, good, bad and indifferent, thrilling to every written thing of that nature that he could lay his hands on, from the classics to the current nickel weeklies.

He was born and grew to young manhood in a little town in central Illinois. His personal adventurous accomplishments consisted of a half-dozen fist fights during his grammar school career, a near drowning in the muddy swimming hole of the crooked little creek that wound through the corn fields near town, a fall out of an elm tree which he was climbing in search of birds' eggs and a brief five minutes in a swaying buggy behind a runaway horse that ended with a smash-up in a ditch, in which Adam's collar-bone was broken. With these not startling exceptions, his life from the cradle to his twenty-fourth birthday was as ordinary as a loaf of bread. He had the measles and the whooping-cough and the scarlet fever; went through grammar and high school, spent six months in a business college and got a job as bookkeeper with the firm of Brooks Brothers, coal and lumber dealers.

He lived in an eight-room, two-story house on Elm Street with his mother and father and two sisters. The house was white with green shutters. There was a front porch, much used in summertime between dinner and dark, and a front parlor to which ungrudging admission might be gained only by death or marriage.

Adam got nine dollars a week when he went to work for Brooks Brothers, of which he paid his mother three for board. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church and an active member of the Young People's Christian Endeavor Society. The only social high-lights of his life were the oyster suppers in the church basement in the winter and the picnics at Suttler's in the summer.

He saved his money and the Rev. Jason Ogilvie, his pastor, said that any girl who married Adam Cravath could consider herself lucky. The Rev. Ogilvie qualified his endorsement of Adam by admitting that the boy had an unfortunate taste in reading. It was Mr. Ogilvie's opinion, however, that this was a youthful folly from which he would recover when he married and settled down.

IN POINT of physical fact nothing unusual happened to Adam Cravath during the twenty-four years of his residence in his native town, but in the world of fancy, created for him by tales of romance and adventure, Adam led a turbulent, heroic life. He was ever the hero of what he read. He won football games at the last moment; captured criminals in New York dives; frustrated international political tricksters in every capital of the world; brought dismantled, leaking ships to port single-handed; tracked outlaws over the snowy wastes of sub-arctic Canada; fought in South American revolutions; wooed royalty in little Balkan kingdoms; sought treasure in the South Seas and pitted his wits in successful counter-plot against Oriental criminals in the Far East. He was the perfect adventurer. He felt heroic hardship and danger without facing it.

Then, from Alaska, came the whisper of naked gold to be had for the taking by those with the courage and strength to storm the dread barrier built of distance and cold; of snow and ice; of precipitous mountains and treacherous rivers.

It was a whisper that grew into a roar over night; a roar that stirred the imagination of the world. The Alaska of 1898-1900 had a lure, a siren quality that is difficult to understand in these

C *This is Mr. McNutt's
First story for
Hearst's International.
It will make you laugh—
If you can hold back the tears*

Who Read Dime Novels

Slavens McNutt

David Robinson

days, when the habitable far spots of the globe are no more than a night's run distant from rail-head by airplane, and news goes round the world as a voice over the telephone goes from one city office to another in the next block. The Alaska of then was a grim fairy-land where anything, good or bad, might happen; and men entered the territory with a considerable modicum of the spirit of hope and terror with which Columbus turned the prow of his vessel westward on the unknown Atlantic.

Among those who went was Adam Cravath; Adam, the pale, shy, typical small town nice young man with the perfect book-keeper exterior and a secret grand passion to do daring, impossible deeds; Adam, feverish from alternate attacks of extreme hope and fear.

HE WAS twenty-four years old when he started for the North and just about as fit for the adventure as a scrawny, under-sized mongrel pup would be to win a dinner with its teeth from a mob of hungry malamutes.

Kasanak is a desolate rot spot in the Alaska wilderness today. The log cabins that once housed hopeful men, dreaming of millions and dining on sour dough and sow-belly, are falling apart. The wind whistles through them in the winter and in the short hot summer the rapidly growing sub-arctic vegetation smothers them in green. The one short street of stores, dance-halls, saloons and restaurants is a study in ruin. Many have collapsed; the roofs of others have caved in and in all the place not one structure offers sufficient shelter to tempt the occasional passing prospector or trapper from his camp under the sky.

But Kasanak was a live camp for a season; and in that brief

C His pastor said that any girl who married Adam Cravath could consider herself lucky.

time, Nora Nelson operated there as proprietor, cook and waitress of the Gold Hill restaurant. She was a complete product of the frontier mining camp of that time.

Her mother, one of those anachronistic New England women of an earlier day, half grim Puritan, half adventurous soldier of fortune, traveling wild trails on the rapidly receding frontiers of civilization, had died in her husband's arms beside a sage-brush camp-fire on the Utah desert. Nora, hard-trying little animal of twelve, helped with the burial, cooked the supper afterwards and did her weeping when the day's work was done. Thereafter she followed her dreamy-eyed, impractical, partially mad Norwegian father, as her mother had followed him before her, over desert and mountain, living for short periods under roof in some mining town while he worked at day's wages for the grub stake that would enable him to take to the open again in search of gold. She was nineteen years old when her father traveled too far on too cold a day and wasted only twenty-four hours in dying of the savage attack of pneumonia that resulted from the exposure, leaving the girl Nora an orphan alone in Dawson.

She was lovely in a free-moving, Amazonian way, with a wealth of shining straw-yellow hair, a complexion deep cream in color with a hint of bronze that years of sun and wind had left there. She was as efficiently at home in an inhospitable wilderness, deadly desert or tough camp, as a fish in the sea; and she was almost ferociously virtuous. Taking advantage of the poor motherless child took rank with sneaking up on a loose lion and kicking it in the ribs. She could shoot like a circus performer and her favorite target was any man who "got fresh with her."

❊ "It's a hell of a place for a decent-looking kid like you to come to!" Nora declared.

On the morning of Adam Cravath's inconspicuous arrival in Kasanak, the first of the mining camps at which he stopped, she served him ham and eggs and fell in love with him.

QUALITIES common to men of the wilderness and the mining camps had no attraction for her, but her affections went out to Adam the moment she saw him. Previously she had carried about in her mind a black list, on which was written the names of all the men she had ever met. Some were better than others, but they were all bad as far as she was concerned. Adam, slim, pale, diffident, was something new. His weakness appealed to her strength, his boyishness to her maternal instinct. On that first morning, she placed his coffee and his plate of ham and eggs on the table before him, and stood, hands on hips, staring frankly, friendlily down at him.

Adam grew nervous under her steady gaze, fumbled with his knife and fork and blushed furiously. Nora saw the flood of color rise in his face and was amazed thereat. She stared.

"Well, I'll be damned!" she finally said aloud.

Adam choked over his food and shrank perceptibly.

Nora drew out the chair on the opposite side of the table and sat down. "I never seen a man blush before," she said finally. "A new one on me. I kind of like it. Stranger here, ain't you?" Adam nodded, warmed by the girl's friendliness and yet miserable with embarrassment.

"Thought so," Nora continued her close questioning. "Ain't been in this kind of country very long, have you?"

"No," Adam said, finding his voice. "This is my first trip up here."

"It's a hell of a place for a decent-looking kid like you to come to," Nora declared. The girl put her elbows on the table, resting her chin on her cupped palms, staring at him. What did you go and blush for again?" she asked.

"Why—why—I don't know," Adam stammered.

The girl puckered her eyebrows and thought for a moment. Then her face expanded into a slow pleased smile. "I know," she said softly, "it was 'cause I swore, wasn't it?"

Adam tried to deny this but only succeeded in choking over his food and blushing still more furiously.

The girl laughed delightedly. "Where do you come from?" she asked confidentially.

Adam told her.

Don't any of the women there swear?" she asked wonderingly.

"WHY—I don't know," Adam said. "I guess not."

"I guess they don't any of them have to put up with the passel of no-account ornery bums that I have to deal with," Nora declared. "Why a lady couldn't no more feed these tin horn sports and shovel stiffs, that eat in here, without swearing than a man could sing hymns to a mule-team and get where he was going."

She leaned closer and looked at him searchingly. "It don't make you feel funny to have me swear?" she asked.

"Why, no—certainly not! Not a bit of it!"

She looked deep into his eyes for a moment longer and laughed happily. "But it does," she declared delightedly. Then her face suddenly sobered. "You ain't a parson, are you?" she asked him, with a note of real consternation in her voice.

"Oh, no," Adam said. "Certainly not!"

The girl smiled again and sighed with relief. "I really didn't think you was one, you know; I wanted to make sure," she said contentedly. "I 'cause there was a parson once, down below,

C. "Just one kiss, sister," he teased; "you won't miss it."

who heard me swear and he didn't like it either. It made me mad when he didn't like it. I gave him five minutes' worth of cussing that a Mexican mule skinner could have listened to and learned something and I never repeated a word. It don't make me mad 'cause you don't like to have me swear. I don't know why, but it don't. You're different somehow."

"Why—why—I don't mind."

The girl laughed again. There was a throaty note of tenderness in her mirth. "Yes, you do," she contradicted him. "Never mind. I like you not to like it. What are you going to do here?"

"I don't know," Adam admitted. "Maybe I could get work mining."

"With those hands!" she exclaimed. "You'd die before noon the first day! Can you figure?"

"You mean arithmetic? Oh, yes."

"You go to see Peg Shelby in the Miner's Friend store across the street on the corner and tell him I sent you. Tell him I said you're all right. He needs some fellow that can figure." She leaned across the table and laid her hand over his for a moment. "You're a nice kid," she said frankly.

She rose and began busily clearing the adjoining table. "Come in again," she went on. "Anything you want to know about the camp, ask me." On the way to the kitchen, her arms full of dishes, she paused for a second and looked down at him, a strange light in her eyes.

"Gee!" she said, "you're a decent kid." She hustled away, humming.

Adam got work as clerk and bookkeeper in Ben Shelby's general store and miner's outfitting concern. For a time his trip to Alaska, and residence there, netted him no adventure more startling than he had known in his native town in Illinois, but he at least retained his illusions concerning the men about him. He never failed of a thrill when he walked down the one street of the camp crowded with a colorful throng of roughly dressed men, or when he went, only as a spectator, into Pike's Peak, the big saloon, gambling-house and dance-hall, that was the camp's sole source of amusement.

What he lacked in adventure he made up in romance. In the middle of August of that year he became engaged to Nora Nelson. He was very much in love with her, but the success of his suit meant even more to him than the winning of a wife. Nora was one of the few women in camp; and of those few, by far the most desirable. It amazed him that out of all the throng of sturdy men from whom she had to choose, she should have favored him. It was good for his self-respect, surely, if she considered him worthy to be her husband—thus his subconscious reasoning—he must indeed be a man among men. Others in the camp were influenced, more or less, by the same line of mental argument.

They were to be married in October after navigation closed, remain inside for the winter, operate the restaurant for one more summer and then go below in the following fall for their real honeymoon trip. And then Badger Hotchkiss came to camp.

BADGER HOTCHKISS was a fighter; a thick-set, brutal, vain fellow who glorified in his reputation, which was out of all proportion, because the test of courage was out of proportion in that time and place.

Men went to the territory expecting their courage to be tested, fearing secretly, as all men fear in the face of a fore-understood ordeal, that they would not be able to measure up to standard. And so the wide-spread camps of the territory were peopled with men from all walks of prosaic civil life down below, inordinately keen on the question of courage; always on the alert for a test of it, in themselves or others, always ready to over-acclaim or over-condemn a man for his possession or lack of the one quality.

Badger came swaggering into the Golden Hill restaurant one noon, while Adam was eating his lunch. Nora was in the rear busy with dishes.

"Hello, sister," Badger cried out boisterously at sight of her. "I've come for that kiss you cheated me out of up in Dawson." He laughed loudly and strode toward her, arms outspread.

C. Adam was not behaving according to Badger's understanding of the manner in which a human being should act.

David Robinson

Nora grabbed a pot of hot coffee and flung it at him. Badger dodged, laughed and boldly advanced toward her again.

"Just one kiss, sister," he teased. "You won't miss it, Nora." Nora calmly picked up a butcher knife, backed against the wall and waited. "You'll have to grab awful sudden if you want to shirk a date with the coroner," she said coolly. "I'm tired of having you pester me. You come any closer and I'll make this territory a better place to live in!"

Badger halted, laughing, made a feint as if to grab the girl, and then turned to stare curiously at Adam, who was clawing at his arm.

Adam was a sight worth staring at. His face was chalk white, his eyes wide and wild, his slender frame shaking as under the influence of ague.

"You let that girl alone!" he shouted, his fists gripped at his sides. "You let her alone, or I'll—I'll—"

"You'll what?" Badger asked.

"Why, you sniveling little runt, you!" He reached one big hand for Adam and then dodged back just in time to miss the vicious swish of the knife as Nora Nelson sprang at him. He dodged, laughed, caught up a table and holding it in front of him as a shield, fended off the enraged girl who sought his life with all the fury of a maddened animal.

"Well, well, well!" he chuckled, as he backed toward the door. "Smoked out your pet cub, did I? So you've got a fellow at last! That proves you're human, anyhow. Why didn't you pick a man while you were picking? Never mind! I'll take his place after I've run him out of camp. Then you'll wonder whyfore you ever wasted time on a wobbly, two-legged, blattin' little lamb like him."

Standing in the door, with the table still held before him, he looked at Adam and the mockery went out of his face and voice. "You leave town, young fellow," he commanded. "If I catch you in camp after sundown tonight, I'm going to take you apart and forget how to put you together again. You hear me!"

He looked at the girl again, dropped the table and ducked aside, as she threw the knife at him.

"By, sister," he called back from outside. "I'll be around again when your little woolly lamb has run home to its mother where it belongs."

AN HOUR later, Nora called on Peg Shelby, Adam's employer. Peg was a long, lean old Kentuckian, with a shock of white hair, mustache and goatee to match; an aquiline face and a wooden stump to take the place of the leg he had contributed to The Lost Cause. The mining camps of his time knew him for a man who could out-argue lawyers and evangelists and out-shoot gunmen who claimed to be such, which Peg did not.

"I'm gunning for Badger Hotchkiss," Nora announced briefly. "It won't make any bad trouble for me, if I kill him, will it?"

"I'm sorry, Nora," old Peg said pityingly, "but you mustn't kill the skunk. It would make you the worst trouble in the world."

"I don't see why," Nora argued. "He comes pestering me up in Dawson after Dad died there, and I had to smash him with a chunk of firewood to keep him off me. Now he comes sashaying in here and starts bothering me again. He's insulted me, ain't he? Everybody in the territory knows he's a trouble hunter. I'll bet you couldn't get a jury of men no place, to do anything but let me go loose if I went and killed him."

Old Peg shook his head sadly. "You wouldn't get locked up for it, Nora," he said. "You'd make yourself worse trouble than that. Adam's been to see me. He told me about what happened."

Nora flushed. "Well?" she challenged. "That's all the more reason for me killing him, ain't it? I ain't going to let him run Adam out of town, and I sure ain't going to let him beat the boy up, or get into a shooting fuss with him. No sir! Why, Lawdy, Peg! What chance would poor Adam have with him in a fight or a shooting fuss? The poor boy don't scarcely know which end of a gun a bullet comes out of!"

"That's all true enough, Nora," Peg agreed. "It ain't Adam I'm worryin' about; it's you!"

"Me? Huh! I reckon I can take care of myself!"

"THERE'S no doubt about that," Peg admitted. "You can take care of yourself all right. But can Adam take care of you?"

"He don't have to take care of me," Nora boasted.

"Oh, but he does," Peg insisted. "Nora, a woman can't any more be a man for her husband, than a man can be a mother to his wife's children. Adam had it put square up to him and he's got to be a man now or admit to himself that he ain't one. If he does admit that, you're going to be a mighty unhappy woman."

"Do you think I love him any the less just because he can't fight with a big bully like Badger Hotchkiss?" Nora demanded hotly.

"No, Nora, I don't think that. You probably love him all the better because he's not the kind of a man who can fight with Badger Hotchkiss; but if he don't make some sort of a shift at fightin' Badger now, he ain't ever going to keep on bein' the kind of a man he is. A lot of folks say that a woman can't love a man if she knows he's a'scared. That ain't true. But it's a pretty hard business for a woman to get any satisfaction out of lovin' a man when the man himself knows he's scared. If you was to fight Adam's battle now, he'd soon get to hate himself; and when a fellow gets to hatin' himself, it ain't long before other folks start followin' his example; and pretty soon it gets to be a habit with everybody that knows him; and it's a habit that his wife will acquire in time, too. I'm sorry, Nora, but your young man will have to do his own fightin' now, or your chances of bein' happy with him, or makin' him happy with you, are slimmer than a hair off a gnat's eye-brow."

"But he can't fight Badger Hotchkiss," Nora protested tearfully.

"Look at me! He did this to me as easy as I'd squash a fly on a window pane!"

"I know he can't," old Peg Shelby agreed grimly. That's all the more reason why he's just plum got to do it, Nora, my girl."

At ten o'clock that evening in the late, lingering dusk of the Alaska summer night, Badger Hotchkiss met Adam on the street and whipped him unmercifully, practically without opposition, after the first blow; beat him black and blue and bloody, and then kicked him contemptuously into the street, leaving him stunned.

"You mind what I say and get out of town," he addressed the bruised, half-conscious boy lying panting in the mud. "If I catch you dirtying up the scenery around this place come sundown tomorrow, you'll think what I done to you tonight was just something friendly. Hear me, you little runt!"

NEAR to midnight Adam roused old Peg Shelby from his slumbers in the rear of the store. The boy's right eye was swollen shut. The left was less damaged, but encircled with a discoloration. His lips were cut and puffed so that he articulated with an effort.

"My God! Mr. Shelby, what am I going to do?" he asked desperately. "I can't fight this fellow; he's too big and strong for me. I'm just like a baby in his hands; I haven't a chance. What am I going to do?" "Been around to see Nora lately?" Peg asked him quietly. "No!" Adam said dejectedly, "I'm ashamed to see her."

"Good!" said old Peg heartily. "A fellow that can feel ashamed enough to stay away from his woman when he's on the wrong end of trouble, he's got something to work with. Got any ideas of your own?"

"No," said Adam. And then: "Well, yes, you might call it an idea, I suppose. I thought maybe I'd get a gun and hunt him up and shoot at him until he killed me. I suppose he would kill me, wouldn't he?" he asked, piteously.

"He sure would," Peg agreed with him. "Your idea does more credit to your heart than to your brain, son. No, you haven't got a chance with him in a shootin' match, that's sure. It's got to be done different."

"But, my God!" Adam cried desperately. "Look at me! He did this to me as easy as I'd squash a fly on a window pane. I simply can't do anything with him in a rough and tumble."

"Son," said old Peg solemnly, "I lost my leg tryin' to prove to the damn' Yanks that they was all I thought they was, but I learned somethin' doin' it that's been almost worth what it cost me. Son, I learned that there's just as much difference between winnin' a battle and winnin' a war, as there is between bein' broke and bein' a millionaire. Why, son, us fellows in the South, that fit on the contrary side, we won so damned many battles, we just naturally wore ourselves out. But when we was all wore out, the damn' Yanks went and won the war on us, practically with no opposition, as you might say. Now, lickin' a man in just a two-man fight is somethin' like winnin' a battle; but runnin' a man out of town—well, that's more like winnin' a war. Now, Badger Hotchkiss won a battle from you tonight. Most likely he'll win some more battles if you stay around here where he can get at you easily. But that don't necessarily mean, son, that he's goin' to win the war. No, indeed it don't."

"But what can I do?" Adam asked.

"Well, I'll tell you how it was when we was fightin' the damn' Yanks," Peg said in indirect explanation. "We'd lick 'em good an' set down to rest, an' just about the time we got stretched out an' our pipes lit, the doggone, ornery critters 'd come pesterin' an' botherin' round for another lickin'. We'd get up an' give it to 'em an' start to set down again, an' damn me for a Son of a Siwash Sea Cook, if the ornery skunks wouldn't be back for more! You know,

Q. "Don't cry little girl—Everything is all right!"

son, we just licked 'em an' licked 'em, till we finally got wore out an' had to quit. Do you see?"

Adam admitted that he did not see.

Peg dropped his rambling anecdotal manner. He stood erect, his face grim and hard, and laid his gnarled old hand on the boy's shoulder.

"Son," he said sternly, "Badger Hotchkiss give you an awful bad beatin' tonight. It's a little after twelve now. He'll be hellin' round camp somewhere, takin' on likker or triffin' with a poker game some place. You go out and look him up. Wherever you find him, walk up to him and bust him in the eye. You prob'ly won't get in more than one punch, but just you get that one in and get it in good and hard."

"BUT he'll just beat me up again," Adam objected.

"That's precisely what he'll do, son," Peg admitted. "He'll probably whale you so severe that you'll most likely be in bed for a few days gettin' over it. If you have to go to bed, go right ahead and lay quiet till you're able to get up; and just the minute your feet get so you can stand on 'em and use 'em to go an' come you dig right out and locate this Badger Hotchkiss for yourself and bust him again. Just jump right into him the minute you see him. Give him what little you got, take all he hands you and go back to bed again."

"But I can't keep that up forever," Adam said in desperation. "He'll kill me, Mr. Shelby, I feel sure of it."

"Maybe he will, Adam," Peg agreed. "I ain't never been dead, so I can't say for sure, but my guess on it is, that it ain't as unpleasant as the way you'd feel for the rest of your life if you let this fellow Hotchkiss come it over you an' run you out of town, like he's aimin' to."

"But what's the sense of just letting him beat me up time after time after time?" Adam asked.

"Oh, you mustn't let him beat you up," Peg explained. "You mustn't let him do anything. No indeedy! You never get anywhere with a man lettin' him do something. But you just go on makin' him do it, and gettin' in a little poke in the eye of your own once in a while, and if he don't kill you, I'll make you a little bet, Adam Cravath, that he leaves town before you do."

"Do you actually mean to say, Peg, that he'll get scared of me?" poor Adam asked incredulously. [Continued on page 131]

C Janet Spence might have been a suppliant crying for mercy as she crouched there on the floor. Mr. Hutton had suddenly begun to devise a means of escape, but it was too late. "Marriage is a sacred tie," she sobbed. "And your respect for it, even when the marriage was an unhappy one, made me admire and—shall I dare say the word—yes, love you. But we're free now, Henry!"

The Gioconda Smile

By Aldous Huxley

Illustrated by F. R. Gruger

C A story that proves there are no lengths to which a woman will not go to win the man she loves

"MISS SPENCE will be down soon, sir," the servant said. "Thank you," said Mr. Hutton, without turning round. The door closed. Left to himself, Mr. Hutton got up and began to wander round the room looking with meditative eyes at the familiar objects.

Photographs of Greek statuary, photographs of the Roman forum, colored prints of Italian masterpieces, all very safe and well known. Poor dear Janet, what a prig, what an intellectual snob! Her real taste was illustrated in that watercolor by the pavement artist, the one she had paid half a crown for (thirty-five shillings for the frame). How often he had heard her expatiate on the beauties of that skilful imitation of an oleograph! A genuine Old Master for half a crown. Poor dear Janet!

Mr. Hutton came to a pause in front of a little oblong mirror. Stooping a little to get a full view of his face, he passed a white, well-manicured finger over his mustache. It was as curly, as freshly auburn as it had been twenty years ago. His hair still retained its color and there was no sign of baldness yet—only a certain elevation of the brow. "Shakespearean," thought Mr. Hutton as he surveyed the smooth expanse of his forehead.

Others abide our question, thou art free. . . . Footsteps in the sea. . . . Majesty. . . . Shakespeare, thou shouldst be living at this hour. No, that was Milton, wasn't it? Milton, the Lady of Christ's. There was no Lady about him. He was what women would call a manly man. That was why they liked him—for the curly auburn mustache and the discreet redolence of tobacco. Mr. Hutton smiled again; he enjoyed making fun of himself in this way.

Suddenly he became aware that Janet Spence was in the room, standing near the door. Mr. Hutton started as though he had been taken in some felonious act. To make these silent and spectral appearances was one of Janet Spence's peculiar talents. Perhaps she had been there all the time, had seen him looking at himself in the mirror. Impossible! But still it was very disquieting just the same.

"Oh, you gave me such a surprise, Miss Spence," said Mr. Hutton, recovering his bland smile and advancing with outstretched hand to meet her.

Miss Spence was smiling too, her Gioconda smile, he had once called it in a moment of half-ironical flattery. Miss Spence had taken the compliment seriously and always tried to live up to the Leonardo standard. She smiled on in silence while Mr. Hutton shook hands.

"I hope you're well," said Mr. Hutton. "You look it."

WHAT a queer face she had! That small mouth pursed forward by the Gioconda expression into a little snout with a round hole in the middle as though for whistling—it was like a penholder seen from the front. Above the mouth a well-shaped nose, finely aquiline. Eyes large, lustrous and dark, with the largeness, luster and darkness that seems to invite sties and an occasional bloodshot suffusion. They were fine eyes, but unchangingly grave. Above them a pair of boldly-arched, heavily-penciled eyebrows lent a surprising air of power, as of a Roman matron, to the upper portion of the face. Her hair was dark and equally Roman.

"I thought I'd just look in on my way home," Mr. Hutton went on. "Ah, it's good to be back in the country after a stuffy day of business in town."

Miss Spence, who had sat down, pointed to a chair at her side. "No, really, I can't sit down," Mr. Hutton protested. "I must get back to see how poor Emily is. She was rather seedy this morning." He sat down nevertheless. "It's these wretched liver chills. She's always getting them. Women—" He broke off and coughed. He was about to say that women with weak digestions ought not to marry; but the remark was too cruel, and he didn't really believe it. Janet Spence, moreover, was a believer in eternal flames and spiritual attachments. "She hopes to be well enough," he added, "to see you at luncheon to-morrow. Can you come? Do!" He smiled persuasively. "It's my invitation, too."

She dropped her eyes and Mr. Hutton thought that he detected a certain reddening of the cheek. It was a tribute; he stroked his mustache.

"I should like to come if you think Emily's really well enough to have a visitor."

"Of course. You'll do her good. You'll do us both good. In married life three is often better company than two."

"Oh, you're cynical."

Mr. Hutton always had a desire to say, "Bow-wow-wow," whenever that last word was spoken. It irritated him more than any other word in the language. But instead of barking he made haste to protest.

"No, no. I'm only speaking a melancholy truth. Reality doesn't always come up to the ideal, you know. But that doesn't make me believe any the less in the ideal. Indeed, I believe in it passionately—the ideal of matrimony between two people in perfect accord, I think it's realizable. I'm sure it is."

HE PAUSED significantly and looked at her with an arch expression. She had her charms. And there was something really rather enigmatic about her. Miss Spence made no reply but continued to smile. There were times when Mr. Hutton got rather bored with the Gioconda. He stood up.

"I must really be going now. Farewell, mysterious Gioconda." The smile grew intenser, focused itself, as it were, in a narrower snout. Mr. Hutton kissed her extended hand. It was the first time he had done such a thing.

With a gesture that was almost the blowing of a kiss he started to run down the drive, lightly, on his toes, with long bounding strides like a boy's. He was proud of that run; it was quite marvelously youthful. Still, he was glad the drive was no longer. Once out of sight of the house, he let his high paces decline to a trot and finally to a walk. He took out his handkerchief and began wiping his neck inside his collar. What fools, what fools! Had there ever been such an ass as poor dear Janet? Never, unless it was himself. Why did he persist?

He had reached the gate. A large, prosperous-looking motor was standing at the side of the road.

"Home, McNab." The chauffeur touched his cap. "And stop at the cross-roads on the way as usual," Mr. Hutton added as he opened the door of the car. "Well?" he said, speaking into the obscurity that lurked within.

"Oh, Teddy Bear, what an age you've been!" It was a fresh and childish voice that spoke the words. There was the faintest hint of Cockney impurity about the vowel sounds.

Mr. Hutton bent his large form and darted into the car with the agility of an animal regaining its burrow.

"Have I?" he said as he shut the door. The machine began to move. "You must have missed me a lot if you found the time so long." He sat back into the low seat; a cherishing warmth enveloped him.

"Teddy Bear. . . ." and with a sigh of contentment a charming little head reclined on Mr. Hutton's shoulder. Ravished, he looked down sideways at the round, babyish face.

He covered the babyish face with kisses. The car rushed smoothly along. McNab's back, through the front window, was stonily impassive, the back of a statue.

"Your hands," Doris whispered. "Oh, you mustn't touch me! They give me electric shocks."

Mr. Hutton adored her for the virgin imbecility of the words. "The electricity isn't in me, it's in you." He kissed her again whispering her name several times, "Doris, Doris, Doris." The scientific appellation of a sea mouse, he was thinking as he kissed the throat she offered him, white and extended like the throat of a victim awaiting the sacrificial knife.

"Oh, Teddy Bear!" (More zoology; but he was only a land animal. His poor little jokes!) "Teddy Bear, I'm so happy."

"So am I," said Mr. Hutton. Was it true?

"But I wish I knew if it were right. Tell me, Teddy Bear, is it right or wrong?"

"That's just what I've been wondering for the last thirty years."

"Be serious, Teddy Bear. I want to know if this is right, if it's right that I should be here with you and that we should love one another and that it should give me electric shocks whenever you touch me."

"Right? Well, it's certainly good that you should have electric shocks rather than repressions. Read Freud; repressions are the devil."

"Oh, you don't help me. Why aren't you ever serious? If only you knew how miserable I am sometimes, thinking it's not right. Sometimes I think I ought to stop loving you," she said, on the verge of tears.

"But could you?" asked Mr. Hutton, confident in his powers of seduction and in his mustache.

"NO, TEDDY BEAR, you know I couldn't. But I could run away, I could hide from you, I could lock myself up and force myself not to come to you."

"Silly little thing!" He tightened his embrace.

"Oh, dear, I hope it isn't wrong! And there are times when I don't care if it is."

Mr. Hutton was touched. He had a certain protective affection for this little creature. He laid his cheek against her hair while the car, swaying and pitching a little as it hastened along, seemed to draw in the white road and the dusty hedges toward it devouringly.

"Good-by, good-by."

The car moved on, gathered speed, vanished round a curve, and Doris was left standing by the signpost at the cross-roads. She had half a mile in which to invent the necessary lies.

Mrs. Hutton was lying on the sofa in her boudoir, playing patience. In spite of the warmth of the July evening a wood fire was burning on the hearth.

"Phew! Isn't it rather hot in here?" Mr. Hutton asked as he entered the room.

"You know I have to keep warm, dear." The voice seemed breaking on the verge of tears. "I get so shivery."

"I hope you're better this evening."

"Not much, I'm afraid."

The conversation stagnated. Mr. Hutton stood leaning his back against the mantelpiece. Mrs. Hutton continued to play patience. Arrived at an impasse, she altered the position of one card, took back another and went on playing. Her patience always came out.

A The spectacle of Janet Spence evoked in Hutton an unfailing curiosity. He was sure that there was something queer behind that Gioconda smile. The only question was—what exactly was there?

"Dr. Libbard thinks I ought to go to Llandrindod Wells."

"Well, go, my dear, go, most certainly."

Mr. Hutton was thinking of the events of the afternoon: how they had driven, Doris and he, up to the hanging wood, had left the car to wait for them under the shade of the trees and walked together out into the windless sunshine of the chalk down.

"I'm to drink waters for my liver and he thinks I ought to have massage and electric treatment, too."

Hat in hand, Doris had stalked four blue butterflies that were dancing together round a scabious flower with a motion that was like the flickering of blue fire. The blue fire burst and scattered into whirling sparks; she had given chase, laughing and shouting like a child.

"I'm sure it will do you good, my dear."

"I was wondering if you'd come with me, dear."

BUT YOU won't be alone. You'll have your maid with you." He spoke impatiently. He was being dragged back from the memory of the sunlit down and the quick, laughing girl, back to this unhealthy overheated room and its complaining occupant.

"I don't think I shall be able to go," she faltered.

"But you must, my dear, if the doctor tells you to."

"No, I can't face it. I'm too weak. I can't go alone." Mrs. Hutton pulled a handkerchief out of her black silk bag and put it to her eyes.

"Oh, Lord! Now do be reasonable. Listen now, please." Mrs. Hutton only sobbed more violently. "Oh, what is one to do?" He shrugged his shoulders and walked out of the room.

Mr. Hutton was aware that he had not behaved with proper patience; but he could not help it. Very early in his manhood he had discovered that not only did he not feel sympathy for the poor, the weak, the diseased and deformed; he actually hated them. It was not, he knew, a very comely emotion and he had been ashamed of it at first. In the end he had decided that it was temperamental, inevitable, and had felt no further qualms.

On the following day Mrs. Hutton came down to luncheon. She had had some unpleasant palpitations during the night, but she was feeling better now. Besides, she wanted to do honor to her guest. Miss Spence listened to her complaints about Llandrindod Wells and was loud in sympathy, lavish with advice. Whatever she said was always said with intensity. Bang! the charge in her soul was ignited, the words whizzed forth at the narrow barrel of her mouth. She was a machine gun riddling her hostess with sympathy. Under the bombardment Mrs. Hutton opened out like a flower in the sun.

Mr. Hutton looked on in silence. The spectacle of Janet Spence evoked in him an unfailing curiosity. His wife and Doris—they were nothing more than what they seemed to be. But here one could be sure that there was some kind of queer face behind the Gioconda smile and the Roman eyebrows. The only question was: what exactly was there?

In the midst of his speculations he heard his wife asking the maid to run up to the house for her medicine. Suddenly solicitous, he jumped to his feet and smilingly offered to go for it himself.

"But perhaps you won't have to go to Llandrindod after all," Miss Spence was saying. "If you get well quickly, Dr. Libbard will let you off."

"I only hope so. Indeed, I do really feel rather better today."

Mr. Hutton felt ashamed. How much was it his own lack of sympathy that prevented her from feeling well every day?

"My dear, I wouldn't eat those red currants if I were you," he said, suddenly solicitous.

"But I am so fond of them," Mrs. Hutton protested, "and I feel so well today."

"Don't be a tyrant," said Miss Spence, looking first at him and then at his wife. "Let the poor invalid have what she fancies; it will do her good."

"Thank you, my dear." Mrs. Hutton helped herself to the stewed currants.

THEY sat in the garden after luncheon.

Mr. Hutton took a deep breath of the warm and fragrant air. "It's good to be alive," he said.

"Just to be alive," his wife echoed, stretching one pale knot-jointed hand into the sunlight.

A maid brought the coffee; the silver pots and the little blue cups were set on a folding table near the group of chairs.

"Oh, my medicine!" exclaimed Mrs. Hutton. "Run in and fetch it, Clara, will you. The white bottle on the sideboard."

"I'll go," said Mr. Hutton. "I've got to go and fetch a cigar in any case."

He ran in toward the house. On the threshold he turned round for an instant. Miss Spence was bending over the table, pouring out the coffee.

"Do you like sugar in your coffee?" Miss Spence inquired.

"Yes, please. Give me rather a lot. I'll drink it after my medicine to take the taste away."

Behind her Miss Spence was making a delicate clinking among the coffee cups.

"I've given you three large spoonfuls. That ought to take the taste away. And here comes the medicine."

Mr. Hutton had reappeared, carrying a wine-glass half full of a pale liquid.

"It smells delicious," he said, as he handed it to his wife.

"That's only the flavoring." She drank it off at a gulp, shuddered and made a grimace. "Ugh, it's so nasty! Give me my coffee."

Miss Spence gave her the cup; she sipped at it. "You've made it like syrup. But it's very nice after that atrocious medicine," she admitted.

At half-past three Mrs. Hutton complained that she did not feel as well as she had done and went indoors to lie down. Her husband was sympathetic, gave her his arm to the house.

"A rest will do you good," he said. "By the way, I shan't be back till after dinner."

"But why? Where are you going?"

"I promised to go to Johnson's this evening. We have to discuss the war memorial, you know."

"Oh, I wish you weren't going." Mrs. Hutton was almost in tears. "Can't you stay? I don't like being alone in the house."

"But, my dear, I promised—weeks ago." It was a bother having to lie like this. "And now I must get back and look after Miss Spence."

He kissed her on the forehead and went out again into the garden. Miss Spence received him aimed and intense.

"Your wife is dreadfully ill," she fired off at him.

"I thought she cheered up so much when you came."

"That was purely nervous, purely nervous. I was watching her closely. With a heart in that condition and her digestion wrecked—yes, wrecked—anything might happen."

"Libbard doesn't take so gloomy a [Continued on page 124]

❖ "It's all my fault," Doris wailed. "I shouldn't have loved you. If they do anything to you I shall kill myself."

C Northcliffe has been the most powerful newspaper man in Europe. He has made and unmade statesmen. He has bought a multitude of papers and given some of them astonishing circulations. The other day the cables flashed the news of his breakdown. It followed his defeat in a finish fight with a little Welshman whom he had helped to make Prime Minister. As we go to press the whole world is wondering whether Northcliffe can come back as he has come back from lesser breakdowns.

Is Northcliffe Through?

By Norman Angell

For ten years Managing Director of the Paris edition of the Northcliffe Daily Mail

ONE speaks of "the Northcliffe press" and has in mind the series of morning, evening and weekly newspapers, properly speaking, known to, say, an American who spends a few weeks in England: the London Times (the most "historic" paper in the world); the Daily Mail, with a circulation of more than a million copies a day—which is greater than the circulation of any morning paper published in the United States; the Daily Mirror, the paper of illustrations with a circulation close to the million mark; the Evening News, the evening edition of the Daily Mail, with a circulation of about three-quarters of a million; the Glasgow Mail and Record, a Scottish daily of large circulation; the Weekly Despatch, a Sunday paper (as the London daily papers do not publish on Sundays, the Sunday papers belong to a special class and have often enormous circulations); as well as other Sunday and weekly journals.

But we shall never understand how Northcliffe obtained his power, nor its nature, unless we keep in mind the fact that the Northcliffe press consists mainly not in these daily papers at all, enormous as is their influence, but in certain organs of which the visiting American probably never hears, of the existence of which indeed most educated Englishmen are unaware.

The "Harmsworths," as they were called before they became ennobled, were an extremely wealthy publishing firm and had great power in the formation of English feeling and opinion (though many would deny this), long before they published a daily paper, or indeed anything which could be described as a newspaper, properly speaking. And even today the main source of their revenue is not in the daily press but in some eighty publications which constitute the reading matter of perhaps the greater part of the British population and make up the greatest publishing business in the world.

And that organization, with the colossal fortune and influence that has resulted from it, has been built up by a man who is not yet old, who was penniless and unknown when he began, in a conservative country suspicious of innovations, whose capital was already provided with great newspapers.

I have seen statements in the American press to the effect that Northcliffe is of working-class origin, or at least not of the social order which makes him a "gentleman" in the European sense. This is wrong. He comes of the upper middle classes, from which, until a few years ago, the rulers of England were mainly drawn. His father was a barrister of the Middle Temple—that is to say, an Advocate in the English Courts. The family is of partly Irish stock (Alfred, the Viscount-Northcliffe-to-be, was born in Dublin) with, however, humorously enough, both German and French affiliations.

In his intercourse with his subordinates Northcliffe usually displays great courtesy and charm, exercising a real magnetism over those with whom he comes in contact. Although autocratic in his methods of administration, he is, in his social contact, democratic, simple; though not a good conversationalist—for reasons I will indicate presently—he has a pagan zest in life, a schoolboy attitude and humor which make him a good companion. His heads of departments often become close personal friends, staying at his country houses, knowing his family, meeting his friends. He is a model employer. Quick, it is true, both to "fire and to hire," but generous to the point of extravagance in his recognition of merit. This by way of discounting certain legends.

Alfred was the eldest of a very large family of brothers, and when in the normal order of events he would have gone to the University, the family fell upon hard times, and instead, at sixteen, he went into the world, and with astounding rapidity was able to provide and make careers in one way or another for every one of those brothers. Parenthetically, his lavish generosity to them, as to his mother, is entirely characteristic of a side in him which no one who knows him would want to minimize.

It is important to note the choice he made.

The England of the eighties was, we may recall, the England of William Morris, Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, Newman, Carlyle, Herbert Spencer, Bradlaugh, Gladstone, Dilke, Parnell and all that they stood for in social and moral and intellectual ferment; it was the England of Fabianism, Positivism, Estheticism, the beginnings of political Labor and Feminism, of a definite Republicanism, of the struggles around Irish Home Rule. Men were beginning to "find out the industrial revolution"; to discover that steam and electricity had not really liberated England, but rather had filled it with slums and a new and perhaps worse oppression and poverty, and were looking for salvation rather to new social and moral ideas, and everywhere young men were dreaming dreams of the New World that they would cause to be born.

A. Into a new world—the England of the eighties—came young Alfred Harmsworth, completely indifferent to the political upheavals of that time. But later, as Lord Northcliffe, he was to play a tremendous role in the politics of his generation.

To all this young Alfred, who was one day to play so big a rôle in the politics of his generation, seems to have been completely indifferent.

WE GET the key to Northcliffe's incredible success, to the real character of his influence and the nature of the problem which the Northcliffe influence in British politics represents when we note that the journalist, who was to have more weight in politics than any journalist his country had known, lays out his campaign for the capture of the nation's mind by disregarding political ideas and movements altogether and by turning to the journalism which concerns itself with the bicycle, sport, photography, amusement, boys' interests. Not only was this the type of newspaper work in which he was mainly engaged as a free lance in the years from sixteen to twenty-three, but the same method of approach is reflected when he came to establish papers of his own.

His first—and most characteristic—venture was Answers. Answers belongs to a category of publication for which the United States has no duplicate. And it rather defies description. It is addressed presumably to adults. Format; eight inches by twelve; paper, very cheap news print; type smaller than that current in newspapers. The first item on the first page of the first number of this historic sheet is a ten-line paragraph about an idiot that had a habit of shouting the hours when the clock indicated them; the second paragraph, twenty lines, is devoted to describing the intelligence with which an anonymous ass worked a horse pump; the third item deals with the beginnings of silk stockings; the fourth with "The Origin of Grog"; the fifth the origin of hair-powder; the sixth with the discovery of some fossil bacon. Later numbers contain on the front page a selection of the kind of joke one may still see in American country papers on the editorial page.

L To the end of worsening at certain crises the character of the English mind, making it more trivial, less balanced, sometimes more cruel and vindictive, by giving it what it wants when it wants it, Lord Northcliffe has contributed as no man before him.

Young Harmsworth applied the principle of "Following what succeeds, and doing it more so." He offered a pound a week for life to the competitor who would come nearest to guessing the amount of money, on a certain date, in the Bank of England. There was the usual dodge of coupon, two attested names, etc. Result: seven hundred thousand competitors, and the paper brought to the attention, through the names on the coupons, of three million people.

In a few years the profits on this one publication amounted to over a quarter of a million dollars annually.

The backbone of this business is the weekly periodical, publications for boys, for girls, for the home, dealing with amusements, dressmaking, hobbies, cooking, "society," fiction, but not dealing with any problem or idea in politics, or sociology or religion (though the firm publishes religious periodicals). The firm has never produced a publication that gave any large place to the discussion of "general ideas." One or two of the more recent of the children's publications (The Children's Encyclopedia; The Little Paper, etc.) are excellent, and seem to be improving, and constitute at times an exception to the general rule.

To what must we ascribe its enormous success? To two things: First, the Education Acts of 1870 which made it compulsory for every English child to be taught to read (this brought into being by 1888 a public of tens of millions for whom the existing press—stolid, heavy, leisure-demanding—made no provision), and, secondly, the genius which Harmsworth showed for understanding the new type of public.

He found that such publishers as were catering for it went on a fundamentally fallacious principle.

When the Harmsworths turned to daily journalism, they made a success in that field for the same reasons which had given them success in the field of periodicals. The old type of English newspaper—long verbatim reports of Parliaments, law cases and political speeches; "weighty" and ponderous discussions of foreign affairs, no condensation of news, no headlines—was produced with an eye purely to the servant-keeping class, the clubman, the merchant, the politician, the country rectory—say a reading public of perhaps a million in all. The Harmsworths, when they established the Evening News and a little later the Daily Mail, went after the remaining forty millions or thereabouts—the women left at home, the typist, the bus conductor, servant girl, everybody—and got them.

And it got them by the same methods which had made Answers and its progeny a success. Harmsworth knew that "public affairs" were not for the million. Public affairs were, for the women, for instance, the fashions, "society," what people were wearing; for the men, sport, the "human element" in the police cases, personalia in politics. The study of the inattentions and the trivialities of the public mind became with Northcliffe a profound science.

AND so millions bought his papers because of their way of reporting a boxing match, distributing pictures to reading matter in a certain proportion and a certain way, presenting the fashions as they had not been presented before in a daily press. And having obtained power by that order of motive on the part of the public, that power was used for purposes to which the motive had no relation. It is because of his sports or his fashion page, not because of any idea that the public really has of his capacity to deal with politics or economics, that Northcliffe is an enormous force in deciding the issues of Free Trade and Protection, peace and war.

That is the supreme paradox of Northcliffe political power. The founder of Answers may have the soundest of political judgment, a genius for economic and political problems, all sorts of qualifications for statesmanship, but it is not in any case those things which have given him his political power. The thing which gave him the power of statesman had nothing to do with statesmanship.

In war time he can dominate politicians as he proved when he was largely instrumental in the deposition of Asquith and the putting in power of Lloyd George. But when peace comes the politicians can in some measure defy the sensational press, as George has defied Northcliffe. And this is a suggestive indication of the limitation of Northcliffe's powers.

The 1905 election in England was fought on the issue of a chauvinist and Protectionist Imperialism versus Liberalism, Free Trade and Conciliation in South Africa. The Harmsworth Press was "all out" for the former policy and in opposition to the latter. And much of the London press, seeing how a Jingo line had coincided with phenomenal expansion of circulation, had followed suit. If the "stunt press," as it has come to be called in England, could be considered as, in all circumstances, either the leader or the representative of the active political public opinion, Chamberlain should have carried all before him and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman should have been swept into limbo. The exact contrary occurred. Someone has said of that election that "all the press was on one side and all the votes on the other." This is not the place to analyze that really extraordinary manifestation and is recalled here only as throwing some light on what was to happen ten years later in the dramatic struggle between two great personal embodiments of democracy—or demagoguery, if you will—Lord Northcliffe and Mr. Lloyd George.

To understand the Northcliffe-George incident and its outcome certain things must be kept in mind. On the one question that the Germans must be beaten George and Northcliffe were of one mind. But if they were of one mind on war policy, they were certainly not of one mind on the policy of the settlement. And of this from the beginning, undoubtedly, Mr. Lloyd George has been much more aware than Lord Northcliffe.

As a pro-Boer critic of Chamberlain and Harmsworth in the Boer War, and with the memory of the intensity of popular feeling aroused even over that hole-and-corner affair, George knew that during a war of the dimensions of the last, the type of mind and policy represented by Northcliffe, and the power of his press in giving expression to it, would be supreme. For the period of the war he would not challenge that press; he would use it. But he knew also that he would have to challenge it when it came to the settlement. As his memorandum of 1918 shows, his is far too "political" and realist a mind to believe that the Northcliffe policy of extermination of, or everlasting enmity to, a people of seventy millions in Central Europe (or to peoples of two hundred millions if we include Russia) can possibly work. On this point he had very definite ideas argued, thought out, tested, where Northcliffe had only the feelings, the common passions, animosities and hates. Would he be able to use Northcliffe in war and challenge him in peace?

The details of the Asquith-George-Northcliffe episode of 1916 are still matters of controversy, but the broad outlines are plain enough. In 1915 Northcliffe—whose sincere conviction that he was pursuing a policy essential to the success of British arms need not be doubted for a moment—began a campaign of violent criticism of the British Cabinet as it then existed. All were included—Balfour and Grey were attacked as bitterly as Asquith and Hal-dane—except one: Mr. Lloyd George. Partisans of Asquith represent George as having gone behind the backs of his colleagues to come to a bargain with this outside critic: "Support me against the others and I will support your policies."

What we know is what happened: That Asquith and Grey went; that their going was largely the result of the fierce campaign that Northcliffe waged against them; that George, whose claims were warmly supported by the Northcliffe press, came into power as Prime Minister, that he and Northcliffe became extremely intimate, and that Northcliffe came to occupy various offices—Director of Enemy Propaganda (of all things!), head of the British War Mission in America. Titles were distributed among Northcliffe's newspaper staff like pies at a picnic—Knighthoods to correspondents, Baronetcies to business managers, Orders of the British Empire to head clerks.

SUCH WAS the relation between the two up to the Armistice. And then Northcliffe made it plain that just as he had decreed who should govern—and consequently what policy should be followed—during the war, so he intended to dominate the conditions of peace. Already he had made himself virtual arbiter of what policies the nation should be allowed even to consider. When Lord Lansdowne and others presumed to suggest, for the nation's consideration, the policy of an earlier and negotiated peace, he had decided that the British people—or that very large proportion whose mind he controlled—should not be allowed to know that responsible people were making such a suggestion.

The first tussle with Mr. Lloyd George came at the 1918 election. Northcliffe had demanded among other things that the Germans should be made to pay "the whole cost of the war." Now George knew perfectly well, as his memorandum showed, that the Germans could not be made to pay the whole costs of the war, and that it would be disastrous to try to make them. It was evident that in going to the people for a "mandate" in 1918, he wanted to be free of any such undertaking. The Northcliffe press was immediately on his trail and there began one of the campaigns that it knows how to organize. Day after day in its pages was a slogan, "HE HAS NOT SAID IT." The public began to demand that he "say it." Well, at the end he was obliged to "say it"—and it has bedeviled his policy ever since.

ONCE THE election was over, a subtle change set in in the attitude of the public to the whole thing. It had had its fill of crises and politics and sensations and national disasters. After five years of war-strain it wanted to amuse itself—and Northcliffe discovered that his rampagings against Lloyd George fell flat. If the Prime Minister would indulge in an occasional diatribe against the Germans the public was content to leave him alone. Mr. George soon found this out and said in effect to Lord Northcliffe, "Do your damndest!" There came an occasion when in a speech in the House of Commons he declared that his erstwhile colleague and confederate "had no more judgment or reliability than a grasshopper." And the House roared its approval. He had defied this Jove and no thunderbolts fell. Nothing happened. For the time being George was master of the situation and Northcliffe, with all his power, found that now he could do nothing. And when Lord Northcliffe left on his much-heralded world tour, some of his newspaper colleagues were unkind enough to suggest that it was to nurse his discomfiture at having been worsted in this duel with the politician for whose accession to power he was so largely responsible.

To the end of worsening at certain crises the character of the English mind, making it more trivial, less balanced, sometimes more cruel and vindictive, by giving it what it wants when it wants it, Lord Northcliffe has contributed as no man before him. One may detest the task which, on occasion, he has accomplished, and admire the real genius he has brought to it.

One need not blame the man. He is a manifestation of certain social forces. Little given to introspection, Northcliffe has doubtless followed such garish light as he happened to see.

If blame there be, it is with the public.

C Back in the old home town when a girl lightly remarked that they served good sodas at Bundy's you knew it was up to you to buy. But when a very upstage young lady in New York says the same thing, how is a fellow to "get" just what she means?

C. Poor Joe wished she weren't so perfect; somehow he felt he wasn't making any headway. He just couldn't interest her.

In The New York Manner

By Lucian Cary

Illustrated by Charles D. Mitchell

JOE THAYER came down Fifth Avenue swinging his stick as if he owned the street. It was a whangee stick and it was that kind of morning. It was that morning in April when spring boldly announces herself; that morning when the myriads of buds on the trees in Madison Square actually burst into myriads of tiny leaves of the tenderest and palest green; that morning when the street vendors suddenly abandon gardenias for violets; that morning when Fifth Avenue is full of new hats. On such a morning it occurs simultaneously to thousands of young men that New York is full of pretty girls.

Joe arrived at the offices of Shotwell & Orme just in time to see Miss Robinson disappear through the door that led to the art department. She hadn't seen him. She had turned just as he came out of the elevator. If the elevator had been two seconds faster she would have seen him. In which case she would have smiled and said, "Good morning, Mr. Thayer." And Joe would have walked into his new office and smiled happily at his new secretary and said something about what a grand morning it was and whistled while he looked over his mail. But the elevator was slow, too slow. Joe walked into his office frowning thoughtfully and merely nodded to his secretary.

On his desk was a booklet entitled, "In the New York Manner." Joe picked up the booklet and read it through from cover to cover. Then he walked over to the window and looked down on Madison Square.

Of course you can look down on Madison Square on the day that spring comes and think how fortunate it is that men who are out of work can sit on the benches and be warmed by the sun—for nothing. Or you can think that after all spring comes more poignantly in the heart of Manhattan, where there are so few evidences of her, than in the country, where there are so many. You can, indeed, think anything you please. But Joe Thayer could only wonder what to do about Miss Robinson. It was six months since he had come on from Indiana to make a place for himself in the offices of Shotwell & Orme. It was six months since Uncle Jim Shotwell, leading him casually through the art department, had introduced him to Miss Robinson and she had looked up from her drawing-board long enough to smile and say, "Good morning, Mr. Thayer." In that six months he had succeeded. That is, he had succeeded with Shotwell & Orme. He had a new job and a new office and a secretary entirely his to command. But he was exactly where he was in the first place with Miss Robinson. She had never said anything to him but "Good morning, Mr. Thayer." When, as this morning, the elevator was too slow, she didn't even say that.

IT WASN'T that Miss Robinson was especially unapproachable or distant or anything like that. Joe had never said anything to her but, "Good morning, Miss Robinson." Not even, "Isn't it a nice day?" And especially not, "Where are you going to lunch?" Why hadn't he? He asked himself that question now. Why hadn't he? Why?

It was because she was so extraordinarily pretty in such a quiet, distinguished way. And because her voice was so cool and smooth—one of those contraltoish voices. And because of the air with which she carried herself, of the way she wore her clothes. She was simply dressed always. But her clothes so exactly suited her. She looked as if she could step into a Rolls-Royce without the slightest trace of self-consciousness—as a matter of course. In short, it was because she had the New York manner.

Joe sat down at his desk and idly turned the leaves of the booklet. It had been printed to advertise the wares of a dealer in men's furnishings. It raised, and answered in detail, the question of how a young citizen of the metropolis ought to dress in order to say quietly but unmistakably that he belonged. It spoke of simplicity and distinction and ease.

"What is it that gives a man that assured ease, that secure self-confidence?" the booklet asked. And it proceeded to answer: "Above everything else it is the knowledge that he is appropriately dressed for the occasion."

Joe decided that the answer said altogether too much. It distinctly implied that if you were appropriately dressed you would have assured ease, secure self-confidence. Indeed, he had intended to imply that when he had written it. He had believed it was so. When he had invented that slogan—"In the New York Manner"—he had been convinced that the right clothes were a sure way to achieve the New York manner. But there seemed to be a catch in it somewhere. There was more to it than just clothes.

Suppose you were from a small city in Indiana. Suppose you knew the ways of that town backward and forward, so you were never in doubt as to what was what. Suppose you knew exactly how to proceed from the stage of "Good morning, Miss Robinson," to the stage of kissing her good night just before you left her at her own front door. Suppose you could do all this quite perfectly in Indiana—what would you do in New York?

Back home you would be meeting the girl in Main Street two or three times a week. One day you would ask her if she wouldn't go into Bundy's drug-store and have a soda. She would. And then you'd naturally walk home with her. And then she'd naturally say, "Why don't you come and see me some time?" You would. And then you'd ask her to the next Saturday night dance at the Country Club. By that time you'd be calling her Susan and she'd be calling you Joe and everybody in town would know that she was your girl. And then—of a moonlight night in May, one of those glamorous nights, the kind they have in Indiana, when the elms have made a leafy arch over Main Street and the odor of lilac is sweet on the wind—you'd be walking home with her and you'd take her arm and then you'd snuggle her hand into yours and then as you were saying good night you'd just naturally put your arm around her and kiss her.

But what would you do in New York?

HE WOULD never meet her casually in Fifth Avenue. At least he never had. He didn't even know whether she came down on the subway or on the bus or walked. He had followed her out of the building often enough at five o'clock in the afternoon. But he had been afraid to stay close behind her for fear she would think he was following her. And so he had lost her in the crowd immediately.

But supposing he did get up his nerve to wait for her and ask if he might walk up the Avenue with her—assuming that she did walk up or would, when the weather was fine—and that she acquiesced. What would you do then? What was the next step? You couldn't very well ask her to step in and have a soda. That would be small-town stuff. You could ask her out to lunch. But it was a kind of rule, an unwritten rule, but still almost a rule, that you didn't do that kind of thing at Shotwell & Orme's. What he really wanted to do was to ask her out to dinner. But he could hardly do that right off. And besides, what kind of a place would he ask her to? Delmonico's? That would seem awfully swanky. On the other hand he didn't want to take her to any of the Italian table d'hôtes where he ordinarily dined himself. They were all noisy and crowded and none of them was good. Not good enough, certainly. The truth was he didn't know enough about restaurants to choose, even if he knew her well enough to ask her to go to one. He had been so busy holding his job since he'd got down to New York that he hadn't been around. Now he recalled the story somebody had told him of the young man from the Middle West who had met the perfect girl and wanted to do the perfect thing and so he had taken her to dinner at the Pennsylvania Station.

Joe considered that he might ask her to go to the theater. That might seem—might be—a bit unexpected. But he could casually mention the fact that he had complimentary tickets to something, and if she expressed interest he could go and buy tickets. Only if he committed himself to one particular show it might prove to be something she'd already seen. It probably would. And if he should manage to ask her to the theater what would he wear? His dinner jacket, of course. That reminded him of something he had written about dinner jackets in the booklet entitled, "In the New York Manner." He had called especial attention to the backless white waistcoat, cut in the new short-waisted fashion. He had read about it in the "What the Man Will Wear" column in the theater program or in Fancy Bazaar, he couldn't remember which. He'd have to get one himself right away. It had been designed in London—for dancing—cooler.

That was the single result of his hour's cogitation of what to do about Miss Robinson. He'd go out and buy a new waistcoat to go with his dinner jacket. A white one. That was as far as he'd got. But it was farther than he had ever got before. His previous cogitations on the subject had never reached any result.

JOE WENT out at lunch time and bought the white waistcoat and had it sent home. Perhaps it was the boldness of that act which helped him on to a further boldness late that afternoon. At a quarter to five he put on his hat and said good night to his secretary and went down to the lobby of the building and waited for Miss Robinson. When she came out of the elevator he followed her. When she reached the door he was beside her. He lifted his hat and said, "Why, good afternoon, Miss Robinson." Just like that.

"Why, how do you do, Mr. Thayer," she said and smiled that smile of hers.

"I hope," Joe said, "I hope you're walking up the Avenue."

It occurred to Joe even before she spoke that he had said exactly the right thing.

"Yes," she said, "I am."

He fell into step with her.

He couldn't think of exactly the right thing to say next. But he was glad he was carrying a stick and that he carried it as if he were used to carrying it—he'd been carrying it since the very first day he had landed in New York and there was no human being on Manhattan Island who had ever seen him in the days when he was not known to carry a stick.

"I heard today," Miss Robinson said, "that your booklet on men's furnishings has made a hit with the client."

"I had a lot of fun doing it," Joe said modestly.

"That's a good slogan," Miss Robinson added. "I mean, 'In the New York Manner.'"

Joe wondered what she would think if she knew that she had been the inspiration of that phrase. But it was the last thing he would ever tell her.

"Well," Joe said, "I'm not going to pretend that I don't rather fancy it myself."

They walked on a block in silence and then Joe asked her what she was working on.

"Furniture," Miss Robinson replied, with a touch of bitterness. "It's an impossible job. The client wants sketches of rooms with his period furniture. But he insists that every detail of his product must be drawn to scale. And that throws the whole drawing out."

That started them off talking shop. Which was good for many blocks. Joe didn't realize he had passed Forty-fourth Street,

C. "If a girl puts her arm around your neck, in the fashion one occasionally sees among flappers," Miss Ponsonby-Smith was ever so correct, "you can only avoid dancing with that girl again."

which was where he lived, until they were opposite Hicks's, half a mile north on the Avenue. Miss Robinson called his attention to the Hicks window.

"Isn't that gorgeous?" she asked.

Hicks's window was full of fruit—every known kind of fruit. Yellows and reds and greens.

"They have marvelous fresh fruit sodas," Miss Robinson remarked as they walked on.

IT WAS all Joe could do to keep from saying, "Shan't we try one?" But he did keep from saying it. He had made that decision in advance. Fortunately so. If he had been taken unawares he might imagine she wanted a soda. Whereas, having thought it out in advance, he knew she was just making a casual remark.

At Sixtieth Street she paused.

"I go east here," she said. That, he knew, was another remark.

Joe decided instantly that he would let her assume that he went farther north. He didn't want her to know that he had walked a mile past his street. He raised his hat.

"Good night," he said.

"Good night," she answered.

He caught just the flash of a smile, and then the curve of her cheek, and she was gone. He walked four blocks farther north before he realized that he was going in the wrong direction. He would have to ask her to dinner, he decided, as he rode down the Avenue on a bus. And in the meantime he would look up places. He'd try a few. Then he'd know exactly what he was getting into.

He went home and tried on the new waistcoat. It fitted. But it was short-waisted and so were his trousers. The two met, but by a dangerously small margin. He hunted up two small safety pins and after much pinning and re-pinning, he secured the waistcoat to the trousers. Then it occurred to him that he'd better go out and try a restaurant that very night. What he

Q. Miss Robinson was so extraordinarily pretty in such a quiet distinguished way. In short it was because she had the New York manner needed was a dress rehearsal. And then he remembered the restaurant—Cyrano's, of course. He had heard about it and read about it often enough. Why hadn't he thought of it before? He would dress and go there.

Dressing involved unpinning the union between his waistcoat and trousers, in order to put on a dress shirt, and then re-pinning. But he managed it more quickly this time. In half an hour he was in a taxi. In forty minutes the waiter was suggesting a cold consommé and Joe was accepting the suggestion.

"And after that," he said, "I'd like the suprême of Guinea Hen Jeannette."

He had no idea what it would be like but he intended to find out.

"Very good, sir," said the waiter, and departed.

Joe was free to look about and see what Cyrano's was like. He affected a faint smile, a slightly bored smile, and half-closed eyes while he studied the room. It was, he decided, quietly exotic. It was done largely in black, with a design in dull gold and green, faintly suggesting peacocks, for relief. The tables were small, the lights were carefully shaded, the carpets were thick. There was no music. But he was not especially impressed with the patrons. At least a third of them were not in evening dress. And those who were hardly matched the unique setting the restaurant provided. Joe wondered if the crowd at Delmonico's was any more distinguished.

The cold consommé was refreshing but not exciting. He awaited the suprême of Guinea Hen with interest. It proved to be cold also—it was in fact cold jellied chicken. While he ate it Joe wondered what kind of salad a habituë of such a restaurant as this would order. He considered endive, which he had always thought unnecessarily bitter. He considered watercress, which he happened to like very much. Watercress grew profusely in the brook at home. He decided in favor of the endive.

"Sir," said the waiter, "I regret to say we have no endive."

"Hmmm," said Joe, and frowned reproachfully.

"Have you—by any chance—some watercress?" he asked.

The waiter bowed.

"Yes, sir."

When he had eaten the watercress, Joe ordered a demi-tasse but continued to study the menu. The truth was he was still hungry. But he didn't want a sweet. He considered cheese. He found cheese a la Cyrano.

"What," he asked, "is that—cheese a la Cyrano?"

"That, sir, is a specialty of the house," the waiter said. "Very good, sir."

"Bring me some," Joe said.

The cheese was very good. It seemed to be a mixture of cheeses, made into little balls, like butter balls. It had distinction. Cyrano's would do. The check was seven dollars.

Joe reflected that there was one advantage in staying at home nights and working for six months. You saved enough money so you could look around a bit. He had money in the bank—enough so he could easily spend some on a pair of dress trousers designed for a short waistcoat. He would order them the next day. He would have to wait a few days before he walked up Fifth Avenue with Miss Robinson again. He must seem to be casual. . . .

He got the trousers, by insisting, in a week. But the moment he tried them on he perceived that they demanded a new jacket. That took another week. So it was two weeks before he waited for Miss Robinson in the lobby again.

This time he said, "Hello, there," most informally when he raised his hat. And she responded as informally with a "Hello."

She was wearing a new dress, with a cape and a hat to match—a cape that rippled as she walked. His elbow accidentally touched hers. And for two blocks he couldn't think of anything to say. She was altogether lovely. She was fearsomely lovely. What if he said the wrong thing? And how could he ask her to dinner? He kept thinking of ways of bringing up the subject—ways that were clumsy, ways that were involved, ways that wouldn't do. He couldn't make up his mind to any of them. He knew he'd get flustered and ball it all up and show his ineptitude. And she was so cool, so assured, so absolutely at ease. She always was.

But coming to Sixtieth Street she happened to say something about "Dulcy" and that brought up the theater and he said something about what a long run "Sally" had had, and she said she hadn't seen it and without stopping to think Joe said he hadn't either, but why didn't he get tickets.

"I'd like to go very much," Miss Robinson said.

"Shall we make it tonight?" Joe asked.

Miss Robinson shook her head.

"No," she said, "I don't believe I could before next week."

"Monday then?"

"Yes, Monday will be fine," said Miss Robinson, and smiled her most gracious smile.

Joe got tickets at an agency on the way home. It was fortunate she had made it Monday—his new dinner jacket would be finished. And then he remembered he didn't know her address. But of course he could ask her at the office. And when he called for her he might, seeing her against the background of her own home, place her a little better.

As a matter of fact he couldn't. It was a brown-stone house in East Sixtieth Street—one of those houses which fails to reveal in any outward way whether it has been remodeled into apartments or not. A white-capped maid opened the door and a second later she came down the stairs in a lovely little frock of green and silver that showed her throat and her arms to advantage, and in a third second they were in the taxi and on their way to the New Amsterdam Theater.

Q. "It's nice to meet you this way," said Joe. "I wish there was some place we could go—or something." Across the street an electric sign announced: Dancing 25 cents. "I'd like to go over there and dance," said the perfect Miss Robinson.

For the first time, as he sat beside Miss Robinson, Joe felt that possibly he hadn't stretched the truth—much—when in writing that booklet he had implied that the appropriate clothes gave a man that quiet assurance, that secure self-confidence. He kept it until the finale. And then, when he was trying to think of the right phrases—the casual New York manner phrases—in which to suggest a supper place, he realized that almost any place he might choose would have dancing and he didn't dare dance with her. His dancing had done well enough in Indiana. But he didn't know how they danced in New York. He had never danced in New York. There was nothing to do but grab a taxi and take her home. He was so sore at himself that he hardly spoke on the way to East Sixtieth Street.

"Well," he said, as the taxi paused in front of her door, "I thought it was mildly amusing, didn't you?"

"Why," said Miss Robinson, "I thought it was good. Marilyn Miller is really charming and Leon Errol was really funny."

"I'm awfully glad you liked it," Joe said, as he handed her out of the taxi.

Miss Robinson held out her hand.

Joe took her hand in his for the briefest of moments.

"I liked it very much," she said warmly. "Good night."

Somehow or other, Joe reflected as he rode home, the evening hadn't been the success it had started out to be. He had played his rôle adequately, as they say of actors who don't matter much one way or the other. No, he hadn't been adequate. He hadn't been able to dance. At least he hadn't been sure that he was able. He remembered now that he had read an article about the modern dance as observed in New York. The writer said that jazz was losing favor and more tuneful music was taking its place and dancing was becoming more dignified and more graceful. It was that article that had worried him. He wondered how he could acquire the New York manner in dancing.

The very next day Joe saw an advertisement in the classified columns of a newspaper that answered this question. A Miss Ponsonby-Smith, who gave a Riverside Drive address, offered to teach correct dancing. Private lessons only. Ten dollars a half hour. Anybody who charged that price must be good, Joe decided. He did not dare call her up from the offices of Shotwell & Orme. But at lunch time he found a telephone booth outside and managed to make an appointment for that afternoon at half-past four.

MISS PONSONBY-SMITH received Joe in a room which contained nothing but a large mirror and a victrola. And she did not require either of these pieces of equipment for the first fifteen minutes of the half-hour that was to cost him ten dollars. Miss Ponsonby-Smith began with a lecture. What she said, in her extremely polite phrases, was that the right people weren't doing the rough stuff any more. It didn't sound like that but that was what she meant. She sounded like the article Joe had read. Joe wondered if by any chance she had written it herself. If she hadn't written it she had certainly read it. She repeated it almost verbatim. That done, she called Joe's attention to the mirror.

"Now," said Miss Ponsonby-Smith, "take the position for dancing and observe yourself in the glass."

Joe did it, but he found it singularly embarrassing. Miss Ponsonby-Smith corrected carefully the manner in which he grasped her right hand with his left. Then she corrected with equal care the way he had placed his right hand.

"Now," she said, "you will see in the mirror that there is at least four inches of clear space between us."

Joe observed that she was quite right. There was.

"Never, under any circumstances, reduce that distance," Miss Ponsonby-Smith said. "To do so is vulgar."

"Yes," said Joe.

Miss Ponsonby-Smith released herself and put a record on the machine and started it.

"Of course," she said, "if the girl puts her arm around your neck, in the fashion that one occasionally sees among flappers, you have no recourse—you simply cannot dance properly. You can only avoid dancing with her again."

"Yes," said Joe.

"Now," said Miss Ponsonby-Smith, "we will dance. A perfectly plain, fox-trot walk."

Joe started off with her. For perhaps a minute he was extremely awkward, but Miss Ponsonby-Smith could dance and the moment he discovered that, the rhythm of the music got hold of his feet.

"Why," she said, when the piece was finished, "you dance quite decently. With half a dozen lessons you would pass muster anywhere. Come tomorrow at the same hour."

Joe gave her a ten-dollar bill. But he had mental reservations about six more lessons. Indeed, about any more lessons. Only it was simpler to drop Miss Ponsonby-Smith a note saying he had been suddenly called out of town on business than it was to refuse her appointment. He had found out what he wanted to know. . . .

When next he waited for Miss Robinson in the lobby at five o'clock he had decided to ask her to dine with him. He walked all the way up to Sixtieth Street without asking her, but at the last moment he got the courage.

"I'd like it awfully if you'd go to dinner with me some night," he said.

Miss Robinson smiled. Her smile was an acceptance.

"Could you by any chance go tonight?" he asked.

"Why——" she hesitated.

"We'll go to Cyrano's," he finished.

"Why, yes," Miss Robinson said. "I'd like to."

"Shall I call for you at seven-thirty?"

"Yes," she said. And again the delicious curve of her cheek cut off her smile as she turned to go home.

JOE RUSHED back to Forty-fourth Street to put on his new dinner clothes. No need to insure the meeting of these trousers and that waistcoat with safety pins. The new trousers were reassuringly long-waisted. Joe surveyed the final effect with a profound satisfaction. He was impeccable.

She came down this time in a little dress of black silk with a big black hat that framed her face and earrings of coral. She was perfect. Joe entered Cyrano's that night as if it was his habit to dine there.

"Cold consommé, sir?" asked the waiter. It was the same waiter who had served Joe two weeks earlier.

Joe glanced at Miss Robinson.

"Oh, quite," said Miss Robinson.

Joe studied the menu. But the only item to which there wasn't some objection was the suprême of Guinea Hen Jeannette. At least he knew exactly what it was.

"How would you like the suprême of Guinea Hen?" he asked. "They do that rather well here."

Miss Robinson acquiesced. And after the suprême she acquiesced in a watercress salad. And then she acquiesced in a demi-tasse.

"I can recommend the cheese à la Cyrano," Joe said, with great ease. "It's a specialty of the house."

Again Miss Robinson accepted his suggestion. Joe felt it was all going off very well indeed. But when they had finished their coffee his doubts returned. She was polite, even agreeable. But she wasn't—well, she was almost too calm, as if she were a bit bored. Somehow he just didn't get any further with her.

Joe lit a cigarette slowly while he gathered himself for speech.

"You know," he said, "I'd like to dance. Why don't we stroll down to the Biltmore or the Astor?"

"Why don't we?" Miss Robinson asked. So they did. That is, they took a taxi.

The music was good and she was a beautiful dancer, after the entirely restrained fashion recommended by Miss Ponsonby-Smith and the article on the new tendency among those in the know. But somehow Joe felt that she didn't specially enjoy dancing with him. He had somehow the sense that she could enjoy dancing a lot. Only she wasn't—tonight. It was as if some pall of formality hung over the occasion. It was as if they were two who had just been formally introduced and never expected to meet again and hadn't the slightest interest in each other—really. That was the trouble with the New York manner. It was impalpable but it was also a little impenetrable. It was a smooth and glassy surface.

AND YET he knew she wasn't just a surface. She was a keen workman, drawing every day from nine to five in a fashion to satisfy one of the most exacting advertising firms in the world. And she was human, too. She was capable of warmth and friendliness and laughter. He knew it. He could feel it. Only somehow he failed to stir all that in her. She was just as pleasant as she could be. But she didn't seem interested.

Joe made a desperate effort to find a subject that would arouse her interest. But he couldn't. It was as if they were two polite, well-bred, and entirely sophisticated New Yorkers passing a polite, well-bred, and entirely dull evening [Continued on page 135]

The Author of
The Jungle
Tells a Story of the Second Coming

LUCIUS WOLCOTT HITCHCOCK
Carpenter faced him without flinching.

They Call Me Carpenter

By Upton Sinclair

Illustrated by Lucius Wolcott Hitchcock

WESTERN CITY called him a red anarchist, though the message he gave was only a paraphrase of the words spoken by Christ. He who said, "They call me Carpenter," appeared first to a young man who, beaten by a mob, sought refuge in St. Bartholomew's Church. To the young man's fevered imagination, the figure literally appeared to step out of a great stained-glass window behind the altar. Later these two, the rich young man and Carpenter, met Mary Magna, queen of movie vamps, and Mr. T-S, motion picture magnate. With T-S, they went to dinner at the fashionable Prince's and there they ran into another mob, for Prince's waiters were on strike. But policemen were on hand to hold this mob in check. After dinner the party started for T-S's studios to see some night scenes shot. Carpenter and the rich young man rode in the car of Mrs. Stebbins, a wealthy society woman. Her son drove and his reckless driving led to a fatal accident. In a tenement section of the city the car struck and killed one child and seriously injured another. Carpenter cared for the wounded little one, and his commanding presence saved Mrs. Stebbins and her son from rough usage at the hands of the infuriated people. Afterwards the sick and the crippled were brought to Carpenter and many of them he cured. On the next morning the prophet appeared at the Labor Temple. Then he readily won friends and was asked to speak at a mass meeting. The papers of Western City already had been giving space to the strange man. After his address at the strikers' meeting he was denounced as a red and held up to ridicule. The Western City Times was particularly caustic with reference to Carpenter's day before the meeting but it reached its height in commenting on the speeches at Grant Hall.

A Synopsis of what happened after the Figure from the Stained-Glass Window came to Life.

THE Western City Times went on to tell about the "red riot of talk" at the Labor Temple. James, the striking carpenter, had indulged in virulent and semi-insane abuse of the rich; after which the new prophet had stirred the mob to worse frenzies. The Times quoted sample sentences, such as: "Do not think that I am come to bring you ease and comfort; I am come to bring strife and disorder to this world."

I turned to the editorial page, and there was a double-column leader, made extra impressive by leads. "AN INFAMOUS BLASPHEMY," was the heading. Perhaps you have a Times in your own city; if so, you will no doubt recognize the standard style for this sort of thing.

"For many years this newspaper has been pointing out to the people of Western City the accumulating evidence that the men who manipulate the forces of organized labor are Anarchists at heart, plotting to let loose the torch of red revolution over this fair land.

"But even though they had no respect for the works of man, we thought at least they would spare the works of God, the most sacred symbols of divine revelation to suffering humanity. But yesterday there occurred in this city a performance which reveals the bosses of the Labor Trust as wanton defilers of everything that decent people hold precious and holy.

What was this spectacle? A moving picture producer, moved by blind, and we trust unthinking, lust for gain, produces in our midst an alleged 'prophet,' dressed in a costume elaborately contrived to imitate and suggest a Sacred Presence which our respect for religion forbids us to name; he brings this vile, perverted creature forward, announcing himself to the newspapers as 'fresh from God,' and mouthing phrases of social greed and jealousy with which for the past few years the Hun-agent and Hun-lovers in our midst have made us only too sickeningly familiar. This monstrous parody of divine compassion is escorted to that headquarters of pro-Germanism and red revolution, the Labor Temple, and there performs, in the presence of moving picture cameras, a grotesque parody upon the laying on of hands and the healing of the sick. This appears to be a scheme for making a moving picture star; this 'Carpenter'—note the silly pun—is to become the latest sensation in million-dollar movie dolls.

"But the worst has yet to be told. The masters of the Labor Trust, not to be outdone in bidding for unholy notoriety, had the insolence to invite this blasphemous charlatan to their riot of revolutionary ranting called a 'protest meeting.' He and other creatures of his ilk, summoning the forces which are organizing red ruin in our city, proceed to rave at the police and the courts for denying to mobs of strikers the right to throw brickbats at honest workers looking for jobs, and to hold the pistol of the boycott at the heads of employers who dare to stand for American liberty and democracy! This 'prophet fresh from God,' as he styles himself, is a man of peace and brotherly love—oh, yes, of course! We know these wolves in sheeps' clothing, these pacifists and lovers of man with the gold of the Red International in their pockets. We shall be much mistaken if the order-loving and patriotic people of our Christian community do not find a way to stamp their heel upon this vile viper before its venom shall have poisoned the air we breathe."

THEN I PICKED up the Advertiser. Our Advertiser does not go in so much for moral causes; it is more interested in getting circulation, for which it relies upon sensation, and especially what it calls "heart interest," meaning sex. It had found what it wanted in this story, as you may judge by the headlines:

MOVIE QUEEN PAWNS JEWELS FOR PROPHET OF GOD

Then followed a story of which Mary Magna was the center, with T-S and myself for background. The reporter had hunted out the Mexican family with which Carpenter had spent the night, and he drew a touching picture of Carpenter praying over Mary in this humble home, and converting her to a better life. Would the "million-dollar vamp," as the Advertiser called her, now take to playing only religious parts? Mary was non-committal on the point; and pending her decision, the Advertiser published her portraits in all of her most luxurious rôles.

The telephone rang, and there was the voice of T-S, fairly raving. He didn't mind the Advertiser stuff; that was good business, but that in the Times—he was going to sue the Times for a million dollars; by God, and would I back him in his claim that he had not put Carpenter up to the healing business?

After a bit, the magnate began apologizing for his repudiation of the prophet. He was in a position, just now with these hard times, where the Wall Street crowd could ruin him if he got in bad with them. And then he told me a curious story. Last night, after the meeting, young Everett, his secretary, had come to him and asked if he could have a couple of months' leave of absence without pay. He was so much interested in Carpenter that he wanted to follow him and help him!

"Y' know, Billy," said the voice over the telephone, "Y' could 'a' knocked me over vit a fedder! I said to him, 'Vot you gonna do?' And he said, 'I gonna learn from Mr. Carpenter to be a better man.' Den he vaits a minute and he says, 'Mr. T-S, he told me to foller him!' J' ever hear de like o' dat, Billy?"

"What did you say?" I asked T-S.

"Vot could I say? I hadda tell him to go ahead, and come back before he forgot all my business."

I dressed, and had my breakfast, and drove to St. Bartholomew's. It is always such a pleasure to see that goodly company of ladies and gentlemen, so perfectly groomed, so perfectly mannered, breathing a sense of peace and well-being. Ah, that wonderful sense of well being! And what a curious contrast with the Labor Temple! For a moment I doubted Carpenter. Surely it was better to be serene and clean and pleasant, than to be terrible and bewildered, sick and quarrelsome! I was seized by a frenzy, a sort of instinctive animal lust for this life of ease and prettiness.

I BOWED to a score or two of the elegant ladies, and to their escorts in shiny top hats and uncreased kid gloves, and went into the exquisite church with its glowing stained-glass window, and looked up over the altar—and there stood Carpenter! I tell you, it gave me a queer shock. There he was, up in the window, exactly where he had always been; I thought I had suddenly wakened from a dream. There had been no "prophet fresh from God," no mass-meeting at Grant Hall, no editorial in the Times! But suddenly I heard a voice at my elbow: "Billy, what is this awful thing you've been doing? That terrible prophet creature, and getting your name into the papers!"

So I knew it was true, and I walked with my dear, sweet old auntie down the aisle, and there sat Aunt Jennie, with her two lanky girls and also Uncle Timothy. Uncle Timothy was my guardian until I came of age, so I am a little in awe of him, and now I had to listen to his whispered reproaches—it being the first principle of our family never to "get into the papers." I told him that it wasn't my fault I had been knocked down by a mob, and surely I couldn't help it if this man Carpenter found me while I was unconscious, and made me well. Nor could I fail to be polite to my benefactor, and try to help him about. My Uncle Timothy was amazed, because he had accepted the Times story that it was all a "movie" hoax.

I was trying to think about that picture over the altar. Of course, they would naturally have replaced it! I wondered who had found old de Wiggs up there; I wondered if he knew about it, and if he had any idea who had played that prank. I looked to his pew; yes, there he sat, rosy and beaming, bland as ever! I looked for old Peter Dexter, president of the Dexter Trust Company—yes, he was in his pew, wizened and hunched up, prematurely bald. And Stuyvesant Gunning, of the Fidelity National—they were all here, the masters of the city's finance and the pillars of "law and order."

The organ pealed and the white-robed choir marched in, bearing the golden crosses, and followed by the Reverend Dr. Lettuce-Spray, smooth-shaven, plump and beautiful, his eyes bent reverently on the floor. They were singing with fervor that most orthodox of hymns:

The church's one foundation
Is Jesus Christ, her Lord.

During the singing, the Reverend Lettuce-Spray had moved silently into the pulpit. After the choir had sung "Amen," he raised his hands in invocation—and at that awesome moment I saw Carpenter come striding up the aisle!

He knew just where he was going, and walked so fast that before anyone had time to realize what was happening, he was on the altar steps, and facing the congregation. You could hear the gasp of amazement. The rector in the pulpit stood with his mouth open, staring as if seeing a ghost.

THE PROPHET stretched out both his hands, and pointed two accusing fingers at the congregation. His voice rang out, stern and commanding: "Let this mockery cease!" Again he cried: "What do ye with my name?" And pointing over his head: "Ye crucify me in stained glass!"

There came murmurs from the congregation, the first mutterings of a storm. "Oh! Outrageous! Blasphemy!"

"Blasphemy?" cried Carpenter. "Is it not written that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands? Ye have built a temple to Mammon, and defile the name of my Father therein!"

The storm grew louder. "This is preposterous!" exclaimed my Uncle Timothy at my side. And the Reverend Lettuce-Spray managed to find his voice. "Sir, whoever you are, leave this church!"

Carpenter turned upon him. "You give orders to me—you who have brought back the money-changers into my Father's temple?" And suddenly he faced the congregation, crying in a voice of wrath: "Algernon de Wiggs! Stand up!"

Strange as it may seem, the banker rose in his pew; whether under the spell of Carpenter's majestic presence, or preparing to rush at him and throw him out, I could not be sure.

And Carpenter pointed to another part of the congregation. "Peter Dexter! Stand up!" The president of the Dexter Trust Company also arose, trembling as if with palsy.

"Stuyvesant Gunning! Stand up!" And the president of the Fidelity National obeyed. But the procedure was halted suddenly, as a tall, white-robed figure strode from its seat near the choir. Young Sidney Simpkinson, assistant to the rector, went up to Carpenter and took him by the arm.

"Leave this house of God," he commanded.

The other faced him. "It is written, Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh His name in vain," he answered.

Young Simpkinson wasted no further words in parley. He was an advocate of what is known as "muscular Christianity." He flung his strong arms about Carpenter, and half carrying him, took him down the steps and down the aisle. As he went, Carpenter was proclaiming: "It is written, My house shall be called a house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves. He that steals little is called a pickpocket, but he that steals much is called a pillar of the church."

By that time, the prophet had been hustled two-thirds down the aisle; and then came a new development. Unobserved by anyone, a number of Carpenter's followers had come with him into the church; and these, seeing the way he was being handled, set up a cry: "For shame! For shame!" I saw Everett, secretary to T-S, and Korwsky, secretary of the tailors' union; I saw someone leap at Everett and strike him a ferocious blow in the teeth, and two others leap upon the little Russian.

C. The men began to sing and the words of the prophet were drowned out. "Come along now. I guess we've heard enough of this," said a policeman, pushing through the crowd and seizing Carpenter.

I started up, involuntarily. "Oh, shame! Shame!" I cried, and would have rushed out into the aisle. But I had to pass my uncle, and he had no intention of letting me make myself a spectacle. He threw his arms about me, and pinned me against the pew in front; and as he is one of the ten ranking golfers at the Western City Country Club, his embrace carried authority. I struggled, but there I stayed, shouting, "For shame! For shame!"

The mêlée came quickly to an end, for the men of the congregation seized the half dozen disturbers and flung them outside. I sank back into my seat, my worthy uncle holding my arm tightly.

All this time the Reverend Lettuce-Spray had been standing in the pulpit, making no sound. Now, as the congregation settled back into order he said, with the splendid, conscious self-possession of one who can remain equal to the occasion: "We will resume the service." And he opened his portfolio, and spread out his manuscript before him, and announced:

"Our text for the morning is the fifth chapter of the gospel according to St. Matthew, the thirty-ninth and fortieth verses: 'But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil; but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man shall sue thee at law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also.'"

I SAT through the sermon, and the offertory, and the recessional. After that my uncle tried to detain me, but he no longer used physical force, and nothing but that would have held me. I ran round the corner to where my car was parked, and within ten minutes I was on Western City Street, where Carpenter had announced that he would speak.

The wide street was packed solid for a block, and in the midst of this throng stood Carpenter, upon a wagon, making a speech.

There was no chance to get near, so I bethought me of an alley which ran parallel to the street. There was an obscure hotel on the street, and I entered it through the rear entrance, and had no trouble in persuading the clerk to let me join some of the guests of the hotel who were watching the scene from the second story windows.

The first thing which caught my attention was the figure of Everett, seated on the floor of the wagon from which the speech was being made. I saw that his face was covered with blood. Nevertheless, there he was with his stenographer's notebook, taking down the prophet's words. He told me afterwards that he had taken even what Carpenter said in the church. "I've an idea he won't last very long," was the way he put it; "and if they should get rid of him, every word he's said will be precious. Anyhow, I'm going to get what I can."

C. The prophet's voice rang out—"Let this mockery cease. What do ye with my name?" Then, pointing two accusing fingers, he cried, "Algernon de Wiggs, stand up!"

Also I saw Korwsky, lying on the floor of the wagon, evidently knocked out; and two other men whom I did not know, nursing battered and bloody faces. Then I gave my attention to what Carpenter was saying.

He was discussing churches and those who attend them. Later on, my attention was called to the curious fact that his discourse was merely a translation into modern American of portions of the twenty-third chapter of St. Matthew; a free adaptation of those ancient words to present-day practices and conditions. But I had no idea of this while I listened; I was shocked by what seemed a furious tirade, and the guests of the hotel were even more shocked—I think they would have taken to throwing things out of the windows at the orator had it not been for their fear of the crowd. Said Carpenter:

1. The banker rose; partly under the spell of Carpenter's majestic presence, and partly it seemed preparing to throw him out.

"The theologians and scholars and the pious laymen fill the leisure class churches, and it would be all right if you were to listen to what they preach, and do that; but don't follow their actions, for they never practice what they preach. They load the backs of the working classes with crushing burdens, but they themselves never move a finger to carry a burden, and everything they do is for show. Whoever exalts himself shall be abased, and whoever humbles himself shall be exalted.

"Woe unto you, doctors of divinity and Catholics, hypocrites! For you shut up the kingdom of Heaven against men; you don't go in yourself and you don't let others go in. Woe unto you, doctors of divinity and Presbyterians, hypocrites! for you foreclose mortgages on widows' houses, and for a pretense you make long prayers. For this you will receive the greater damnation! Woe unto you, doctors of divinity and Methodists, hypocrites! for you send missionaries to Africa to make one convert, and when you have made him, he is twice as much a child of hell as yourselves. (Applause.) Woe unto you, blind guides, with your subtleties of doctrine, your transubstantiation and consubstantiation and all the rest of it; you fools and blind! Woe unto you, doctors of divinity and Episcopalians, hypocrites! for you drop your checks into the collection-plate and you pay no heed to the really important things in the Bible, which are justice and mercy and faith in goodness. Woe unto you, doctors of divinity and Anglicans, hypocrites! for you dress in immaculate clothing kept clean by the toil of frail women, but within you are full of extortion and excess. You blind high churchmen clean first your hearts, so that the clothes you wear may represent you. Woe unto you, doctors of divinity and Baptists, hypocrites! for you are like marble tombs which appear beautiful on the outside, but inside are full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness. Even so you appear righteous to men, but inside you are full of hypocrisy and iniquity. (Applause.) Woe unto you, doctors of divinity and Unitarians, hypocrites! because you erect statues to dead reformers, and put wreaths upon the tombs of old-time martyrs. You say, if we had been alive in those days we would not have helped to kill those good men. That ought to show you how to treat us at present. (Laughter.) But you are the children of those who killed the good men; so go ahead and kill us, too!"

When Carpenter stopped speaking, his face was dripping with sweat, and he was pale. But the eager crowd would not let him go. They began to ask him questions. There were some who wanted to know what he meant by saying that he came from God, and some who wanted to know whether he believed in the Christian religion. There were others who wanted to know if he really believed that the capitalists would give up without using force. The old gentleman who represented spiritualism was on hand, asking if the dead are still alive, and if so, where are they?

Then, before the meeting was over, there came a sick man to be healed; and others, pushing their way through the crowd seeking even to touch the hem of Carpenter's garments. After a couple of hours of this he announced that he was worn out. The wagon moved very slowly, the driver calling to the people in front to make room. So they went down the street, and I got into my car and followed at a distance.

THE WAGON drove to the city jail; which rather gave me a start, because I had been thinking that the party might be arrested at any minute, on complaint to the police from the church. But apparently this did not trouble Carpenter. He wished to visit the strikers who had been arrested in front of Prince's restaurant. He and several others stood before the heavy barred doors, asking for admission, while a big crowd gathered.

But it appeared that Sunday was not visitors' day at the jail, and the little company was turned away. The wagon took up its slow march again, the company drove to one of the poorer quarters of the city, and stopped before a workingman's cottage on a street whose name I had never heard before. I learned that it was the home of James, the striking carpenter, and on the steps were his wife and a brood of half a dozen children, and his old father and mother, and several other people. There were many who had walked all the way following the wagon, and others gathered quickly, and besought the prophet to speak to them. He told them he must be quiet, and went inside, and James mounted guard at the door, and I sat in my car and waited until the crowd had filtered away. There was no good reason why I should have been admitted, but James apparently was glad to see me, and let me join the little company.

There was Everett, who had now washed the blood off his face, and Korwsky, who was now able to sit up and smile feebly, and two other men, whose names I did not learn, nursing battered faces. Carpenter prayed over them all, and they became more cheerful. I noticed that Everett, in spite of what must have been intense pain, was still faithfully taking down every word the prophet uttered.

You may believe that next morning my first thought was to get hold of the Times and see what they had done to my prophet.

Sure enough, there he was on the front page, three columns wide, with the customary streamer head:

MOB OF ANARCHISTS RAID ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S; PROPHET AND RAGGED HORDE BREAK UP CHURCH SERVICE

I noted that Carpenter was represented as having tried to knock down the Reverend Mr. Simpkinson, and that the prophet's followers had assaulted members of the congregation. I confess to some relief upon discovering that my own humble part in the adventure had not been mentioned. I suspected that my Uncle Timothy must have been busy at the telephone on Sunday evening! But then I turned to the Advertiser, and, alas, there I was! "A certain rich young man," rising up to protect an incendiary prophet! I remembered that my Uncle Timothy had had a violent row with the publisher of the Advertiser a year or two ago, over some political appointment!

The Times had another editorial, two columns, double-headed. Yesterday, the paper had warned the public what to expect; today it saw the prophecies justified, and what it now wished to know was, had Western City a police department, or had it not? "How much longer do our authorities propose to give rein to this fire-brand impostor? This prophet of God who rides about town in a broken-down express wagon, and consorts with movie actresses and red agitators! We call upon the authorities of our city to act and act at once; to put this wretched mountebank behind bars where he belongs and keep him there."

There was another aspect of this matter upon which the Times laid emphasis. After long efforts on the part of the Chamber of Commerce and other civic organizations, Western City had been selected as the place for the annual convention of the Mobland Brigade. In three days this convention would be called to order, and already the delegates were pouring in by every train. What impression would they get of law and order in this community? What did the local lodge of the Mobland Brigade propose to do to save the fair name of the city?

Now, I had been so much interested in Carpenter and his adventures that I had pretty well overlooked this matter of the Mobland Brigade and its convention. I belong to the Brigade myself, and ought to have been serving on the committee of arrangements. Yes, the Brigade was coming; and I could foresee what would happen when a bunch of these men encountered Carpenter's express wagon on the street!

I SWALLOWED a hasty cup of coffee, and drove in a taxi to the Labor Temple. Carpenter had said he would be there early in the morning, to help with the relief work again. One of them came toward me, the same who had sought my advice about permitting Carpenter to speak at the mass meeting. "Good morning," he said; and then: "I thought you told me this fellow Carpenter was not a red?"

"Well," said I, taken by surprise, "is he?"

"Good heavens!" said the other. "What do you call this?" And he held up a copy of the Times. "Going in and shouting in the middle of a church service, and trying to knock down a clergyman!"

I could not help laughing in the man's face. "So even you labor men believe what you read in the Times! It happens I was present in the church myself, and I assure you that Carpenter offered no resistance. You remember, I told you he was a man of peace, and that was all I told you."

"Well," said the other, somewhat more mildly, "even so, we can't stand for this kind of thing. We have called a meeting of our executive committee this morning, and are going to adopt a resolution, making clear to the public that we knew nothing about this church raid, and that we don't stand for such things. We would never have permitted this man Carpenter to speak on our platform, if we had known about his ideas. We hear the man proposes to come back to our relief kitchen. Is that so?"

"I believe he does; and I suppose you would rather he didn't. Is that it?" The other admitted that was it.

So I left the Labor Temple and walked up and down on the sidewalk in front. It was really rather unreasonable of me to be annoyed with this labor man for having voiced the same point of view of "common sense" that I had been defending to Carpenter's group on the previous evening.

To this mood of tolerance I had brought myself, when I saw a white robe come round the corner, arm in arm with a frock coat of black broadcloth. Also there came Everett, looking still more ghastly, his nose and lip having become purple. Also there was Korwsky, and two other men; Moneta, a young Mexican cigar-maker out of work, and a man named Hamby who had turned up rather mysteriously on the previous evening, introducing himself as a pacifist.

I joined the group, and made clear to them, as tactfully as I could, that they were not wanted inside. Comrade Abell threw up his hands. "Oh, those labor skates!" he cried. "Thinking about nothing but keeping themselves respectable, and holding on to their fat, comfortable salaries!"

"Vell, vat you expect?" cried Korwsky. "You git de verkin' men into politics, and den you blame dem fer bein' politicians! Vat else could dey be?"

Then Carpenter spoke. "If men set out to preach a new doctrine, how can they expect to be welcomed at once? We have chosen to be outcasts, and must not complain. Let us go to the jail. Perhaps that is the place for us."

Our little group had come out on Broadway. It attracted a good deal of attention, and a number of curiosity seekers were beginning to trail behind us. "We'll get a crowd again, and Carpenter 'll be making a speech," I thought; and as usual I faced a moral conflict. Should I stand by, or should I sneak away, and preserve the dignity of my family?

SUDDENLY came a sound of music, fifes and drums. It burst on our ears from round the corner, shrill and lively—"The Girl I Left Behind Me." Carpenter stopped short, and seemed to shrink away from what was coming.

It was a company of brigade men; one or two hundred, carrying rifles with fixed bayonets which gleamed in the sunshine. There were two fifiers and two drummers at their head. I remembered having noted in the morning papers that the national commander of the Brigade was to arrive in town this morning, and no doubt this was a delegation to do him honor.

The marchers swept down on us, and past us, and I watched the prophet. "Oh God, my Father!" he whispered, and seemed to quiver with each thud of the tramping feet on the pavement. After the storm had passed, he stood motionless, the pain still in his face. "It is Rome! It is Rome!" he murmured.

Now, I had felt quite certain that Carpenter would not get along very well with the Brigade, and I was more than ever decided that he must be got out of the way somehow or other. Already he was in the full tide of a speech. "Those sharp spears! Can you not see them dripping with the blood of your brothers?"

I whispered to Everett. "We had better get him away from here!" And he put his hand gently on the prophet's shoulder, and said, "The prisoners in jail are hoping for us." I took him by the other arm, and we began to lead him down the street.

The party came to the city jail, and knocked for admission. But no doubt the authorities had taken consultation in the meantime, and there was no admission for prophets. The party stood on the steps baffled and bewildered, a pitiful and pathetic little group.

For my part, I thought it just as well that Carpenter had not got inside, for I knew what he would find there. The place is old and musty, and the walls are so badly cracked that it has been condemned by the building department. It is so crowded that half a dozen men sometimes sleep on the floor of a single cell. They stay there, sometimes for many months unheeded, because the courts are crowded, and if Comrade Abell's word may be taken in the matter, every poor man is assumed to be guilty until he is proven innocent.

Did Carpenter know these things? Suddenly he said, "Let us pray"; and there on the steps of the jail he raised his hands in invocation, and prayed for all prisoners and captives. And when he finished, Comrade Abell suddenly began to sing.

Arise, ye pris'ners of starvation!

Arise, ye wretched of the earth!

For justice thunders condemnation,

A better world's in birth.

I think I would have shuddered even more than I did, if I had known the name of this song; if I had realized that this group of fanatics were sounding the dread Internationale on the steps of our city jail! I suspect that what saved them was the fact that the guardians of the jail had no more idea what it was than I had!

Then Carpenter turned, and looked up and down the streets of the city, and suddenly I saw that he was weeping. "Oh Mobland, Mobland! But the way is hid from your eyes, and you will not see it, and now the hour [Continued on page 106]

The Inside Story of HENRY FORD'S Jew-Mania

Henry Swallows Old Bait

By Norman Hapgood

II, PART FOUR

OF ALL the follies in the Ford Jew-Mania it is not easy to pick the silliest. Some might select the "Gentile front." An argument could be made for that part of the story. It included President Taft, part of Mr. Harding's administration, and President Wilson. It depicted Wilson hanging on a secret wire to get the orders transmitted from the Jewish Political Trust by Mr. Justice Brandeis. Such a bit of farcical thinking must rank high, but we incline to give first place to the famous Protocols. Why does this particular dream attain the blue ribbon? 1—Because it is the documentary evidence of the whole world-conspiracy, so that when the insanity of this claim is understood the whole case crumbles; 2—because the forgeries are so half-witted; 3—because when they began to figure as the basis of Mr. Ford's nightmare they had already, in four languages, run their childish course.

Before we observe Mr. Ford swallowing this antique bait, let us answer the only serious point made in the course of these exposures by the other side. It is argued that Mr. Ford has stopped his persecution. But this statement is an entire mistake. When no amount of padding would produce any more newspaper articles, Ford put this material in book form and is now selling that book all the way from Dan to Beer-sheba, from Dearborn to Key West. We also understand that he is still gathering "material."

Like the rest of the eventful tale, this chapter shows Mr. Ford's ill-informed mania leading him along the lines trod by the men who are working hard in this country to put back on the Russian throne a Romanoff as Tsar.

One day a Russian army officer walked into the office, in the Grand Central Station, New York, of Dr. Harris Houghton, who at that time had charge of the New York branch of the American army secret information work here, and displayed a copy of the Protocols to a Russian girl who was working in that office.

NEXT month I shall give a document of great importance, prepared by the American War Censorship against Senator La Follette, as ultimately furnished to the Ford agencies.

In trying to peddle the Protocols, the Russian officers treated them mysteriously as smuggled out of Russia. This mystery made a weird impression on various anti-Jewish crusaders, including the Ford secret investigators. In truth it was on a level with the ordinary marketing of gold bricks. The so-called Protocols were freely on sale in Russia. Anybody could carry them out. They are freely on sale in Germany in the German language; in France, in the French language; in England, in the English language.

According to the reports later reaching the Ford investigators, several people in Dr. Houghton's office were employed in making copies of the so-called translation. One of these persons was the wife of an officer who was prominent on Pershing's staff.

On the intelligence or lack of intelligence of our secret service I do not wish to generalize. It would not be libelous but it would be rash. That service contains fools. It also contains men of excellent judgment. Probably the most important members of the secret service realized that this Protocol basis to Jewish persecution was utter nonsense.

These governmental agents had some advantage over Henry Ford, for Henry did not begin to read the Protocols until extracts from them appeared in his own newspaper. The editor of his newspaper was at least sane enough to leave out some of the most imbecilic parts of the Protocols. These particular parts might have put even Henry on his guard.

FOR example, take this, put into the mouth of the supposed author of these documents:

"We will continue to direct thought into all the intricacies of fantastic theories, new and supposedly progressive. Surely we have been completely successful in turning the witless heads of the Gentiles by the word 'Progress.'"

Of these Protocols the Ford people learned there were twenty-four in existence. Later they raised the estimate to thirty-seven.

Translation of the opening of one of the Protocols was written on stationery of C. C. Daniels, head of the group of Ford's sleuths in New York.

The plan put forward in these forgeries is a plan for upsetting the world. The idea is to take all possible steps to interfere with our civilization, so that finally it falls of its own weight. It hopes to abolish all authority so that a new aristocracy may take its place. In Mr. Ford's Independent this nonsense was sprinkled along in bits. Here is one of them:

Natalie De Bogory, daughter of a well-known Russian general and revolutionist, made the first translations in this country of the Protocols.

PERSONAL &amp; CONFIDENTIAL

415 East 14th Street

New York City

March 18, 1919 .

Mr. Smith,
20 Broad Street,
New York City.

Dear Sir:

Referring to our recent conversation, I am so fortunate as to have in my possession valuable material about Zionist work in Russia and other countries abroad. Moreover, I have very valuable documents in both the Russian and Hebrew languages. I can get photographs from the originals* of the Zionist Protocols which are now preserved in a safe place. Those documents are of colossal importance and therefore I think my work and the work of my friends will be very important for your organization.

In the Far East I have my workers with whose assistance the above-mentioned material could be translated into English and forwarded to you here in America by courier or postal, as you may think better. For this work I need funds. The matter is of tremendous importance to me, I am vitally interested, and with resources, I am sure I could get great results and confer much benefit.

I would like an appointment for a personal interview when I could arrive at a decision.

Awaiting your reply, I am

Yours very truly, D. Rodionoff

*or the originals themselves if they are wanted

U. Of all the Protocol readers in the world, Mr. D. Rodionoff makes a strong bid for the championship.

"In this divergence between the Gentiles and ourselves in ability to think and reason is to be seen clearly the seal of our election as the chosen people and higher human beings in contrast with the Gentiles who have merely instinctive and animal minds. They observe but they do not foresee and they invent nothing, except perhaps material things. It is clear from this that nature herself predestined us to rule and guide the world."

And again: "Usually it is the climbers, careerists, and people, generally speaking, who are not serious, who most readily join secret societies, and we shall find them easy to handle and through them operate the mechanism of our projected machines."

Also this: "Peoples of all opinions and of all doctrines are at our service, restorers of monarchy, demagogues, socialists and other Utopians. We have put them all to work. Every one of them, from this point of view, is undermining the last remnant of authority, is trying to overthrow all existing order. All the governments have been tormented by these actions. But we will not give them peace until they recognize our super-government."

The now dead Tsar could have found these extracts in a book that during his revolutionary troubles of 1905 was hot off the presses in his own home town of Tsarski-Selve. Probably that consolation actually was offered to him.

The extent to which forgery was a vested industry in Russia before the Revolution is not realized by most Americans. It certainly was not realized by our government when that government promoted the "Sisson documents." These of our readers who are acquainted with the French language might turn back to the Revue des Deux Mondes for May 1st, where they will find the notes made by the French Ambassador to Russia in the early months of 1917, when the Russian peasants, soldiers, and workers were preparing to throw off the incubus of incompetent despotism. The simple method taken by the reactionary ministers, to make the Tsar and Tsarina believe the country was still loyal, was to have masses of letters forged, full of ardent support. Despite the fact that these letters were in practically the same language the monarchs of Russia swallowed them. Their credulity is more explicable than is the fact that a great genius in manufacturing, in the free country of the United States, should have lapped up the childish Protocols nearly two decades after they were first forged and published.

The folly of reviving in 1922 in the United States these notorious documents is made all the more picturesque by the fact that the original forger, not trusting his own powers of invention, made a mere adaptation of an old document having nothing to do with the Jews. Much of this old material, as is now widely known, is to be found in exactly the same words, in a French work of fancy, called "A

C. Henry A. Wise Wood, head of the National Security League, now gets into the story.

April 21st, 1921.

Mr. Charles Smith

Dear Sir

Today I received a wire from Mrs. De Bogory and I am very much surprised by its contents.

During our last meeting we have finally agreed upon the plan of the work and I have promised to give you weekly certain material with exclusive right to use it in the order in which it comes according to the "PLAN". Outside of this I promised to send also different other interesting material. All communications will be made by registered letters and valuable packages.

My conditions are following:

I am to receive Fifteen Hundred Dollars ($1,500.00) per month by transfers on any Bank in Yokohama. There is no need for any special contract. I will begin the work only upon receiving the advance agreed upon. You may inform me as to your address by wire.

Mrs. De Bogory is already translating my material and I hope you will find such satisfactory to you; I leave it to your judgment.

On leaving America I am feeling rather sad, but I will inform you more particularly from Japan.

I wish you all success.

Sincerely Yours,

D. Rodionoff

C. This letter, written to one of Ford's detectives, speaks of Miss De Bogory as translating anti-Jewish Protocol material for Ford.

Dialogue in Hell between Machiavelli and Montesquieu." It was published at Brussels in 1865.

Anybody more than eight years old who had given attention to the subject of forged documents would be able to tell, by the foolishness of what we have quoted above, that these famous Protocols were forgeries of the weakest nature. If he were two or three times eight, and had the information accessible to everybody, he would see how suitable this type of forgery was to the habit of the Russian Tsarists. As was stated in the comment of one distinguished Jew, Nathan Isaacs, Professor of Law in the University of Pittsburgh, and formerly a captain in the Intelligence Division of the United States Army, what all this Protocols dream, reduced to sane English, amounts to is: "Beware of progress. It is a Jewish scheme."

In this Dr. Houghton, who figures in the United States secret service, as one of the venders of the Protocols, and as the family physician of C. C. Daniels, one more direct connection is made between the Ford organization in its anti-Semitic crusade, and the other drives that were being made against the Jews. The detective who is listed in the Ford organization as No. 124 X makes a report in which he says: "Mr. Sidorkin also says that Mr. Brasol, the translator of the Small, Maynard Publishing Company's edition of the Protocols, is possessed of much valuable information on the subject of Jewry in Russia, and may know something about it in this city. He also says there is another copy of the Russian translation of the Protocols in New York City and that to the best of his information it is now in the possession of A. N. Avinoff, of Napahonk, New York."

The people who are mixed up in these enterprises contradict each other with extraordinary facility. The Mr. Avinoff referred to in this detective's report heartily denies the possession of any unprinted copy of the Protocols.

About six months after the Small, Maynard edition came out, it was followed by an edition of Dr. Houghton, which was excellently printed, richly covered, and elaborately illustrated. It bore the fantastic name of The Protocols of the Wise Men of Zion, and was called the Beckwith Edition. Mr. Ford's weekly quoted freely from this edition.

WHEN Dr. Houghton got into financial difficulties, Prof. A. L. Frothingham of Princeton, wrote to one of the Ford investigators, a member of the Daniels organization of near-detectives, as follows: "Mr. F. Hunter Creech. Dear Sir: I have had no intercourse with Dr. Houghton for at least six months, since his failure to carry out any part of his agreement. I want it clearly understood that whatever was agreed to between us was upon his initiative, and after repeated urging. Naturally I have not dunned him about his delinquency. You volunteered the statement to me, 'We are trying to settle up Dr. Houghton's rather complicated business troubles, financial obligations, etc., and expect to do so before long as he is too valuable a man to drop.' This is the substance if not the exact words. I naturally suppose that 'we' meant yourself as Wise Wood told me that you had full charge of all the work in the East. This will explain what I wrote you and probably will take away any feeling of surprise you may have felt about my letter." The Wise Wood here mentioned is Henry A. Wise Wood, the well-known protector of the United States civilization against radicals, listed in the Daniels office as 105 A. Mr. 105 A was for a long time the leading spirit in the National Security League. His picture appears on page 47.

These matters were well under way when there appeared on the scene the man who could furnish any number of Protocols of any type. The purchaser had but to make known the brand preferred. Mr. Rodionoff was taken by the Ford employees with complete seriousness. He presented himself as part owner of the original Protocols in Hebrew, and declared he was the possessor of thirteen new Protocols. He was the champion Protocoler of the world.

Investigator Creech wrote to Mr. Ford's editor, Cameron, as follows: "It occurs to me that it would be quite valuable if we had a photographic copy of the Protocols in Hebrew and place same in our files against investigations we might encounter in the future." Operator 103 A was especially assigned to deal with this Rodionoff. No. 103 A, you will remember, was the same Dr. Houghton, formerly of the United States Secret Service. This 103 A reported that Rodionoff had shown papers that he had worked for the Tsar's government. He quotes Rodionoff as saying, "that he has the originals of the Protocols in Hebrew and that these were the originals which were in the possession of Serge Nilus. The twenty-four that have been published in this country, continues Dr. Houghton, reporting to his superiors, "are the original Protocols which were gotten up at the Basle conference in 1897. There have since been written thirteen more which had never been published. All of these he has in the original Hebrew. Everyone who has come in contact with Rodionoff is impressed with his sincerity and dependability. We all believe that he has what he says he has. Would not recommend a visit of Rodionoff to Dearborn for several reasons." No. 103 A did not, "for several reasons," wish Rodionoff to see Mr. Ford. Therefore, Rodionoff endeavored to break through the guard of No. 103 A to get to Mr. Ford himself. His letter was turned over by the manufacturer to investigator 124 X. No. 124 X has appeared in this story. He also had been a Government investigator, and his name is C. W. Smith. Mr. Smith sent for Rodionoff immediately.

Rodionoff went to the office of No. 124 X. He told him a story, with all the detail necessary to a picture in five reels. Rodionoff described himself as actually acquainted with Serge Nilus, the Russian publisher who first put the Protocols on the market. Nilus, according to Rodionoff, was a Mason of the Russian order, and fluently spoke eight languages, including Hebrew. One of the most important of these details was that the original Protocols in Hebrew are at present in the possession of a secret Russian anti-Jewish propaganda institution with headquarters near Harbin, Russia. "Near Harbin, Russia," is a perfect setting for this type of melodrama. Rodionoff hinted clearly enough to be understood that for a consideration he could obtain for Mr. Ford photographic copies.

NOW, No. 124 X, Mr. Smith, once had such a serious place in the secret work of the United States Government that I hesitate to speak of him with any lack of respect. Nevertheless, it is a fact, too, that he sent back to the Ford organization a report in which he said, "I am inclined to believe Rodionoff's story relating to the Protocols." This may set the reader's mind to wondering how many things secret service investigators in general are inclined to believe.

The results in money did not satisfy Rodionoff. He suddenly decided he must get more. He wrote a letter to Natalie De Bogory, the Russian lady who had been in the office of 103 A during the war, telling her he was leaving New York and would sail from Seattle for Japan on August 22nd. He did sail on the day named. His departure produced consternation in the New York office. Miss De Bogory wired to him that his departure would make it quite impossible to [Continued on page 133]

April 1 1921 192

Mr. E. C. Daniels

To _____ Dr.

Terms _____

Billhead No. 10

|     |    |    |                   |       |  |  |
|-----|----|----|-------------------|-------|--|--|
| Feb | 14 | 13 | Protocols of Zion | 20.00 |  |  |
|-----|----|----|-------------------|-------|--|--|

One of the bills, showing the Ford agency picking up a few extra copies of the Protocols.

When a

Girl's Thirty

By Katharine Dayton

Illustrated by Baron de Meyer

Not so long ago
a woman left all hope behind after her twenty-ninth birthday.
But that was not so long ago

NOWHERE could one find a more inoffensive appearing Last Straw than little old Mr. Joralemon, nor one more cheerfully unaware, as he toddled into the University Club after his chance meeting with Miss Victoria Kent, that on the corner of Fifty-fourth Street and Fifth Avenue he had just Broken a Camel's Back. Yet thus it was.

It had been a thoroughly difficult day for Victoria, dating from the moment—7:47 A.M. to be exact—when, with a distinct and disagreeable sensation of shock, she had wakened to realize that this was her thirtieth birthday; and culminating, after a sequence of irritating incidents which were as so much salt rubbed into the wound, in the encounter with Mr. Joralemon. Before entering further into details, however, we feel it a duty to announce loudly to those of our readers who have been led by the Younger Novelists to believe that an unmarried heroine of thirty in the average magazine story must of necessity be a poor, colorless creature whose starved soul revolts lulubettishly against a drab, loveless existence, that Miss Tory Kent was not in the least like that type of heroine. And as for looking like that—but we must return to the birthday.

Victoria had always known, vaguely, that thirty happened to everybody some time. But not to her—at least, not yet! Surely, she had always imagined, by thirty one would be—well, set in one's mold. Married—dead—something! Not doing the same things, feeling the same things one always had. And here she was—it—and just as she always had been. Or was she? Sinking rapidly in the Slough of Despond Victoria, ignoring the eight querulous chimes of the little clock on the bedside table, pulled the rose-colored comforter more closely about her pretty chin and reviewed, after the approved manner of drowning persons, her past life. It was a pretty tapestry the fates had woven for her. Money, position, unusual good looks, opportunity and intelligence shot it full of gay colors, and easily discernible in the intricacies of the design were the faces and figures of considerably more than the average number of men. Victoria smiled faintly as she considered them. They were a composite lot—her summers abroad, a winter in Rome, a season in London, had seen to that—and most of them had been very much in love with her, though she was quite aware that a few rather nice ones had asked to marry her because of her money, and two or three awfully nice ones hadn't for the same reason. It was these last who stood out most distinctly from the blur of the background—which fact is mentioned as giving a slight clue to Victoria's character.

C. The house was finished and looked adorable. Everything was in readiness for the little dinner she and Jim Brice were to have here before turning over the keys to its owners.

For Victoria, though she would have indignantly denied it, was incurably romantic. If you had asked her why she hadn't married any of these men she would have given you, in many cases, quite logical reasons; but mostly they would have been illogical, such as, for instance, this one being too short, or that one too thin or too fat, or not wearing a becoming sort of collar.

The truth was that, perhaps unconsciously, and being not a little spoiled, she had expected from life something very decidedly out of the usual; and, beautiful and economically independent, she could afford to wait for it. Certainly marriage in the abstract as she saw it among her friends, had not attracted her. Even under the best of circumstances it seemed a humdrum enough cycle of servant problems, babies, houses, curtains, commuting, country-club gossip, and husbands with a tendency just at present to golf and drink too much—and the humdrum was, above all things in life, what Victoria had determined always to avoid. But could it be avoided, she asked herself as she dressed slowly, meticulously brushing her hair and momentarily cheered when a sedulous search revealed no single thread of gray in its deep brown waves.

"MY BABY!" her mother greeted her, a trifle sentimentally, as she entered the breakfast room. "It doesn't seem possible my little Tory can be th—"

"Ahem!" coughed Victoria, with a frown in the direction of the maid who was bringing her coffee. "Are there any letters?" For some unaccountable reason she couldn't bear to have Annie, who must have been all of twenty-two hear the fatal word. If one had done something—something worth while—it wouldn't matter. At least, not so much. But to be thirty and have no—no alibi! That was it. At thirty one simply must have some excuse for living.

"You're not listening, dear," complained Mrs. Kent gently. "I said you must be sure not to forget your appointment with Dr. Merrick this morning."

"Excuse [Continued on page 100]

C, "Listen to me, dearest," Jim pleaded. "You're all the color and light and warmth I need in my house and I'll try not to let it be stupid and humdrum for you."

Painted by Arthur E. Becher

The SELFSAME SONG

By Thomas Hardy

*A bird bills the selfsame song,
With never a fault in its flow,
That we listened to here those long
• Long years ago.*

*A pleasing marvel is how
A strain of such rapture rote
Should have gone on thus till now
Unchanged in a note!*

*But it's not the selfsame bird—
No: perished to dust is he. . . .
As also are those who heard
That song with me.*

The distinguished author of The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse recently returned home and now he reports:

*"All I hear in Europe is talk of PEACE;
all I see is fear of WAR"*

Trembling Europe

By Vicente Blasco Ibañez

WHILE the war lasted, there was a general revival of religious emotion. The churches of every creed received more worshipers than ever before, and prayers, for a while at least, were sincere, not mere lip-service; for once they came from men's hearts. There was no family that did not number either someone already fallen at the front or someone who might fall there. Furthermore, the crimes of the human beast which had been set free from its cage by the war; the assassinations, the burnings, thefts, and rapes committed, the trampling underfoot of every human right, the crippling of liberty, made all eyes turn prayerfully to the gentle teachings of brotherhood offered by Christianity.

And those who witnessed this religious renaissance during the war made haste to prophesy: "When at last we shall have peace, this moral progress will continue at an even more rapid rate. Men will finally become convinced that the church, inasmuch as it is an association for idealistic and generous purposes, is more competent than politics or governments to deal with the conflicts inevitably arising in our midst. The war will have served the purpose of forcing humanity to take a great step forward toward perfection. God, in his mysterious ways, often draws good from evil, and bestows happiness upon us only when we have endured severe tests and trials."

But once the war was over, danger, anxiety and grief were over too, and these were the real causes of religious emotion in most cases. The number of worshipers at the temple did not continue to increase. On the contrary, it diminished; and as to the contribution of the religious spirit in solving present-day difficulties, no one has been able to discover that it has exerted the slightest effect.

LIFE rolls ceaselessly on, careless of our griefs. It catches us up in its waves and sweeps us along in its currents. We keep our memories within us, but each time we look at them they are a little more dim, for life carries us on without stopping to rest . . . farther, farther . . . with the utter indifference of a piece of machinery that is deaf and insensible to our sentiments. It shows us new skies, new lands, and brings it about that we think less and less of the past, and that finally, in spite of ourselves, we come to forget it. . . .

At social gatherings in Europe it is bad taste now to mention the world conflict. The producers will not accept any plays alluding to it. Publishers refuse without a reading any manuscript dealing with the late catastrophe; even the wounded and the combatants who came out without actual injury, but who, for those four awful years went through all sorts of sufferings, avoid speaking of this part of the past as much as possible. Europe is as religious, or as little religious, as it was before the summer of 1914. It has remembered God, prayed, worshiped, and then forgotten.

The moral code of every religion offers a reward for virtue, and punishment for evil-doing. In many cases it is esteemed that the punishment can be modified by divine pardon; but obviously, before the pardon can be given the punishment must have begun.

After that blind catastrophe of the war, as sightless as an earthquake or a tempest at sea, the observer looks the facts in the face and inquires: "Well, where is the reward of the virtuous? Who has succeeded in seeing the wicked punished?"

Fifteen million men lie buried in the recent battlefields; twenty or thirty million innocent souls who could not fight, since they were weak, and who thus could not constitute a peril for anybody, have died of fear, hunger, cold, and harsh treatment. The towns destroyed, for the most part, remain in ruins. Whole series of little tragedies occurring in the very heart of the family remain irreparable. Hundreds of thousands of women and children are waiting in vain for some superhuman intervention to come and efface the shame and humiliation suffered by their families, the very memory of which fills them with a new horror.

Obviously, the spectacle presented by the world at this moment is not calculated to support the pious belief that for the good there are rewards; for the evil, punishments. The teachings of the recent war could not be more immoral than they are.

Very few human beings can live without speculating to some extent at least on what awaits them after death.

Only those who have attained that serenity that might be called philosophic, are willing to go on living without any certainty as to what lies beyond the grave. The great majority of human beings want to know, clamor for a certainty, beg for something to free them from the terror of their doubts as to what lies beyond.

All religions provide this consoling assurance. They tell what to expect after death, but they promise a glimpse beyond the grave only when we have left this mortal life.

definitively set out on the dark and mysterious path that leads to another world. No religion of good standing and long-established respectability offers to bring us directly into contact with super-terrestrial life, nor is willing to admit that living beings can communicate directly with the dead. More than that, nearly every reputable religion considers the attempt to make the dead speak, and to evoke the life beyond the grave mere superstition, a remnant of the belief in spirits prevalent among witch-doctors.

But human beings always betray a childish impatience when they are really interested in something. Our native egoism makes us assume ourselves to be the center of all that exists. When we experience a great joy we think the world is perfect, and we call the poor wretch who complains of his hard lot, ungrateful and troublesome. When we are sad, it astonishes us that everyone else should not be sad with us, and it seems to us absurdly cruel that the sky should still be blue, and that the sun still shines.

How can the love one bears the dead, forever lost to us, listen to the voice of religion or of scientific conviction or of anything that intervenes, setting up a barrier, be it ever so thin, between the loser and the lost? Emotions are more to us than faith or reason. Aside from this, it gives us pleasure to know what lies beyond death without having to die to gain that knowledge. We like to talk with our dead without having ourselves to tread the narrow path to the tomb. And from all this derives the fact that throughout Europe the only revival of religious sentiment that occurred after the war took the form of spiritualism; and I use this term to include all the schools, sects, religions or whatever one chooses to call them, that attempt to put the living human being into direct contact with the mysterious unknown out of which he came at birth, and to which he will return again when he plunges into the abyss of death.

Not long ago I was dining in one of the most beautiful and elegant palaces of the côte d'azur. I chanced to be seated at a table beside a lady who had lost her son in the war.

"For two years now I have spoken with my son every week," this lady told me, with the utmost calm, just as she might have mentioned that she had seen her son that afternoon at the Casino of Monte Carlo. Then she added:

"If you knew how happy I have been since that séance when I first talked with him! Before that life seemed impossible. Now I can go on quietly hoping until I die, and then join him where he is. . . ."

As I was listening attentively to what this devoted mother was telling me, she went on to give me details of the happy conversations she had had with her dead son by means of tripods, tables and other articles of furniture.

As a rule these conversations are foolish or at best incoherent, and the poor deceased are reported to be making nonsensical statements for which they would undoubtedly blush if they were alive to hear them.

This poor English boy, who, while he lived, had achieved no higher distinction than being a good soldier, was not likely to free himself from that intellectual mediocrity which seems to be one of the distinguishing marks of the dead when they try to speak to the living. In all the conversations he had had with his mother he had never apparently said anything that was not commonplace, or at least well known, the sort of thing that his mother might very well have read forty-eight hours earlier in a magazine or newspaper. But it happened that the week preceding the occasion of which I speak the young Englishman from beyond the tomb had been more explicit and definite in his statements concerning eternity.

"There is a great deal going on here," he told his mother. "We are getting the place ready for those who are coming. They say hereabouts that soon there is to be another war. . . . And yet we who died thought that this was the last, and that there would never be another!"

For the first time in my life I felt impressed by something reported to have been said by a member of the spirit world; I acknowledged that the dead do not always talk nonsense.

As always happened in human affairs, alongside the sincerity and good faith of those who believe in spirit manifestations, the desire to exploit and deceive has found lodging. As there were never so many people in Europe eager to explore the beyond and talk with those who have ceased to exist, so there have never been so many clairvoyants, mediums, palmists, and diviners of the future of every ilk. One needs only to read the advertisements in the daily papers of the great capitals of Europe to get some idea of the sudden and extensive blossoming of a vast crop of those beings who live by exploiting human suffering, and the human need of consolation. Even in the smallest and quietest cities, in the midst of those who, in entire good faith seek the comfortings of spirit messages, a surprising number of audacious sharpers are to be found, and they, without any faith in the doctrines they profess, make of spiritualism an instrument of exploitation.

"But what has the war left in Europe that is positive, that will count in the long run?" some of us ask.

On this point at least I am pessimistic. Perhaps, when many years have passed, when events can be seen in perspective, the observer will be able to discern that some actual benefit to humanity has been derived from this gruesome catastrophe; that is, if a definitive peace results, and if the recent war turns out to be a drama complete in itself and not the first act of a long drawn out tragedy of ghastly and suicidal wars.

HAD THE WAR never taken place the Russian Revolution would have been impossible; the Russia of the republic and of the Soviets would have been still more so. After a war begun by grand dukes and the generals of the Tsar we now behold what eight years ago would have been considered the most impossible of absurdities, nothing less than this; the formation of a Red Army of several million men organized in true military fashion, and commanded by a communist newspaper writer, in other words, that Trotzky who, a few years ago, was straying all over the globe, when he wasn't in jail.

This Red Army is not yet a menace to the world because the immense and disorganized nation behind it is in the throes of famine. Moreover, modern warfare requires the support of a thoroughgoing industrial system, and this is something Russia has not succeeded in developing even in peace times, much less now in the disorder of revolution. But what if it should happen in the future that the revolutionary spirit of Russia invades Germany, and the Russian ant-hill should be able to work with the great stores of materials produced by German industry?

And this is the peril actually menacing the future.

The one certainty of the post-war period such as we know it is the fact that nearly one-half of Europe, with one-half of Asia supporting it from behind, is in open rebellion against that social constitution which, since the earliest centuries, has governed mankind, a constitution based on individual property. Never have the enemies of existing society held so much power in their hands, never before have they succeeded in acquiring a national individuality. Up to 1918, in the whole long course of human history, those who were dissatisfied with the organization of society had to content themselves with writing or orating against it, and, if they actually attempted direct action, they went no further than to hold meetings which were promptly snuffed out by the police, or make individual attacks, by means of dynamite, on the representatives of the order they opposed.

For the first time in human history we see a government, the declared enemy of private property, and the partisan of communism, possessing an army numbering millions, a navy, and diplomatic representatives who are received in the congresses of nations. Compared with this revolution, all other revolutions appear gentle and inoffensive. They were mere political changes affecting the internal organization of the country in which they occurred; occasionally they modified the scope of property rights, but they never denied them nor suppressed them.

As I was walking one day through the Champs Élysées with Kerensky, the famous prime minister of the first Russian republic, who was driven out of office by Lenin and his party, he said to me with the vehemence that made him so stirring an orator:

"Just as long as the Allied Powers insist on intervention in Russia, just so long will Lenin remain in power. The peasants believe that the foreigners will take from them the lands we gave them. They will support Lenin to the death if Europe intervenes. But it is equally certain that if Russia's relations with the rest of Europe are restored, if the barriers at the frontier are let down, so that our people can see what is actually going on in other countries, these millions of small landed proprietors, instead of maintaining communism will rise against it and overthrow it."

To my thinking there is nothing new about Lenin nor the equally austere and selfless men associated with him. I know many of his relatives in history. Robespierre, too, was called "the virtuous."

It is true that the rulers of the great [Continued on page 130]

Q A Novel of a Woman
Who Found Herself

by the Author of
"The Penalty"

The Better Wife

By Gouverneur Morris

Illustrated by Henry Raleigh

Q The shifting scenes of Bud Highland's life which make up the earlier chapters of this story.

ONE morning Captain (Bud) Highland awoke from a drunken sleep to find himself securely married. That was strange because only the day before, or was it the day before that, he had been divorced by his first wife to whom he had given alimony and the custody of the two boys. If it was strange to be married again, it was shocking to find he had married a fallen woman. But a promise given was, in Bud's mind, a promise to be kept. He set about keeping his promise to the poor, sick, wasted creature whom he had married. They left New York at once, as Bud could not endure the thought of taking his new wife, whom he hated, among his old friends. In the far West, Mary, his wife, got back her strength and health and much of her good looks. In bitterness of spirit she moaned out that she felt like other women, thought like other women—and yet her terrible past, cruelly forced upon her, would not down. Gradually, there emerged the real woman back of the bedraggled creature he had married and from whom Bud was losing his desire to escape. Then came the time when she had to go to the hospital and Bud was awakened at two o'clock one morning to learn that she was worse. The operation had been on her throat and there was a hemorrhage. He found her weak, suffering, and submitting to heroic treatment as the great "cherry" was forced into place. Surprising thoughts of tenderness moved him for the girl as he watched her fighting for life.

Q The Story Goes On

MARY fainted again, forty-eight hours later, when they took the "cherry" out. She had supposed this would hurt just as much as the putting in had hurt. She didn't believe them when they told her it wouldn't. They had told her that the putting in wouldn't hurt much. She wouldn't have believed anything they told her. She had to get over the bitter disappointment of learning that she could not have any ether or anything to make the pain less. It didn't hurt very much, and it was from relief that she fainted.

If her courage had filled Bud Highland with admiration, his performance had thrilled the nurse.

He had not slept during all those forty-eight hours. He had been splendid, an inspiration. His voice had never struck an impatient note—not once. He had patted and stroked that poor little woman's hand for three and four hours at a stretch—and all the while dying for a smoke. He had confessed that much.

It must be wonderful, thought the little nurse, much impressed, to be loved like that!

She had always been down on men. She knew too much about them. But perhaps she had been all wrong. She had consecrated herself to a life of single blessedness. Now, she wasn't so sure.

THE VERY next person who came under the little nurse's charge was a frivolous, teasing, young bachelor-about-town. He was a nose case—the sub-mucous operation for stoppage of the left nostril. It is a most miserable business; but all through the miserablest part, he teased and frivoled away in high spirits, and was forward and saucy, and altogether abominable and adorable. She did her best to repress him. He was irrepressible. He would kiss her hand if she didn't watch out. He would pay her outrageous compliments. She had the loveliest skin he'd ever seen. Rage and pleasure fought in her.

He left the hospital in high spirits. She remained in low ones. Three weeks passed. He came to see her. He was changed. He was earnest, very manly, serious. He had about him a kind of beseechingness, a sort of orphan quality, that was very sweet and taking.

He had a little money, he told her; but he thought that a man ought to work. There was a fine opening that he had heard about up in Portland, Oregon. Would she come, please? If not he would stay right on here, and find some job that would keep him near her. He had stayed away three weeks to be sure that the feeling he had for her was love, and not just wanting to catch her in his arms and eat her up. She had the cutest little ears, and the brightest eyes. She was like a little squirrel. And she had been so gentle and tender when he was suffering, and she was so wise and sensible.

Mary had not intended to show Bud the letter, but he had asked casually whom it was from, not being in the least interested to know, and she had shown it to him.

"It's from the nurse I had," she said. "She wants us to know that she is going to be married."

"But," the little nurse had written stiffly, "I would never have made up my mind to it, if it had not been for the impression that the perfect love of you and your husband made upon me when you were sick here. . . ."

Bud returned the letter to her.

"I am glad," he said, "that we made such a good impression. I hope she'll be very happy."

So the little nurse married, and went to Portland, Oregon, to live; and the very next case that came to her was a maternity case, in which she took an interest so intense that it was closely related to the worst kind of pain, and her next case was a nursing case, and that was so interesting and delightful that the delicious tenderness of it brought the tears to her eyes; and her husband would come in and watch them, and he'd say:

"Couple of squirrels!"

THE JESSUPS, to whom Bud had written about Mary's setback, received her, you may say, with open arms, and did their best to make an invalid of her. The old man had made selections of flowers from his little garden, no color omitted, and placed huge bouquets in the little sitting-room. Mrs. Jessup had gathered that Mary had lost a great deal of blood and needed to have it replaced by a course of enforced over-eating.

But Mary had already rebounded with all the resiliency of youth from the hard floor of the dark valley. Her color was good, her eye was bright, and if she was a little weak in the knees, it only lasted a few days.

The Jessups, indeed, with the most affectionate and painstaking effort saw little or no change in her. It was in Bud's eyes that she was changed, and greatly changed. Some of the changes were in her, and some of them were in himself.

Circumstance had for many months now thrown them into a very close and intimate association with each other. Neither had done anything which the other might not have found out and welcome. But the fact of Mary's past and of their disreputable marriage was a thing to make them both shy in forming other and outside associations.

Two people of whatever possible combination of the sexes—two men, two women, or as now, a man and a woman—cannot live together, travel together, sharing a purse in common, and almost wholly dependent on each other for interest and recreation, without having whatever degree of liking they first brought into the relationship diminish or increase.

The chief change that had come about in Highland was this: he was now obliged to acknowledge, in common honesty, what must for some time have been true, but passed over without recognition. He wasn't, as he had perhaps imagined, merely reconciled to the thought of the long years ahead with her company through them always a prominent factor. It wasn't merely that he had grown used to having her about. He had become fond of her.

The changes that he saw in Mary were various. Having gone through her recent trial with so much courage and dignity, he now seemed to see a gentle and quiet dignity in such actions and points of view as he would formerly have described to himself by such words perhaps, as "quiet," "not noticeable one way or the other." She had, in short, acquired in her husband's eyes a sort of force of character. He realized that he had respect for her, and that he must have had it right along, after those first few awful days.

When he had first seen her face, after the operation, he missed what until that time he had blindly passed over, her prettiness. It had, in other words, taken a long time to live down his first impressions. It was no wonder that so many people turned their heads to have a better look at her. She was a lovely young thing! Because of this, the quiet deference which he had always put into his manner toward her, and into his consultations of her wishes, ceased to be an expression of that code by which he had striven to rule his conduct toward her, and became the natural deference which the average man feels toward any pretty woman who does not bore him.

THEN, she talked so differently now! He attributed this to the removal of all those unnecessary growths and congestions in her throat, and not in the least to her own quick ear, and her desire to please. From the beginning, she had labored to acquire from her husband his intonations, his vowels, and of course, his approval of her for having acquired them. While it is true that surgery had actually improved the quality of her voice, the gradual changes brought about by her own persistent and intelligent efforts were the important ones.

He knew women in New York, women who are among those who rule what is called society, who would have been greatly improved if they could have talked as quietly and harmoniously as his new wife did.

Well, they had been through a terrible time together. He had been afraid at one time that she was going to die. Afraid! Yes, he had sat for many hours by her bed, leaning forward, till he thought his spine must splinter, and trying with all the strength of his will to give her something of his own strength through the two hands in which he held hers.

He had taken the doctor aside and offered to give his own blood. But the doctor had said that she was going to be all right, and not to get excited. Well, it was something to have been frightened and to have offered! What more could he have done, even if she had been precious to him?

He realized that if she had died, life would have seemed horribly empty to him. "I'm so used to her," he thought.

But he was not used to her.

Her prettiness, her high color, the clear tan that a few mornings in the salt water and the bright sun had brought back, the lithe and graceful curves of her body when she walked into the wind began to trouble him.

He was getting fat, he said. That was why he was up so early in the morning, up and dressed and off for a long run over the hills before breakfast. As for sitting up late, why he didn't sit up so very late. It was wonderful what a lot of interesting reading could be found in an encyclopedia! Farmer Jessup's was a pretty good one—big print. One subject suggested another, and the first thing you knew, a lot of time had flown over your head. Had she ever read Rollo's Trip to Cambridge? Few had, of her generation. There was a man in it, who wasn't very good at remembering things, a Mr. George. He undertook to read the Encyclopedia all the way through from cover to cover; always when he laid his volume aside, he would put a marker between the leaves to recall where he had left off reading. He got as far, did Mr. George, as Xerxes, but then, omitting to put in his marker, he was obliged to go all the way back to Aaron again.

All these months, he had been as casual and indifferent as if she had been another man. If rooming with another person has always its crowded and bothersome sides, he had put up with them in the same common sense spirit that she had. They lived that way because they were poor, and preferred to spend their extra dollars on concrete amusements and luxuries.

C. That night on the porch Fred got out his guitar and made Mary sing with him. It was so easy to feel gay and young with these Jessups. They didn't know the things about her that her husband did.

The Jessups would have given them another room for the asking. It wouldn't have cost them an extra cent. But Highland, though he felt sure of this, had not the nerve to make the suggestion. Mary, of course, knew that she was nothing to him, and never could be, and he had no reason to think that the knowledge hurt or offended her in any way (she had never given him any reason to think so); but to have others even suspect that he was indifferent to her, would hurt her. It hurts any wife to have people know that her husband is indifferent to her. It hurts her even if she detests him.

Highland could discover no way of changing present arrangements without hurting his wife's feelings. It would be awkward to suggest any rearrangement to the Jessups and still more awkward to suggest it to Mary. She would think that from indifference he had passed to antipathy and resentment. He would be making her feel that her ubiquitous nearness had got frightfully on his nerves. So he was up and out before she was awake, and to bed long after she had gone to sleep.

If one of the Jessups happened to be about, when Mary, sweeping her knitting into the brocade bag she had made to hold it, rose to say good night, he always punctiliously kissed her, and walked with her to the foot of the stairs. His code commanded him to treat her, in the presence of others, as a loving husband should treat his wife.

But to Mary, the light smiling touch of his lips upon her cheek, was the same kiss he had always given her, when his notion of good manners, and the respect which is owing to the holy estate of matrimony, impelled him to kiss her. If kissing the wall-paper at the height of a girl's cheek from the ground, had been the proper thing to do, to keep people's feelings from being hurt, he would have kissed the wall-paper. It would have made no difference to him which he kissed, the wall-paper or the clear tan, undershot with vermilion, of his wife's cheek. He was kissing neither to give pleasure nor to receive pleasure, but to make a woman's hopeless position in this world seem sound and conventional. He kissed not to give pleasure; but to spare pain. So Mary thought.

But it was no longer so. It gave him pleasure to kiss that clear tan cheek now. It was a privilege. His privilege. But she must never know.

IN THE early spring, Highland was startled to see his first wife's writing on one of the envelopes in the morning mail. It was a cold and formal letter about the boys. Bud Junior had had the operation for mastoiditis, one side only. He had suffered a lot, and was very much pulled down. Now there were indications that there was trouble in the other side. He had gone out without his overcoat and played in the wet snow. She was very much worried; but that wasn't the point.

The boy, it seemed, talked all the time about his father, and wanted him. Highland could use his own judgment. She had no objection to his seeing the boy. She was sending the letter to his club. She supposed they would have his address. He might telegraph if he was coming. It would be a comfort to Bud Junior to know. So much for Bud Junior.

Montie was well. He hadn't bucked up much in his studies and she was afraid he was a little precocious. His teacher thought that in another year it would be well to send him to a boarding school, etc., and so on. No word of herself, or of how she was using her new-won liberty. He wondered if Uncle Fisher had come out of hiding.

He showed the letter to Mary, and asked her what he should do; just as if the decision lay with her.

"Why, you must go, of course," she said promptly. "The poor little kiddie."

"I want to go, of course, but the boy can't mean anything to you, one way or the other, and my going does mean something to you. It means that I'll have to spend a whole lot more than my share of what little money we have on myself. It costs like the very devil to travel these days."

Her answer to this surprised him, and revealed in her a quality that he had never suspected, a maternal quality.

"If he was my kiddie," she said quickly, "I'd go. If I didn't have the money, I'd steal it. If the person I stole it from starved to death, I should worry!" She made him see the thing as she saw it, and he decided at once to go.

Bud had always punctiliously kissed his wife in the presence of others. His code demanded that he show her this respect. But he suddenly realized that it gave him pleasure to kiss her now. It was a privilege. But she must never know.

C. The forty-eight hours of Mary's agony were soon a dim memory. Bud had been splendid, an inspiration. He had patted and stroked her hand for hours, all the time admiring her courage.

Not once did it occur to her that of his own free will he might be leaving her forever; that once he was back in New York, he might think of her, so far away and all, as only a sort of bad dream from which he had waked. For in her mind he had come to be the personification of goodness, honesty, loyalty, and faith to duty.

Then suddenly at parting, he had said, "Give me a kiss," and had whipped his arm around her, and kissed her lips. She had obeyed without thought, as one often obeys a sudden, and unexpected command—had tilted up her face with childish candor and given him the kiss that he had told her to give him. It was an affair of a moment, a touch as it were of butterfly wings, and no more. It wouldn't have happened that way if they had been alone. They had parted as he thought husbands and wives ought to part, when a person like Farmer Jessup, who thought so highly of them both, was looking on.

SHE STOOD with heightened color, and a flutter in her breast: nothing much, just butterfly wings again, until the train under its canopy of dark smoke was small in the distance.

After that she climbed back into the buckboard, and chatted with Farmer Jessup, and with him waited for the up-train that was to bring young Jessup home again for one of his flying visits.

But it was to be a longer visit than usual.

He who usually came off the train with a flying leap, before it had stopped, did not come at all now until after the smoking car had emptied itself. He had two big bags this time instead of one little one, and it was not himself who wrestled with them, but the brakeman.

He waved to them from the platform; waved his left arm. The right was in a sling. You could see it plainly against his light gray suit. It was black silk. His face was pale and thin. He had on a red necktie. There was a fountain pen with a patent nickel clip in the breast pocket of his coat. He had a fob to his watch. Her husband would never have been caught wearing one.

She had waved to him; not exactly a wave; that lovely straight-arm, straight-up gesture, that a girl makes (taking a step forward if she happens to be standing) with the palm of her hand forward, and all the fingers spread.

It wasn't anything. He had slipped on an iced-over platform up in the mountains somewhere, and broken both the bones in his fool forearm. All that worried him was that he wouldn't be able to hug mother the way he always did (it was the old-fashioned mother-and-son way, lasted a long time, and was accompanied by a very gentle to and fro rocking motion, at the exact tempo of a baby's cradle), and that mother would scold him because he hadn't mentioned his accident in the telegram which had announced his home-coming.

"Mother'll never forgive me," he said, "for not costing her two more nights' rest."

Why, of course he could sit on the back of the buckboard and let his feet hang over! What nonsense! Well, then, he'd sit astride the horse!

"There's plenty of room on this seat for all three of us," said Mary, going into action. "We came over that way and my husband takes up more room than you do. You'll sit on the right so's your arm won't get bumped, and I'll sit in the middle so's I won't fall out, and Mr. Jessup can drive from the left side just as well as he can from the right. . . . No. I'll drive. Please let me drive."

She sat in the middle, on the very edge of the seat, and, a rein in each hand, flushed and excited, her eye a little wild and nervous, continuously and jocosely warned as to what outrageous misbehavior to expect next from the docile old plug between the shafts of the wagon she drove for the first time in her life.

Her riding experience at McGregor's stood her in little stead. This horse steered differently; he was not bridle-wise! They made her laugh, and she made them laugh. But presently she was demanding to be told how, and they told her. Young Jessup told her, while old Jessup chuckled.

Horses' heads, Fred Jessup told her, are very firmly put on. It's a trick nature has. Old Mingo's head had been put on in that way. Even if she were to let go of the reins entirely and suddenly it was exceedingly doubtful if his head would fall off, not all the way off, anyhow. But perhaps she was a college girl and had played on the tug of war team, or tugged on it. She had a mighty impressive way of tugging—so steady.

But old Mingo wasn't really a horse; he was a mule. Most stubborn. It was believed that he had sat on a hot stove once in his remote childhood, and it was now known to be very difficult to get him to sit down anywhere at any time. When you tugged the reins that way, he thought you wanted him to sit down and that always made him want to go somewhere else, when maybe you wouldn't feel the same about his having to sit down, and would let him off.

It was indeed doubtful if Mingo could be made to feel like going somewhere else in any other way. She might try. She might loosen the reins and slap him with them. . . . see that? He slows right up, and looks round at you. He thinks you are trying to kill flies, and he's thanking you. . . . Take a little hold of him, or he'll stop altogether.

If she took both the reins in one hand, she could rest the other. Didn't people ever drive with both hands? Only trot hoes (he gave a sly imitation of Farmer Jessup's Down-East way of talking) and chariot horses. Had she never seen a Roman Matron driving a gold chariot drawn by four white horses, and racing a Roman Patron with a gold laurel wreath on his brow and a short purple skirt and a pronounced Adam's Apple who stood in another gold chariot and leaned against the mouths of four black horses?

He was chock full of nonsense. He was like a schoolboy out of school. It was a delightful drive. They were dears, those two Jessup men. Then it was so easy to be just the way you felt with them. They took you at your face value. They didn't know things about you, the way your husband did. Often when your husband was round, you felt like cutting up like a kid, and just didn't.

He was going to stay till his arm was well. That would be a long stay; because it had only just been broken. Wouldn't his mother be glad that as long as it had been broken, it had only just been broken! It would be the longest visit he had made home since he had "flown the coop" to earn a living.

He was mighty sorry not to see that fine big husband of hers. They had had one bully good talk together, and he believed that there might well have been other talks where that one came from.

Of course he swallowed without question, as his father and mother had done, the myth that Highland had gone East on important business.

"Why doesn't he bring his business out here?" he asked. "This is the place to do business. This is what they call God's country in the best sellers and the movies!"

NEITHER Mary nor Farmer Jessup suspected how much effort all this talk and banter cost the young man. Nor did his mother suspect. She simply knew. She saw clear through the pallor to the underlying courage and suffering. Wherefore she gave orders, and he, opposing with every whimsical objection that he could think of, with speeches against all forms of tyranny, allowed himself to be overruled, and did as he was told.

The center of life shifted from Mrs. Jessup's kitchen to the end of the piazza. Here she caused a day-bed to be made soft and delicious with cushions and pillows. Hither she brought a small table, with a copper dish on it to receive ashes, with matches and a half-emptied package of cigarettes remaining from his last visit home.

The house itself was between him and the ocean wind. He was pointed so that through an opening among the rose vines (silk pink roses, large, lippy, and having each a bright, golden eye) he could look down the two steps into Farmer Jessup's garden.

This, but for the overpowering luxuriance of its roses and heliotropes, and the exotic quality lent it by fuschias, and scarlet passion vines, might have been lifted up, white picket fence and all, from Cape Cod, or Martha's Vineyard, and brought (rolled up like a rug) to be spread out in the California sun.

In the center of the garden was the figurehead from an old whaler. He was a young gentleman just going to burst out of his coat and knee breeches. He had low shoes with square toes; deep ribbed stockings, enviable calves, buckles to the shoes, and the breeches. He had very curly hair and upon it a sort of derby hat with a very low crown and a very curly brim. He had in his right hand a scythe and in his left a sheaf of wheat. He stood, one foot higher than the other, upon a boldly carved block of scroll-work. The name of the ship from which he had been salvaged upon the occasion of its being broken up, had been the Good Harvest. Every six months, the old figurehead received a thick coat of white paint.

The circle in which he stood was the meeting-place of four narrow paths edged with white-washed stones. You glimpsed beyond him the gate that opened on the country road. It was of white pickets hinged to one side of a sperm whale's lower jaw and latched to the other. The jaws met at an acute angle and formed a kind of Gothic archway. One jaw was kept bare to show the ivory teeth bedded in it, the other was bright green and scarlet from the twining tendrils of a passion vine.

Mrs. Jessup, it seemed, never had time to sit down; going, coming, hovering, and going again and returning to the side of the patient was all that rested her—that and the loving bantering smile on the boy's face.

But Mary had a place to sit, a tough cushion at the top of the garden steps.

SHE had been made a regular member of the family. Hers to be on the watch, and carry any emergency orders that might be issued by the invalid; hers to fetch and return his cigarette holder when he dropped it and it rolled away. Hers to read aloud to him if he wished, to talk when he wished for talk. At other times to knit (and feel like a real person, and a member of a family) and to fill his eye.

Between them they kept him down all the rest of that day, and nearly all the next. Thereafter the broken arm stopped hurting and he rebelled against being babied any more. The doctor to whom Mrs. Jessup frantically telephoned in this emergency was unable, owing to her deafness, to make her understand that there was no earthly reason why Fred shouldn't do exactly as he pleased, and dropped in in person an hour or two later to take the invalid's part.

It would do him good to walk and driving wouldn't hurt him. Three good meals a day would keep him from wasting away before his mother's eyes. A square meal every two hours might be a good cure for some ailments. It was even advised in acute cases of clubfoot, and sick headache; but it was bad for broken bones. Now while he was at it, he'd just look into Mrs. Highland's throat—beautiful job, the pillars hadn't been hurt. Didn't she sing? She ought to sing with a throat like that. She should begin at once.

The last time Mary had ever sung for pleasure was that time, six years ago now, when she had come home singing "Son of my soul, Thou Saviour Dear. . . ."

That night Fred got out his guitar and made her sing with him, and for him. It was a lot of fun; because the guitar needed them both. Fred held it, and stopped off the chords with his left hand, while Mary stroked the strings under his direction.

The old people sat in a couple of rocking chairs and rocked. There was a moon. Fred knew lots of songs. Why shouldn't she call him Fred? He was just a boy and it seemed natural to call him that. He had been on the glee club. His voice wasn't much. But he made all the words count, and he had a good ear. Perhaps the best things about his singing were his good taste and his wonderful memory. Stephen C. Foster he placed first among our native composers:

"Heigh! Nelly! Ho! Nelly!
Listen lub, to me,
I'll sing for you, play for you,
A dulcem melody!"

He did most of the singing. Mary was shy about it. She didn't know many songs—lots of snatches of songs that she wouldn't want the Jessups to know that she knew. But she was rather thrilled to find what a [Continued on page 121]

Sinning in Silks & Sanctity

By Frank Ward O'Malley

Illustrated by Arthur Little

U Into the fastness of his New Jersey retreat there came to Farmer O'Malley, late of Broadway Broadwayish, a rumor that the world was getting wicked and wicked. Naturally he could not withstand the temptation to go and see for himself.

W AN STARS—three stars—swimming aloft in the last faint flush of the afterglow, lighted dimly my way across lush, sweet-smelling Jersey meadowlands on a recent evening as I, thoughtfully disturbed, wandered homeward after paying our monthly bill at the beautiful country estate of our family bootlegger. I always, incidentally, pay the monthly applejack and gin bills in person. When a very young child I learned that whenever I was sent to our grocer to pay the monthly store bill, the grocer always gave me an orange.

But to return to my original line of thought.

I was, I repeat, distressed in mind on my homeward way because of a gloomy chat I had just had with our family bootlegger. After he had receipted his bill, he had given me not only an orange but also had added cracked ice, vermouth and gin. Then we had sat on his vine-covered porch discussing sadly the deplorable lapse in recent days from the high moral standards of a generation of decent, law-abiding Americans now passing away.

The wife and pretty daughter of our bootlegger had passed us on his porch, I remember, and had departed in their car to attend a charity function being held that evening, I believe, in our Fire House by the Ladies' Aid of the New Jersey Applejack Retail Distributors' Association. The brevity of his daughter's skirts had caused the bootlegger father's head to shake sadly. Then he had plunged gloomily into a discussion of these morally hideous days—of the shocking brazenness of woman's dress; the daily street crimes and nightly indoor orgies in New York and other metropolitan centers; smoking and drinking among young girls; mere boys at country club dances with flasks on their hips—in brief, all that terrifying trend toward moral and social degeneracy, especially in our New York night life of today, that the metropolitan newspapers, militant clergymen and chronic reformers are now constantly viewing with more than alarm.

"But surely," I had tried to protest reassuringly to the saddened bootlegger, "night life in New York today, lawless though it may be, cannot be as bad as in the days of New York's notorious Haymarket, its old German Village, the old Raines Law hotel, the Bowery dives of Red Light days, the——"

"Worse!" my bootlegger had gloomily interrupted, shaking up another. After he had poured he had gone on morosely with modern night-life details that left me as troubled as he. I, too, am a father.

Now, disturbed, as I strolled home in the beauty of the evening, memories came to me of sin that I—solely, of course, as an innocent bystander—had witnessed in the New York night life of terrible days. If metropolitan night life now was even more shocking than it was when——

WELL, take just one night that came back to me as I strolled. Down near New York's old Academy of Music one night, I ran into a playwright, now dead, who announced, while shaking hands, that he wanted to fight me. He had been stepping down to Fourteenth Street between acts, and the melodramas of those days usually had five acts.

When I told him fighting bored me, he pleaded piteously with me to take him some place where he could have a good fight. I helped him into a hansom—taxicabs hadn't arrived then—and took him down to the mirrored place of business run by the late Mr. Trailing Arbutus Biggie Donovan.

There at the street curb the playwright wept bitterly for a while because the cabby and I would not enter Mr. T. A. B. Donovan's and watch him pick his fight. He entered alone at last and instantly picked one.

Glass crashed indoors. Oaths that would have terrified Long John Silver rose above the poundings of fists on flesh: A bung starter, slipping from a bloody hand in action, smashed through the window into the street. The saloon lights went out. Silence.

"Come on in and have a drink, people," the playwright called thickly, yet cheerily to the cabby and me. "They're all unconscious and I'm tending bar."

But wait! After I had poured the playwright back into his own Tenderloin apartment an hour later, I walked round the corner to the old Rector's—new then—for a bite.

A noted Broadway comedian, a writer of best sellers related to the comedian through marriage, and a friend of the novelist were about to depart as I entered Rector's. I was preparing to greet them when suddenly three brawny young strangers halted them abreast of the, until then, arty display of lobsters and other sea foods which the late George Rector always exhibited against a background of cracked ice and green things on a table just inside the restaurant lobby.

A fist flew. Six pairs of fists flew. In time out of a squirming mass of novelist, lobsters, comedian, bluefish, brawny strangers, shrimps, stark naked raw oysters, police, waiters and crabs, came the cause of the ruckus. The three brawny strangers belonged to a class that was a common Broadway pest of the good days. They were college boys—Princeton, I think. College boys always in the good days felt cheated if, on the morning after they returned to the dear old ivy-twined col, they could not say truly, and nonchalantly, to their fellow intellectuals on the campus, "Well, Stubby, we sure did clean up the three biggest"—yawn—"guys we could find in Rector's last night. Gotta ciggie, Stubby?"

I CRAVED no sea food that night after watching a police surgeon amputate a soft-shell crab from beneath the subcutaneous tissue of what once had been a bright little schoolboy face in Princeton's classic halls. I strolled down Broadway to the rhythm of receding ambulance and patrol-wagon gongs.

At Broadway and Twenty-ninth Street an excited crowd that had spilled out of the dance-hall dives that then dotted the neighborhood called for attention. In a basement opposite the stage door of the old Weber and Fields' Music Hall the headless body of a freshly-murdered dance-hall patron had just been found—an innocent, venerable retired sea captain from Long Island idly looking at New York night life, so the papers next day described the victim. He had worn a gold watch. The waiter therefore gave him knockout drops so it wouldn't hurt, carried him to the basement and hacked his head off at his leisure.

Authoritative word finally came out to us in the crowd that the police had just hoed the ex-captain's half-charred head out of a dying fire in the basement furnace.

I called it a night and hurried home.

Ah, those outspoken, carefree nights of direct action! Not all nights in the New York of the good days were so fetchingly interesting, of course, as the one I have just described. But even on the quietest nights then there was always Jack's.

Rare was the night hour in Jack's restaurant when a college boy or a bad young broker failed to rise in the Battling Nelson Grill and speak out of his turn. Instantly, the famous Waiters' Flying Wedge slammed into action. Broker or college boy thereupon hit the Sixth Avenue car tracks lightly, crashed through the Hippodrome's glass entrance and splashed into the Hippodrome tank. The bottom of the tank to this day, so old wives' tales say, is paved with rusty old Psi Upsilon pins where it isn't white with the bleached and broken bones of bad young brokers.

The interesting old Suicide Hall in the Bowery! Mike the Bite's, Jack the Bear's, Trailing Arbutus Biggie Donovan's—a din of shouts and flying fists, of crimson love, bung starters and crashing glass! Red light glowed in the night sky from Fourteenth Street to Longacre Square. Painted ladies with wide swinging hand-bags crowded pedestrians off Broadway curbs from dusk to dawn. Chief indoor sports were the "panel" and "badger" games. Restaurant proprietors hired a bouncer first; the chef was an afterthought. The old-fashioned table castors held cruets of vinegar, pepper, salt, mustard and knockout drops. The drops worked fast, but the waiter had to work faster or the freshly gilded lady at the next table would beat the waiter to the patron's purse pocket.

It was difficult to believe that, comparatively, those were the good days—nights, rather—and these the bad. Nevertheless details my bootlegger had given to me haunted me.

"Youths, misses, yes, and their grandparents," he had said, hollowly, "nightly guzzle illegal liquor in these so-called midnight 'clubs' that now smear Broadway and even side-streets just off Fifth Avenue. Sodom and Gomorrah? Why, New York will wake up some morning to find the flagpole of the Woolworth Building barely sticking up into the bottom of hell! Professional dancing girls, all but naked——"

I FELT it my duty to go. Hastily I packed some old clothes, a gray flannel shirt, my revolver and a cap that Gyp the Blood, back in my newspaper days, had given me as a keepsake when they sternly told him to take off his hat in the electric chair. I scribbled my name and address on a card in case my face was unbecomingly when the body was found. I kissed my wife and little ones good-by and started for the metropolis, unshaved. . .

By midnight that night I had learned that within a scant three-quarter-mile stretch of Broadway there are twenty-four of these midnight "little clubs" going nightly full blast. I place the number exactly at twenty-four because long before midnight at the doors of twenty-four of them I had been thrown out.

"Thrown out" is putting it, perhaps, too uncouthly. Rather, when I sought entrance the evening-clothed guardians of the portals—any one of whom made a Leyendecker illustration for a dress shirt advertisement look like the portrait of a section hand who drinks—gazed haughtily, at best with cold smiles of contempt, at the late Gyp's cap, my clothes and broken shoes. I was garbed, remember, in a way that would have made me more than welcome in the least disreputable night life resorts of the good days that were.

The "little club" managers would not unbend even to the extent of explaining why I could not enter. As rebuff followed rebuff, a curious obsession began to grip me; I had not been barred at half a dozen doors before I became obsessed with the notion that I was a Town Topics reporter trying to get one of the Vanderbilt boys to put me up at the Union Club.

Midnight came and I had not yet been permitted a glimpse of the sodden orgies and degenerate dances which I knew, on the authority of all our foremost reforming for-god's-sakers, were dragging Manhattan to depths so low that soon the city would need a step-ladder to climb into hell. Disheartened, I had not now even the old corner saloon to turn to for solace.

IN DESPAIR I went to Jack's. I was admitted, but only to the men's grill, and they hid me in a far corner. I stayed until I had finished a quart and a pint of coffee and two quarts of ginger ale. Not even a religious argument started. Not a "rah" was heard for dear old Yale. And it was a Saturday night!

In the club where I lunched the next day—an actual club—I saw in the Sunday paper a page interview with a woman for-god's-saker. She proved conclusively my worst fears. While I read, into the club came two members, one a Justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, the other a brilliant young

C. In New York's new night life you must dance decently, and wear evening clothes; in the New York night life of a generation ago decency in anything was out of bounds.

Assistant District Attorney. I am not a professional reformer, nevertheless I did feel it my duty to tell these, in a way, officers of the law about the scandalous multiplicity of these illegal drinking clubs and of the way their managers had feared to let me pass through their portals of hellishness.

"Oh, calm yourself, lad," said the venerable Justice—whose next words proved that he had missed the whole uplifting theme of my hot protest. "I can get you into any of them. I frequent them all. Once or twice a week after seeing a show my wife and I—"

"Your wife?"

"My wife, of course! Whose wife do you think—" The Judge stopped and eyed me sharply. "Do you mean to say you tried to enter a Broadway supper club unaccompanied by a lady? Where did you think you were—back in the days of the Haymarket?"

In one-syllable words that a country boy like myself could understand, the Justice and the Assistant District Attorney schooled me briefly in the etiquette of the New Hellishness. I went home that day, but only to get my dress clothes. The next night I was back on Broadway—now arrayed like the lilies of the field. Instead of an identification card I carried the card of the Justice of the Supreme Court, a word of introduction penciled on a corner of it. With me was my wife, whom I had persuaded, without marked opposition from her, to be an innocent bystander while we watched New York plunge to perdition.

Sin—so I mused while getting into evening clothes that Monday night—at least socially was looking up. My Justice friend had pointed out that the drinking club managers these days make up their advertising mailing lists almost exclusively from the Social Register. In the old days of legalized ossification, on the other hand, the only Broadway night resort that made a pretense of exclusiveness limited its patrons only to persons listed in the city and suburban telephone books. As a rule, however, the managers of night life resorts asked only that a patron be a member of one of two sharply defined classes—(a) persons listed in the City Directory, and (b) persons not listed in the City Directory.

They did not insist, as now, that the male patron be accompanied by a perfect lady; not even by one who was a lady. There was, in fact, an added thrill in starting out on the night of adventure either alone or as one of a party strictly stag. One looked forward then to picking and choosing at random from the garden of feminine loveliness [Continued on page 116]

C How he did it he hardly knew, with an axe, he thought; no, not his own, for he had left the cabin without it. They had lunged for him first, he thought—he was not sure.

C If you don't like a story that will clutch at your heart and bring a lump to your throat, you would better pass this one by, because it carries a feud to its relentless end and the simplicity of its telling only adds to its poignancy

The Last MAN CHILD

By Emma-Lindsay Squier

Illustrated by Dalton Stevens

FROM the far woods came the hollow sound of an axe. And the woman with sharp features and iron gray hair smiled grimly from the doorway of the cabin.

"Your pap and Lem is gettin' the fence back in place," she announced, and there was a note of bitter triumph in her voice.

The girl bending over the stove in the far corner of the room, straightened up and listened. But in her face was no answering response of satisfaction. Her dark eyes were clouded, and she made an impatient little gesture.

"Yes, and young Abel'll cut it down t'night and move it back agin. Foolishness, I call it, this here everlastin' feud about an old fence!"

The mother whirled in the doorway, and her sharp features grew more grim. There was something sinister about the intense blackness of her hard, bright eyes and the tight, straight line of her mouth.

"Foolishness, is it!" she said, shrilly, and the girl did not answer, but bent again to her cooking.

"Foolishness, you call it, do you? I call it by a different name, my girl. Young Abel's grandpap killed your grandpap, and his uncle put a bullet through my brother's head. In my time a Beadesly wa'n't safe out'n his own yearld without one of them white trash pickin' him off from a tree or a rock. Foolishness, eh! And nigh all of your kinfolks killed by that wicked Owens clan!"

The girl did not look up, but her face set into stubborn lines.

"That ain't young Abel's fault," she said in a sullen monotone; "it ain't his fault that he's an Owens, nor that his kinfolks has been at outs with our'n. That ol' fight would of died out years ago if Pap and Lem had let that fence alone. Young Abel ain't done nothin' but stand up for his rights."

From the inner room of the cabin came the gurgling laughter of a young child. Then the patter of small feet, and Amanda Beadesly's eyes softened.

"Buddy, come to yore mammy," she said, and held out her arms to him. Almost three years old was the man child, and he was straight and sturdy of body, with eyes that were softly dark like Florrie's. The mother caught him up with a gesture that had something of fierceness in it.

"You don't talk like a Beadesly," she said to the girl; "a body'd think you wa'n't of our stock at all. But Buddy here, he's goin' to larn from the cradle that he's of our clan. He's goin' to larn t' hate them Owensens, and to never let 'em git ahead of him nor any of his family."

The girl shifted a frying pan from an open hole to the back part of the stove, and the red gleam shone ruddily on her heavy braided hair, twisted around her head.

"You talk as if they was a hull tribe of Owensens left," she remarked. "They's only young Abel—our kinfolks cleaned out the rest of the family years ago."

The mother nodded shortly.

"An' a good thing, too, that he's the last o' the line," she said. "Though I reckon when he marries—"

It was something more than the heat from the glowing range that colored the girl's cheeks and sent the hot blood coursing up to her forehead. But the mother did not see. With her work-roughened hand, she was smoothing back the dark brown hair from around the child's face.

The cabin was not one of those pitilessly bare homes that one finds so often in the Kentucky mountains. For the Beadesly place lay on the slope of the smiling Weneboga valley, and all around them the land was richly black, the soft loam smelling of fertility and boundless pent-up energy. The dark pine trees stood stiffly along the upper ridges of the Kennebeck Mountains, singing sonorously to the clustering maples and alders that grew on the lower levels. And down the valley, as far as the eye could see, was the sheen of sunlight on fields of grain, the heavy wheat bending to every breeze in rippling undulations of green.

None could know, save those who had lived long in that mountainous land, that an invisible cloud of hate overhung the rich meadows and brooded in the shadow of the dark pines. For the fertile valley was divided in ownership between two once powerful clans, the Beadeslys and the Owensens. Once long ago the two families had been friends, had shared tools and supped in each other's cabins. But that was farther back than anyone living could remember.

Down the middle of the valley coursed a clear brook, having as its source a mountain spring that gurgled up in a stone cup under the rocks of the Kennebecks. Until the first quarrel, both families had shared the cool waters amicably, nor had they thought to establish the ownership of the spring. But a Beadesly, with his kin, had fenced in the spring so that it lay upon his land. That night there came the Owensens—as the Beadeslys knew they would come—and a gun fight ensued.

THUS THE first blood was shed; and through the years the war went on, hotly, ruinously. Where, before, the smiling Weneboga valley had housed many comfortable cabins, and had pastured hundreds of cattle and horses, now were left only two cabins, wherein dwelt the remnants of the two once powerful clans. In one of them lived old Bartholomew Beadesly, with his wife Amanda, the girl Florrie, his son Lem, and Buddy, child of his old age. In the other cabin across the slight ridge, lived young Abel, the sole survivor of the Owens family.

New laws had come into the country, and they who dwelt in the valley were dimly aware of the restraining powers that said that feuds should cease. There was peace of a kind, but it was a deadly, brooding peace, the pause that the rattler makes when he coils and is ready to strike.

The spring rains and the storms that followed them, had leveled the dividing fence in many places. Both young Abel and the elder Beadesly men knew of it, but there was planting to do, and all the innumerable tasks of early spring. So the fence had lain as it had fallen, and the girl Florrie dared to hope that it would be forgotten.

But when the summer came with its lull of work, old Bartholomew and his son Lem spoke of the dividing line. Now was the chance to put up a new fence, a stronger one, a fence that young Abel should not easily tear down.

The mother had watched from the door as the two went swinging up into the woods with their axes, and she smiled as she heard the first dull blows of steel against living wood as great trees were hewn to make for the Beadesly clan a lasting victory of hate triumphant.

When the sunset was reddening the valley with its goodnight kiss, when the dark pines on the upper slopes commenced to sing their sonorous song of coming night, Florrie stole away from the cabin where her mother was busied with the evening meal, and with the lithe, nervous steps of a young forest animal, swung down the trail and disappeared over the ridge.

Quickening her steps to a run, she skirted the fringe of alders that grew beside the brook, and paused only at the door of another cabin, a smaller one, nestled against the side of the hill as if for protection. As she halted in the doorway, a strongly built young figure rose from a kneeling position beside the small stove.

"Honey!" said young Abel, and with two long strides he had taken her in his arms.

For an instant they stood so, lost to everything but the sweetness of the moment. Then she stirred in his arms, and half freed herself.

"Don't keep me, Abel," she said nervously, "I've got to go right back, they'll be wonderin' about me in a minute. I had to come to tell you—"

He drew her back into his embrace, and his lips rested on her hair. "Whatever you come to tell me, I'm glad of it if it brought you here to me," he said, caressingly. "Honey, I've been thinkin' of you all day, how it wouldn't be long now with the good prices I'll git for these crops before you and I kin sneak off to Spinneytown—"

Florrie sighed, but she did not move.

"Oh, Abel, I wonder if I'm wicked to love you so. Sometimes it seems t' me that I cain't go through with it—marryin' you agin Pap's wishes. Why, Abel, he and Maw would turn me out'n the house if they knew me and you was promised. Already Maw wonders why I stand up fer you the way I do, but she don't really suspicion nothin'—"

She stirred in his arms and raised her face to his.

"I hate this quarrel between our families, Abel! It ain't right, it ain't civilized. I used to think it was, afore I went to school those few months, and afore I knew you—"

There was silence, as they kissed.

"But, Abel, it's all wrong. Here we have the finest land in all of Linden County between our families, and ef we'd let bygones be bygones, we all could be mighty happy. I thought maybe when the fence fell down that everything ud be forgotten. But now—"

Abel held her off and looked at her searchingly.

"But now, what?" He asked, and his voice had suddenly become stern.

"They—oh, Abel, promise me you won't do nothin' about it, please promise me—"

She raised her dark eyes to his pleadingly.

BUT HIS arms had fallen from around her. His mouth had gone into a straight hard line—it was the mouth of the Owensens, who had all been fighting men.

"They've made another fence around that spring. Is that what you've come to tell me?"

"Yes, that's it, but I came, most of all, Abel, to beg you to let it go, please don't stir up no more trouble. You and me will be gettin' married soon, and maybe ef you gave up about the spring, Pap and Maw might not take it so hard—"

But young Abel's hands had clenched into hard knots.

"By God, I'll not let it go!" he said tensely. "Why wasn't they willin' to let the fence lay where it lay? I'd never have put it up, but they cain't do me dirt behind my back like that, I'm damned if they can! That fence comes down tonight, and when I put it up the spring will be on my land so there won't be no mistake."

The girl gave a little cry.

"Abel, please—"

He turned on her, almost fiercely.

"No, I say! There never was an Owens yet who laid down to be walked on. They's two of them, and only one of me, but they'll find out—they'll find out—"

Florrie was silent for a moment. Other women might have cried, might have wrung their hands in the sheer futility of their despair. But she did neither. She looked at him from under level brows, and presently he took her hands in his.

"Florrie," he said almost pleadingly, "cain't you see, if I gave up to them, they'd think I was soft. I wasn't goin' to touch that fence, it would have rotted there on the ground for all of me. But since it's been down I've been watering my horses at the spring. It's handy to the barns and Roger"—Roger was the big brown horse he loved—"likes the water there. You ought to see him, Florrie"—the clan fight was lost for a moment in the Kentuckian's admiration of a good horse—"he's awful cute, he puts his nose in the water and blows bubbles. Plays in it long after he's had his fill. They ain't goin' to shut me and Roger out, nohow."

Florrie still regarded him steadily and without speaking. And sensing the sorrowful rebuke in her dark eyes, he caught her to him again.

"Florrie, you-all knowed I was an Owens when you fell in love with me. You knowed about all this. It's been goin' on fer years, and it cain't stop now, not as long as your pap and your brother set themselves to do me dirt whenever they kin. It's me or them, Florrie, you know that. You've either got to be an Owens or a Beardedly. You cain't be both."

The girl lifted her head, and her hand stole up to his cheek.

"Why, Abel, there ain't no choosin' about it, I chose you long ago. Ain't it somewhere in the Bible that a woman shall leave her kinfolks and go with her husband? I'm willin' to do that, Abel, I'll go with you to Spinneytown jest as soon as you say the word. And after that, you know I won't have no family but you. I'm not askin' much of you, Abel, jest that you don't stir up no new trouble. Pap and Lem won't stop at nothin'—" her lips were against his cheek—"and I don't want to be a widder woman afore I'm a bride."

He laughed, and held her closer. The sun had set, and the long shadows of the mountain had crept unnoticed down upon the valley.

DON'T YOU worry about me, Honey, I kin take care of myself. You know I ain't aimin' to cause you no heartaches—not once sence I met you hev I raised my hand agin your kinfolks. But that there spring, now—"

She released herself slowly, and turned to go.

"All right, Abel, I know you got to do what you think is proper, but I did hope that if I come and asked you—oh, it's gittin' dark," she broke off, "I've got to hurry home."

She moved toward the door, but young Abel held her back and spoke on impulse.

"Honey, fer your sake, I'll not fence in the spring on my land. I'll cut the fence down t'night, jest to show them that they cain't get ahead of an Owens, not with a dozen axes. But I'll let it lay, and ef they build it up, I'll cut it down again. Is that better, Florrie?"

He knew that she was not satisfied. But he loved her because she accepted the partial sacrifice gratefully.

He watched her lithe figure until it disappeared behind the alders, and the grimness around his mouth had been smoothed away. But now, as in the far distance he heard the dull thud of an axe, his eyes narrowed, and once more his lips set into hard lines. It was again the mouth of the Owensens, who were all fighting men.

Florrie's mother looked up petulantly as the girl entered the cabin, warmly lighted now by firelight and an oil lamp that burned with a yellow flame.

"Where you-all been so long?" she demanded. "What with you runnin' around the woods at night an' the men folks still workin' at the fence, supper's gittin' stone cold."

The girl, unused to lies, flushed, and murmured an excuse. She caught Buddy up from his play, and tossed him until he shrieked with delight. Then, swinging him in her strong arms, she sang a snatch of an old-time song.

The older woman's face softened. Florrie, with the rosy-cheeked child nestling against her softly rounded breast, was a pretty and satisfying picture.

"That's right," she said jokingly, "better git used to 'tendin' Buddy. It'll come in handy one o' these days when you have a young 'un of your own."

The girl did not answer, but she hid her face suddenly against the child's cheek. A great hope—and a great fear surged through her heart. A baby of her own—Abel's baby! An Owens! A boy baby, perhaps, who should grow up to hate the child she held in her arms—a Beardedly. It was as if a weight had pressed upon her heart when she heard her father's gruff laugh as he stood in the doorway with Lem, her elder brother.

"Well, the fence's up. Guess that'll hold the young Owens hound fer awhile."

"Yes," added Lem, "an' he won't even know it's up until mornin'."

"I s'pose," said the girl, in the sullen monotone she always used when speaking of young Abel or the feud, "that he couldn't hear your axes?"

"I s'pose he could, my girl," responded her father as he

Q You-all knowed I was an Owens when you fell in love with me. You knowed about the feud. It's me or them, Florrie, you've either got to be an Owens or a Beardesly. You can't be both.

strode over to the corner of the cabin and deposited his axe, "but he ain't goin' to figger out that we've put up the fence agin—not until he sees it there."

Lem had taken down a lean mountaineer rifle from its peg above the stone fireplace. He handled it carefully, almost lovingly. He sighted down its long, sinister length, and smiled grimly to himself.

"Some o' these days, mister rifle," he told it, "we'uns is goin' to see young Abel at the end of yore sight, and then—"his finger pressed against the trigger, and it clicked viciously—"then, the last of the Owenses is goin' out o' the world."

Florrie clasped Buddy a little more tightly to her breast. She wanted to cry out, to spring against the burly figure of her brother, to wrench the rifle from his hands, to beat her fists against his sneering face. She wanted to scream at him, "I am Abel's woman, we are promised—you shan't kill my man because of a fence—I'll protect him with my life! I'm not a Beardesly. I'm an Owens, because I belong to him—"

But she did neither. She only stared at him as he put the gun back on its peg, and obeyed silently her mother's command to get her father's supper on the table.

That night Florrie stared sleeplessly at the patch of starlit sky that she could see from her bed. She was listening, with every muscle in her body taut. And when, in the silence of the black hour that presages the dawn, she heard far away the dull sound of an axe, she caught her breath, and a mad fear tore at her heart lest her father and brother, hearing it, should steal out with their lean mountaineer rifles to take the life of the man she loved, the man she was to marry.

But they slept, profoundly, with deep gurgling snores. And it was only when daylight came that they found young Abel had come and gone in the night, and that the fence they had built was leveled to the ground.

ON THE next day Florrie came to young Abel, having made of her clothes a little bundle which she carried in her hand.

"Ef you still want me," she said simply, "you'll have to take me now, Abel."

He took the bundle from her, and led her into the cabin.

"You've left home fer good?" he queried.

"Fer good, I reckon, Abel. I couldn't hold my tongue when I heard them carryin' on about that fence, an' the spring, and you-all—I up an' told them that me an' you was promised, an' they told me—to get out."

Abel took her in his arms very tenderly.

"You don't mind, do you honey?"

"No," she said slowly, "not so long as I have you."

But he knew that she did mind. The ties of blood are strong in the mountains. Her kinfolks had loved her in their restrained way, and her father had been proud of her beauty and her strength. She did not enlarge upon the scene in the cabin when she had stood before her family and told them that she loved young Abel, but he knew that it had been savage for her and hard to face.

He brought Roger from the meadow, the big, brown horse walking with happy mincing steps as if he had been a colt. He knew Florrie, and stuck his ears forward when he saw her. She had given him many dainty morsels, and had always a caress for him whenever she saw him.

"Make yore bow to yore mistress," said young Abel gaily, and Florrie tried to match his mood. She put her face against Roger's soft wrinkly nose, and stroked his well-kept mane.

"You-all won't be jealous, will you?" she said softly. And as if he denied it stoutly, Roger nibbled at her sleeve, his eyes bright with affection.

So on the broad back of the favorite horse the two rode down the mountain trail, and at Spinneytown they were married.

Thus Florrie became an Owens. And in the cabin on the slope of the Kennebecks, they never spoke her name. Life there went on much as before, only the iron gray hair of the mother turned somehow to white, and in the eyes of the father there was a hurt look as of a big animal who has been struck unjustly. Lem was sullen and silent, his heart was black with bitter hate. They could never understand.

In the cabin that nestled snugly against the hillside like a child against its mother's breast, young Abel and the girl Florrie lived, and loved, and worked. Abel was happy, and sang while he worked. But Florrie—sometimes of an early evening she would steal over the ridge, and up to the top of the slope, where she could look down and see through the trees the warm, yellow lights that shone from the cabin windows where her kinfolks dwelt. She used to wonder, as she stood there in the dusk, what they were doing; whether Buddy was playing or was asleep, how

C When at last she heard his step on the threshold, it was as if an icy finger touched her heart and stopped its beating. "Florrie," he said thickly, "help me hitch the team. I'm goin' int' Spinneytown t' give myself up."

her mother's face would look, flushed from the firelight, how her father's rough voice would sound as he called her, "my girl"—then she would hurry back along the narrow trail, back to the cabin which she now called home, and Abel never knew she had been away.

WITH THE waning of summer came heavier work for out-of-doors, crops to harvest, to market, endless chores of house and farm. Autumn passed into the whiteness of winter, and then with the spring, came Florrie's baby.

The doctor, brought from Spinneytown, laid the soft little body in the girl's arms, and he spoke reassuringly.

"A boy, and as fine a one as I've seen."

Abel wiped his perspiring brow. The night had been a torment to him.

"Ain't that fine, honey?" he beamed down at Florrie. "A boy!"

To him it meant the continuation of his line, a new life to carry on the name of Owens.

Florrie smiled at him, wanly. But in her heart was a deep fear. A boy baby! An Owens! to grow up learning hatred of that boy baby across the ridge—

On an impulse she turned weakly in bed.

"Abel," she said in a whisper, "I want my mammy. Will you go and fetch her to me?"

Young Abel stared at her without speech. His eyes turned away and questioned the doctor. It was his first thought that Florrie's mind had given way.

"Why, honey—" he said uncertainly, and stopped. He had sworn when a boy, never to cross the boundary line that separated the two farms. The Beardslys had made the same oath. It was a rule in clan warfare that enemies must stay—and shoot—on their own land. It was a rule that was often broken, of course. But young Abel had kept to his own side.

The doctor spoke briskly.

"Get your mammy, well, I reckon. Of course he will." He turned to Abel authoritatively. "Fetch her as soon as you can. Every woman needs her mother at a time like this."

"But—" Abel began.

Florrie's look caught and held Abel's hesitating speech.

"ALL RIGHT, honey, I'll fetch her ef she'll come," he said.

With long, swinging strides he hurried out through the pasture, across the meadow, and along the narrow trail that led over the ridge. The Beardsly men labored with their axes in the far woods. So when he paused in the open doorway of the cabin, the woman who faced him from the shadowed room, peered at him suspiciously, but without recognition.

"I'm Abel Owens," he said briefly, and Amanda Beardsly stiffened to rigid defense. "I've come at Florrie's bidding," he went on mechanically, "to ask you to come to her. She's got a baby—a boy baby—and she wants you."

For an instant there was silence. He could not know that the mother heart of the older woman had yearned and leaped in response to his words. He only knew that her mouth had twitched, and that her voice came to him in a tense, low tone.

¶ "Oh, God, forgive me, I've been wrong. Don't let her die, my girl—my girl——"

"You—git back where you belong—git back to your woman—she ain't no child o' mine and I ain't a-goin' to her. Tell her that when she chose t' be an Owens she stopped bein' a Beardsly. Git back now onto yore own land, or——" her hand indicated briefly the long rifle that hung above the fireplace, "I'll take a shot at you myself, sence the men folks ain't here t' do it."

He had half expected some such reply, yet the cold cruelty of it dismayed him. He spoke almost pleadingly.

"At sech times as this, Mis' Beardsly, it might be jest as well t' forgit about quarrels. I've come here in peace t' ask you t' come t' Florrie. She needs you, and wants you. You kin say that she ain't your'n, but in your heart you know that she belongs t' you, jest like her baby belongs t' her, no matter what happens. I ain't askin' for myself, Mis' Beardsly, it's for Florrie. The first words she said when she got strong enough t' talk, was, 'I want my mammy.'"

Again the mother heart was wrenched in longing. Her girl, her Florrie, who in this moment of travail and triumph was calling for the mother who had borne her! But the stern repression of the mountaineer folk closed and sealed the half-open door of tenderness. The girl Florrie was no longer her girl. She had chosen to be an Owens. She had turned against the family that had reared her, against its teachings of class hatred, against all that the name of Beardsly stood for.

"Tell her," said the older woman, and [Continued on page 110]

C. Peggy was an unchecked barbarian, healthy as a hunter and restless as a diabolical mass of quicksilver. Her instinct, within the sound of music, was to dance; and the sailors seized on this as a form of entertainment.

Peggy

By Henry Holt

Illustrated by Frederic Dorr Steele

C "If you love a man
so badly that it hurts, and you know you're only a counterfeit like me, should you take what the gods offer, or should you leave him for some other girl who could give him children with real blood instead of the counterfeit thing?"
That was Peggy's problem

OF PAINTING, literature or sculpture, Captain David Fenton knew as little as most other weather-beaten mariners; but it has never been denied that when a really suitable situation arose, a situation which gave adequate scope, he was an artist at what his deck-hands would have called "cussin'." The fact that he could do it in about eight different languages—a stern necessity, this, considering the polyglot crews one finds at sea—enabled him to go full speed ahead for fifteen hectic minutes without a single repetition.

Yet, when the supreme moment, the human limit of chagrin arose, he stood mute as a newly-opened oyster.

His ship, the wheezy old steam freighter Nancy, had left New York, bound round Cape Horn for Valparaiso, Batavia, Chinese ports, and heaven only knew where else. Exactly twenty-four hours after the vessel chugged past Sandy Hook, Peggy appeared. The chain locker had been her hiding place.

Peggy was twelve and grubby; as grubby as she was twelve; chain lockers would make an archangel look grubby. Lest you should imagine that her little face was particularly dirty where she had rubbed her tear-stained eyes with her grubby hands, it should be explained that on being taken before the captain, Peggy incontinently put out her tongue at him. She was not of the weeping order.

That was where Captain David Fenton emulated the oyster in its silence.

But after a while, power to make inarticulate sounds returned.

When, finally, speech came to him, it was very characteristic.

"Holy sufferin' cats! What is it?"

The question was addressed to Perkins, the mate, to whom Peggy owed the pleasure of this introduction. It was Perkins who had caught sight of her peering tentatively round the chain locker door.

"It's a stowaway, sir," declared the mate.

WELL, I'll be—" the skipper began and checked himself. Ordinary "cussin'" seemed so woefully inadequate. He ran gnarled fingers through his silvered hair. "But, Lord, Perkins, we—we can't—dammit, look at the thing. Look at it! I ask you, d'you think we can drop it overboard, or at Valparaiso? Of course, we can't. It's a girl, I suppose."

He was looking at Peggy's bedraggled pigtail, while Peggy's gray-green eyes, in which the very devil of mischief lay hid, were unerringly taking stock of the master-mariner. He had funny criss-cross lines all over his face, particularly about his eyes, which were extraordinarily blue. You couldn't see his chin, because he had a beard growing there, a white beard that waggled as he talked. He spoke very loudly, as though he wanted everyone on the ship to hear, and he was upset about something. Very likely because she had come on board. But he wouldn't hit her. Definitely, he wouldn't hit her. So that was all right. She could put her tongue out at him any time she liked and he wouldn't hit her. It was comforting to know it.

C The man gave Peggy a long, keen look as though searching his memory. Peggy's brain sped backward.

"What's your name, kid?" Incautiously, Perkins touched her shoulder as he spoke, earning thereby, as reward, a glance of withering scorn. She had sensed the fact that the skipper was judge and jury in this case, and that Perkins only ranked as a common cop.

"Peggy," she answered, defiance unquenched.

"Peggy what?" demanded the skipper.

"Peggy Saxley," the prisoner admitted glibly, after a second's thoughtful pause.

"Where do you live?"

Silence shut down upon Peggy. She gave a toss to the pig-tail and then, apparently, forgot the existence of the two men.

"Say, where do you live?" the mate echoed bluntly.

SOMETHING the stowaway shared in common with a tigress flashed into her expression. Even Perkins saw that he was not making himself really popular with Peggy. He glanced at the skipper who, with more understanding, jerked his head in the direction of the door. It was an order against which Perkins would dearly have loved to mutiny, but, with no alternative, he sidled from the cabin. Peggy's greatest sorrow for hours afterwards was that she had failed to celebrate her triumph as he went out by putting her tongue out after him.

"Now, little girl, you've got to tell me where you belong," said David Fenton, subsiding into a chair with a helpless feeling of suspended control.

Wide-eyed, she looked at the skipper with great ingenuousness. She had anticipated something severe in the way of reprisals at the hands of constituted authority as soon as she was discovered on board. Anticipated reprisals, and been prepared to take her medicine. Now, as the felon feels a wave of feeling akin to love for the judge who is letting him down lightly, Peggy warmed to the captain and was aware that in another moment she would blurt out her story. But Captain Fenton, ill-versed in such delicate cajolery, blundered. A gnat may irritate an elephant, and Captain Fenton felt rather like that elephant. Bringing his hand down on the table with a crash he barked, "Answer me!"

"Won't!" she said with finality, yet no suggestion of sulkiness. It was a mere statement and it carried such conviction that Captain Fenton never doubted it. You see, even if you are a hardened old sea-dog you can’t wring facts out of little girls with the aid of a rope’s end; moreover, from what he had seen of this young lady, the skipper was beginning to suspect that if she made up her mind, physical pain couldn’t influence her decision. Wherein, he struck upon a fact as abiding as the granite hills.

“Yes, it’s me,” she said. “I’ve wondered what it would have been like for me if that shark got you.”

“Very well, have it your own way,” he said, affecting indifference without ease. “I’ll hand you over to the steward. You’ll be locked in a spare cabin and fed on bread and water till you change your mind and ask for me.”

The barb sank deeply, for Peggy was a healthy young animal, and had eaten nothing in thirty-six hours.

Old Barns, the steward, knew by familiar signs that the skipper was madder than a rattler with a steam-roller on its tail. It was an excellent idea to carry out instructions implicitly and with dispatch when the captain was in that mood.

“Yes, sir,” he said, catching hold of Peggy and withdrawing her from the Presence without noticeable tenderness. Opening a door, he ushered her into a temporary prison where, in a lowered, husky voice, he uttered the word, “Hungry?”

With brow wrinkled in suspicious delight and surprise, she appraised him swiftly; and after about ten seconds, mirth was reborn in her grubby face for the first time since she had tasted the sorrows of a life on the ocean wave. She nodded, and loved the old steward passionately. He placed a finger on his lips in warning, closed one eye, and stalked off to the ship’s larder with a dark scowl on his kindly face to veil his intention.

THE STEWARD openly brought her a glass of water and two large slices of dry bread; and then, inside the cabin, Peggy’s dreams came true. It was real pumpkin pie that he gave her—fished out of his pocket as the conjurer fishes out the rabbit.

“If you gotta go without grub, you shan’t do it on an empty stummick,” he said. “How old are you?”

Peggy told him with difficulty. She was extremely busy.

“Huh! Just the same age!” wheezed the steward in his curious stage whisper, a yearning look in his watery old eyes; grandfathers are curiously devoted to the offspring of their own.

“Wat yo’ run away from home for?”

Piecemeal, between bites, she told him snatches of her life and why she had come on board the Nancy, while Joe Barns rubbed his chin.

"An' to hell with the whole lot of 'em," she finished.

"Say, kid," the old steward broke in, still rubbing his chin reflectively, "I guess you'd better go right to the old man an' tell him. He's one of the best, an' you'll soon have him buffaloed. You got the mate's goat, though."

Two words and a gesture were Peggy's retort. Even Joe Barns coughed, though his face twisted whimsically at the two words. Peggy's education evidently had lacked nothing in colorful speech.

"That's all right," he said, "but you might just as well tell the skipper now as do it later an' be starved."

By using that last word, the steward spoke in a language that Peggy fully understood. Her eyes narrowed.

"I getcha," she said, sliding down from the bunk on which she had sat, mun hing. "That guy with the whiskers? I can talk to him."

"Come on, then," urged the steward. Half an hour later Captain Fenton was making one or two points very clear to the mate Perkins.

"I can't figure out yet, Mr. Perkins, whether she's a limb of Satan himself, or whether there's something almighty nice about the kid. I never had no little uns of my own, an' I guess they're a plague anyway; but till we get back to New York, Peggy's going to be my kid, plague or no plague. Do you understand? My kid."

Which put a period to the immediate troubles of Peggy and at the same time taught David Fenton that fatherhood, even by proxy, may, indeed, add to life's complexities. There were days when the skipper was convinced Peggy was the devil's own infant with most of her father's characteristics, but these days were sandwiched in between others when he was less sure of this.

As an instance, he understood the devil fought for evil, whereas Peggy fought for what she wanted, irrespective of whether it was good or bad, and fought, too, with amazing persistence. She demanded warmer quarters for the ship's cat. Even the cat, a hardy beast, accustomed to roughing it, thought it was comfortable enough in the draughty after wheel house. The skipper swore he wouldn't have the animal in the saloon. Peggy's way of compromising on this particular problem was to take the cat to bed with her.

Peggy saw Perkins cleaning a revolver. She had always wanted a revolver and her young wisdom told her the last thing to do was to ask the mate for that gun. Here was a clear case for strategy. When Perkins was on watch, she hunted in his cabin until she found the weapon and then stole it. According to her simple code, "taking" things one wanted was morally identical with buying them, only in the latter case one could be impudent, and in the former one must be careful.

Nobody found any way of curbing or "improving" Peggy. She laughed at the mate brazenly; she wheedled the steward. For the skipper, she had a queer sort of awe tempered by a tinge of scorn because he never spanked her. How could anybody hope to get her to do things or not to do things unless they spanked her? She sensed it as a weakness in the skipper, and after she discovered that he didn't like her to swear, she swore to make him angry—and for the fun of getting away with it. Not that she wanted to hurt the skipper; considering her dozen years only, she felt rather maternal toward him, and though she had liked him the instant she realized he wouldn't hurt her, she was beginning to like him in a way she had never cared for anyone.

Before the freighter rounded Cape Horn, Peggy had developed into an institution on board the Nancy. Authority and discipline were influences she had never before encountered, and the merest suggestion of them converted her into an instinctive wild-

U Up in Vermont, Pop dropped anchor for the last time. Peggy took care of him. But the fall brought double pneumonia and Peggy bit her lips hard when the doctor told her the truth.

C. "Life is wicked, Mary," Peggy sobbed, without looking round to see who was there. "I didn't ask to be born in an East Side tenement, and I didn't ask to love him. I couldn't help that."

cat. But David Fenton noticed that she had a habit of working things out for herself in her own way. Curiously, her way, he observed, was not always inherently wrong.

"That kid's got character," he muttered to himself once, the pride he took in her forcing itself through his anger after she had defied him utterly. "Yes, by heck, there's no doubt about it, she's got character, all right."

As the months went, and the ship toiled on her endless course, Peggy was left very much to her own devices, with results that amused the deck-hands, but would have shocked a more delicately nurtured community. She was an unchecked barbarian, healthy as a hunter and restless as a diabolical mass of quicksilver. Her instinct, within the sound of music, was to dance; and presently the sailors seized on this as a form of entertainment.

There was a little Cockney on board who had an amazing knowledge of hornpipes and step dancing. To the tune of a broken-winded accordion, he taught her all he knew of dancing, and Peggy absorbed the knowledge in the same voracious way that she absorbed various queer kinds of knowledge not to be found in books. Books spelled school to Peggy, and school spelled rebellion.

From Hong Kong, the freighter traded to Iquique, and from Iquique to New Zealand. The immediate prospect of return to New York faded into the dim background. Once, in the middle of the Pacific, while Peggy and the skipper were watching the play of flying fish, David Fenton frowned over the thought that some day he would lose her.

"What about your folks?" he said. "You know, we'll hit New York sooner or later."

"To hell with New York," was her epitaphic summary of the situation. "Say, Pop, what makes flying fish fly?"

Peggy was thirteen when the freighter sidled to the rickety pile wharf of Iloilo, one of the dots you see marked on the chart between Fiji and Samoa. That dot is rather more important than it looks on the chart, for Iloilo is a Pacific Ocean trading center, and men and women spend their lives there far from the maw of cannibals. Indeed, the church at Iloilo was designed by a famous American architect, and only the more fastidious of mortals can fully appreciate the cuisine of the exclusive Pacific Club at Iloilo.

But Peggy wasn't thinking of churches or cookery when her rusty floating home lay at Iloilo for a few hours. She went ashore in search of devilment, found none, and returned to the freighter, there to kick her heels, frankly bored. Iloilo meant nothing in her young life.

She sat on the ship's rail, dangling her legs over the side. It was very hot. She watched the vividly-colored fish darting and flashing in the water below. For ten minutes, that amused her. But she was terribly bored. Even Pop was too busy to take any notice of her.

She puffed out her cheeks, raised her head to yawn, and saw a boy about sixteen standing on the wharf a dozen feet away.

THE YAWN stopped midway, and Peggy screwed her eyes up in the sun to get a clearer view of the youth. Since she had left New York, she had seen very few white boys, and even to a girl of thirteen a boy is a boy. But what she didn't like about him was that he was laughing at her. As though a girl couldn't yawn without being laughed at! Quick anger flashed into the gray-green eyes. She looked away and her little form stiffened. Then she looked up again; perhaps it was because the sun blinded her or perhaps because the little tiger within had taken possession of her, but she leaned too far backward and toppled in an ignominious heap on the deck.

Conscious of neither bumps nor bruises, Peggy boiled with rage as her ears caught the high note of the boy's joyous laughter. In that instant, history was being written, though the boy was unaware of the fact, as was Peggy, who, with fingers clenched in her hot little palms and with teeth tightly set, gathered herself up and walked aft determined to die rather than limp.

Possibly if Peggy had not been so bored up to this incident, her mind might now have worked differently. As it was, a burning desire took hold of her. Here was devilment all ripe, waiting to be plucked. She could still hear—she could feel—the boy's laughter. From behind the [Continued on page 128]

The Novel of a Wild Youth who aspired to the Seats
of the Mighty

Carnac's Folly

By
Sir Gilbert Parker

Illustrated by
Walt Louderback

“Tell me, Carnac, is there anyone who could hurt you, who could spring up in this fight and defeat you—man or woman?” Junia asked, anxiously.

A A brief résumé which tells of Carnac Grier's initial folly and the consequences which followed

ART WAS the cause of it all—Carnac's love for it, and his father's intolerance of anything that distracted either of his sons from his own beloved business. Before his death he turned his big lumber enterprise over to his assistant, Luke Tarboe, disinheriting his two sons, but in a secret will Carnac was to get the business in three years. The boys had gone their own way; Fabian to a rival lumber camp and Carnac to New York, and art and the unhappiness of finding himself the dupe in a marriage to his model, Luzanne Larue. In rage he left her, keeping his miserable secret even from Junia Shale, the girl he had always loved. Restless, he turned to politics, standing for a seat in Parliament against Barode Barouche—unaware that he was competing with his own father. Barouche, much upset, sought a reconciliation with Carnac's mother, only to be denounced by her for having ruined her life years ago. He then decided to use the story given him by Luzanne Larue of Carnac's secret marriage to her. When the question, “Where is your woman?” was hurled at Carnac he parried it successfully, but he knew he would have to face this scandal before election.

You can now go on with the story

AS CARNAC drew near his friends at the back of the hall, Fabian's wife stepped forward. “Carnac,” she said, “I hope you can come with us on the river in Fabian's launch. There's work to do there, and this is the day for it. It's pay-day in the lumber-yards on the Island.”

Carnac laughed. “I'd like nothing better than a couple of hours among the rivermen. Where's the boat?”

Fabian's wife told him, and then added: “I've got the roan team here, and you can drive Junia and me down to the boat landing if you care to.”

“Good,” he said, “good! I'd like nothing better.”

A few moments afterwards, with the cheers of the crowd behind them, they were being driven swiftly by Carnac to the wharf where lay the “Fleur-de-Lys.” On board was Fabian, who had just arrived.

“Had a good meeting, Carnac?” Fabian asked.

“I should call it first-class. It was like a storm at sea—first wind from one direction, then from another; but I think on the whole, we had the best of it. Don't you think so?” he added to Fabian's wife.

“Oh, much the best,” she told him with a confident smile. “That's so. Junia, isn't it?”

“I wouldn't say so positively,” answered Junia. “I don't understand Monsieur Barouche. He talked as if he had something up his sleeve.” Her face became clouded. “I'm certain he's got something up his sleeve,” she continued. Have you any idea what it is, Carnac?”

Carnac laughingly shook his head. “That's his way. He's always bluffing. He does it to make believe the game's his, and to destroy the confidence of the enemy. He's a man of mark, but he's in for the biggest fight he ever had—of that I'm sure. . . . Do you think I'll win?” he asked Junia presently with a laugh, as they made their way down the river with speed. “Do I look like a winner? Have I conquest in my eye?”

How seldom did Junia have Carnac to herself in these days!

When Carnac asked his question Junia smiled up at him. “Yes, I think you'll win, Carnac.” Presently she added: “I'm not sure that you've got all the cards, though—I don't know why, but I have that fear.”

"You think that——" Carnac stopped, absorbed in thought. She nodded. "I think Monsieur Barouche has some cards he hasn't played yet. What they are I don't know, but he's confident. . . . Tell me, Carnac, is there any card he can play that would defeat you? Have you committed any crime against the law?—no, I'm sure you haven't, but I want to hear you say so. She smiled cheerfully at him."

"He has no card of any crime of mine, and he can't hit me in a mortal place."

"You have the right policy for this province. But tell me, is there anyone who could hurt you, who could spring up in the fight—man or woman?"

She looked him straight in the eye, and his own did not waver.

"There's no one has a knock-out blow for me—that's sure. I can weather any storm." He paused, however, disconcerted, for the memory of Luzanne came to him, and his spirit became clouded. "Except one—except one," he added.

As THEY neared the Island Fabian said to Carnac: "Don't be surprised if you get a bad reception here. It's the worst place on the river, and I've no influence over the men—I don't believe Tarboe could have. They're a difficult lot. There's Eugene Grandois, he's as bad as they make 'em. He's got a grudge against us because of some act of father's, and he may break out any time. He's a labor leader, and we must be on guard."

Carnac nodded. He made no reply in words. They were nearing the little dock, and men were coming down to the point where the launch would stop.

"There's Grandois now!" said Fabian, with a wry smile, for he had a real fear of results. He had, however, no idea how skilfully Carnac would handle the situation—yet he had heard much of his brother's adaptability, of his pliable vitality. Yet Carnac was not demonstrative. It was his quiet way that played his game for him. He had the sense of physical speech without words. He was a bold adventurer, but his methods were those of the subtlest. If a motion of the hand was sufficient, then he let it go at that.

"You people after our votes never come any other time," said Eugene Grandois, sneeringly, as Carnac and Fabian landed. "It's only when you want to use us."

"Would you rather I didn't come at all?" asked Carnac with a friendly smile. "You can't have it both ways. If I came here any other time you'd want to know why I didn't stay away, and I come now because it's good you should know if I'm fit to be your representative in Parliament."

THERE'S sense in that, my bonny boy," said an English Canadian laborer standing near. "What have you got to say to that now, my little skeezicks?" he added teasingly to Eugene Grandois.

"He ain't got more gifts than his father had, and we all know what sort of a man he was—that's so, bagosh."

"Well, what sort of a man was he?" asked Carnac coolly, with a warning look at Fabian, who was resentful. Indeed, Fabian would have promptly struck the man if his brother had not been present, and then been torn to pieces himself.

"What sort—don't you know the kind of things he done? If you don't, I do, and there's lots of others that know, and don't you forget it, mon vieux," answered Grandois, angrily.

"That's no answer, Monsieur. It tells nothing," remarked Carnac.

"You got left out of his will."

"My father had a conscience and he used it. He gave me a chance to become a partner in the business, and I wouldn't, and he threw me over—what else was there to do? I could have owned the business today, if I'd played the game as he thought it ought to be played. I didn't, and he left me out—that's all."

"Makin' your own way, ain't you?" said the English laborer. "That's hit you where you're tender, Grandois. What have you got to say to that?"

The intense black eyes of the little habitant sparkled wickedly, his jaws set with passion, and his sturdy frame seemed to

"You fool — you oughtn't to have let her leave!" cried Barouche in terrible anger. "She was my one perfect weapon of attack!"

fasten to the ground. His gnarled hands now shot out fiercely.

"What I got to say! Only this, that John Grier played the devil's part every day he lived. He turned me and my family out into the streets in winter-time, and the law upheld him, old beast that he was—sacré diable!"

"Beast—devill! Grandois, those are hard words to use about a man in his son's presence, and they're not true. You think you can say such things because I'm standing for Parliament. Beast—devil, eh? You've got a free tongue, Grandois; you forgot to say that my father paid the doctor's bill for your whole family when they were taken down with smallpox; and he kept them for weeks afterwards. You forgot to recall that when he turned you out for being six months behind with your rent and making no effort to pay up! Who was the devil and beast then, Grandois? Who spat upon his own wife and children then? You haven't a good memory. . . . Come, I think your account with my father is squared; and I want you to vote to put my father's son in Parliament, and to put out Barode Barouche, who's been there too long. Come, come, Grandois, isn't it a bargain? Your tongue's sharp, but your heart's in the right place—is it a bargain?"

He held out his hand with murmurs of applause from the crowd, but Grandois was not to be propitiated. His anger, however, had behind it some saving sense of caution, and what Carnac said about the smallpox incident struck him hard. It was the first time he had ever been hit between the eyes where John Grier was concerned. His prestige with the men was suddenly under a shadow, yet he dared not deny the truth of the statement. It could be proved. His braggart hatred of John Grier had come home to roost. Carnac saw that, and he was glad he had challenged the man. He believed that in politics, as in all other departments of life, candor and bold play were best in the long run. Yet he would like to see the man in a different humor, and he heard with joy and relief Junia say to Grandois:

"How is the new baby boy, and how is madame, Monsieur Grandois?"

It came at the right moment, for only two days before had Madame Grandois given to her husband the boy for which he had longed. Junia had come to know of it through a neighbor and had sent some jellies to the sick woman. As she came forward now, Grandois, taken aback, said:

"Alors, they're all right, ma'm'selle, thank you. It was you sent the jellies, eh?"

She nodded with a smile. "Yes, I sent them, Grandois. May I come and see madame and the boy tomorrow?"

THE INCIDENT had taken a favorable turn.

"It's about even—things between us, Grandois?" asked Carnac, and held out his hand. "My father hit you, but you hit him harder by forgetting about the smallpox and the rent, and also by drinking up the cash that ought to have paid the rent. It doesn't matter now that the rent was never paid, but it does that you recall the smallpox debt. Can't you say a word for me, Grandois? You're a big man here among all the workers. I'm a better Frenchman than the man I'm trying to turn out. He's for breaking down the old custom in education, and I'm for keeping it. Just a word for a good cause. They're waiting for you, and your hand on it before you begin. Here's a place for you on the roost. Come up."

The "roost" was an upturned tub lying face down on the ground, and in the passion of the moment, the little man suddenly gripped Carnac's hand and stood up on the tub to great cheering; for if there is one thing the French-Canadians love, it is sensation, and they were having it. They were mostly Barouche's men, but they were emotional, and melodrama had stirred their feelings.

Besides, like the Irish, they had a love of feminine nature, and in all the river-coves Junia was known by sight, at least, and was admired. She had the freshness of face and mind which is the heart of success with the habitant peoples. She had heard French speakers of all degrees, but now, with Eugene Grandois on his feet, she heard a speech which had in it the best spirit of Gallic eloquence, though it was crude. But it was forcible and adroit in its way.

"Friends and comrades," said Eugene Grandois, with his hands playing loosely, "there's been misunderstandings between me and the Grier family, and I was out against it, but I see things different since M'sieu' Carnac has spoke—and I'm changing my mind—certainlee. That throwing out of my house hit me and my woman and little ones hard, and I've been resentin' it all these years till now; but I'm weighin' one thing ag'in' another, and I'm willing to forget my wrongs for this young man's sake. He's for us French. Alors, some of you was out to hurt our friend M'sieu' Carnac here, and I didn't say no to it; but that's all over, and you'd better keep your weapons for the election day and use them ag'in' Barode Barouche. That's what I say. I got a change of heart. I've laid my plate on the table with a prayer that I get it filled with good doctrine, and I've promise that the food I'm to get is what's best for me and for all of us. M'sieu' Carnac Grier's got the right stuff in him, and I'm for him both hands up—both hands way up high, nom de pipel!"

At that he raised both hands above his head, with a loud cheer, and soon after Carnac Grier was carried to the launch on the shoulders of Eugene Grandois's friends

"WHO are you, ma'm'selle?"

It was in the house of Eugene Grandois in Montreal that this question was asked of Junia. She had followed up the experience on the Island by a visit to Grandois's house, carrying delicacies for the sick wife. Denzil had come with her, and was waiting nearby in the street.

She had almost ended her visit when the door opened and Luzanne Larue entered carrying a dish she placed on the table, eying Junia closely. First they bowed to each other, and Junia gave a pleasant smile, but instantly she felt here was one who was a factor in her own life—how, she could not tell.

To Luzanne, the face of Junia had no familiar feature, and yet she felt here was one whose life's lines would cross her own. So it was she presently walked over to Junia, and said, "Who are you, ma'm'selle?" in a sharp voice. As Junia did not reply at once, she put the question in another form, "What is your name, ma'm'selle?"

"It is Junia Shale," said the other calmly, yet with heart beating hard. Somehow the question foreshadowed vexatious things, associated with Carnac Grier. Her first glance at Luzanne showed the girl was well dressed, that she had a face of some beauty, that her eyes were full of glamour—black and bold, and, in a challenging way, beautiful. It was a face and figure full of daring. She was not a local or French Canadian; yet she was French; that was clear from her accent. Yet the voice had an accent of crudity, and the plump whiteness of the skin and waving fulness of the hair gave the girl a look of an adventuress. She was dressed in black with a white collar which, by contrast, seemed to heighten her unusual nature.

"Junia Shale—you are Junia Shale?" The voice was bitter and resentful. "We must have a talk—that's sure," Luzanne said with decision.

"Who are you?" asked Junia calmly

"I am Luzanne Larue."

"That makes me no wiser."

"Hasn't Carnac Grier spoken of me?"

Junia shook her head, looked at the bowl on the table and turned her face toward the door of Madame Grandois's room. "Had we not better go somewhere else to talk, after you've seen Madame Grandois and the baby?" she asked with a smile.

Luzanne made no reply, but taking up the dish she went into the sick-room, and Junia heard her voice with that of Madame Grandois. Luzanne appeared again in a moment, and spoke: "Now we can go to the house where I'm boarding. It's only three doors away, and we can be safe there. You'd like to have a talk with me—ah, yes, surelee!"

HER EYES were combative and repellent, but Junia was not dismayed, and she said: "What shall we talk about?"

"There's only one thing and one person to talk about, ma'm'selle," Luzanne said.

"I still don't know what you mean."

"Aren't you engaged to Carnac Grier? Don't you think you're going to marry him? . . . Don't you like to tell the truth, then?" she added.

Junia raised her eyebrows. "I'm not engaged to Carnac Grier, and he has never asked me to marry him—but what business is it of yours, ma'm'selle?"

"Come to my lodgings, and I'll tell you." Luzanne moved toward the door. They passed into the street, and were wordless till they reached Luzanne's lodgings.

"This is the house of Monsieur Marmette, an agent of Monsieur Barouche," said Junia. "I know it."

"You'll know it better soon. The agent of M'sieu' Barouche

“Those are hard words to use about a man in his son’s presence, and they’re not true,” cried Carnac.

is a man of mark about here, and he’ll be more marked presently—but yes!”

“You think Monsieur Barouche will be elected, do you?” asked Junia, as they closed the door.

“I know he will.”

“I’ve been working for Monsieur Grier, and, you may be sure, that isn’t my opinion,” Junia replied.

“I’m working for M’sieu’ Barode Barouche, and I know the result.” There was something in her voice that startled Junia.

They were now in Luzanne’s small room, and Junia noted that it had all the characteristics of a habitant dwelling—even to the crucifix at the head of the bed, and the picture of the French Canadian Premier of the Dominion on the wall. She also saw a rosary on a little hook beside the bed.

"How do you know Barouche will win?" Junia asked.

"Because I am the wife of Carnac Grier, and I know what will happen to him. . . . You turn pale, ma'm'selle, but your color isn't going to alter the truth. I'm Carnac Grier's wife by the laws of the United States."

"Does Monsieur Grier admit he is your husband?"

"It doesn't matter. He must pay respect to the law under which he married me."

"I don't believe he was honestly married to you," declared Junia bravely. "Has he ever lived with you—for a single day?"

"What difference would that make to the marriage? I have the certificate here." She touched her bosom.

"I'd have thought you were Barode Barouche's wife by the way you act. Isn't it the duty of a wife to help her husband's interests? Shouldn't you be fighting against Barode Barouche?"

"I mean to be recognized as Carnac Grier's wife."

SHE DREW from her breast a folded piece of blue paper. "There it is, signed by Judge Grimshaw who married us, and there's the seal; and the whole thing can't be set aside. Look at it, if you like, petite."

She held it not far from Junia's face and Junia could see that it was registration of a marriage of New York State. She could have snatched the paper away from Luzanne, but she meant to conquer Luzanne's savage spirit.

"Well, how do you intend to defeat your husband?"

"I mean to have the people asked from a public platform if they've seen the wife of the candidate, and a copy of the certificate will be read to all. Then, what do you think will happen?"

"It will have to be done tonight or tomorrow night," remarked Junia, quietly.

"Because the election comes the day after tomorrow, eh?"

"Because of that. And who will read the document?"

"Who but the man he's trying to defeat—tell me that."

"You mean Barode Barouche?"

"Who else?"

"Has he agreed to do it?"

Luzanne nodded. "On the day Carnac became a candidate."

"And if Carnac Grier denies it?"

"He won't deny it. He never has. He says he was drunk when the thing was done—mais, oui."

"Is that all he says?"

"No. He says he didn't know it was a real marriage, and—"

Luzanne then related Carnac's defense, and added: "Do you think anyone would believe him with the facts as they are? Remember I'm French and he's English, and that marriage to a French girl is more life and death than to an English girl; and this is a French province!"

"And yet you are a Catholic, and French, and were married by a Protestant judge."

"That is my own affair, ma'm'selle."

"It is not the thing to say to a French Canadian here. What do you get out of it all? If he is your husband, don't you think it would be better to have him successful than your defeated victim? What do you think will be yours if you defeat him?"

"Revenge—my rights—the law!" was the sharp rejoinder.

JUNIA smiled. "What is there in it all for you? If the man I married did not love me, I'd set the law in motion to be free. What's the good of inviting God to punish you for cruelty? What's the good of trying to destroy a husband who doesn't love you, who never loved you—never."

"You do not know that," retorted Luzanne sharply.

"Yes, I do. He never loved you. He never lived with you for a single day. That's in the power of a doctor to prove. If you are innocent and virtuous, then he has taken nothing; if you have given your all, and not to Carnac Grier, what will his mind be about you? Can't you see where you are? Is it money? He has no money except what he earns. His father left him nothing—not a dollar. Why do you hate him so? I've known him all my life, and I've never known him hurt man or animal. When did he ever misuse you or hurt you? Tell me, did he ever treat you badly? How did you come to know him?"

She paused and Luzanne flushed. The first meeting! Why, that was the day Carnac had saved her life, had taken her home safe from danger, and had begun a friendship with, behind it, only a desire to help her.

Junia saw the impression she had made, and set it down to her last words.

"Tell me," she added, suddenly following up her advantage,

"where did you first meet him? What was the way of it?"

Suddenly Junia came forward and put her hands on Luzanne's shoulders. "I think you loved Carnac once, and perhaps you love him now, and are only trying to hurt him out of pique and anger. If you destroy him, you will repent of it—so soon! I don't know what is behind these things you are doing, but it is all horrible, and you'll be sorry for it when it is too late. Yes, I know you have loved Carnac, for I see all the signs—"

"Do you love him then, ma'm'selle?" asked Luzanne exasperated. "Do you love him?"

"He has never asked me, and I have never told him that; and to speak truth I don't know; but if I did I would move heaven and earth to help him, and if he didn't love me I would help him just the same. And so, I think, should you. If you have ever loved him, then you ought to save him from evil or wrong. Tell me, did Carnac ever do you a kind act, one that is worth while in your life?"

For a moment Luzanne stood dismayed, then a new look passed over her face and drove the dark light from her eyes. It was as though she had found a new sense.

"He saved my life the day we first met," she said with hesitation, but under the hypnotic influence of Junia.

"And now you try to hurt him—to strike him when he is trying to do the big thing. You threaten to flaunt his marriage, which he repudiates, in the face of those who can elect him to play a great part for his country."

Junia saw the girl was in a state of emotional turmoil.

"Besides, he's not the only man in the world," Junia continued. "Doesn't that ever strike you? Why try to hold him by a spurious bond when there are other men in the world as good-looking, as clever. Is your world so bare of men?—no, I'm sure it isn't," she added, for she saw anger rising in the impulsive girl. "There are many men who'd want to marry you, and surely it's better to marry someone who loves you than to hold to one who doesn't love you at all. Is it hate? He saved your life—and that's how you came to know him first, and now you would destroy him! He's a great man. He would not bend to his father's will, and so he was left without a cent of his father's money. All because he has a conscience, and an independence worthy of the best that ever lived. That's the soul of the man you are trying to hurt."

"COME, ma'm'selle, tell me the truth. He didn't know he was being married, and when you told him it was a real marriage he left you at once. You and yours tricked him—the man you'd never have known if he hadn't saved your life. I suppose you thought that with your beauty—yes, you are beautiful—you'd conquer him, and that he'd take it all like a lamb, give in, and become a real husband in a real home. Come now, isn't that it?"

The other did not reply. Her face was alive with memories. The lower things were flying from it, a spirit of womanhood was living in her—feebly, but truly, living. She was conscious of the insanity of her pursuit of Carnac, and a new look came to her eyes. For a few moments she stood silent, looking at Junia, and then she said with agitation:

"If I give this up—" she took from her breast the blue document—"he'd be safe in his election, and he'd marry you, is it not so, ma'm'selle?"

She held out her hand, and an instant later the blue certificate was in Junia's fingers. She felt a sudden weakness in her knees, for it seemed she had in her grasp the career of Carnac Grier, and it moved her as she had never been moved in her life.

With the yielding of the certificate, Luzanne seemed suddenly to lose self-control. She sank on the bed beside the wall with a cry of distress.

"Mon Dieu—O mon Dieu!" Then she sprang to her feet. "Give it back, give it back to me," she cried, with frantic pain. "It's all I have of him!"

"I won't give it back," declared Junia quietly. "It's a man's career, and you must let it go. It's the right thing to do. Let it stand, mademoiselle. You can be happy in the memory that you gave Carnac back his freedom."

"But the record stands," said the girl helplessly.

"Tell the truth and have it removed. You owe that to yourself and to the man who saved your life. You could have it done at once at Shipton."

"What will you do with the certificate?" She glanced at Junia's bosom where the paper was hidden.

"I will give it to Carnac, and he can do what he likes with it," Junia answered her.

❧ "I mean to be recognized as Carnac Grier's wife, and that will lose him the election," declared Luzanne.

By now the tears were streaming down the face of Luzanne Larue, and hard as it was for Junia, she tried to comfort her, for the girl should be got out of Montreal at once, and only friendliness could accomplish that. She would see Denzil—he was nearby waiting.

There would be a train in two hours for New York and the girl must take it.

Barode Barouche was in a state of excitement. He had sure hope of defeating Carnac with the help of Luzanne Larue.

The woman had remained hidden since her coming to Montreal, and the game was now in his hands. On the night before the poll he could declare the thing not easy to be forgiven by the French Canadian public, which has a strong sense of domestic duty. Carnac Grier was a Protestant, and that was bad, and if he added to that an offense against domestic morality, he would be beaten at the polls as sure as the river ran. He had seen Luzanne several times, and though he did not believe in her, he knew the marriage certificate was real. [Continued on page 112]

Q. Photograph by Lewis N. Hine for Survey Graphic

Q. John Brophy is president of District Two of the United Mine Workers of America that covers fourteen counties in Central Pennsylvania. He has 43,000 union men in his organization, and on April 1st, 20,000 miners in non-union counties rose to his strike call. He is one of the half-dozen leaders who have broken the backbone of the largest unorganized coal fields in the country and he is helping to set the policy of 600,000 miners.

U. Drawing by John J. A. Murphy

A man's philosophy is his suffering declares John Brophy, leader of 43,000 coal miners. What friends and family are, the Union is. The Union is the cure of distress and worry. The Union is the way of Service. It is the answer to human fear and loneliness

A Coal Miner's Life

By John Brophy

I COME from a line of coal-diggers. My great-grandmother was a tradition in our family. As a girl she had worked in a coal-pit. When very old she would say:

"I've slid down the rope into the pit many a time."

In the shallow shafts of the pre-Victorian days, a rope would stretch from the minehead to the depth, where she worked. My father joked her on her young days as a collier. She was one of those thousands of English and Scots women who were miners at the hardest underground work, about whom blue-books were written and, later, laws were passed that lifted them out of the pit to the minehead.

My grandfather worked his life in pits. He broke a leg, and a collar-bone, and took bruises and minor fractures as the years went by. At the age of sixty, he stood at the pithead ready to be lowered, his pick on his arm. Paralysis struck him. The pick dropped. He never went down the shaft again. The doctor said it was the toil and the many accidents that brought the final stroke. He raised his family in the one house, almost in the pit, for a lifetime.

In that house my mother was born and in the same house I was born. My grandfather took his eldest son into the pit with him, and they worked together for years. So in turn I was taken into the mine by my father. It was apostolic descent.

I was named after my uncle, my father's oldest brother. One day, he had got work at a new pit, where the cage had not yet been put in. The miners went up and down in a large bucket. He and his brother had gone down to the pit, and dulled their picks on the coal. They rang the bell for the engineer to drop the bucket to take them up. Perhaps the engineer was irritated because they rang so soon. He hoisted the bucket very fast. The two men hung to the chain, with only one foot inside.

Then the engineer stopped the bucket suddenly. They tried to steady it, but too late, and the engineer kept hoisting with the bucket still swinging. It caught under a cross-arm and tipped. My uncle fell backward to the bottom. He was killed instantly. His brother fell forward in the bucket, and clung to the rope. He reached the pithead, seized an iron bar and rushed to the engine room. The engineer had run for his life.

My father worked himself out before he was sixty. He had been in the pits since he was eight years old. His lungs clogged by coal dust and dried up with gas and smoke, and the heart slowed down, the work of car-pushing was hard on him. Car-pushing is shoving a two-ton car up a three percent grade.

"By the time I get it up to the face, I fall down exhausted, my heart beating like a trip-hammer," he would say.

When he was done, lying in bed and his mates calling in to talk with him, he seemed to me a frame worn-out and worked-out.

Great-grandmother, grandfather, uncle and father—worn-out, paralyzed, killed; those are the facts in the life of a miner. That was the life I inherited. I wanted to make that life better. If those who get the coal out of a mine have not the right to say something about the organization of that work and that life, who has the right?

I was born at St. Helen's, twelve miles out from Liverpool, England, on November 6, 1883. St. Helen's was a rapidly growing industrial town, with glass factories, chemical plants, coal-pits, and a large Irish population. My mother was English. My father was of Irish descent, but born in England.

My father had seen something of the world. He had served six years with the colors, and six years with reserve, seeing some service even then. He had been in the South African campaign, had stayed in Ireland for a couple of years, had taken part in the Egyptian Wars, had knocked about on the Mediterranean, and had taken a group of convalescent soldiers up the mountain of Cyprus. My father was always moving on. It was his desire for something better, or sometimes a scrap over conditions.

I attended the Parochial school. I remember the thrill of exultation at the age of six when I was presented with a book.

Our home was a four-room house in a row of houses. From early childhood I can remember my father, a miner, returning home in the late afternoon with his face black from the pit. He would have his cup of tea and then wash up in the pantry. When I was about six, my father made a trip to America, bringing back presents for us children from my uncles and aunt in Philipsburg, Pennsylvania.

WHILE HE was away, my mother did outside work. When my father came home, he went back to work in the pit where he was making a new air-way. A current of air struck him on the side, and he was laid up with pneumonia. We were in for a long siege, and became poor. My mother went out to work. Always in a crisis the burden full on her. Once I was sent out to buy bread, and lost a shilling. My father's illness, the hard work, and the lost shilling broke her down.

In the Town Hall was a reading room, where I used to pore over magazines.

A family who had lived in Pennsylvania came to see us. They talked of my uncles and aunt in Philipsburg, and how one uncle had bought a house and garden and a cow. To us who lived in an industrial city, it seemed affluence to be owning your home with a garden and a cow. Specially it had an influence on me.

So, bit by bit, we decided to come to America. The final decision was largely made by my mother, for English conditions suited my father better. We left St. Helen's in December of 1892—my father and mother, two sisters and I. I was just turned nine years old.

We came to Philipsburg, Pennsylvania. We arrived at dusk of a winter day and walked a mile to the home of Aunt Eliza. We all lived together in her house, badly crowded. Philipsburg was America to me. I went to school for one year, and got to the third reader, and long division. I was then ten years old. That was all the schooling I ever had. I was more interested in reading than the average boy in school. Slowly I lost some of my strangeness and fear of my surroundings.

Work in the mines was very slack—these first American years were the early 1890's, a period of panic—and our family was poor. In the spring we moved into a little house on an alleyway. It had been built for a stable, and then windows and a door put in. It cost $3.50 a month, and I am convinced that was all it was worth. The rest of the alley was lined with stables. It was a terrible place for flies. We could not get money enough together to buy furniture. Old Country friends in the neighborhood helped with a few chairs, a bed, and an old stove.

For my father in the mines, there was only a day or two of work a week. Coal always was disorganized. The present troubles are the same as I have seen for the last thirty years. It is misery that keeps the tie to the Old Country. Loneliness, illness and poverty keep an immigrant an alien. Good luck and good times make him an American.

IN PHILPSBURG we began by taking a Liverpool weekly from the Old Country. It had a column of Lancashire dialect. There were a large number of Lancashire people in the town, and my father would have me perform for visitors by reading aloud that column. When we gave up that Liverpool weekly, and took the Utica Globe, that marked a change in becoming American.

As long as papers from the old home are the main reading, it means the thoughts are still there. The change into thinking American took us about two years. My father had me read newspapers aloud to him. I got the reading habit. It seemed to me one way of seeing the world, just as my father had seen the world in his way.

I went into a mine at Philipsburg with my father when I was eleven years old. He was working in a top drift; in a wet back-heaving. Every few days it would accumulate considerable water. Then it would take a half-day to bail it out. He took me along. At seven o'clock in the evening, my Uncle Charley would come into our wet mine-place, and ask me how much work

I had done that morning, with a pretense at seriousness.

"You bailed all this water out," he would say to me, "you dug all this coal?"

Then the mule and driver would come in, and the other miners would gather, and everyone jollied the Kid on what he had done.

My father would read something in the paper, and, differing with it, would look up and say:

"If I could only write a letter, I'd tell them what."

I, a boy of eleven, would think to myself: What a wonderful thing to write a letter, and a letter that could be read by the public. He helped me to break up the idea that this little corner where we happen to live is the whole world. He had read more than the average miner of his time, but about all the writing he ever did was to sign his name.

Then came the year of the miners' strike, 1894. It was an act of desperation; a panic year, a falling market. It was strike or submit tamely to bad conditions. It was a twelve weeks' strike, and brought a great deal of poverty. In that strike year we were still living in the stable in the alley. There was lack of nourishing food for my mother, so a baby brother died.

Because of his activities, father was blacklisted when the strike was over. He could not get work at his old place in the Pardee Mine, where he had worked on the best quality coal in the Moshannon vein. So he had to go looking for work in little top veins. It was slack work and a miserable existence.

Three years we stayed in Philipsburg. Father had grown desperate. He was a good, a willing worker, with a pickman's pride, his rib trimmed, his place clean, steady stroke, no scurry or bustle. In those three years, if he could have taken his family back to England, he would have packed up. He left better conditions in England—eight to ten shillings a day, five days of work a week, and a union.

Those days I went more poorly clothed than other children, and the clothes were made over and home-made, and I was sensitive because of that. It was an unhappy period for me. It was largely, I think, because of the unhappiness of my mother. It was not a sordid poverty, because love was there. But it was bitter, because hurt was done to one I loved.

IN THE late summer of 1895 we moved on to the mining camp of Urey. Our home was a three-room shanty. We lived better and had more food than in Philipsburg. When we began to have a little money, it was a wonderful thing. In the mining camp my father became something of a personage, because he was the best entertainer in a place of no social variety.

The English-speaking miners in the dusk after work would stroll in and sit on the two logs of a tree, opposite the company store, and my father would sing the songs of the English "free-and-easy." They were a growing body of folk ballads, developed in the public houses. They were songs about a famous character, or a great mine accident, or a strike. My father told the rich experiences of his life. The men would talk over the day's work. Only a few of the miners were English-speaking.

Some of the dollars we laid by were now spent on the doctor for another little brother who had been born in Philipsburg.

After several months, work fell off. Because of sickness in our family and the poverty, it was decided I should go to work. So my father went to the boss. The mining law said that a boy to work in the mines must be twelve years of age.

"Johnny will be twelve soon?" asked the boss.

"Yes, on November 6th," replied my father.

"Well, let him start."

It was November 1st. I went in at seven o'clock in the morning and tried to shovel. I filled my father's lamp with oil, and did many other little things to keep moving, so as not to get cold. I soon learned to use the pick in undermining. In a small weak way, I did the work of a miner, as far as the strength of a boy would permit. There was no check weighman on the tippie, and no labor organization.

My father bought me the only two books in the company store. They had been there for two years. One was Buffalo Bill's story of the Wild West. The other was the Civil War, illustrated. I read the Buffalo Bill book not as a melodrama, but as a description of the West. It gave me a vista of plains and buffaloes, then the coming of cattle, horses, wagon trains, the pony express, and at last the railroad.

The Civil War book gave me an idea of the South. So the picture of the continent spread out for me, with something of history in it. In the Philipsburg school, I had learned no history of the country. It wasn't in [Continued on page 108]

The Kiss by Gustav Klimt

The Vienna Workshop in America

By Willard Huntington Wright

A MODERN ART has developed along two distinct lines—the purely pictorial, or esthetic, and what is generally termed the arts-crafts. Though differing fundamentally as to objective, these two phases of art expression have much in common. Beauty, in the broad sense, is the motif of each; and the same spirit of research and of revolt against the older classic traditions and academic formulas, animates them both.

The purely esthetic development of modern art (which has taken place for the most part in France) has to do exclusively with the laws of composition and form, with the technical problems relating to light, color, and chiaroscuro, and with the philosophic interpretation of life as expressed through line, mass, volume, rhythm and organization. In this field Courbet, Manet, Monet, Renoir, Picasso, Cézanne, Gauguin, Matisse, and Macdonald-Wright represent the dominant and influential figures.

The other line of art evolution—the arts-crafts—which has been confined, in the main, to Germany and Austria) embraces architecture, architectural sculpture, interior designing, mural painting, friezes, ceramics, metal work, and all forms of decoration, such as documentary canvases, allegorical panels, and even the more illustrative types of landscape and figure painting. In this field are included such widely divergent names as Galland, Puvis de Chavannes, Josef Hofman, Klimt, Bakst, Reinhardt, Maxfield Parrish, Boechlin, and Joseph Urban. [Continued on page 102]

C PLAY of the Month

C This is not all of Balieff's company but enough of them are shown to give a good idea of the way their humor is expressed.

C. The Musical Snuff-Box is a bit of real pantomimic charm.

Chauve-Souris

THE outstanding sensation of the New York theatrical season is not likely to tour the country. Here is the story of Balieff's Russian novelty and again The Play of the Month carries Broadway to all parts of the United States

WHEN A RUSSIAN vaudeville, charging five dollars a seat, packs a New York theater in the regular season, moves to another theater, packs it all summer, and prepares for its second season, something has happened.

The Chauve-Souris success has caused more comment in intelligent circles than any of the intellectual plays that have been produced or revived within the past year. These intellectual plays have been many. They have included The Hairy Ape, Anna Christie, A Bill of Divorcement, The Nest, The Pigeon, The Deluge, Madame Pierre, S. S. Tenacity, Fanny Hawthorne, Candida, and Back to Methuselah.

In this unusually intellectual season the Russians stood out. Dostoyevski's novel, The Idiot, was dramatized for a few performances. Andreyev's He Who Gets Slapped ran longer than anyone would have supposed it could run. The welcome accorded to the foremost dramatic singer in Russia, perhaps in the world, Chaliapin, was worthy of his tremendous manner.

The success of the Chauve-Souris was far more surprising than that of Chaliapin, or of Pavlova before him, because in grand-opera singing and in dancing there is little nationality. The Chauve-Souris is nearly all national. It is spoken and sung in Russian; the themes are mostly traditional Russian, and largely peasant themes.

A few critics have tried to pass it off as a fad for foreign things. These critics are quite hopeless, since there is no case on record of this kind of a success against the obstacles of a wholly unknown language. The audiences have gone because they could have a better time at the Chauve-Souris than anywhere else. Many in the audiences could not explain why this variety show is far above our own, but an audience can feel what it cannot analyze.

C. When the exquisite figure from the Snuff-Box becomes animated, she remains delicately in character.

The actors in Chauve-Souris have something of the same superiority that will be seen in the regular company of the Moscow Art Theater, if Mr. Morris Gest decides, by the time these lines are printed, that he can bring over that company also. It is the parent company, from which the Chauve-Souris company is a lighter off-shoot. The regular company cannot run so long, for it gives plays in which the drama cannot be at all grasped without the words. There will, however, be a great chance to study the methods of fine actors who have those gifts that cannot be developed in a country like this, of unbroken runs and of the constant fitting of a mere personality to every particular part.

Consider the most successful of all the Chauve-Souris features, the Wooden Soldiers. The idea is familiar enough on our stage. Yet if an American manager took a million dollars and went out to obtain and drill the actors to do this pantomime as well, he would certainly fall clearly short. The result would be very much inferior both in technical excellence and in the purity of the comic sense.

ISADORA DUNCAN, not long ago one of the world's most creative dancers, has recently spoken of Moscow as having the most artistic atmosphere in the world. To compare it with Berlin before the war, with Paris or Vienna, is not our purpose, but it has in it much of the spirit that has in the last century put Russia so high in creative art; that has given us Pushkin, Tolstoi, Dostoyevski, Turgenev, and Krilov in literature, not to speak of such later writers as Chekhov and Gorki; that has given us Roerich and Bakst in painting, Pavlova and so many others in the dance, and in music, first Glinka, then the Mogu-

Q. So many people said Katinka, as danced by Mme. Karabanova, must be seen again, that Balieff had to use her every night as an encore on the second bill.

Anton Chekhov's satirical elopement episode presents a bookful of life in five minutes.

Mme. Fechner as the little peasant girl who gathers mushrooms and lovers in The Three Huntsmen.

chaya Kuchka or Mighty Clique—Rimski-Korsakov, Borodin, Musorgski, Cesar Cui, and Balakirev. More recently, Chaikovski, and then Glazunov.

The Chauve-Souris is not composed altogether of such artists as appear at the Arts Theater, but it has some of them, and it has the heart of a great tradition. Its soul is joy, fun, naturalness, but it makes all the difference when this fun and naturalness have for their expression the accumulated skill of a nation going through an age of expression.

THE DIRECTOR, Mr. Balieff, with his clown's personality and his grotesque English, no doubt makes it much easier for American audiences. He gives them a kind of comedy that they understand, presenting it in every interval between the Russian features. This confidential and absurd colloquy with the audience exists in the United States as well as in other countries, but Mr. Balieff's form of it is his own, and it has the value of making the whole show possible in a foreign tongue.

An idea of the simplicity of method pursued by this company in reaching its comic effects would be gained by English-speaking spectators if they knew that the four men who are singing a song, with such success that the audience rocks with laughter, are, in fact, singing one word over and over and over again with varying emphasis. It is the Russian word for painter, "zhivopisets." One day at lunch the man who plays the hind legs of the horse in a Chekhov skit showed the same ability to make comedy out of any words whatever. And this is also the same man who is the drummer boy in the Wooden Soldiers.

An example, by the way, of how simple is real art of this type is in this little drama made out of a short story by Chekhov. There could be no better sample of that humor in which the Russians are often dominant, and which is never dreamed of by people who are familiar only with Dostoyevski and Tolstoi, just as in painting most of us are familiar with no one but Verestchagin and Bakst. So fixed is the idea of the tragic in connection with Russia that when Tolstoi's Resurrection was put into the movies, the scene of trudging to Siberia in the broiling sun was put on the screen as across plains deeply covered with snow.

This Chekhov story is only a few moments, picturing a man and a woman eloping in a rickety cab, with a still more rickety horse, which breaks down at the end, and enables the husband to catch the woman, whereupon everybody repents and the policeman stands as a symbol of law and order. The virtuous speeches that decorate the end of the comedy make a pleasant contrast to the real cause of the triumph of virtue—the collapse of the horse.

So exclusively have the translators and the musicians given the serious aspects of Russian literature, that to many it was almost a shock to see the name of Chekhov put down as the author of The Sudden Death of a Horse or The Greatness of the Russian Soul. As a matter of fact, Chekhov has written many short stories that are hilarious. Similarly, to those who know our harping on the melancholy of the Russian folk songs, it was not easy to realize how characteristic is Katinka, next to The Wooden Soldiers the most popular of the Chauve-Souris features on both bills.

Perhaps some idea of the naturalness of feeling of the gypsy scenes may leak through a translation. At any rate, we give two that are almost literal, and almost preserve the meter, although, of course, our translations have no technical or language value:

II. Eyes of Black

Eyes of blackness, eyes of passion,
Eyes of fire and of beauty,
But once did I see you,
All my calm was gone.
I forgot the world,
Just for you alone.

(Chorus repeats the whole first stanza)

Eyes of blackness, eyes of passion,
Eyes of fire and of beauty,
Had I never seen you
I'd not suffer now,
I'd have lived my life
As a happy song.

Eyes of blackness, eyes of beauty,
Eyes of fire and of beauty,
You have destroyed me.
Eyes of blackness
You have carried off forever
My own happiness.

III. Once Again

Ah, once!
Two guitars beyond the wall
Sadly are a-singing
Mem'ried melodies of youth.
Dear one, is it thou there?

Ah, once, once again,
Once again, again, again.
(Repeat)

Yes, I recognize you now.
Your rhythm in D-minor
And your melody I know,
And its rich refrain.

Ah, once, once again,
Once again, again, again.

Evening, a field, little lights,
And a far-away road,
Oh, my heart sings from sadness,
Alarm is in my soul.

Ah, once, once again,
Once again, again, again.

Ah, my destiny, my lot,
Ah, my evil fortune,
I'd have crushed you long ago
If I'd but freedom.

Ah, once, once again,
Once again, again, again.

Where are they, ah, where are they,
Eyes so full of languish?
Passion's unaccounting gage
And a high white forehead.

Ah, once, once again,
Once again, again, again.

THERE have been plenty of dances like the one here staged to Copenhagen plate, but not many full of such an exquisite blending of blues and grays and white.

If we had as much money as Henry Ford, it would give us pleasure to offer about $500,000 to any American company that could turn into a short drama the old French ballad, The King Orders the Drums to be Beaten, with a result as tragic and as delicate as this. It is a tale of kingly love, queenly jealousy, a little poison and a sad end. As Mr. Balieff himself says. "It is an old story, but with what dramatic power is it produced!"

Many of us can still hear the refrain of the drums, "Rat-a-plan, rat-a-plan," as it sways from gaiety and wooing to shame, to jealousy, to bitter revenge. We have some sort of familiarity with the American stage, and if anybody wants to indicate an American actress who can get as much out of this refrain as is given by the Russian actress, Mme. Dianina, with her easy, charming, and dramatic gamut of emotion, we shall be relieved.

In short, this company, equipped as it is with limitless spontaneous feeling, and with a good deal of the established Moscow technique, is able to take many kinds of themes from life, gay and tragic, and present them with fascinating ease, grace and art. Undoubtedly merry-making predominates, and if we wish to see the more somber themes carried to their ultimate power we shall have to hope that Mr. Gest will be successful in arranging for Mr. Stanislavski to bring his great company to America.

Mr. Balieff and Mr. Gest need no suggestions from us, but here is one to which they are more than welcome. A stunning little piece could be made out of the convicts hauling the boats on the Volga, one of the best known songs in Russia. There is a famous painting by Repin, taken from the song, that would be a marvelous setting. It may be that Messrs. Gest and Balieff will reply that such a dramatization would be too much of a test of the average American's intellectuality.

Among the artists connected with the Chauve-Souris stage decorations are: Sudjekin, Remisov and Roerich. Back of them are several well-known Russian artists of high standing—Verestchagin, Repin, and Serov, noted for their portrait work; Vaznetsov and Nestorov, who deal largely with religious subjects, and Shickin, whose landscapes, especially forests, are famous.

The career of the company is now so well known that it can be briefly told.

Balieff and his fellow-artists did not stop with their regular work at the Moscow Art Theater. The spirit of joy and non-sense so possessed them that after each performance they fell into the habit of getting together and entertaining one another. Balieff gravitated to the head of the group which, in time, formed a private club.

It was inevitable, however, that these artists should not keep their light hidden. The public heard of the private performances and Balieff at last yielded to the demand and opened a kind of cabaret. Such was the beginning, back in 1908, of the present Chauve-Souris.

NO ONE who has seen the performances here will be surprised to learn that Moscow reveled in what was then known as The Bat Theater. Soon the club's accommodations became too small and Balieff and his players were forced to move to the basement of the largest apartment house in Moscow. The popularity of the entertainment had not abated when, by the coming of the revolution, artistic circles were thrown into chaos. Balieff led, and by way of the Caucasus, made his entry into Constantinople, and at last to Paris.

He was without resources or prospects. His friends were scattered, the doors of Russia were barred to him, but he set about finding and luring to Paris those who had helped him to success in Moscow.

First among those to be secured were Mme. Tamara Deykarhanova, who had been with him since the inception, and Mme. Fechner. Gradually others joined him. Nicolas Remisov, a young Russian painter, who like Balieff was an exile from his native country, was glad to associate himself with the company, to design the scenery and costumes.

At last Balieff's moment came again. In December, 1920, under the title The Chauve-Souris, The Bat was revived at the Théâtre Femina, in Paris. There was a period of uncertainty while Paris nibbled at the offering; then Balieff's comedy and the sincere, artistic work of all of his players won through to the French heart.

The next year Balieff and his company crossed the Channel and opened at the Pavilion Theater in London. At that playhouse, they met with discouragement, but when the performance was moved to the Apollo, London awoke and the English took the Russians to their hearts, exceeding in their cordiality even the French.

In New York, Mr. Gest arranged for a limited number of performances, but this original plan was immediately upset. On April 21st, last, the company celebrated the one-hundredth performance. Now, at the Century Roof, in New York, the second bill is going strong, there will be a third bill downtown, and no one can see the end.

A It would take all of your time to read all of the current books. Each month the book which is most worth your knowing is condensed here so that you can read it in thirty minutes

Simon Called PETER

By Robert Keable

THE GLAMOUR of no other evil thing is stronger than the glamour of war. It would seem as if the cup of the world's sorrow as a result of war had been filled to the brim again and again, but still a new generation has always been found to forget. A new generation has always been found to talk of the heroisms that the divine in us can manifest in the mouth of hell and to forget that so great a miracle does not justify our creation of the circumstance. . . .

Thus to lift the veil on life behind the lines in time of war is a thankless task. The stay-at-homes will not believe, and particularly they whose smug respectability and conventional religion have been put to no such fiery trial. Moreover they will do more than disbelieve; they will say that the story is not fit to be told. Nor is it. But then it should never have been lived.

The old-fashioned pious books made hell stink of brimstone and painted the Devil hideous. But Satan is not such a fool. Champagne and Martinis do not taste like Gregory powder, nor was St. Anthony tempted by shriveled hags.

Paganism can be gay and passion look like love. Moreover, still more truly, Christ could see the potentialities of virtue in Mary Magdalene and of strength in Simon called Peter. The conventional religious world does not.

ROBERT KEABLE in his searching new novel thus lays down his thesis, and moves directly into a recital of the events in the life of Peter Graham, chaplain in the World War. Having been a chaplain with the South African forces, Mr. Keable is able to introduce a verisimilitude that is decidedly convincing.

Peter Graham, minister to a parish that ran down to the river and included slums, had been invited to preach at St. John's, the great fashionable church of mid-Victorian faith and manners. Graham was coming on; the bishop thought well of him—"a young fellow with quite remarkable gifts."

On this Sunday morning, as Peter walked toward a meeting with Hilda Lessing, at whose home he would breakfast before services, he was pondering his sermon, and his thoughts inevitably turned to the question of war. England was not yet in; but momentarily her ultimatum, preceding the crash, was expected. Peter, suspended over this abyss, had but one text for his sermon—"Christ had compassion on the multitude."

He and Hilda were not engaged; there was merely an understanding. But after his sermon, which won the admiration of the Rector, the young people walked through the park and the weight of the tragic moment forced them into each other's arms. Then the expected blow fell and the fury of war was about them. Peter asked at once for an appointment, but it was not until the struggle had become a grim deadlock that he was sent over. On the boat, he had a glimpse of a pair of flashing eyes—eyes he was to see again and out of whose depths he was to learn many things that would change the whole course of his life.

A Robert Keable, clergyman himself and son of a clergyman, acquired some surprising ideas as a result of his war experiences, which are said to form the background of his successful novel, "Simon Called Peter."

At Rouen, where he was sent first, conditions were surprisingly different from what he had expected; he did not find the great need for the kind of creed he, as a young chaplain, was so eager to offer; he could not fit himself in. Later on he was transferred to Havre, and thrown into association with Arnold, a Presbyterian chaplain, things were no better, in fact they were worse, but there he met Julie, the girl of the flashing eyes whom he had noticed on the boat on his way to France.

THE CENTRAL ward at No. 1 Base Hospital, where a concert was being given, looked as gay as possible.

There were women in plenty. The staff had been augmented by visitors from most of the other hospitals in the town. Jack Donovan and Peter were a little late, and arrived at the time an exceedingly popular young subaltern was holding the stage amid roars of laughter.

Once inside, one had to make one's way among beds and chairs, and the nature of things brought one into rather more than the usual share of late-comers' scrutiny, but nothing could abash Donovan. He spotted at once a handsome woman in a nurse's indoor staff uniform and made for her. She with two others was sitting on an empty bed, and she promptly made room for Donovan. Graham was introduced, and a quiet girl moved up a bit for him to sit down; but there was not much room and the girl would not talk so that he sat uncomfortably and looked around.

Suddenly he became conscious, as one will, that someone was particularly looking at him. He glanced back over the chairs, and met a pair of eyes, roguish, laughing and unquestionably fixed upon him. The moment he saw them, their owner nodded and telegraphed an obvious invitation. Peter glanced at Donovan: he apparently had not seen. He looked back; the eyes called him again. He felt himself getting hot, for, despite the fact that he had a kind of feeling he had seen those eyes before, he was perfectly certain he did not know the girl.

He looked steadily toward the chairs. The back of the girl who had looked at him was toward him now, for she was talking sideways to somebody; but he noted an empty chair just next her and that her uniform was not of the nurses of this hospital. He felt confident that she would look again, and he was not disappointed. Instantly, he made up his mind, nodded and reached for his cap. He got up and walked boldly over to the vacant chair. He was fast acclimatizing to war conditions.

PETER sat down on that empty chair and met the girl's eyes fairly. She was entirely at her ease and laughing merrily. "I've lost my bet," she said, "and Tommy's won."

"I haven't any idea who you are," he said, "though I can't help feeling I've seen you before."

The girl chuckled with amusement and turned to her companion. "He doesn't remember, Tommy," she said.

The second girl looked past her to Peter. "I should think not," she said. "Nobody would. But he'll probably say in two minutes that he does. I think you're perfectly shameless, Julie."

Julie swung around to Peter. "You're a beast, Tommy," she said over her shoulder, "and I shan't speak to you again. You see," she went on to Peter, "I could see you had struck a footling girl, and as I don't know a single decent boy here, I thought I'd presume on an acquaintance and see if it wasn't a lucky one. We've got to know each other, you know. The girl with me on the boat—oh, damn. I've told you!—and I'm swearing and you're a parson, but it can't be helped now—well, the girl told me we should meet again, and that it was probably you who was mixed up with my fate-line. What do you think of that?" she asked the bewildered Peter.

Peter had not an idea, really. He was going through the most amazing set of sensations. He felt utterly at a loss to deal with a female of so obviously and totally different a kind from any he had met before; but with it all, he was very conscious of being glad he was there. "I'm highly privileged, I'm sure," he said and could have kicked himself for a stupid ass.

"Oh, Lord!" said Julie, "for goodness' sake don't talk like that. There's the worst of a parson: he can't forget the drawing-room. At any rate, I'm not sure that I'm highly fortunate, but I thought I ought to give Fate a chance. Do you smoke?"

"Yes," said Peter, wonderingly.

"Then for goodness' sake smoke, and you'll feel better. No, I daren't here, but I'm glad you are educated enough to ask me. Nurses aren't supposed to smoke in public, you know, and I take it that even you have observed that I am a nurse."

"To be absolutely honest, I had," he said. "And I observe, moreover, that you are not wearing exactly an English nurse's uniform, and that you have what I might venture to call a zoological badge. I therefore conclude that, like my friend Donovan, you hail from South Africa. What hospital are you in?"

"Quai de France," she said. "Know it?"

Peter repressed a start. "Quai de France?" he queried. "Where's that now?"

AT THAT moment, a song started but his companion dropped her voice to a stage-whisper and replied: "End of the harbor, near where the leave-boat starts."

Then she looked away toward the platform, and he studied her face surreptitiously. It seemed very young till you looked closely, especially at the eyes, and then you perceived something lurking there. She was twenty-seven or twenty-eight, he concluded. She looked as if she knew the world inside out, and as if there were something hidden below the gaiety. Peter felt curiously and intensely attracted. His shyness vanished. He had no intimation of the doings of Providence, and nobody could possibly be more skeptical of fate-lines than he, but very strangely it dawned on him as he studied her, that he would fathom that look somehow, somewhere.

"I'm practically not made up at all," she whispered, without turning her head, "so for heaven's sake don't say there's too much powder on my nose."

Peter shook silently. "No, but a faint trace on the right cheek," he whispered back. She turned then and looked at him and her eyes challenged his. Yet it is to be supposed that Hilda knew nothing whatever about it.

"Right on my mother's knee . . . ." sang the platform.

"Without a shirt, without a shirt," gagged Peter, sotto voce, and marveled at himself. But he felt that her smothered laughter amply repaid him.

The song ceased in time, and immediately she began again.—

"I hope to goodness tea isn't far off," she said. "By the way, you'll have to take me to it, now, you know. It will be a fiendish squash and I wouldn't go if I hadn't you to get me tea and take me away afterwards."

"I'm highly privileged, I'm sure," said Peter again, deliberately.

"You are," she said. "Look how you're coming on! Ten minutes ago, you were a bored curate, and now you're—well, what are you now?"

Peter hesitated perceptibly. He felt he might say many things. Then he said, "A trapped padre," and they both laughed.

"Thank goodness you're not sentimental, anyway," Julie said. "Nor's your friend; but the matron is. I know her sort."

PETER did not consciously say to himself that this meeting marked the beginning in his awakening, but actually it did. His doubts of his efficiency as a chaplain remained, grew, led to letters to Hilda that disturbed that young lady, who held visions of a future bishop for a husband. Meanwhile, Julie was always there; not that he saw her often, though visiting at her hospital was part of his official duty. In the end, the girl, along with the general army conditions behind the lines, so seriously disturbed him, shook his faith, that he took his troubles to Padre Arnold, old and wise:

"Arnold," said Peter as he pulled up a chair and got his pipe, "I don't know that I'm even a Christian heretic. I don't know what I am and where I stand. I wish I did. I wish I even knew how much I disbelieve, for then I'd know what to do. But it's not that my dogmas have been attacked and weakened. I've no new light on the Apostles' Creed and no fresh doubts about it. I could still argue for the Virgin Birth of Christ and the Trinity, and so on. But it's worse than that. I feel . . ." He broke off abruptly and pulled at his pipe. Arnold said nothing. They were friends enough by now to understand each other. In a little while, the younger man found the words he wanted.

LOOK here, it's like this. I remember once on the East Coast coming across a stone breakwater high and dry, infield half a mile from the sea. There was nothing the matter with the breakwater, and it served admirably for certain purposes. But it was no longer of any vital use in the world, for the sea had receded and left it there. Now that's just what I feel. I had a religion; I suppose it had its weaknesses and its faults; but most of it was good sound stone and it certainly had served. But it serves no longer, not because it's damaged, but because the need for it has changed its nature or is no longer there."

Arnold stirred to get out his tobacco pouch. "The sea is shifty, though," he said. "If they keep the breakwater in decent repair, it'll come in handy again."

"Yes," burst out Peter. "But of course, that's where illustrations are so little good; you can't press them. In any case, no engineer worth his salt would sit down beside his breakwater and smoke a pipe till the sea came in handy again. His job is to go right after it."

"True for ye, boy. But if the old plan was so good, why not go down to the beach and get on with building operations of the same sort?" Arnold asked.

"Arnold," said Peter, "you couldn't have put it better. That's exactly what I am here to do. I knew in London that the sea was receding to some extent, and I thought there was a jolly good chance to get up with it again out here. But that led straight to my second problem: I can't build on the old plan, and it doesn't seem any good. I remember preaching in the beginning of the war from the text, 'Jesus had compassion on the multitude.' But the crowd isn't interested in Jesus any more. It doesn't believe in Him."

"I wonder," said Arnold.

"I don't see how you can," said Peter. "Do you think Tommy worries about his sins? Are the men in our mess miserable? Does the girl the good books talked about, who flirts and smokes and drinks and laughs, sit down by night on the edge of her little white bed and feel a blank in her life? Does she, Arnold?"

"I'm blest if I know; I haven't been there. You seem to know a precious lot about it," he added dryly.

Julie

This beautiful war nurse in Mr. Keable's book plays an important part in Peter Graham's change of attitude toward life and religion

Drawn by Henry Raleigh

IN THE end, Arnold advised Peter to get down among the multitude and make a few inquiries. That is exactly what the young chaplain did. He came to know women of the town and drunken men; to tolerate and to do things he could scarcely have dreamed of in London. This attitude, these experiences, were reflected in his letters to Hilda and he was not greatly surprised when she wrote telling him that she thought it best, in view of the fact that he was so very much changed since he had gone away, to break off her engagement to him. He was shocked but resigned; it was impossible to explain in letters and besides, back there was Julie.

So Hilda, in one swift moment, went out of his life and out of the book. Toward Julie his emotions were mixed. When away from her, she was a subtle influence of which Peter was, mostly, unconscious. When he was with her, she fascinated him, the two of them caught in the meshes of an irresistible passion. This feeling reached a certain dramatic climax on New-year's eve, when Julie and Peter, with four of their friends, made a night of it starting with a dinner at a Havre restaurant.

JULIE was the very spirit of bedevilment and fun. She leaped up and the next minute circled on the table in a whirl of skirts. So light that she seemed hardly to touch the table, she danced as if born to do it. It was such an incarnation of grace and music that a little silence fell on them all. To Peter, she appeared to dance for him. He could not take his eyes off her. He cared nothing what others thought or saw. There was a mist before him and thunder in his ears. He saw only her flushed, childlike face, and sparkling brown eyes, and a wave of her loosened hair.

The music ceased. Panting for breath, she leaped down amid a chorus of "Bravos!" and held out her hand for the liqueur glass. Peter put it in her fingers, and he was trembling more than she and spilt a little of it. "Well, here's the best," she cried, and raised the glass. Then, with a gay laugh, she put her moistened fingers to his mouth and he kissed them, the spirit on his lips.

Then Tommy, as usual, remembered [Continued on page 122]

¶ When Uncle Walt says:
Be calm and you'll be happy,
you just have to believe it

¶ Illustration by
F. Strothmann

What's All The SHOOTIN' For? By Walt Mason

STRANGERS and tourists who call at my ivy-mantled tower to give me the once-over, frequently ask what caused the oblong dent in the top of my head. This depression holds about a pint, and I find it a great convenience when I am arduously engaged in Literary Labors. Before sitting down to write a thoughtful and serious essay like this, I fill the dent with ice-water, and it keeps my faculties from overheating. Some day, probably, somebody will invent an air-cooled intellect which won't smoke under the severest strain; but as things are now I consider the dent in my head a great blessing.

I acquired it long ago, in Atchison, Kansas. I was young then, and my heart was hot and restless, and I got excited over every issue before the people. At that time a historic railway strike was in progress and I was all worked up over it. I have championed so many causes I don't remember whether I was championing labor or capital just then, but I was on one side or the other; and one evening I mounted a dry-goods box that was standing against a store building and gave a good imitation of William J. Demosthenes, calling upon my hearers to strike for their altars and their fires, and also for the green graves of their sires; and just as I was reaching the peroration, somebody dropped a brick from a window two or three stories up, and it bounced off my dome of thought, leaving the depression which I now find so useful, but which I considered a blemish until age gave me wisdom.

My roommate in those halcyon days was a young man named Tubb, and he was even more passionate than myself in his desire to be of public service. The woes of the taxpayers kept him awake at night, and he would forsake his job and meal ticket at any time, in order to join any old forlorn hope that might be in evidence. At that period the prohibition experiment was new in Kansas, and the authorities were making desperate efforts to enforce the law. The attorney-general was more industrious than a cranberry merchant, and he was appointing deputies by the dozen, so the entire state might be covered. Mr. Tubb had convinced himself that the Anheuser-Busch products were the chief evil of the time, and that it was his duty to enroll in the attorney-general's army; and, having enlisted, he was the busiest warrior in the business.

The forces of Barleycorn were not taking their punishment in the proper spirit; they fought back with whatever weapons they could get their hands on and most of the weapons seemed to hit Albert Edward Tubb. I got sick and tired of patching him up. He'd come home one evening with his nose out of alignment, and the next evening a lot of his teeth would be loose, and he had to have beefsteaks on his eyes, and poultices on his brow; and again his collarbone would be broken, and I had to get a wooden one to take its place; and I had to keep a complete stock of interchangeable parts on hand, so I could keep him going. One evening when I was fastening a new celluloid ear to his head the building went up in the air about twenty feet, and fell apart as it came down, and the fire department had a great time digging us from the ruins; an indignant jointist had placed a bomb under it.

Tubb was taken to a hospital and I saw no more of him for more than thirty years. The other day he called to see me, and we sat under my banyan tree, and talked calmly of old times, laughing at the sound and fury that filled our youth. I had been reading the morning paper, which contained a heartrending story of conditions in Russia. I remarked that things were in appalling shape in that country.

"Yes," said Tubb, in a bored way, "but what's the difference?"

Age has its compensations. The old man leans the back of his chair against the woodshed, and watches the hurrying, agitated, strenuous crowd go by; he hears people declaiming and protesting, and sees them shaking their fists at the firmament, demanding this and imploring that, and he knows that it makes no difference; it is all old stuff. The Moving Finger writes, and the seventh sons of seventh sons foretell the future at so much a head, and Daniels come to judgment, but in the end a man waxes old and realizes that nothing makes any difference.

China is all shot to pieces and has a fresh crisis every morning, with matinees twice a week. But I can't do China any good by pawing the ground and getting excited. By such a course I might induce a stroke of apoplexy, and my health is more important than anything that can happen in China.

Alaska, a country teeming with possibilities, has been ruined by bureaucracy, the papers say. Had that happened when I was young I'd have kicked up a hideous commotion, writing furious letters to the newspapers, and abusing the administration in the forum. But the family veterinarian says I have high blood pressure, and nothing could be worse for me than excitement, so I let Alaska slide. And probably Alaska will work out her salvation just as soon, and just as thoroughly, as she would if I were to burn a ton of fireworks.

I SOMETIMES wonder if anything I ever did made any difference. A long time ago Jim Pulsifer and Hank Evergreen were opposing candidates for county treasurer. I knew them well and considered them highly virtuous citizens, so well matched as to morals and abilities that it made little difference who won. This being my conviction, I set forth on the morning of election day to spend the day fishing. Hard by the village pond I met Rev. Septimus Bucksmith, the pastor of our church, and when he learned that I didn't intend to vote, but was going to fish for red herring in the brook, he was greatly shocked. He argued that it was my duty to vote, even where one candidate seemed as good as the other. I was setting an evil example and undermining those bulwarks and palladiums which are the foundation of our government. So, being overborne, I put away the fishpole and bait, and went to the polls and voted for Jim Pulsifer. This man was elected by one vote, so it would seem that when I turned back from my fishing excursion I did something portentous.

After being in office a year Jim was pinched for using the county money to back certain ponies, and eventually he went to the penitentiary, but the county never got its money back, and when last I saw it, was on its uppers. For a long time I felt guilty and humiliated. But it turned out that Hank Evergreen also was arrested for buncoing a lot of farmers, and he also went to the penitentiary. Had he been elected, and Jim defeated, they'd have gone to the pen just the same, so really it would have made no difference had I gone fishing instead of going to the polls to defend the Constitution.

This is the comfortable philosophy of the aged, that nothing makes any difference. There's no sense in getting excited, in arguing. Everything will come out right in the end, because it was so ordained in the beginning, and not because men charge around.

That great and good man, Superintendent Voliva, of Zion City, recently has made public some of his remarkable discoveries in astronomy and kindred sciences. He informs us that the earth is flat, and rests upon four posts; also that the firmament is solid, with the sun and moon and other well-known planets suspended from it like chandeliers, or lanterns in a country theater. Time was when I couldn't have calmly read such a statement. I'd have jarred the welkin out of place denouncing such false teachings and pointing out that the authorities were shamefully neglecting their duties, since Voliva was still at large. But now I read Voliva's decrees with amusement and enjoyment. The man is a great humorist, even if he doesn't know it, and a great humorist is a distinct blessing in a world that is heavy with weariness. And, moreover, it may be he is right. His theory is far more convincing than that of the recognized scientists who say the earth is whirling around the sun, and the sun around the earth, and the moon around both—or whatever it is they say. And, anyhow, what's the difference? The planetary system will chug along just the same, all cylinders hitting, no matter what we believe, or don't believe about the matter.

"Let the rest of the world go by," says the popular song; and the deathless Omar speaks of "a book of verses underneath the bough," as a symptom of felicity. One must be in the sere and yellow leaf to appreciate these things, to thoroughly enjoy the calm, ruminative life. There are people who call me a hermit, and ask why I don't mingle with the madding throng, ignorant of the fact that in other days I was the life and soul of said madding throng. Old Tom Fanning, for instance, is always asking me to go downtown with him. He wants to introduce me to about 10,000 people. I ought to get acquainted with the Live Wires, the men who Do Things, the men who put the town on the map. Yesterday Tom insisted that I go in his car.

After a while he came back, and I helped to pry his hat off. It had been jammed down over his head until the brim was around his neck; his coat was split up the back, and his chin had been driven in about two inches.

Such things happen to men who will not sit quietly at home, who must mingle with the madding throng.

MY LIFE is a quiet, gentle routine. I take a walk every morning, then write one of those songs that will go sounding down the ages; then after eating a hearty meal, I ride a few miles in my tin car, and eat again, after which I write another song that is not born to die. Then, after a hearty meal of ham and eggs, I sleep a few rounds, after which I eat a hearty repast, and so on until bedtime.

We have a civic league in our town, and the officers and members often rebuke me severely for not attending. I used to attend the meetings of such organizations long ago, and found that they were chiefly schools of oratory.

It is a good thing for the old man to let the world go by, and simply watch things from the shelter of his banyan tree. For the truth is he is a back number. The more active he becomes, the more he is in the way, and the younger men can't help looking forward to his funeral with impatience.

So I sit through the long afternoons in the shade of my upas tree, and watch the world go by. Sometimes I think it is headed in the wrong direction, there is so much jazz stuff, so much flapperism, so much yawping about sex, so much noise, so much craziness of costume, so much joy-riding and so little working; but the old boys in all ages were prone to shake their heads and predict catastrophe.

So I cheer up and ask myself, "What's the difference?" I lag superfluous on the stage; the world belongs to the young folks going by; let's see what they'll do with it.

From the Sidelines

I HAVE an easy rustic chair, it stands upon my lawn; and sitting calm and peaceful there, I watch the world roll on. Perhaps it isn't rolling right. perhaps it's jumped the track; but I'm too old to whoop and fight, and try to put it back. Men say, "While we are throwing fits, and viewing with alarm, there in his chair the dotard sits, nor cares for good or harm." But if I joined them on the pike, and pawed with them the sand, invoking Pete and likewise Mike to save our native land, they'd say, "Go, dotard, to your seat, and dream the hours away; you are too gray, too cold your feet—we need young blood today!" And so I sit before my coop, a bent and wintry guy, and quaff a cup of Volstead soup, and watch the world go by.

Walter Mason

Q. SCIENCE of the Month

Q. When you consider that science and invention are responsible for the comforts and conveniences of modern life
you will understand the eager interest in the latest developments of today's scientific problems and achievements

Latest Reports On Psychic Research

Q. Drawing by Harry Townsend

By James Hopper and E. E. Free

D R. CHARLES RICHEL, professor at the University of Paris, is just out with a new book on the subject of Psychic Phenomena. That is to say, on that subject which has to do with such things as table-tipping, automatic writing, haunted houses, ghosts, divination and telepathy. In this book the French scientist concludes firmly that we must accept some of these phenomena. That they are real.

Then, as he specifies exactly which ones we must consider real, he names among them the very one which, surely, to the average man, is the most extraordinary. The phenomenon of ectoplasm.

In this, as everyone knows, a singular substance seems to exude out of a person in trance—a substance which seemingly can be felt as something solid and living, which seems capable of moving objects, and which seemingly can take on different shapes. The shape of a hand, an arm, of an entire human body, even.

Dr. Richet is a scientist of reputation and integrity, a distinguished physiologist. He has studied the psychic phenomena for years, not only analyzing the existent mass of evidence, but experimenting carefully himself. His book, which is to be translated and published in the United States, is an exhaustive treatise. This might be a good time, then, to determine, if possible, the position of science on the troubling phenomena called psychic.

Ten years ago there were only two attitudes toward the psychic phenomena: that of the sceptic and that of the believer. By far the greater number of scientists, we might say almost all of them, held the first attitude. They were sceptics. They denied altogether the reality of psychic phenomena. All so-called psychic phenomena, they said, are merely fraud and self-delusion. There are no psychic phenomena, they said.

A few scientists, however, held the second attitude. They were among the believers. They not only accepted the reality of psychic phenomena, but accepted, in explanation, the theory of the existence of spirits. Spirits being conceived as the non-material personalities of persons who have died

THIS was ten years ago. At the present time, we must take account of a new third group which as rapidly grown in the past decade. This is the group of scientists that holds neither the attitude of the sceptic, nor that of the utter believer.

These men believe that, beneath a mass of fraud and illusion, there exist psychic phenomena that are real.

They believe that these real psychic phenomena are due, not to the action of spirits, but to the working of natural forces at present unknown to science.

It is with these men that Richet belongs; it is of their attitude that he is the foremost advocate.

The three attitudes—that of the sceptic, the believer, and the new group—would be about as follows if applied to a well-known phenomenon, such as the wireless telephone.

Imagine three men who have been cast away on a desert island before the wireless came into being. Imagine them, rescued and returned to civilization, brought to a wireless telephone.

The first man might say: "This is an amusing trick but, of course, it is fraud and bunk. There can be no such thing as the transfer of the voice over distance except by means of a wire."

The second man might say: "This is wonderful and marvelous. Of course, it is done by spirits. It proves that spirits really do exist."

The third man might say: "Well, I don't think that spirits do it. But I think it's happening all right. It isn't all bunk and fraud. Underneath must be some hidden natural force with which I am not acquainted. I'm going to find out what it is!"

THE PSYCHIC phenomena that, in his book, Dr. Richet examines, are more or less familiar, at least by hearsay, to everyone. They comprise:

1. Apparitions. Here belong the reports of the existence of ghosts and fairies; of haunted houses; of ghastly sounds, moans and groans;appings and the clanging of chains. Here belongs that singular phenomenon of ectoplasm; in which, as we have seen, a singular substance, issuing out of a person in trance, seems to be able to move objects, to make itself felt, and to take on shape that may be even that of an entire human body.

2. Movement of objects. Table-tipping belongs here, and all phenomena in which objects move without any visible means. They often take place at the medium séance. Tambourines are shaken by invisible hands; chairs mysteriously stir; objects move from one part of the room to another.

3. Telepathy and Clairvoyance. The securing of information otherwise than through the five senses. The clairvoyant seems to be able to describe things occurring at a distance; the telepathic person, or "mind-reader," claims to secure information from the minds of other persons, absent or present. The best-known instances of telepathy are those in which a person receives a sudden impression of accident or danger to another person who is far away.

4. Premonition and Foresight. Here come "warnings." Smith suddenly, while reading a book, gets a sharp sense of impending disaster. Later in the day, he breaks his leg, or a medium in seance says, "Beware of a black-haired man." You go to the races, get a tip from a black-haired man, and lose money.

5. Automatic Writing. In a trance state, a person writes on a paper or on a slate, something that he feels he is not writing out of his own volition, but prompted or directed by some supernormal agency. "I am Napoleon," the writing may say. "Do not buy those lots at Cocoanut Beach." Poems, entire novels, mostly very bad, have been written in this way. The ouija board belongs here; it is automatic writing done with a board instead of with a pen.

6. Trance Control. The customary phenomena at the "séance." The medium, in state of trance, claims to become subject to a spirit control. The control, through the medium, answers questions and gives advice. He communicates with the spirit of the departed with whom the medium's client wishes to speak.

OUT OF all this mass, what does Richet accept as real?

Compared with the mass examined, he accepts little. But that little, in itself, is a good deal. It comprises some phenomena that are certainly among the ones that the average man would regard as most extraordinary.

For instance, he accepts something of Premonition.

He accepts what we have called movement of objects, and which he calls telekinesia.

As we have seen, he accepts ectoplasm. He says of premonition, after examining all the facts: "One conclusion disengages itself out of all these facts; it is that premonition is a demonstrated fact. A strange fact, paradoxical and apparently absurd, but which we are forced to admit."

Of movement of objects he says, "Proofs of telekinesia exist which to my mind are sufficient and even superabundant."

Of ectoplasm, he says: "The facts of ectoplasm seem demonstrated as rigorously as those of telekinesia, though here we deal with phenomena which are more dramatic and extraordinary."

Science, he says, must acknowledge these phenomena.

When Dr. Richet writes this, does he mean that science, admitting these phenomena, must accept also the explanations which, in many minds, go with them?

He does not. He simply means that, in his mind they are facts with which science must reckon, which science must accept as facts to study. He turns over these facts to science, as it were, and says, "Now go to work and discover what are the natural laws beneath all this."

For he does not think that the phenomena, mysterious as they seem in outward aspect, are supernatural. He thinks they probably are due to the working of forces that are unknown at the present time, but which are natural, and which will be known some day. As lightning, once so very mysterious, is now known to be a discharge of electricity.

As Dr. Richet thinks, so does his group—the group that might be called that of Younger Science. It thinks that, in the mass of psychic phenomena, after you have accounted for most of it by calling it error or calling it fraud, there still remains something that must be accepted as true, and that is due to the working of natural forces at present unknown of science.

RICHET probably, among his own kind, is an advance skirmisher. We doubt if many of his brother soldiers have charged as audaciously forward as he. We doubt if many follow him in his acceptance of ectoplasm, for instance.

The phenomena of ectoplasm take place always through a medium. Mediums so often have been convicted of fraud, fraud seems so inseparable from the métier of the medium, that the present writers would leave out as suspicious all phenomena connected with them.

They also would explain premonition as due to the well-known fallibility of man's senses, and his woful capacity for exaggerating the meaning and significance of the word coincidence.

They would then accept a still smaller amount of the mass of psychic phenomena than does Richet, ascribing this residue, as do Richet and his group, to the working of unknown forces that will be found eventually to be natural forces when discovered.

Natural forces, not spirits. There exists, in our judgment, no adequate scientific evidence of the existence of spirits of any kind whatever.

WHY THE SUN STAYS HOT

Old Sol can preserve his youth and energy merely by contracting two hundred feet a year

WHY DOES the sun stay hot? At present, to this question, science has two answers. One is radioactivity; the other is contraction.

The energy radiated continually by the sun is enormous. All the energy we have upon earth—the energy of coal, of water-power, of food—is energy we have caught from the sun. Yet this energy, intercepted by the tiny earth, is almost as nothing compared to the huge amount poured out by the sun on all sides into space.

How does the sun keep this up all the time? Where does this colossal energy come from?

Perhaps from radioactivity. How much radium or other radioactive elements there may be in the sun we do not know; nor, therefore, how much heat it may produce. Perhaps it is enough to preserve the sun's youth.

Or this energy may come from the sun's contraction. If one drops an object from a high building, one obtains energy from the fall. The speed of the fall, suddenly stopped, turns into heat. But contraction is a falling. When the sun contracts, all of the matter near the sun's surface falls a little toward the center.

The amount of matter near the sun's surface is, of course, very great, and even a very short falling of it would create much energy.

It has been figured that if the sun contracts two hundred feet in diameter a year, this contraction will balance the energy it loses by radiation in the same time.

To keep hot, in other words, the sun has only to contract itself by two hundred feet once every year.

Which is a small matter for a body with a diameter of nine hundred million miles.

NEW WAVES FOR RADIO?

Wireless Telephony may help to discover and use unknown gaps in space

THE MUSIC which the radio fan receives from his broadcasting station comes to him as does the sunlight from the sun. The wireless wave is an electro-magnetic wave, and so also is the light wave an electro-magnetic wave.

The difference between the two is merely one of dimension. The usual broadcasting wave is about three hundred and sixty meters from crest to crest; light waves are much shorter—less than a millionth of a meter from crest to crest.

There are other electro-magnetic waves—for instance, the waves of radiant heat, and of the radium rays.

Between wireless and radiant heat waves there is a gap; and between ultra-violet and X-ray, there is another gap. In these gaps, there may also be waves—waves that we have not discovered yet, that can do things as interesting as those we know.

WANTED: THE OZONE TRUTH

Experimenters are looking for information that may eliminate impure air

THE United States Bureau of Mines, working together with the American Society of Heating and Ventilating Engineers, is carrying on experiments in Pittsburgh on the possible use of ozone as an air purifier—on its possible use in making air good to breathe in places where it is foul and where ventilation is difficult.

Ozone is in the air in very small quantities. In a way it is a more active oxygen. Where a molecule of oxygen is made up of two atoms of oxygen, a molecule of ozone is made up of three atoms of oxygen.

In the experiments being carried out in Pittsburgh by the Government, electric sparks are passed through the air. The sparks change into ozone some of the oxygen in the air. The small quantity of ozone already in the air is thus increased by another very small quantity.

It is hoped that this increased quantity of ozone will be found to purify the air, destroying its odors and killing its bacteria, and that we will have thus an efficient way of keeping air good in mines, tunnels, theaters—all the places where this necessity of life is often so foul. But whether ozone actually does purify the air, and, if so, just how efficiently it does, are things still to be determined by the experiments of the Bureau of Mines.

WHEN THE DESERT WAS WET

Once upon a time America's Great Basin country was a region of lakes

THE GREAT Basin Country of the West, now an almost bone-dry desert, was once a green lush land of beautiful lakes. Recent publications of the U. S. Geologic Survey recall attention to this fact. Because of climatic changes, these lakes have shrunk or altogether vanished.

The largest remnant, the Great Salt Lake of Utah, renowned for its bitter waters, was once a mighty body of fresh water which covered a large part of Utah and a part of Nevada. On the mountains that rise behind Salt Lake City or Ogden, the traveler can still see the great wave-cut terraces which mark the ancient shore-line.

Farther West, in the mountains of Nevada, the waters of another lake once stretched over eight thousand square miles. Other valleys pillowed some twenty or thirty lakes, all of which are now gone. Beautiful lakes once lay under the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevada. The shrunken, bitter residue of one of them remains as Owens Lake; the others, Searles and Panamint, are mere arid basins.

GOOD GERMS EAT BAD

The cause of so many human ills is set upon by one of its own kind and destroyed

THE GERMS that attack us, causing disease and even death, are in turn subject to attack by other germs—by other germs that prey on them as they prey on us, making them ill and killing them. This is the conclusion of Dr. Felix d'Herelle, the French bacteriologist.

From persons suffering from a certain kind of dysentery, Dr. d'Herelle isolated the germ that causes the disease. He was able to isolate, at the same time, a something that attacked the dysentery germs and destroyed them—which made the dysentery germs ill, killed them, and then disintegrated and dissolved them.

Many bacteriologists, including most of those who are American, think that this "something" is chemical in nature. But Dr. d'Herelle thinks that it is a living organism. He calls it the Bacteriophage—the germ devourer of the germ.

THIRTEEN MONTHS A YEAR

New Calendar under consideration would have twenty-eight days in each month

WE MAY have some day a thirteen-month calendar. The year, in this calendar, would be divided into thirteen months of twenty-eight days each.

There would be a January Zero each year, which would be New-year's day. And then every four years there would be in addition a July Zero to take care of leap year's day.

The Camera-man was on hand when this blast furnace "choked."

The establishment of such a calendar is being more and more seriously considered. It was recently endorsed by a convention in Washington called to discuss such a reform and has the backing of many astronomical organizations.

In this new calendar, each month would begin on a Sunday, and any certain date of the month would always fall on the same day. The fourth of any month would always, for instance, be on Wednesday—a simplicity altogether lacking in our present foolish and complicated system.

VOLTS FOR STEAM

Electricity, usually generated by steam power, now returns the compliment

ELECTRICITY today has supplanted steam as the power preferred for factories. But factories, though finding electricity cheaper and better, also have some need for steam.

An apparatus recently devised fills this demand. It makes steam from electricity. The factory using it can still use electricity as its main source of power and have steam where it needs it.

The new device is in point of fact an electric boiler. It makes use of the fact that electricity, passing through water, raises the temperature of the water. High tension alternating currents, led through the water by means of electrodes, change it into steam.

This new electric steam generator is somewhat like a huge breakfast-table coffee percolator without the coffee.

MORE SMOKE THAN FIRE

But there is often serious danger when a blast furnace "slips"

THE ACCOMPANYING picture is not of a conflagration, but a rare photograph of a "slip" in a blast furnace.

Tons of iron ore and coke occasionally stick in the throat of such a furnace for a while, and then slip down suddenly, throwing out tremendous clouds of ore dust through every vent and chink. These abrupt "slips" cannot be foreseen and are by no means enjoyable. Workmen have been killed by them. This one was snapped by a camera which happened to be at hand by a singular bit of luck.

COUNTING THE STARS

Ancients thought there were only 3,000 stars; we know there are billions of them

How many stars are there in the sky? More and more, as we find better ways of seeing and counting them. The ancients thought that the stars they could see were all the stars in the heavens; they dreamed of making a perfect catalog which would hold all the stars.

Now we know this cannot be done, will never be done. When primitive man lifted his eyes to the heavens, he saw perhaps three thousand stars. Galileo, through his telescope, was able to see probably half a million. Herschel, a little later, through his glass, saw enough to estimate that there must be five or six million.

But the modern telescope, with its photographic attachment, has multiplied and multiplied even Herschel's estimate. The photographic plate is like an eye which does not blink, which does not tire; a stupendously patient eye which fixes what it will see till it does see it.

With that eye, we see about two billion stars. That number of stars has been photographed.

But there are probably other thousands of millions too faint to sensitize even the patient photographic plate.

And there are the dark stars—those unlit, invisible stars which are known to exist through their influence on their more luminous sisters.

CHEMISTRY AT A GLANCE

Science of chemical composition began with the discovery of oxygen in 1774

THE FOLLOWING events mark the most important points and milestones in the growth of chemical science:

In 1774, oxygen was discovered by Joseph Priestley, an Englishman. Here began the study of chemical composition.

In 1789, the laws of chemical combination were announced by Antoine Laurent Lavoisier, a Frenchman. This was the beginning of chemical science as distinguished from alchemy.

In 1807, Sir Humphry Davy discovered the alkali metals, sodium and potassium, giving great impetus to the search for new elements.

In 1828, urea was produced artificially by Friedrich Wohler, a German—a most far-reaching discovery in that it proved for the first time that substances produced in Nature by living things could also be made artificially in the laboratory.

In 1834, Michael Faraday, an Englishman, discovered the laws of electro-chemical combinations, thus beginning electro-chemistry.

In 1839, photography began through the efforts in invention of Louis Jacques Mandé Daguerre, a Frenchman.

In 1856, Sir William Henry Perkin discovered the dye called mauve, the first of the aniline dyes and the beginning of the dyestuff industry.

In 1859, Robert Wilhelm von Bunsen and Gustav Robert Kirchhoff, Germans, perfected the important spectroscope, thus making it possible to determine the chemical constituents of the stars.

In 1887, the theory of the nature of solutions announced by the Hollander, Jacobus Hendricus Van't Hoff, opened up the modern science of physical chemistry.

In 1898, Madame Curie, a Pole, and her husband, a Frenchman, discovered radium, thus paving the way for the modern knowledge of the internal structure of the atom.

the electric arc which does the melting, and from the heated metal which is being melted. This difficulty was met in an ingenious way. The carbon rod that has the arc at its end is made hollow, in the shape of a tube. Down this tube a current of gas is blown to the very end, where the glowing arc is. The gas drives the water away from the arc and from the metal on which it plays, keeping both dry.

MAKING BALLOONS SAFE

Helium gas, first found in the sun, is non-explosive and will not burn

IN THE recent balloon race held at Milwaukee, the navy balloon was filled with helium, instead of hydrogen. The great advantage of helium is that it is non-explosive and will not burn. Its use will much lessen the probability of such deplorable disasters as the late destructions of the Roma and the British built ZR2.

The history of helium is a romantic one. It was first discovered in the sun, and for a long time afterwards was not known to exist on earth. It was Lockyear who, in 1868, found it in the sun through spectroscopic examination, and who called it helium.

Later on Dr. Hillebrand of the U. S. Geological Survey extracted some from a terrestrial mineral called pitchblende, but without knowing what he had in his hands. And it was not till 1895 that Ramsay, repeating Hillebrand's extraction from pitchblende, identified the gas thus extracted as that which Lockyear, years and years before, had found in the sun.

THE MIGHT OF THE TINY ELECTRON

Smallest unit yet known is the building stone of matter and electricity

THE RADIO has introduced several new words into the everyday vocabulary. Among them is the word "electron."

An electron is simply a tiny particle of electricity. Also, it is a tiny particle of matter. For matter and electricity are now known to be the same thing—or different manifestations of the same thing. The electron is the tiny building stone of both; the ultimate particle out of which, as far as we know, everything is built. Electricity is made up of electrons; and the atoms of matter consist of electrons marvelously held together in infinitesimally tiny systems.

The vacuum tube of your radio outfit is an apparatus for producing electrons and using them to detect wireless waves. An electric current in a wire is simply a stream of billions on billions of electrons passing through the wire.

The size of an electron is such that it would take seven million millions of them laid side by side to make an inch. The number passing through a fifty-watt electric lamp (not at all a large-sized lamp) is something like 3,000,000,000,000,000,000 a second—if that means anything!

TO BOIL OR NOT TO BOIL?

Engineers have turned their attention to the making of our favorite breakfast beverage

IF YOU want good coffee, make it in a glass or porcelain pot, say the research scientists connected with the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

But what do these scientists know of making coffee? They know a good deal and will know more, for they have attacked this problem, disruptive of so many homes and so many campfires, in the only way it can be solved. With thermometer, and manometer, with complicated and precise apparatus, with patient and careful and laborious experimentation, they have attacked it.

How much water and how much coffee; should it boil or should it not; should the grounds be precipitated with the white of an egg? All these questions they will be able to answer with authority in time.

IS GLASS A LIQUID?

Scientists think it is a viscous fluid and old age finds it crumbled into glittering dust

IS GLASS a solid? The experts say no. It is a liquid. A very thick, viscous liquid.

It is like a very thick syrup, but still thicker. As every housewife knows, very thick syrup crystallizes when it has stood a long while. That is what happens also to glass when it gets old. When it gets old—very old—the chemicals which are in solution in the viscous glassy liquid crystallize out. The glass, little by little, becomes all crystals. Then it easily crumbles into glittering dust.

Fly with safety, say the sailors, so they fill their balloon with helium. Official photograph U. S. Navy

A MIRACLE OF MELTING

Fusing metal under water is made possible by an amazing little torch

AN ELECTRIC torch which will melt metal under water was used recently in New York to cut out a broken section of a thirty-six-inch water-main at the bottom of the bay.

The difficulty in the devising of such a torch is to find a way to keep the water away from me, mother. No, I won't," said Victoria. Lately her eyes had been troubling her, and when her mother insisted she see a doctor, Victoria had compromised on a clever young specialist she had sat next to at dinner recently. She felt sure she could appeal to his better nature not to make her wear them. Glasses!

Ⓐ Katharine Dayton's Story of the Way of a Man with a Maid—Continued from page 51

When a Girl's Thirty

There was little of the sere and yellow to be noticed about Miss Tory Kent as, an hour later, she swung briskly down Madison Avenue to Dr. Merrick's office. If you could have seen her—tall, dark, slender, the crisp air accentuating the warm rose tints in the dusky olive skin, you would never have imagined that life for her had, at that moment, all the flavor of a bad nut.

Dr. Merrick began by asking Victoria questions and writing her answers on a little card. Was she subject to rheumatism? And then—very courteously—"How old are you, Miss Kent?" It would have been so easy to say twenty-nine! And so nearly true because only yesterday she had been!

"I'm thirty," said Victoria, and in her voice was the sound of earth falling upon a coffin. Hateful snoop!

"It's impossible to tell until you've had the drops in your eyes, Miss Kent," he was saying. "But I don't think you'll need glasses yet, anyway. It's a condition, you know, that is more noticeable as we grow older." Victoria left with these pleasant words ringing in her ears.

SHE JOINED Muriel Tanner at the Bagby concert, and Muriel added her straw.

"Tory, dear," she said, "I've a perfectly wonderful new man for you. One of Dick's best friends."

"What's the catch?" asked Victoria, sceptically. "You know, dear, I've met so many of Dick's friends—"

"He's a widower with one dear little girl, if you call that a 'catch.' Really, Tory, it's about time you woke up to the fact that any man who is a suitable age—"

"And just what age might that be?" interrupted Tory.

"Well, I'm thirty-two this month, so you must be thir—"

"Come on," Tory interrupted. "I'm due at the day nursery meeting at Gertrude Annesley's."

Still pondering the problem she considered the women gathered in the Annesleys' drawing-room. Almost immediately they had resumed the buzz of talk interrupted by her entrance.

"—Said she wanted ten dollars a month more if she made broth for the baby! Think of the nerve, my dear. . . ."

There followed an election of officers. Everyone, apparently, would gladly have been president, but nobody was willing to be secretary, which entailed a considerable amount of work.

"You really ought to take it, Tory," Lisa Stillwell sounded determined. "We are all so tied up with husbands and children and houses—"

There it was again—the good old alibi, reflected Victoria.

"I'm sorry," she said. "I'm going to be too busy this year."

"Tory Kent, you're engaged!" Lisa fairly squealed. Victoria's negative nods were as so much fuel to the flame. "You are—you are!" Lisa insisted.

Victoria's lips framed the words "got to go—tea!" and she made her escape.

"She'll tell the world now, all right," said Victoria, safely in the street, "and how will I explain it? What a fool—what a—oh, Heavens!" For she had just seen—and been seen by, which was more to the point—Mr. Joralemon. Mr. Joralemon was little and fat, with a playful trick of shaking his forefinger roguishly at any marriageable young woman and inquiring cryptically of the world in general, "what the young men were thinking of?"

"I CAN'T bear to hear that today," thought Victoria.

"Little Tory Kent!" beamed the old gentleman. "Dear me, it doesn't seem possible it was—let me see, how long ago was it when you used to sit in my lap? It must be nearly—"

"Oh, all of that," agreed Victoria hastily.

"Ha! Ha! I daren't do it now!" he chuckled fatuously. "Gad, what are the young men thinking of! I declare, if I were a younger man, Tory. . . ." With which facetious threat Mr. Joralemon toddled off. But the Camel's Back had been broken.

"Old idiot!" snapped Victoria aloud—and collided with a tall young man walking rapidly in the opposite direction. "Oh, I beg your pardon! I didn't mean—I mean—why, Jim Brice! Thank goodness it's you and I don't have to explain!"

"But that's exactly what you'll have to do," declared the tall young man, removing his hat. "When I've spent this entire day bemoaning the dulness of life and then a hitherto cruel fate relents and sends me a beautiful young goddess who almost butts me off my feet and calls me an old idiot I insist upon having an explanation. Who's made you mad, Tory?"

"Mr. Joralemon," she laughed. "Tell me, how are Elsie and the baby?"

"Don't try to dodge," he persisted. "Why can't we go and get some tea? Please say you'll come," he pleaded boyishly. "You're the only cheering thing I've seen today!" There was something in his voice and manner that made Victoria look at him in surprise. She had known tall, good-looking, perfectly conventional Jim Brice for as long as she could remember, but always as Elsie Brice's older brother. Certainly she had never noticed him as he was today—impetuous, frankly admiring, sincerely glad of their encounter.

"Cheering!" she repeated, when they were seated in the almost deserted tea-room of the big hotel. "I can't imagine what's cheering about me today!"

"You would if you knew your Gilbert and Sullivan:

When a man's afraid,
A beautiful maid
Is a cheering sight—

"If you wish a literal translation—I'm afraid because I've had a thousand blue devils chasing me all day, and you're the beautiful maid."

"It isn't," said Victoria, considering him gravely, "by any chance your birthday?"

"While hesitating to attribute it wholly to chance," he returned, equally grave, "it is my birthday."

Victoria's hand went out to him impulsively. "Shake," she said solemnly. "It's mine, too—and isn't it hideous?"

"Oh, I wouldn't go so far as that. It's just sort of rotten. You ought not to mind. You're nothing but a kid."

"I'm thirty," said Victoria. But it didn't sound nearly as horrible to her as when she had said it to Dr. Merrick that morning. Sympathy and understanding mingled with the amusement in Jim's eyes. It even sounded rather funny as she told it, especially poor Mr. Joralemon's part.

"But seriously, what shall I do with Lisa? I can explain until I'm blue in the face but she won't believe me! Oh, did you ever hear anything so unutterably silly?"

"It doesn't strike me as silly," said Jim. "I'm thirty-eight today and I hate it, but by tomorrow I'll be busy working and will have forgotten it. With a girl it's different."

"That's what I mean," she interrupted eagerly. "That's why I want to try my hand at decorating."

"With me," he continued, "it's more an annoyance than anything else. I've done well enough, but I want more out of life than I've got."

"Jim Brice," she broke out impulsively. "You're so—nicel!" Why haven't you ever. . . . she stopped.

"Ever what? Married?" he grinned. "The trouble with us is, Tory, we're incurable idealists. You've been waiting for a beautiful knight in nice, shiny armor, and I've been waiting for a second Ninon de l'Enclos. And here I am thirty-eight and still being thrown at the head of everybody's wife's best friend. . . ."

THEY can't be as bad as husbands' best friends," murmured Victoria.

"—And I'm fed up with it! See here," he broke off abruptly. "I have a big idea Tory. We've discovered that we're both looking for the same thing, haven't we? And we both want to go on as we have been a little longer, don't we? Well, what do you say we tell them we're engaged, and then we can do as we like?"

"You're joking, of course," said Victoria, but her eyes danced.

"I never was more serious in my life," he protested. "It's the psychological moment for us, Tory. You can always back out if you're bored. And, by Jove, I've got a job for you, too!" In spite of herself Victoria was caught in the current of his enthusiasm. He was, it appeared, remodeling a house in the East Forties for a client at present in Europe.

"You know the sort of thing," he explained eagerly. "Two old houses thrown into one—stucco, and a little Italian garden at the back. This chap is a friend of mine. He doesn't want a [Continued on page 102]

C We may have most of the world's gold in America, but it is England, which we look upon as poverty-stricken, that is again getting the world's trade

C. Drawn by F. G. Cooper

Poor Little Rich John Bull

By James H. Collins

FORTY-SEVEN million dollars, right in your hand!

A bundle no larger than a Sunday newspaper, for it is made up of several hundred million dollars, said to be the first bonds ever issued in such a large denomination.

They let you hold them only a couple of seconds, down in the deepest vaults of a great Wall Street bank, one bundle out of several hundred million dollars, but that is long enough to conjure up mental pictures. For there, in your hand, you have the luxury, the margin of comfort, the culture and gentility of thousands of British people—noblemen of high estate, solid country families, the bishop, the barrister, the Harley Street specialist, the university professor, the gracious English gentlewoman, and young Britons in school and college.

These million-dollar bonds were sent over by John Bull as security for his first war borrowing in this country. They are secured, in turn, by bonds deposited with the British Government by well-to-do Britons with money invested in enterprises all over the world, yielding the dividends and interest that make possible their standard of living.

However, those bonds all went back to London some months ago, and the smaller bonds behind them, loaned to their government in the war pinch, are back in the strong boxes of the individual investors who lent them.

But the comfortable living standard of the well-to-do British family has not been restored. The value and earning power of pre-war securities have fallen as new securities earning more interest were put upon the market, and the heavy burden of British taxation has shrunk what is left.

Strange things are happening to British people who, before the war, lived in comfort, security and luxury that seemed permanent—the people that we have known for two generations in the pages of novelists from Trollope to Wells. Yesterday, the stock-broker and solicitor helped them with their money affairs. Today, they need the auctioneer's professional services. For they are selling estates, jewels, pictures, books and the nicer things of life, because reduced income and increased taxation make it impossible to keep them. Not even royalty escapes—a few months ago King George sold his yacht. A certain shabbiness has become genteel, and more economical ways of living are seen on every hand.

AND it is not John Bull alone who feels the pinch. For his own comfort, in the old days, he had to make comfort and opportunity for people in other lands. There was a generous margin between his income from world investments and his living expenses. This margin went back into the London money market to be put into new securities—Argentine railroads, East Indian rubber plantations, South African mines, telegraphs, telephones, trolley cars and electrical enterprises in many lands. It is estimated that British investments in other lands amount to about $20,000,000,000, and that approximately $1,000,000,000 interest and dividends used to come back every year to be invested in still more foreign enterprises, and with it a generous slice of the Briton's profits and savings from home enterprises.

"Interest" is a magic word to the Britisher. Where our get-rich-quick sharper assures his victim that a thousand dollars put into his scheme today will return ten thousand tomorrow, the British get-rich-quick specialist—and he is as common over there as he is here—promises so much more interest. One or two percent above the average rate British [Continued on page 104] cut-and-dried 'decorator' because he's marrying an English girl and he wants to bring her back to a house that looks like a home. And that's where you come in. Don't you see?"

[Continued from page 100]

"No, I don't," said Victoria, dreamily. "It sounds too heavenly."

The waiter brought their check. But it was an hour before they reluctantly took their departure.

OF COURSE there was a good deal of explaining to do. Mrs. Kent, after the first surprise, was pleased to hear that her daughter had decided on someone the family had always known.

Lisa Stillwell gave a wonderful dinner-party in their honor.

"It's so absolutely what she's wanted to do for me for years," Victoria confided to Jim on their way home in the taxi.

He had been watching her all evening, her vivid personality flashing against the background of the other women as it had since he had first known her, with the same question in his mind.

"That's not what's worrying me," he answered, a trifle grimly; and added, matter-of-factly, "Hendriks says the painters will be out of the house in a week."

"Oh, good!" she said. "I'm simply dying to get the curtains up. Did you notice those of Lisa's? Ours"—the pronoun was quite unconscious—"will be like that only with French headings."

In the darkness of the taxi Jim smiled at the change in the impatient and imperious Miss Kent, heretofore so scornful of the detailed domestic conversations of her married friends.

For Victoria had plunged into her job with all the pent-up energy that had sought expression for years.

"We've done pretty well, I think," she said, one afternoon, several weeks later, as she stood on a stepladder and surveyed the almost completed living-room. It was Saturday, and she and Jim had lunched together and gone back to the house to work as had become their habit lately.

"I wish you'd get off that ladder and stop talking with tacks in your mouth," he told her. "It's getting too dark to see, anyway, and I want you to come down and hear what I've got to tell you."

With a final adjustment of a recalcitrant curtain pulley she descended and came over to sit beside him on the window seat. She sighed happily as she looked about her. The room already had a charm and character of its own. Jim's words brought her back to earth with a jerk.

"I had a letter from Ralston today. They get back the twenty-first—that's two weeks from today—and he wants the house ready. Can you do it?"

"Jim!" she cried sharply. "Oh, he can't! He mustn't!" Of course she had known the Ralstons would want their house some time, but she hadn't dreamed it would hurt like this. It wasn't their house! It was her house—hers and Jim's!

"You're tired out," Jim said gently, helping her on with her furs. "Let's motor up in the country tomorrow if it's not too cold."

"No. If we only have two weeks more we'll need every minute of it."

Tory was right about the two weeks. They fairly flew by, and as the time grew shorter the little house grew dearer.

"We've simply got to have one meal here, Jim," she told him that night. "I'll get a woman mother has sometimes to cook for us, and we can have dinner, and a fire in the living-room afterwards—a real house-warming." And so they decided it.

FRIDAY afternoon at three o'clock Victoria arrived at the house in her mother's motor, laden with packages. The cook wasn't due until four. The house looked adorable. It seemed so still and peaceful, and yet expectant—as if it were just waiting to be lived in.

"It ought to have been my house!" she thought. She sat at the living-room table and picked up her knitting while waiting for the cook. "This is where I belong—in a home. That's all I know how to do—and it's all I want to do—and now I'll have to make them for other people and never for myself!" Because suddenly she knew she never could make another home without Jim—big, funny, clever Jim, who wanted a Ninon de l'Enclos!

Four o'clock came, but no cook. Half-past four. . . . She inspected the bundles Mrs. Kent's chauffeur had left in the kitchen. Grapefruit—that was easy. Soup—Victoria, slightly hazy as to the component parts of soup, decided to eliminate that. Steak—there was only one thing to be done with steak, thank goodness! Potatoes—string beans—salad. Victoria pulled her green working smock over her dress and pitched in. She had never in her life got a meal unaided. At half-past six Jim let himself in the blue front door. As he opened the door into the kitchen he saw Victoria bending over a small, coal-black object which lay on the floor.

"It's THE st—st—steak!" she said, pointing feebly, and collapsed beside it.

"Tory—darling!" he gasped, bending over and taking her in his arms. "Don't laugh so, dearest—what is it?"

"It's so f-f-funny!" she wailed. "We think we're so s-s-smart and d-d-different, and I'm just like one of those d-d-darn' fool b-bri-d-es—and we might just as well be m-m-married and done with it!"

"Listen to me, dearest," he pleaded. "There aren't any Ralstons—don't you understand? This is your house if you'll only take it! I bought it that day we ran into each other—I didn't know why, and I felt I'd been a fool, but the minute I saw you I knew you were the only person I wanted in it. You're all the color and light and warmth I need in my life and in my house, Tory—and I'll try not to let it be stupid and humdrum for you if you'll only. . . ."

"I love h-h-humdrum!" she laughed and cried against his shoulder. "It's so—so exciting, Jim, with you and c-cooks that don't come, and b-burning steaks, and other people's houses, and. . . open the windows, dearest, so we can breathe!"

The Vienna Workshop in America

Art of the Month—Continued from page 85

The greatest impetus was given to this branch of modern creative effort by the young Secessionists of Austria, who are now working for what has come to be known over all Europe as the Wiener Werkstaette.

This revolutionary enterprise grew out of the gigantic task of designing and decorating the Stocklet House in Brussels—a millionaire nobleman's private marble palace. Josef Hofmann, one of the greatest of modern architects, who had complete charge of the work, established a shop in Vienna for the sole purpose of designing and making the furnishings and decorations for this famous residence. Associated with him in this work were Kolomozer and Gustav Klimt.

Through the compelling personality of Hofmann (whose name coincidentally is the same as that of the great pianist) the influence of this "Vienna Workshop" soon became a vitalizing factor in modern decorative art. Every day at a certain hour Hofmann appeared at the famous Café Kremser, and about him gathered an ever-increasing circle of young art students and révoltés. Here his ideas were disseminated; and in time they spread over all Europe. Recently there has been born a Wiener Werkstaette of America; and many of the finest specimens of this organization's work have been exhibited in New York.

But though Hofmann was the central figure of this new movement, and the "master" of the Café Kremser cénacle, the artist who has had perhaps the widest and most profound influence among all the workers of this distinguished group, is Gustav Klimt, who died two years ago at the age of fifty-six.

Klimt's preëminence rests not alone on the richness of his imagination, nor yet on his amazing technique, but on the very fullness and diversity of his genius. He has achieved a maturity and mastery of expression in several different creative media. Among his best known works are The Kiss and Medizin—the originals of which are in Vienna. The former, which stands fifteen feet high, is familiar to Americans through the numerous reproductions of it.

Klimt's directing genius can be found in the works of such broadly varying artists as Peche, Fräulein Lickards, Hauesler, Joseph Urban and Oscar Strnad. Moreover, his influence has reached to architecture, modeling and metal designing. There is scarcely an important gallery in Europe which does not possess some example of his work.

Gustav Klimt, in fine, holds very much the same position in relation to the modern workers of the decorative and craftsman's realm of art, that Cézanne holds in relation to the workers in the modern school of purely esthetic and experimental painting.

Josh Billings as a Prophet on Tires

YOU may recall what Josh Billings had to say about cats:

"The hardest thing in everyday life iz tew pik out a good kat, not bekause kats are so skase, az bekause they are so plenty."

If this Yankee philosopher of the 70's had been talking about the tire situation today he couldn't have stated the case any better.

* * *

There are 200 or so different brands of cord tires.

A variation of standards up and down the scale hardly duplicated by any other article of human use.

Selling methods have their own variety also. Some dealers encourage the car-owner to buy a tire he doesn't know much about by offering an "inside price" or "wide discount."

Other dealers hold "sales."

These don't satisfy the brass tacks tire user. His habit is to be sure of the quality first. Then when he asks the price he knows how much of his dollar is related to money's worth.

Prices on United States Passenger Car Tires and Tubes, effective May 8th, are not subject to war-tax, the war-tax having been included.

United States Tires
are Good Tires

Copyright
1922
U. S. Tire Co.

All along the way, as U. S. Royal Cords have grown to be the natural leader of the tire business, they have done this for the car-owner—

They have made it easier to select a good cord tire.

First, by getting and using every fundamental advance in the art of cord tire building.

Second, by keeping on the inside of the quality fence all the time.

Third, by becoming the measure of all automobile tires.

So that every tire user has something to compare by when a tire dealer tries to sell him something that he doesn't exactly believe in.

U. S. Royal Cord Tires

United States  Rubber Company

Fifty-three
Factories

The Oldest and Largest
Rubber Organization in the World

Two hundred and thirty-five Branches

Investors Bonds Pay 7% With Safety

YOUR MONEY will earn 7% with safety when placed in INVESTORS BONDS. These bonds are parts of first mortgages on highest grade buildings and land; millions of dollars have been sold without loss.

They are issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000, maturing two to fifteen years. Partial payments starting as low as $10 if desired.

Make your money earn 7% with safety. Write today for interesting and valuable literature, or ask your banker.

Ask for Booklets No. L-124

The INVESTORS
COMPANY

29 South La Salle Street, Chicago

An Attractive Preferred Stock

THE 8% Cumulative Preferred Stock of Standard Gas and Electric Company is non-callable and is listed on the Chicago Stock Exchange. Par value of shares is $50. It may be purchased for cash or on the 10-Payment Plan.

This well-known Preferred Stock is backed by investments in modern, growing properties supplying necessary services for 578 cities and towns with a total population of approximately 2,250,000, in sixteen states. Operated properties have 30,000 home shareholders.

Dividends payable quarterly. Earnings more than twice Preferred Stock dividend requirements. Ask for Circular HM-11

H. M. Bylesby and Co.

208 South La Salle Street, CHICAGO
NEW YORK BOSTON
111 Broadway 14 State St.

Ask Us Before You Buy

Hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of foreign securities and currency have been sold already in the United States. Much more will still be sold as fast as this country is willing to buy. Do YOU buy because you KNOW the securities or because the bond salesman is a good talker. Ask the International Institute of Economics for authentic disinterested expert advice on financial conditions in any country—without charge or obligation.

THE INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF ECONOMICS

119 West 40th Street, New York, N. Y.

Business of the Month

[Continued from page 101]

investors are accustomed to, sounds better and makes a stronger appeal.

Roughly speaking, for every dollar that he puts into home enterprises, John Bull invests three dollars abroad. Out of more than eighteen hundred securities listed on the London stock exchange last year, nearly twelve hundred were foreign, colonial and American investments. In the last normal year before the war, the grand total of home and foreign securities absorbed by London was $2,500,000,000. Three-fourths of it went abroad because, years ago, John Bull found that there was where his luxury and comfort came from. At home, his money earned three to four percent, but in newer lands it earned twice the interest. So, with his money, and his ships, and his trade—not forgetting his diplomacy—he became the most enterprising and daring developer of other people's resources, and London became the supreme banking center of the world.

London now has less money to invest in world projects. And yet it is still the world's banking center. The dollar today stands higher than the pound sterling as international currency. Other countries are turning to Wall Street for money. Yet, despite its handicaps, London has been investing more money since the armistice than it did ten years ago.

WILL New York now become the world's banking center? Since the first British war borrowing here in 1915, more than one American has believed that it would. We have been steadily absorbing the world's gold until we have more than half of it, and John Bull is apparently crippled and out of the game. Others have predicted relentless war between the bankers of London and New York for the world's business through foreign investments.

But there will be no such war. The world has grown, and needs more capital for its development. It must depend chiefly upon British and American capital, say economists, and the burden of financing is so great that each country will welcome a strong partner.

And London will still be the world's banking center—though saying so usually starts an argument.

"Why, look at our natural advantages!" protests the patriotic American. "We have half the world's gold. We are investing more money in other countries right now than London. The dollar is the standard everywhere. We cannot help being the world's banker."

But John Bull has natural advantages, too. And something better—natural disadvantages. London is no longer the world's banking center in the sense of being the only one. Yet it will be the chief center, no matter how our own world investments grow. London has the advantages of banking organization and connections. It has the experience, and, most of all, the international viewpoint. We have more money now, but John Bull has already recovered so far that he has cheaper money, and as things grow more normal, will be able to lend at more reasonable rates.

Back of his banking organization are investors who, for a hundred years or more, have been purchasing foreign securities,

Things You Want to Know About Investments

If you are interested in investments the financial department of Hearst's International offers you a careful selection of authoritative booklets published by leading financial institutions. They contain information of value to the investor—the man who believes in making his money work. Any of the booklets listed will be sent on request without cost. Here are a few of them.

State which ones you want and address:

FINANCIAL DEPARTMENT,
HEARST'S INTERNATIONAL,
119 W. 40th St., New York

Foreign Investments

Chilian Codulas—8% Bonds Redmond & Co.
Mexican Securities Jerome B. Sullivan & Co.

Bank & Trust Co. Literature

Shawmut Service The Nat'l Shawmut Bank
Travel Suggestions The Equitable Trust Co. of N. Y.
Trust Service for Corporations Guaranty Trust Co. of N. Y.

Public Utility Securities, etc.

Bonds as Safe as Our Cities Wm. R. Compton Co.
Foundation Investments H. M. Bylesby & Co.
The Giant Energy—Electricity The National City Co.
Time-Tested Underlying Railroad Bonds, 5% to 10% F. J. Lisman & Co.
Electricity in Industry Bonbright & Co.

Real Estate, etc., Mortgages

Building with Bonds American Bond & Mortgage Co.
Caldwell First Mortgage Bonds, Caldwell & Co.
How Henry Wilkinson Became Rich G. L. Miller & Co.
Investors Bonds The Investors Co.
Washington, the Heart of America The F. H. Smith Co.

Partial Payment Plans—Thrift

$80,000 in 25 Years R. J. McClelland & Co.
The Partial Payment Plan John Muir & Co.
A Practical Method for Buying Stocks & Bonds on Monthly Payments. James M. Leopold & Co.
Ten Payment Plan H. M. Bylesby & Co.

General Investment Subjects

Suggestions for Conservative Investments Lee, Higginson & Co.
Non Callable Bonds Hornblower & Weeks
Bylesby Monthly News H. M. Bylesby & Co.
Bonds for July Investment Merrill, Lynch & Co.
Getting the Most from Your Money Babson's Statistical Organization
Guaranteed Bonds, The Prudence Co., Inc.
Investment Bulletin Henry L. Doherty & Co.
Investment Recommendations Guaranty Company of N. Y.
Investment Securities Kidder, Peabody & Co.
Investment Securities The National City Co.
Water Power—The Greatest of Our Natural Resources Spencer Trask & Co.
The Investor's Pocket Manual The Financial Press
The Baltimore & Ohio Situation Rutter & Co.
The New South's Message to the Conservative Investor Caldwell & Co.

A 100-YEAR RECORD

One hundred years prompt payment of interest and principal on all its government and municipal bonds, is the record of only one country in either North or South America.

LAND BANK BONDS 7%

Real Estate Mortgage Bonds, issued by a bank owned by the government mentioned above, can be obtained to yield over 7%.

ASK FOR H-53

R. J. McClelland & Co.

Investment Securities

60 Broadway

New York

DIAMONDS

FOR A FEW CENTS A DAY

Don't send a single penny. Ten days Free Trial. When the ring comes, examine it—if you are not convinced it is the Greatest Bargain in America, send it back at our expense. Only if pleased, send $1.50 weekly—at the rate of a few cents a day. This Bargain Cluster Ring with 7 Blue-White Perfect Cut Diamonds can be yours. No Red Tape. No Risk.

Million Dollar Bargain Book FREE Send for it today. It pictures thousands of Bargains. Address Dept. 1406

J.M. LYON & CO.
2-4 Maiden Lane N.Y.

Free Information about Boarding Schools

MAKE certain that the high ideals which have been inculcated in your growing boy or girl will find room for sympathetic development in the school you choose.

The representatives of the Harper's Bazar School Department have personally visited practically every worth while school in the country. They have helped thousands of parents and more mature students to find the right school. Their experience and knowledge is at your disposal without cost or obligation. Simply state your problem in a letter and send it to

Kenneth N. Chambers, Director

HARPER'S BAZAR SCHOOL BUREAU

119 West 40th Street, New York City

whereas such securities are still regarded with suspicion by many American investors who refuse to judge them by the same standards applied to domestic securities. And John Bull honestly sells his money, soliciting the foreign borrower's business, whereas some of our bankers still make the mistake of treating the borrower as though he were the salesman.

On top of that, John Bull is working under the pressure of his natural disadvantages, and when your competitor is doing that, look out!

About a year ago, when the British Government was still spending money extravagantly, and British business men were talking about the prosperity that must come out of the world's hunger for commodities, a courageous executive of the North Country, Arthur Balfour, master cutler of Sheffield, began talking plainly:

"A MAN may be hungry for food and clothes, and yet be unable to get either. Hunger doesn't buy. Let us stop talking about a hungry world, and instead talk of a beggared world. Until the world is on its feet, we in this country must sweat blood. It must be such economy as no official at the Treasury has ever visualized. Luxury must be crushed, waste must be extirpated, the whole nation must take the vow of poverty.

"Our industrial greatness rests absolutely on three things—the moral character of the British people, the confidence of the banker in British solvency, and the industry of the people. No patches can avail us. No economic hocus-pocus can get us out of the ditch. There is only one way out of poverty—it is work. We have got to work as we never worked before. We have got to produce wealth, and we can only produce wealth by half-starving ourselves while we work. The most rigid economy must go side by side with tremendous industry. There is a knocking at our door, and the figure that stands there is Lazarus."

Shortly after, John Bull made drastic reductions in government expenses, and just the other day the British income tax was cut from six shillings in the pound to five. British business, facing the facts, no longer waits for orders from beggared customers, but is going out to put them on their feet, through loans that enable them to restore their industrial and transportation systems, buy or produce raw materials, and earn money with which to buy the British products that they need.

What natural disadvantages will do for people who tackle them courageously is shown in one of John Bull's own industries—shipbuilding on the Clyde. This Scotch river is little more than a ditch—so narrow that a ship can only be launched parallel with the stream, and then with control devices to stop it in two or three ship lengths. Almost the last place in the world to start shipbuilding. But through sheer skill and pluck in overcoming disadvantages, Clyde shipbuilding has been made the greatest industry of its particular kind in the world.

If we regard John Bull as a competitor in our new world banking, that is the sort of competitor he is going to be. Actually, we have set up in a department of banking new to us, but old to him. So, instead of becoming our competitor, he is much more likely to be our teacher.

Helping nature heal a wound

LISTERINE functions in a most interesting way in guarding against infection.

Even many persons who have trusted this safe and efficient antiseptic for many years do not know just why it has so justly merited its steadily growing popularity. Here is the reason:

Listerine is composed of antiseptic oils and essences, scientifically combined with a saturated solution of boric acid—one of the most healing agents known to medicine.

Thus Listerine applied to a cut, scratch, burn or abrasion has a two-fold antiseptic effect: first the liquid, itself, halts infection; then upon evaporation, it leaves a film of pure boric acid which protects the wound while nature heals.

Its action is safe and sure. It is strong enough in its antiseptic properties to combat bacterial development. Yet it is not so strong as to injure even the most delicate tissue.

There's a lot of satisfaction in knowing your antiseptic does its work safely.

To guard against sore throat

Every one knows that many illnesses start with sore throat. The mouth is an open door to disease germs.

Listerine is ideally efficient in warding off troubles of this sort and the more serious ills that so often follow. Try it as a gargle the next time you feel your throat becoming sensitive. See how quickly it relieves you.

And best of all you know you are using an antiseptic that is absolutely safe.

Read the booklet packed with every bottle of Listerine. It suggests many other uses to which Listerine may be put.—Lambert Pharmacal Co. Saint Louis, U. S. A.

Don't take chances with sore throat.

LISTERINE
—the safe antiseptic

Upton Sinclair's Striking Novel of the Second Coming—Continued from page 44

They Call Me Carpenter

is coming, the horrors of class war are upon you, ruin and destruction are at hand! Your towers of pride shall fall, your own children shall destroy you because you knew not the time for justice when it came."

The doors of the jail opened again, and three or four policemen came out, with clubs in their hands. "Get along, now!" they said roughly, and began poking the prophet and his disciples in the back; they poked them down the stairs and along the street for a block or so—until they were sure the ears of the jail inmates would no longer be troubled by offensive sounds. But still they did not arrest them, and I marveled, wondering how long it could go on. I had an uneasy feeling that the longer the climax was postponed, the more severe it would be.

There was quite a crowd following us now, hoping that something sensational would happen. We started to walk again, and came to Main Street, which in our city is given up to ten-cent picture shows, and old-clothes shops. A block or so distant we saw a mass of people, and something warned me—my heart sank into my boots. Another mob!

There was shouting, and people running from every direction. The throng would surge back, and a few run from it. "What's the matter?" I cried to one of these, and the answer was, "the Brigade is cleaning out the reds!" Comrade Abell, who knew the neighborhood, exclaimed in dismay. "It's Erman's Book Store! Erman told me last week he'd been warned to stop selling the Liberator!"

Now, I don't know whether or not Carpenter had ever heard of this radical monthly. But he knew that here was a mob, and people in trouble, and he shook off the hands that sought to restrain him, and pushed his way into the throng, which gave way before him, either from respect or from curiosity. I learned later that some of the mob had dragged the book-seller and his two clerks out by the rear entrance, and were beating them pretty severely. But fortunately Carpenter did not see this. All he saw were a dozen or so men carrying armfuls of magazines and books out into a little square. They were dumping the stuff into a pile, and a man with a five-gallon can was engaged in pouring kerosene over it.

"My friend," said Carpenter, "what is this that you do?"

The other turned upon him and stared. "What the hell you got to do with it? Get out of the way there!" And to emphasize his words he slopped a jet of kerosene over the prophet's robes.

Said Carpenter: "Are you one that should be set to judge books? Have you read these that you are about to destroy?" And as the other, paying no attention, knelt down to strike a match and light the pyre, he cried, in a louder voice: "Behold, the beast has been let loose in your heart, and he ravens within!"

"One of these damned pacifists, eh?" cried the man, and he dropped his matches and sprang up with fists clenched. Carpenter faced him without flinching; there was something so majestic about him, the man did not strike him, he merely put his spread hand against the prophet's chest and shoved him violently. "Get back out of the way!"

I well knew the risk I was taking, but I could not refrain. "Now, look here, buddy!" I began; and he whirled upon me. "You one of them, too?"

"I belong to the Brigade," I told him quickly.

"Oh, ho! Well, pitch in here, and help carry out this bloody Arnychist literature!"

I WAS about to answer, but Carpenter's voice rang out again.

"Shall ye be wolves, or shall ye be men? That is the choice, and ye have chosen wolfhood. The blood of your brothers is upon your hands, and murder is in your hearts."

There were a dozen men within sound of this discourse, and I judged they would not stand much of it. Suddenly one of them began to chant; and the rest took it up, half-laughing, half-shouting:

Rough! Tough!

We're the stuff!

We want to fight and we can't get enough!

The crowd joined in, and the words of the prophet were completely drowned out. A moment later I heard a gruff voice behind me. "Make way here!" There came a policeman, shoving through. "What's all this about?"

The fellow with the kerosene can spoke up: "Here's this damned Arnychist prophet been incitin' the crowd and preachin' sedition! You better take him along."

It seemed ludicrous when I looked back upon it; though at the moment I did not appreciate the funny side. Here was a group of men engaged in raiding a book-store, beating up the proprietor and his clerks, and burning a thousand dollars' worth of books and magazines on the public street; but the policeman did not see a bit of that, he had no idea that any such thing was happening! All he saw was a prophet, in a white nightgown dripping with kerosene. He took him firmly by the arm, saying, "Come along now, we've had enough of this, and started to march him down the street."

"Take me, too!" cried Moneta, the Mexican, beside himself with excitement; and the policeman grabbed him with the other hand, and the three set out.

I NO LONGER had any impulse to interfere. In truth, I was glad to see the policeman, considering that his worst might be better than the mob's best. About half the crowd followed us.

When we came to the station house the officer pushed Carpenter through the door, and bade the rest of us keep out.

"I'm a practicing attorney," said Abell, "and I represent the man you have arrested. I presume I have a right to enter."

"And I am a prospective bondsman," I stated, with sudden inspiration. "So let me in also."

We entered, and the policeman led his prisoner to the sergeant at the desk. The latter asked what the charge was, and was told, "disturbing the peace and blocking the traffic."

"Now, sergeant," said I, "this is preposterous. All this prisoner did was to try to stop a mob from destroying private property."

"You can tell all that to the magistrate in the morning," said the sergeant.

"What is the bail?" I demanded.

"You are prepared to put up bail?"

I answered that I was; and then for the first time Carpenter spoke. "You mean you wish to pay money to secure my release? Oh, no. Let there be no money paid for me."

"Let me explain, Mr. Carpenter," I pleaded. "You will accomplish nothing by spending the night in a police cell. You will have no opportunity to talk with the prisoners."

He answered, "My Father will be with me." And gazing into the face of the sergeant, he demanded, "Do you think you can build a cell to which my Father cannot come?"

The officer was an old hand, with a fringe of gray hair around his bald head, and no doubt he had been asked many queer questions in his day. His response was to inquire the prisoner's name; and when the prisoner kept haughty silence, he wrote down John Doe Carpenter, and proceeded: "Where do you live?"

Said Carpenter: "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but he that espouses the cause of justice has no home in a world of greed."

So the sergeant wrote: No address.

He nodded to a jailer, who took the prophet by the arm and led him away.

Abell and I went outside and joined the rest of the group. None of us knew just what to do—with the exception of Everett, who sat on the steps with his note-book, and made me repeat to him word for word what Carpenter had said!

COMRADE Abell told us where the police court was located, and we agreed to be there at nine o'clock next morning. Then I parted from the rest, and walked until I met a taxi and drove home.

I felt desolate and forlorn. Nothing in my life had any interest for me. This was the afternoon when I usually went to the athletic club to box; but now I found myself wondering, what would Carpenter say to such imitation fighting? I decided I would stay by myself for a while, and take a walk and think things over. I had been dissatisfied with my life for a long time; the glamour had begun to wear off the excitements of youth, and I had begun to suspect that my life was idle and vain. Now I knew that it was; and also I knew that the world was a place of torment and of woe.

I returned home in the afternoon, and a few minutes afterwards my telephone rang, and I discovered that somebody else was dissatisfied with life.

"Hello, Billy," said the voice of T-S. "I see dat feller Carpenter is in jail. Vy don't you bail him out?"

"He won't let me," I said.

"Vell, maybe it might be a good t'ing to leave him in jail a week, till dis Brigade convention gits over."

"Funny!" said I. "I had the same idea!"

"Listen," continued the other. "I been feelin' awful bad because I told dem fellers I didn't know him. D' you suppose he knows I said dat, Billy?"

"Well," said I, "he knew you were going to say it, so probably he knows you said it."

"Vell," said T-S, "maybe you laugh at me, but I been t'inkin' I tell dem fellows to go to hell."

"What fellows?"

"De whole damn' world! Billy, I like dat feller Carpenter! I never met a feller like him before. You t'ink he would let me go to see him in de jail?"

"I'm sure he'd be glad to see you," I said; "if the jailers didn't object."

"Sure, I fix de jailers all right!"

"But T-S," I added, "I don't believe he'll sign any contract."

"CONTRACT nuttin'," said T-S. "I shoost vant to see him, Billy. Is dere anyt'ing I could do fer him?"

I thought for a moment; then I said: "You might do something for one of his friends, and that's young Everett. He got pretty badly hurt, and he's sticking at the job of taking down all Carpenter's speeches. He ought to have a surgeon, and also a first-class stenographer to take turns with him. Have you got another man like him?"

"I dunno," said T-S. "You don't find a young feller like Matt Everett every day."

I started. "What do you say is his name, T-S?"

"Matthew," said T-S. "Vy you ask?"

"Nothing," said I; "just a coincidence!"

Our conversation ended with the remark by T-S that he would call up the station-house and arrange to see Carpenter. Five minutes later the telephone rang again, and I heard the magnate's voice: "Billy, dey say he's been bailed out!"

"What?" I cried. "He declared he wouldn't have it done."

"Somebody done it vitout askin' him! De money vas paid, and dey turned him out," answered T-S!

"Who did it?"

"Guess!"

"You mean it was you?"

"I wouldn't 'a' dared. I only shoost found out about it. Mary Magna done it, and she's took him avay somever."

"Good Lord!" I exclaimed; and before my mind's eye flashed another headline:

FAIR FILM STAR FREES LOVE-CULT PROPHET.

Can the movie queen save Carpenter? Or, more important, will he permit himself to be saved? The forces of intolerance cry for the life of this Figure from the Stained-glass Window whose ideals seem so strange in these times. Upton Sinclair's novel reaches a startling climax in the concluding instalment. See Hearst's International for October.

School Days

When you say, "Now study hard," give him an

EVERSHARP

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

You cannot guide his hand, but you can put an EVERSHARP in it—for good marks. EVERSHARP itself is a wonderful example of efficiency. Perfect in operation; dependable, it is made with precision and assembled in a space no larger than an ordinary lead pencil. The exclusive EVERSHARP rifled tip makes EVERSHARP supreme in writing ability. No other pencil can have this rifled tip that keeps the lead from slipping. Priced from 50c to $50, in gold, silver and enamel, and with hold-fast clip for pocket, or ring for chain.

When you say, "Do write home regularly," give her a

WAHL PEN

You know yourself that the desire to keep on writing is strongest when the words flow smoothly from the pen, without blot or sputter. Put a WAHL PEN in her hand and each letter will prove that easy, smooth writing is a matter of pen perfection. The everlasting all-metal barrel holds more ink, prevents leaking, will not crack like hard rubber, and may be had in designs to match EVERSHARP. Sold with clip or with ring for suspending from ribbon or chain, as is the fashion nowadays. Priced as low as $4. Unequaled in durability and attractiveness.

Made in U. S. A. by THE WAHL COMPANY, CHICAGO
Canadian Factory, THE WAHL COMPANY, LTD., Toronto

❧ The Philosophy of a Man Who Worked With His Hands to Lead Men—Continued from page 84

A Coal Miner's Life

the third reader course. It began in the fourth reader. I used to borrow that older reading book and take it home over the week-end.

Later, my father and I went to another camp for work. It was overcrowded, with a slow turn, and pay delayed. So we tried again. This time, it was night work in a heading. We could not pay the $5 for a wagon to move the family. So I, a boy not quite fourteen, walked six miles to work each evening, worked all night in the pit, and walked back six miles in the morning. I slept through the day. It was too hard, and we cashed in on some of the money owed us at the first place, and moved to a farmhouse near this mine. We worked there a few weeks. The place went to the dip, got wet, and the steep grade made the cars too hard to push.

Then on again to another camp, where a couple moved in who had a case of books. I read for months out of their bookcase—Stanley's African Travels, Livingstone, Rider Haggard.

I was small, but compact and set, and could do a man's work at sixteen. Just because I did not grow rapidly, I could do more than those youngsters who became larger men.

THE UNION had not yet grown into my life. In the year 1902, I followed the anthracite strike in the Philadelphia North American, especially the hearings before the Anthracite Coal Commission. The manner in which John Mitchell presented the miners' case was a source of gratification to me, and one of the incidents is still fresh in my memory. When he was questioned on the miners' earnings, and the point was made to him:

"They don't work every day."

He replied:

"But they live every day."

That idealized Mitchell for me as the leader of labor: with that answer, he had knocked them out.

I began to get the idea that there were books. I read Macaulay's England, and Justin McCarthy's History of Our Own Times. In the Sears and Roebuck catalog, I found descriptions of books for sale, and read about the books I could not buy.

In Greenwich, the mines were newly opening up and a company town was building. To Greenwich we moved. I joined the local union, and became secretary. This opened a new field. I discovered there were a Mine Workers' Journal, a record of membership, a national and a district and a sub-district organization, with the hierarchy of officers, and the network of locals. I began then to find out what organization is. Later I served nine months as the Greenwich checkweighman. On that job I read Lloyd's Wealth Against Commonwealth, Richard Ely on the labor movement, Henry George's Progress and Poverty, and then nearly all of George.

Then came the 1906 strike, lasting three months. This was my first strike. The operators tried to scab the mine where my father and I had been working. There were 400 miners in the town, and about 200 houses. The operators evicted some of our people. So we started a tent colony. The mine guards built a tight board fence around company property and ran a special train of scabs into the Greenwich station—the first and only passenger train I ever saw on that line. They ran it to the place where they had evicted our people. The scabs were foreigners who stood there confused.

I was secretary of the local union. Two or three of us marched into the crowd of scabs, and got fifteen or twenty of them out. I led the procession of scabs past the company office, and the company store, past the boss and his clerks. I marched the crowd over to Germantown, and was proud that I did not lose one of them. We gave them dinner and shipped them out. Strike conditions were not too bad. Some of the evictions were in the rain, but mostly the weather was good. Some of the deputies strode round with big guns in the holster. But there was little violence.

In this same year, I became a citizen of the United States. My father had not taken out his naturalization papers.

When the strike was over, the boss gave my father and me a place with a bad roof and hard conditions. This was a way of getting rid of us.

"Let's go West, and see what we can do," said my father. With $120 we started on a blind lead to Southern Illinois. Then came word that the children in Pennsylvania were sick. Back we came, and moved the family to Nant-Y-Glo.

These experiences at Greenwich and Nant-Y-Glo covered five years, and all the time I was reading. Then I took a notion I wanted a change and went out to Iowa, and from there to Michigan.

I spent the next three years in Bay City, Michigan. It was a beautiful place to me who had just come in from mining camps. We rode to work by train, reading, playing poker and seven-up, and talking. Conditions were pleasant. I went on the mine committee, and became president of the local union.

UNTIL then, I had the idea it was a waste of time to read anything but economics and history. But some reading lists of the Socialist Labor Party got me away from that, because they emphasized good literature, and I read Dickens, and Carlyle's French Revolution. I learned the use of encyclopedias. I spent hours in the library, going over titles, recognizing them from study of book catalogs, especially those lists in Sears-Roebuck.

In summer when the mines were closed, I worked as a general laborer on railroad crane work; and another season in a wooden box factory.

Solon DeLeon, son of the S. L. P. pioneer, came to Bay City, and we met. We decided to hold a soap-box meeting at the gate of the crane works.

"They will spot you," he said, "and you'll lose your job."

"My time out here is up," I answered.

I returned to Pennsylvania, a marked man because of my old record in the union. How to get a job was the problem. But my father succeeded in getting me in at the Springfield Mine in Nant-Y-Glo. I was elected checkweighman, and served on the tippie for three years, till elected president of District Two in 1916. This office I have held since then.

IN DISTRICT TWO, there is a successful cooperative movement, with over twenty stores, and a central association, conducted by T. D. Stiles. We have a paper, the Penn Central News, devoted to labor and cooperation, and controlled by the cooperative movement and the United Mine Workers. Our organization has authorized careful investigations into car-pushing, workers' compensation, and conditions in the non-union fields.

Two years ago, we began the campaign for the Miners' Program. It is a campaign of education by pamphleteering, workers' education, labor press, and labor research. We miners are Americans, and have respect for American institutions. We hope to bring changes about in the American way, in the way that is provided for under our Constitution, in accordance with law.

I believe in the necessity for organization. Organization is the opportunity and the way of doing things. It is not a piece of machinery, but a group of human beings with a common purpose.

Some men with ideas of a better social order have tried to work alone or in small groups outside the union. But always the problem has been for me, How can these ideas function in organization? I have slowly worked out the adjustment between progressive ideas and trade unionism in order not to make the absolute break. I reserve the right of mental freedom inside the organization. But I do not forget that the union is the way of service in the mining community. What family and friends are, the Union is. A man's philosophy is his suffering. The Union is the answer to human fear and loneliness. It is the cure of distress and wrongs.

Even today non-union towns are towns of fear. Non-union miners are afraid of the boss, spies and spotters, gunmen and coal-and-iron police. They fear the blacklist on their job and eviction from their home. They are afraid to tell the boss what wages they want, and afraid to demand pay for dead work. They do not dare to ask for a checkweighman to weigh their coal, nor to trade at the cheapest store, nor to meet and discuss their problems as free Americans.

But in a union community, after a year of privation, men will give up their meager job to save the union. What is it that makes a union indestructible? It isn't wages and hours alone. It is that union men are free men. Union towns are free towns. Union miners have the right of free speech, free assembly, collective bargaining, a checkweighman, the right to trade and live and act as they please. Organization brings freedom. For that, once it has been won, men will starve, fight and die.

That Coupon puts $10 in your Pocket and brings a Camera that lasts a Lifetime ~ if you mail it before September 30th

Description

Features that Make You Proud of a Seneca Model 120 No. 1 Sagamore

It has an Anastigmat Lens, F:7.5, Snapshot speeds and a Special Automatic Shutter with speed graduation from 1/10 to 1/100th part of a second—plus time and bulb exposures. It has a Focusing Lever and a Rising and Falling Front. Its pictures are the ideal size—2¼ x 3¼. When folded it is only 6½ high, 3 wide and 1¼ thick — convenient to slip in your pocket. The covering is of genuine leather, giving the camera a durable and smart appearance.

And it costs only $20 when bought with the coupon, during September.

SENECA CAMERA MFG. COMPANY
Rochester, New York

Makers of Good Cameras for 25 Years

AFTER that—midnight, September 30, 1922, this camera alone would cost you $30, if you were President of the United States.

This Company, which is one of the largest in the world, and has been making guaranteed cameras in Rochester for 25 years, makes this special offer to readers of this magazine for advertising purposes during September. The regular price of the Seneca, Model 120, No. 1 Sagamore is $30. With the coupon below it is $20—and you get two rolls of film, free.

Now read the description. Then ask any camera expert or dealer if you can get such a camera anywhere for less than $30.

We guarantee that, with ordinarily good handling, it will take accurate pictures of any subject in any light. This is due to the F: 7.5 Anastigmat Lens and Special Speed Shutter. It will take accurate photographs from which you can make enlargements to please the keenest critic.

You Take No Risk

The manufacturer and this magazine protect you in every way. We guarantee satisfaction. Clip that coupon. Present it with $20 to a Seneca dealer. Or mail both to us. The camera will come to you as fast as Uncle Sam can carry it. Try it for 10 days. Take all kinds of pictures. If they do not suit you and your friends return the camera only. Your money will be refunded by return mail and we will pay transportation, both ways. You keep the film.

But you'll keep the camera. Its pictures will make you proud of your vacation album. Now, take out your pen—pencil will do—and fill in that coupon. Clip and mail it today. Don't let September 30th slip by you.

COUPON

SENECA CAMERA MFG. COMPANY,
Rochester, N. Y.
(Or any Authorized Seneca Dealer)

Enclosed find $20 for which you will please send me a $30 Seneca Model 120, No. 1 Sagamore Camera. The understanding being that if I do not find this camera satisfactory within 10 days I may return it and you will return the price, plus transportation charges, both ways.

Name.....

Address.....

TO RECOGNIZED SENECA DEALERS: The coupon above, properly filled in by your customers before September 30th, will be recognized by us as $10 payments on $30 Model 120, No. 1 Sagamore.

Emma-Lindsay Squier's Story of the Feud that Knew No End—Continued from page 69

The Last Man Child

her voice was rising to shrillness now, "that when she had her mammy, she didn't want her. Now git out'n here afore I shoot you for the thieving dog you are!"

Young Abel's face went grim and hard as her own, and he looked at her a moment in silence. It was a blasting, blazing look, full of hatred and contempt.

"Woman," he said finally, "some day, my son is goin' to be grown up, an' he's goin' to know what kind of people the Beardslys are, how they deny their own kin in time of need."

The girl Florrie heard young Abel's step in the outer room of the cabin. She listened for another footstep, and half thought to see behind him, as he stood in the doorway, the familiar figure of her mother, and to hear the well-known voice saying, "Florrie, my girl!"

But only Abel stood in the doorway. And in his face she read defeat.

"She wouldn't come," he said as if with difficulty. "She——" he paused, wishing to spare her the sorrow of her mother's cold refusal.

"All right," she said briefly, "I don't mind," and turned her face to the wall.

That night young Abel went out and rebuilt the fence, so that the bubbling pool of water lay securely on his own land. He did not tell Florrie what he had done, but she knew, for she heard the far sound of his axe in the woods. And she held her baby closer to her breast.

But for a month there was quiet. Then one morning he came to Florrie and his face was white.

"The skunks—the dirty beasts—they've poisoned the water in the stone cup—Roger drank it and it killed him—Damn them! I'll have their blood for it——"

Florrie could think of no words to comfort him. But when he reached for the rifle behind the door of the cabin, she sprang for it, thrust it behind her, and stood before him defying him for the first time of their married life.

"No—no——" she breathed, "you cain't do that, Abel, you mustn't kill for the sake of a horse——"

He made an inarticulate sound, and seized her by the shoulders with his strong, brown hands. He hurt her, but her muscles almost as hard as his own, tensed under the grip, and she did not flinch.

"You mustn't, Abel, not because they're my kinfolks, but because it's wrong t' kill, and you got me and the baby t' think of. They ain't worth it. Abel, please, for my sake, because you love me—don't take the gun. You kin get it away from me, but you'll have t' fight me."

HE STOOD, breathing hard, his hands still clenching her shoulders.

"You-all are hurtin' me, Abel," she said quietly and he dropped his hands. Then, without a word, he went out of the door, down through the meadow, and across the grain fields to the spring. He stumbled again and again, for he was drunk with bitterness and lust of vengeance.

"Damn them! Damn them!" he was saying over and over. His mind was a seething blank of red passion. He lurched against a fallen log, and then he saw them.

They were there, the elder Beardsly, and Lem, the boy. They were on the other side of the brush fence, their axes in their hands, and they were grinning at him, sardonically.

What happened then he did not clearly remember. He heard himself cry out, hoarsely, felt his body tearing through the gap in the brush fence, saw the gleam of the elder Beardsly's axe as it whirled in his hand. He caught at the wrist, and suddenly the axe was in his own hand. He felt himself assailed by heavy bodies, he shook himself free, his axe flashed high above his head—once—twice—

Florrie had been waiting a long time in the little cabin. When at last she heard his step upon the threshold, it was as if an icy finger had touched her heart and stopped its beating. For he stood there waxen faced, disheveled, with torn clothing and a great red gash across his shoulder.

"Florrie," he said thickly, "help me hitch the team. I'm goin' int' Spinneytown t' give myself up. I've killed yore pap and yore brother."

The trial of young Abel Owens still remains a tragic epic of Linden County. For there in the court room sat Amanda Beardsly, with her child staring wonderingly at the ring of strange faces about him. Her face had the grim hardness of chiseled rock, and her eyes were tearless as if sorrow had drained them dry.

ACROSS the sun-heated room sat Florrie Owens close beside young Abel, her husband, and she held in her arms the two-months-old baby whose coming had been such a joy and such a sorrow. And sometimes she looked across the room at her mother, the mother who was trying to send her husband to death. The older woman never looked at her. And it was only when the attorney for the prosecution made a clever, damning stab at young Abel's character, that she relaxed for the moment.

It was a simple enough trial as trials go. There was nothing to establish except the degree of young Abel's guilt. That he had killed the two Beardslys, he had confessed. How he did it, he hardly knew. They had lunged for him first, he thought—he was not sure.

Florrie had procured for her husband's defense the ablest lawyer in Linden County. There was a little ready money on hand, and the farm could be mortgaged. He had led her to think that a verdict of self-defense might be won, thus securing her husband's acquittal.

But somehow it had not turned out so. His questions, indeed, to young Abel, had brought out clearly the fact that he, and not the two Beardslys had made the first advance in that battle of death. The jury at the fifth day of the trial, brought in a verdict of manslaughter and young Abel was sentenced to ten years imprisonment.

For the first time in her life, the girl Florrie fainted. Young Abel stood silently, his head bowed, and they let him go to his wife and hold her unconscious form in his arms. Amanda Beardsly left the court room without ever looking behind her, holding in her arms the man child who was to carry on the hatred for those of the Owens clan.

The ablest lawyer in Linden County promptly appealed the case, and the appeal was granted. More money was required, and for the second time the Owens farm was mortgaged.

To Amanda Beardsly a lean, rat-eyed lawyer came, offering his services—at a price. It would be an easy matter, with added legal assistance, to convict Abel once and for all.

She assented dully to everything he said, her mind warped and corroded with hatred. She mortgaged the Beardsly farm to pay the fee he asked.

Ten years was the toll the law exacted from young Abel's life for the two lives he had taken, and on a hot, dusty day in July, he went to prison.

WHEN they took him away, Florrie did not cry. She watched the train until it was only a black dot on the converging lines of steel. She was unconscious of the stifling heat, even of the baby that stirred against her, fretfully. She only knew that her man was gone.

Florrie did not go back to the farm. She stayed on in Spinneytown, where she could work and earn money to send Abel the things he would like. The work she found was not pleasant. It was in the kitchen of a restaurant washing dishes. As time slipped by, the mortgage was foreclosed.

Amanda Beardsly, too, stayed in Spinneytown. She worked in a laundry. She had lost her fierceness, somehow. She was just a shrunken old woman who each day pushed her waning strength far beyond its limits.

Then one night, the door of her small room opened and Florrie stood there, holding her baby in her arms.

"Abel's—dead." She said jerkily.

Then Amanda Beardsly spoke, voicing the old hatred of the clan.

"One less Owens in the world."

Florrie nodded.

"Yes, he's dead. That leaves just us—just me and you—an' our children."

The older woman stirred uneasily.

"Well?" she said, harshly, "what are you here for?"

"Today," Florrie answered, "I passed you in the grocery store; and I heerd you sayin' to Buddy, 'thar goes a woman of the Owens clan, with an Owens brat in her arms. They're pizen, the whole tribe of 'em, and you're always to hate 'em.' After all the sufferin' this here feud has brought both of us, yo're goin' t' rear yore boy in hate of me and mine?"

"In hate of all Owensens, an' all that they stand fer," answered the other.

Suddenly Florrie laughed. It was not a real laugh, and in spite of herself the older woman shuddered. Then as suddenly she became quiet, and coming to the table, laid her baby upon it. She turned upon Amanda Beardsly, and spoke rapidly, in a high cracked voice, that sounded hysterical. "You're a fool—a fool—a fool!" she said, monotonously. "Don't you see what has happened? We're caught—all of us, in a web of hate. It has got us all. It got yore kinfolks, it got Abel's, it got Pap and Lem. It killed my man. It has made a broken woman of you, it has made me old before my time. And for it, we have—what? Jest nothing. Who has yore farm, tell me that! Tell me that, will you?" Her voice rose shrilly and insistently. "That's what has happened to us—we've got nothing, nothing—you an' me, only our children—well, what of them? Are they goin' t' be caught too in this here family hate? Are they, I say?"

THE OLDER woman moistened her lips. She had been thinking, vaguely, of some of the things that Florrie had spoken of. Sometimes she had almost realized—but now she closed her mouth grimly.

"My son is a Beardsly, your'n is an Owens. That's my answer."

The girl Florrie put her hand into the bosom of her dress.

"That's yore answer, is it? Well, then, this is mine. Your son ain't never goin' to hate me, because—" her hand came out with an ugly bladed knife—"I'll put my baby out o' the way first, out o' the way of hate—there'll be one less Owens t' suffer from hate—"

Her arm rose. But before it could fall, the older woman had leaped for it, had checked the downward swooping steel. There was a moment's struggle, when they swayed to and fro, with sharp hisses of breath. Buddy screamed aloud and hid his face against the wall.

It was only a moment. For suddenly Florrie's face went blank and white, the tense hand opened, the knife clattered harmlessly to the floor.

The girl swayed for an instant, then dropped down in a heap, and her head struck sharply against the table leg.

In that instant all the bitterness of the past was forgotten. It was not Abel Owens' wife who lay there so deathly white and still, not a woman of the Owens clan, it was Florrie the girl whom Amanda Beardsly had borne the girl whom she had loved, the girl who, in childbirth, had wanted her mammy.

"Florrie—Florrie—" she was saying, in an agony of fear. She knelt beside the girl, chafed her wrists, dashed cold water across her temples. And suddenly tears flooded to the eyes that had long been tearless, a prayer welled up to lips that had only prayed for vengeance.

"Oh, God, forgive me, I've been wrong; don't let her die, my girl—my girl—"

Slowly Florrie's eyes opened, opened with an effort, and her brows contracted sharply. The face that bent above her was hidden in a dim mist, and a voice came to her as from a great distance—

"Florrie, honey, don't you know me? It's yore mammy—"

She raised her hand slowly to the face above her. It was wet with tears. She tried to smile but only sobs came. And she hid her face against the thin shoulder of her mother, while two arms closed tightly around her rocking her as if she had been a little girl again.

"Oh, Florrie, my girl, my girl, I've missed you so—I've missed you so—"

$120 to Europe

*Full-Cabin Passage on Swift,
New U. S. Government Ships*

IF YOU are going to Europe, be sure to investigate the new, swift $120 ships owned by your Government and operated by the United States Lines. Think of it—only $120 full-cabin passage! That includes every charge. Third class passage only $85.

These ships are called "Ships of Democracy," since first and second class distinctions on them have been abolished. Compact, commodious, comfortable and safe, they have already become famous on the trans-Atlantic run. Their names are President Monroe, President Adams, President Van Buren, President Polk and President Garfield.

You will be delighted with their quiet luxury and perfect service—first class comfort without first class expense! Sailings each Wednesday from New York.

Write Today

Send the coupon below today for your Government's authoritative travel booklet and full information about the ships that offer these amazingly low rates.

For information regarding reservations address:

United States Lines

Moore and McCormack, Inc.
Roosevelt Steamship Co., Inc.

45 Broadway New York City

Managing Operators for

U. S. SHIPPING BOARD

Information Section 1406

Washington D. C.

INFORMATION BLANK
To U. S. Shipping Board
Information Section Washington, D. C.
U. S. 1406

Please send without obligation the U. S. Government Booklet giving travel facts and also information regarding U. S. Government ships. I am considering a trip to Europe ☐ to The Orient ☐ to South America ☐ I would travel 1st class ☐ 2d ☐ 3d ☐.

If I go date will be about _____

My Name _____

Business or Profession _____

My Street No. or R. F. D. _____

Town _____ State _____

Sir Gilbert Parker's Novel of Love and Politics in Canada—Continued from page 81

Carnac's Folly

He had no credence in Carnac's lack of honor, yet he felt it was very strange that he had not fought his legal wife, if his case was a good one.

Day by day he had felt Carnac's power in the constituency growing, and there was reason to fear his triumph unless some sensation stopped it. Well, he had at hand the sufficient sensation. He would produce both the certificate of marriage and the French girl who was the legal wife of Carnac Grier. That Luzanne was French helped greatly, for it would be used by Carnac's foes as an insult to the people of French Canada, and his pulses throbbed faster as he thought of the possible excitement in the constituency.

FORTUNATELY, the girl was handsome, had ability, and spoke English with a French accent. She was powerful for his purposes.

On the afternoon of the day that Junia had had her hour with Luzanne, he started for the house where Luzanne was lodging. He could not travel in the streets without being recognized, but it did not matter, for the house where the girl lodged was that of his sub-agent, and he was safe in going to it. He did not know, however, that Denzil had been told by Junia to watch the place and learn what he meant to do.

Denzil had a proper respect for Barode Barouche as a Minister of the Crown; but he had a far greater love of Carnac. He remained vigilant until after Junia and Luzanne had started in a cab for the railway station. They left near three quarters of an hour before the train was to start for New York; and for the first quarter of an hour after they had gone Denzil was in apprehension.

Then he saw Barouche enter the street and go to the house of his sub-agent. The house stood by itself, with windows open, and Denzil did not scruple to walk near it, and, if possible, listen. He drew close and kept his ears open.

He was fortunate, he heard voices; Marmette was expaining to Barouche that Junia and Luzanne had gone to the station, bound for New York. Marmette had sent word to warn M. Barouche by messenger, but the messenger had missed finding him. Then he heard Barouche's voice in anger say:

"You fool—you oughtn't to have let her leave! It's my bread and butter—and yours too—that's at stake. I wanted to use her against Carnac Grier. She was my perfect weapon of attack. How long ago did she leave?"

Marmette told him.

Denzil saw Barode Barouche leave the house with a look of grim concern and talking hard to Paul Marmette. He knew the way they would go, so he fell behind a tree, and saw them start for the place where they could order a cab.

Barouche and his agent stopped at the door of a livery-stable, and were there told that no cabs were available. There was none in the street, and time was pressing. Not far away, however, was a street with a tram-line, and a tram would take Barouche near to the railway station from which Luzanne would start. So Barouche made hard for this street, and had reached it, when a phaeton came traveling along, and in it was one whom Barouche knew. Barouche spoke to the occupant, and presently both men were admitted to the phaeton just as a tram-car came near.

Denzil's spirits fell. By his watch, he saw there remained enough time for Barouche to reach the station before the New York train started! He got aboard the tram himself, and watched the phaeton moving quickly on ahead. Watching, he saw the driver of the phaeton strike his horse with a whip, and the horse, suddenly breaking into a gallop, slipped and fell to the ground on the tram-track. A moment later the tram came to a stop behind the fallen horse, and Denzil saw the disturbed face of Barode Barouche looking about for another trap, for, in any case, it would take at least three or four minutes to get the horse up and clear the track for the tram. There was no carriage in sight—only a loaded butcher's cart, a road-cleaner, and a heavily loaded van. These could be of no use to Barouche.

In his corner, Denzil watched the play with anxious eyes. It was presently found that the horse had injured a leg in falling and could not be got to its feet, but had presently to be dragged from the tram-lines. It had all taken near to five minutes of the time before the train went, and, with a look of despair, Barouche mounted the steps of the tram. He saw Denzil, and shrewdly suspected he was working in the interests of Carnac. He came forward to Denzil.

"You're a long way from home, little man," he said in a voice with an acid note.

"About the same as you from your home, m'sieu'," said Denzil.

"I've got business everywhere in this town," remarked Barouche with sarcasm—"and you haven't, have you? You're traveling privately, eh?"

"I travel as m'sieu' travels, and on the same business," answered Denzil with a challenging smile.

DENZIL had said the thing which roused sharp anger in Barouche.

Anger shook him as he saw Denzil take out his watch.

"The poll closes in three minutes, m'sieu'," said Denzil, and his look beat back the fury in Barouche's eyes.

"The poll closes only when the train leaves. So don't put on airs yet."

"I'll put on airs if I've won, m'sieu'," Denzil answered quietly, for he saw people in the tram were trying to hear.

Barouche had been recognized, and a murmur of cheering began, followed by a hum of disapproval, for Barouche had lost many friends, since Carnac had come into the fray. The tram did not go quite to the station, and as it stopped, the two men hurried to the doors. As they did so, an engine gave a scream, and presently, as they reached the inside, they saw passing out of the station, at the far end, the New York train.

"She started five minutes late, but she did start," said Denzil, and there was malice in his smile.

As he looked at his watch, he saw Junia passing out of a door into the street, but Barode Barouche did not see her—his eyes were fixed on the departing train. For a moment Barouche stood indecisive. Then he held out his hand to Denzil with imitation courtesy, as though to say good-by.

"Give me a love-clasp, spider," he said with a kind of sneer. "I'd like your love as I travel to triumph."

A light of hatred came into Denzil's eyes. Beelle—dog—wasp—spider, he had been called by this big man—well, he should see that the wasp could give as good as it got. His big gnarled hand enclosed the hand of Barode Barouche, then he suddenly closed on it tight. He closed on it till he felt it crunching in his own and saw that the face of Barode Barouche was like that of a man in a chair of torture. He squeezed, till from Barouche's lips came a gasp of agony, and then he let go.

"You've had my love-clasp, m'sieu'," Denzil said with meaning, "and when you want it again, let me know. It's what M'sieu' Carnac will do with you tomorrow night. Only he'll not let go, as I did, before the blood comes. Don't be hard on those under you, m'sieu'. Remember wasps and spiders can sting in their own way, and that dogs can bite."

"Little black beast," was the short reply, "I'll strip your dirty hide for Hell's gridiron for that."

THE DAY of the Election came. Never had feeling run higher, never had racial lines been so cut across. Barode Barouche fought with vigor, but from the going of Luzanne Larue, there passed from him the confidence he had felt since the first day of Carnac's candidature.

Several times he came upon Carnac in the streets, and they saluted courteously; yet he saw the confidence of Carnac in his bearing. Twice also he came upon Junia, and he was startled by the look she bestowed on him.

"A devilish clever girl that," he said to himself. "If he wins, it'll be due to her, and if he wins—no, he can't marry her, for he's already married; but he'll owe it all to her. If he wins! No, he shall not win; I've been in the game too long; I've served too many interests; I've played too big a part for him to win."

Feeling ran higher and higher, but there was no indication that Barouche's hopes were sure of fulfilment. His face became paler as the day wore on, and his hands freer with those of his late constituents. Yet he noticed that Carnac was still glib with his tongue and freer with his hands. Carnac seemed everywhere, on every corner, in every street, at every polling booth.

Carnac was not as confident as he looked. But one good thing had happened. The girl who could do him great harm was not in evidence, and it was too late to spoil his immediate chances now, even if she came.

He had a new feeling toward Tarboe, who had given him such powerful support. There was, then, in the man the bigger thing, the light of fairness and reason! He had had no talk with Tarboe, and he desired none, but he had seen him at three of his meetings, and he had evidence of arduous effort on his behalf.

It was folly electioneering on the day of the poll, but Carnac saw a few labor leaders and moved them to greater work for him. One of these told him that at the Grier big-mill was one man working to defeat him by personal attacks. It had something to do with a so-called secret marriage, and it would be good to get hold of the man, Roudin, as soon as possible. He must go to the mill at once; and he started for it. On the way he met Luke Tarboe.

"There's trouble down at the mill," Tarboe said. "A fellow called Roudin has been spreading a story that you're married and repudiate your wife. It'd be good to fight it now before it gets going. There's no truth in it, of course," he added, with a curious look in his eye, for he remembered the letter Carnac received one day in the office and his own conclusion then.

A FEW moments later Carnac was in the yard of the mill. In one corner he saw the man he took to be Roudin talking to a group of workmen. He hurried over, and heard Roudin declaring that he, Carnac, was secretly married to a woman whom he repudiated, and was that the kind of man to have as member of Parliament? Presently, Roudin was interrupted by cheers from supporters of Carnac, and he saw it was due to Carnac's arrival. Roudin had courage. He would not say behind a man's back what he would not say to his face.

"I was just telling my friends here, m'sieu, that you was married, and you didn't acknowledge your wife. Is it so?"

Carnac's first impulse was to say No, but he gained time by challenging.

"Why do you say such things to injure me? Is that what Monsieur Barouche tells you to say?"

"No, I didn't hear it from M'sieu' Barouche. I got it from better hands than his," answered Roudin.

"Better hands than his, eh? From the lady herself, perhaps?"

"Yes, from the lady herself, m'sieu'."

"Then bring the lady here and let us have it out, monsieur."

Roudin shrugged a shoulder.

"Then you're not honest. You do me harm by a story like that, and when I challenge you, you don't respond. You say you know the woman, then produce her—there's no time to be lost. The poll closes in four hours, and it's not decent to make such statements and not prove them. It isn't playing the game in the right way—do you think so, messieurs?" he added to the crowd which had grown in numbers.

At that moment a man came running from the entrance toward Carnac. It was Denzil.

"A letter for you, an important letter," he kept crying as he came nearer.

Will that letter help Carnac to victory, or does it mean his defeat? Will the folly of his impetuous youth now result in his downfall? Two women hold his fate. See the exciting concluding instalment in Hearst's International for October, ready September 20th.

2400 telephone wires in a cable little larger than a man's wrist

Science keeps down costs

When the Bell System installed its first successful telephone cable, fifty wires was the largest number that could be operated in a single cable without "cross-talk" and other interference. Today it would require 48 cables of the original type to accommodate the number of wires often operated in one cable.

Without this improvement in cable, the construction of new underground and aerial lines would have cost the Bell System upwards of a hundred million dollars more than has actually been spent. In addition, the cost of maintenance would have been greater by eighteen million dollars a year. These economies in the Bell System mean a saving in telephone rates to each individual subscriber.

In all branches of telephone practice science has similarly contributed to economy. Even in such a comparatively small item as switchboard cords, improvements have reduced the cost of renewal by four million dollars a year.

Every new telephone added to the Bell System increases the usefulness of all telephones, but this multiplication tends likewise to increase the complications and the expense of service. The scientists of the Bell System, to offset this tendency, are constantly called upon to develop new devices which simplify complications and keep down costs.

By virtue of a united system the benefits of these improvements are shared by all subscribers—and the nation is provided with the best and cheapest telephone service in the world.

"BELL SYSTEM"
AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY
AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

One Policy, One System, Universal Service, and all directed toward Better Service

Sheet Music 15c

Ask for Century Edition

THE music you want for your piano should cost you only 15c a copy. Tell your dealer you want Century Edition. You can't buy better sheet music than Century—it's beautifully printed on the best of paper—and each selection is certified to be correct as the master wrote it.

The Century Catalog embraces the world's finest music—compositions like "Hungarian Rhapsody," "Moonlight Sonata," "Salut A Pesth," "Poet and Peasant," "Rondo Capriccioso," "Sack Waltz," "Serenade," "Falling Leaves," and 2100 others. Patronize the Century dealer. He has your interest at heart. Century's low price is only possible because of his small profit. If your dealer can't supply you, we will.

Complete catalog of over 2100 classical and popular standard compositions free on request.

Ask your dealer to show you Martin's "Rudiments for the Piano," Jahn's "Rudiments for the Violin," and Martin's "Scales and Chords." Used by all modern teachers.

Century Music Publishing Co.
233 W. 40th St., N. Y.

When Ulysses Met David, King of the Jews—Conan Doyle's Story continued from page 5

A Point of Contact

its long colonnades the greater part of that side of the island which looked down upon the Sidonian port, so-called because only twenty miles away the older city of Sidon maintained a constant stream of traffic with its rising offshoot.

Inns were not yet in vogue, but the poorer traveler found his quarters with hospitable citizens, while men of distinction were frequently housed in the annexes of the temples, where the servants of the Priests attended to their swarthy. On that particular evening there stood in the portico of the temple of Melmoth two remarkable figures who were the center of observation for a considerable fringe of Phenician idlers. One of these men was clearly by his face and demeanor a great chieftain.

His companion was a short, thick-set man, bull-necked and swarthy, clad in some dusky cloth that gave him a somber appearance relieved only by the vivid scarlet of his woollen cap.

"Be not impatient, sire," he was saying. "Give me two days, or three at the most, and we shall make as brave a show at the muster as any."

The other frowned and stamped his foot. "We should have been there now had it not been for this cursed mischance," said he. "Aeolus played us a pretty trick when he sent such a blast out of a cloudless sky."

"Well, sire, two of the Cretan galleys foundered, and Trophimes, the pilot, swears that one of the Argos ships was in trouble. Pray Zeus that it is not the galley of Menelaus. We shall not be the last at the muster."

THE officer bowed and departed, while the Chieftain stood with his eyes fixed upon his great dismantled galley over which the riggers and carpenters were swarming. Further out in the roadstead lay eleven other smaller galleys, waiting until their wounded flagship should be ready for them. The sun, as it shone upon them, gleamed upon hundreds of bronze helmets and breast-plates, telling of the warlike nature of the errand upon which they were engaged. Save for them the port was filled with bustling merchant-ships taking in cargoes or disgorging them.

At the very feet of the Greek chieftain three broad barges were moored, and gangs of laborers with wooden shovels were heaving out the mussels brought from Dor, destined to supply the famous Tyrian dye-works which furnished the most noble of all garments. Beside them was a tin ship from Britain and the square boxes of that precious metal, so needful for the making of bronze, were being passed from hand to hand to the waiting wagons.

The Greek found himself smiling at the uncouth wonder of a Cornishman who had come with his tin, and who was now lost in amazement as he stared at the long colonnades of the Temple of Melmoth and the high front of the Shrine of Ashtaroth behind it. Even as he gazed some of his shipmates passed their hands through his arms and led him along the quay to a wine-shop, as being a building much more within his comprehension. The Greek, still smiling, was turning on his heel to return to the Temple when one of the clean-shaven priests of Baal came forward.

"It is rumored, Sire," said he, "that you are on a very distant and dangerous venture. Indeed, it is well known from the talk of your soldiers what it is that you have on hand."

"IT IS true," said the Greek, "that we have a hard task before us. But it would have been harder to bide at home and to feel that the honor of a leader of the Argives had been soiled by this low dog from Asia."

"I hear that all Greece has taken up the quarrel. Yes, there is not a chief from Thessaly to the Malea who has not called out his men, and there were twelve hundred galleys in the harbor of Aulis."

"It is a great host," said the priest. "But have ye any seers or prophets among ye who can tell what will come to pass?"

"Yes, we had one such, Calchas, his name. He has said that for nine years we shall strive and only on the tenth will the victory come."

A tall man clad in a long white robe with a golden fillet running through his flowing auburn hair, was striding down the street with the free elastic gait of one who has lived an active life in the open. His face was ruddy and noble, with a short crisp beard covering a strong square jaw. In his clear blue eyes, as he looked at the evening sky and the busy waters beneath him, there was something of the exaltation of the poet, while a youth walking beside him and carrying a harp, hinted at the graces of music. On the other side of him, however, a second squire bore a brazen shield and a heavy spear, so that his master might never be caught unawares by his enemies.

"They are but barbarians," said the Priest. "He is a small king from the mountain parts opposite Philistia, and he comes here because he is building up the town of Jebus which he means to be his chief city. It is only here that he can find the wood and stone and craftsmanship that he desires. The youth with the harp is his son. But I pray you, chief, if you would know what is before you at Troy to come now into the outer Hall of the Temple with me, for we have there a famous seer, the prophetess Alaga, who is also the priestess of Ashtaroth. It may be that she can do for you what she has done for many more, and send you forth from Tyre in your hollow ships with a better heart than you came."

TO THE Greeks who, by oracles, omens and auguries, were forever prying into the future, such a suggestion was always welcome. The Greek followed the priest to the inner sanctuary where sat the famous Pythoness—a tall, fair woman of middle age, who sat at a stone table upon which was an abacus or tray filled with sand. She held a style of chalcedony and with this she traced strange lines and curves upon the smooth surface, her chin leaning upon her other hand and her eyes cast down. As the chief and the priest approached her she did not look up, but she quickened the movements of her pencil, so that curve followed curve in quick succession. Then, still with downcast eyes, she spoke in a strange, high, sighing voice like wind amid the trees.

"Behold! I see an island to the west, and an old man who is the father, and the great chief, and his wife, and his son who now waits him at home."

"Yes, maiden, you have said truth," the Greek answered.

"I have had many great ones before me, but none greater than you, for three thousand years from now people will still talk of your bravery and of your wisdom."

"For ten years you will strive and then you will win, and victory will bring rest to others, but only new troubles to you. Ah!" The prophetess suddenly started in violent surprise and her hand made ever faster markings.

THE WOMAN had looked up with wild inquiring eyes.

The Greek was aware that two new figures had entered the room. They were the ruddy Barbarian whom he had marked in the street, together with the youth who bore his harp.

"It is a marvel upon marvels that two such should enter my Chamber on the same day," cried the priestess. "Have I not said that you were the greatest that ever came, and yet behold here is already one who is greater. For he and his son—even this youth whom I see before me—will also be in the minds of all men when many ages have passed. Hail, stranger, hail! Pass on to your work, for it awaits you, and it is great beyond words of mine." Rising from her stool the woman dropped her pencil upon the sand and passed swiftly from the room.

The Greek chief looked with interest at the Barbarian.

"It would seem," said the Greek, "that the gods have chosen us both to play a part in the world."

"Stranger," the Barbarian answered, "there is but one God."

"Say you so? Well, it is a matter to be argued at some better time. But I would fain have your name and style and what it is you purpose to do, so that we may perchance hear of each other in years to come. For my part I am Odysseus, known also as Ulysses, the King of Ithaca. For my work, it is the taking of Troy."

"And my work," said the Barbarian, "is the building of Jebus which now we call Jerusalem. Our ways lie separate, but it may come back to your memory that you have crossed the path of David, second King of the Hebrews, together with his young son, Solomon, who may follow him upon the throne of Israel."

So he turned and went forth into the darkened streets where his spearmen were awaiting him, while the Greek passed down to his boat that he might see what was still to be done ere he could set forth upon his voyage.

Turn Your Overseas Knowledge into Profit

WHEREVER people work, wherever there is farming, mining, banking, industry, trading, transportation or politics there are odd and interesting situations, conditions and practices. A number of these are described each month in "The World Today" department of The INTERNATIONAL Bulletin. They come to us from business men and women, people in exporting and importing houses, bits from overseas letters to American friends and relatives—each a gem of curious economic interest.

If you have any unusual information about current affairs which affect the national life of some specific community in such a way as to interest Americans, clip it from its letter or write it out and send it to us for publication.

We Will Pay $5.00 or More for Each Acceptable Contribution

The notes, an example of which is shown in the illustration, should be brief, picturesque, authentic and stand strict investigation. They may deal with any subject in any country in the world but they must bear interestingly on the economic life of its people.

The INTERNATIONAL Bulletin is a world-economic guide book for thousands of keen minded executives and others interested in foreign affairs. To get a clearer idea of what it represents, why not send for a complimentary copy of the current number?

Checks for contributions to "The World Today" department will be mailed immediately upon acceptance by the editors and the items published as promptly as possible.

Send Items to "The World Today" Department of

THE INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF ECONOMICS

Hearst's INTERNATIONAL Magazine

119 West Fortieth Street, New York

¶ Frank Ward O'Malley's Adventures into the Wicked World—Continued from page 63

Sinning in Silks and Sanctity

lavishly abloom in the primrose path. Thus a charming companion was acquired early; preferably was won away from some strange broker at a nearby table. Then the strange broker added further to the gaiety by making the first good swing at your jaw of the many you looked forward to in the coming night.

Now prohibition, I was beginning to see, and its consequent increase in the consumption of hard stuff, at last was bringing into being a class distinction that long was sadly lacking in our social order. The rush to get stewed was creating an American aristocracy! Kipling's typical Englishman who, if he were alone on a catboat in the Indian Ocean, would instinctively change to evening clothes at six o'clock, had nothing at all on us. Now that the hard-boiled shirt at last had become a requisite of New York night-time hellishness everybody who was anybody, I found, was beginning to change to evening clothes instinctively even as early as five-thirty.

The first supper club we visited differed only in minor details from all the rest. It resembled the old Haymarket in but one respect; it, also, was above the street level. But whereas the steps leading up to the Haymarket were all edged with brass to make a fall more difficult, the "little club" stairs we now ascended were padded with billows of wealthy carpet.

Along the velveted and veloured luxuriousness of stairway were arty lamps of beaten copper shedding light of esthetic dimness. Exquisitely rendered dance music came to us. In fact only a hint of vulgarity marred for us those moments of sumptuous stair climbing. It came from a large, white-haired, handsome devil of two hundred and thirty pounds displacement who seemingly was the host to the party climbing behind us.

"And so finally," puffed the impressive looking man near the stair-top, "I told the damn' fathead that I not only wouldn't sell, but that if he didn't take himself and his dirty million-dollar check out of my study at once my butler would kick him out of the door into Fifth Avenue—the damn' scoundrel!"

But I suppose the middle classes do manage to squeeze into the clubs at times.

A FRENCH maid received my wife. A manager who reminded me of a young John Drew in The Squire of Dames received me. This time he was respectfulness itself.

We were graciously admitted to high midnight society.

A small room—small, at least, for a restaurant—glowed on walls and ceiling with textile hangings decoratively splashed with most modern art.

Surrounding a waxen dancing floor were tables seating in all two hundred—no more. Missing was the old-time orchestra of earlier dance-hall days, which usually consisted of three pieces: a piano, a piano stool and a pianist in a gray derby hat, shirt sleeves and upturned cigar. Instead, here was an orchestra of six pieces; at a salary cost, I learned later, of one thousand, six hundred dollars a week.

I ordered food. The waiter, I fancied, still lingered expectantly.

"And by the way, waiter," I said, with what lightness I could affect, "bring two Bronx cocktails first, then some real beer with the lobster, and after that—well, if you have a good Scotch—"

"Sorry, sir," broke in the waiter in hurt tones, "but we never serve alcoholic drinks—beer, especially, never!"

Every other natty clubman and clubwoman round us who wasn't dancing seemed to be drinking cocktails, champagnes, Scotch or rye. My Irish rose up. I sent for the manager himself. The manager could help me little beyond explaining in his best-bred manner that the clubmen who were drinking must have brought their liquors in suitcases. This was a common practice, he added sadly, that he was unable to stop without resorting to really vulgar squabbings.

When all seemed lost, a life-saver arrived. It was the young Assistant District Attorney, who was accompanied, according to rule, by a lady. He greeted me and took a table next to ours.

A telepathic glance that seemed to have something to do with me shot from the manager's eyes to the eyes of our life-saver.

"WHY, of course he's all right," cried the Assistant District Attorney to the manager. "Anything he wants!"

"As I was about to explain," the manager continued evenly, "we never serve beer here nor in any of the several other clubs under this management. We never mix cocktails nor serve highballs to anyone. We do serve to those we know flasks of gin, Scotch, rye, Bourbon, brandies, champagnes—"

"Brother," I broke in throatily, "start with the gin, cracked ice, a tall glass for mixing, a glass of orange juice, and never mind the vermouth."

From then until the usual closing hour of four o'clock in the morning, the only taint of Puritanism I encountered was the rule stipulating that clubmen must mix their own cocktails at table.

As my knowledge of the New Hellishness progressed, I found myself mentally making comparative lists of the rules of night life conduct today and in the past. Now you must wear evening clothes; in 1900 football clothes and an undershirt of fine chain mail were de rigueur. You have to be sober to gain admission now; you were expected to be plastered, sloshed, orey-eyed, then. A lady must accompany you now; in 1900—but the less said the better. In New York's new night life you must dance decently; in the New York night life of a generation ago decency in anything was considered out of bounds.

Seemingly the New Hellishness first made a list of the classes that monopolized the old night life of Manhattan, gathered them all together and then put the rollers under them.

One inviolable rule is that a candidate for admission must be at least temporarily burdened with money. The half-pint flasks of Scotch cost six dollars, or twenty-four dollars for a quart bottle. Champagnes cost ten dollars and more a pint.

In defense of the prices the managers point out that the dance music is the best they can get, with the weekly cost of the orchestra alone ranging from fourteen hundred to twenty-five hundred dollars; that the clubs' exhibition dancers are Bessie McCoy Davis, Peggy Marsh, Irene Castle, Gilda Gray and similar entertainers demanding wealthy salaries; that good hard liquor comes high, even at wholesale rates; that the little of "little clubs" has two hundred employees.

I LIKED the city's New Hellishness. Thanks to the Justice of the Supreme Court and his card, I saw it all. Out of it all I quickly learned that Manhattan, now that it is bone dry and all that sort of thing, still nightly sets forth seeking sin as of old, only to find, alas, that Satan's unquenchable pride has taken him on a new tack. Mr. Devil and his Missus now are trying to get their names in the Social Register.

I saw, in fact, only one social catastrophe. In one of the clubs the manager must have twice whispered warnings to one couple on the floor that their dancing technique bulged from the manager's strict standard of ethics. At any rate he finally walked out on the dancing floor, stopped the orchestra in the middle of a bar and clapped politely for attention.

"I have twice warned a couple on this floor," he said with all the severity of a Rev. John Roach Straton denouncing the stage, "that their dancing is indecent. The music will not be resumed unless the couple leaves."

Listen! That manager had been so considerate that he had waited to halt the music at a moment when the couple was so close to the exit that the young man and woman could duck out.

"They danced," angrily muttered the manager, "as if they thought this was a country club or something!"

No private rooms; no improper dancing; no fights; no lawns; and therefore no promiscuous spooning out in darkened sedans and limousines while the band plays on; no maidenly checking of corsets and stays in the ladies' room before going on the dance floor; no flat hats above receding chins but bulging hip pockets; no—

"MOTHER," I said firmly, one night lately, while thinking these things over on our own vine-clad porch, "our dear little ones soon will be reaching an age when we shall have to keep them in Manhattan in summer as well as winter. There are too doggone many country clubs around here!"

She saw, of course, what I meant. When my little son and daughter are old enough to take to fox-trotting, highballs and cigarettes, I want them safe in New York's Tenderloin, where they can learn to drink and dance and smoke in the way that young ladies and gentlemen should.

A Chance for the Little Drug Store—

"Here, boy, take this grip and me to a subway train that will bring me to Long Island City. And be sure to let me keep you in sight."

IT WAS in the quiet hour before noon at the information desk of New York City's busiest railroad station, Grand Central. A medium sized man of middle age straightened himself from a leaning position assumed while listening to lengthy explanations from the clerk. A genial smile illuminated his pale, studious face as he said, "I thank you, son, but I'm mighty sure I could never follow all your directions. I'd feel safer following a Redcap." Then with a nod of appreciation to the clerk he hailed a passing porter.

He followed his guide through what seemed a maze of twists and turns until he found himself seated in a subway train.

At last there was a breathing spell and time to think.

Here he was, Mr. M. S. Kahn, druggist, of Baltimore, with his heart and interest wrapped up in his drug store, traveling on the last leg of a journey which, within the last ten days, had taken him to four States. He had yielded to the persuasions of fellow druggists of his State to make this inspection tour of the American Druggists Syndicate, unofficially and unannounced.

Years ago Kahn and other druggists of the country found themselves working long hours for small profits. They were being compelled to use their stores as outlets for manufacturers and jobbers who dominated prices, conditions and dealers.

Then along came the American Druggists Syndicate idea.

It invited the small druggists to join an independent organization in which they would make their own supplies and dictate their own policies. Every druggist would be part owner, manufacturer, and dealer. The idea was Utopian, but it proved practical.

M. S. Kahn

It grew from an idea to an organization of 26,000 enthusiastic coöperators—members with tangible assets that would bring many million dollars in cold cash, even in dull times, and the unique satisfaction of not owing the banks a dollar.

Back of all this are four A. D. S. factories—the four big reasons that pulled Mr. Kahn away from Baltimore and his A. D. S. drug store.

The A. D. S. is proud of these four factories. The pride increases as the top is approached, if there is such a thing as top in a democratic organization of this kind. The executives have been trying to make Kahn and the 25,999 other A. D. S. men share the intensity of their pride. They are urged almost constantly to take time off to see their wonderful plants.

But the druggist is a busy man. He takes few vacations. The Home Office keeps on urging nevertheless, following the maxim that little drops of water wear out a stone.

Mr. Kahn finally gave in when a number of A. D. S. druggists urged him to represent them on a tour of the plants. His visits were to be in each case a complete surprise. None of the executives were to be warned.

At the send off in Baltimore, it was understood that he would see all, and bring back his impressions as viewed from the standpoint of the small shareholder. So primed, he had been through the A. D. S. plant at Huntington, W. Va., and to the two plants at East Killingly, Conn., and Newark, N. J., respectively.

His retrospection was interrupted by the subway guard warning him to get off at the next station. As he walked down the station stairs, he realized that he was approaching the mother plant, and determined that his inspection would be just as thorough as in any of the others.

On enquiring at the great building containing over twelve acres of floor space, Kahn was surprised to learn that the democracy of the organization was carried out to such details as entrances and exits.

"But," he asked as he noted the time clock, "does the president come in at this little door?"

"Yes, sir, everybody," answered the operator who took him up in the elevator. Within a minute he was shaking hands with Goddard, the man whom the shareholders have insisted on having, first as manager and then as president since the A. D. S. was organized. He showed his delight at seeing Kahn with a handshake that left the dealer's fingers tingling as he was led into the president's office. When the greetings were over, Goddard said, "Now that we've got you here, I'm going to insist on showing you what a wonderful plant you have here. And I'll be your guide."

"No, no, Mr. President, I wish you wouldn't. I told those shareholders I'd see our plants just as they perform every day when there are no visitors snooping around. That is how I saw Huntington, East Killingly and Newark. If I saw this plant with the president for a guide, things might be spruced up a little. The very psychology of your being along with me might give just a little impetus to the work. Don't you think so?"

"You're right," agreed Goddard, "and I want you to see things as they are. Now go to it. And remember, the whole plant and everybody in it is yours while you're here. But you can't go now. There's the whistle for lunch. Let us stand at this window. In a minute there'll be something here you'll want to see."

As Kahn walked with him to the window, he saw the first rush of employees leaving the building for lunch. They seemed to flow out in an endless stream.

"Is it possible," asked Kahn, "that all those people work for us in this one plant? There must be a thousand."

"More than that," answered the pleased president, "in all we have over twelve hundred people right here. Some difference, isn't it, from the early days?"

"When I think of those days, it is hard for me to believe my own eyes," said Kahn.

On returning to the factory after a quick lunch with the President, he was shown the door that would let him into the factory on his tour of inspection. Smiling, he warned Goddard not to wait for him.

"I might be here a long time, long after the hour when you go home. I intend to roam all over the place."

And thus at his own sweet will, Kahn began his tour of the A. D. S. at Long Island City. He saw everything from laboratories to shipping room. He saw perfumes and pharmaceutical products in the making. He saw every big division of this mammoth plant which turns out three thousand items in gigantic quantities. Everywhere he noted the spotless cleanliness and wished that he could find some way of showing it to his customers in Baltimore. He was amazed at the marvelous, efficient equipment which insured such rapid production and prevented the possibility of error.

In his talks with operators and foremen of long experience, he learned many things. How so-and-so suggested this improvement—So-and-so, that one, and of the difficulties and expenses overcome. He learned manufacturing evolution from those who make it.

In the shipping department, he studied history from figures. The foremen enjoyed his amazement at the steady progression of shipping statistics. Going back to shipments of five and ten years ago, he saw how this organization of which he was part owner, has increased deliveries from hundreds to thousands, steadily. To tens of thousands in many items.

It was a tired but satisfied man who met the executives in the president's office as the syren announced the close of the day's work. To their requests for an opinion, he said:

"Gentlemen, I wish I could tell you how I feel. My experiences today have served well to back up the impressions I received at our other three plants. We have an organization to marvel at. It is so big, so fine in spirit and fact, that I now appreciate the difficulty you gentlemen have in trying to make druggists like myself realize it. I would willingly give a hundred dollars to charity if I could only find words to convey my true impressions to those druggists interested with us in Baltimore."

Mr. Goddard announced simply:

"Mr. Kahn, I'm glad for the sake of the organization. And I believe every druggist would feel the same way if he could afford the time to duplicate your tour. So now I have a suggestion for you. Instead of making your report only to those few druggists who are interested with you, why don't you make it in the form of a letter to all A. D. S. men?"

"By George! That's a splendid idea," said Kahn. "I'll do it now while the feeling is on me."

And he sat as if alone in the room, and wrote rapidly, stopping only to refer to his notes.

Two or three days later, 26,000 A. D. S. druggists spread throughout the country received his letter. Reading it, they knew it came from a man of their own kind. They read:

TO MY FELLOW MEMBERS AND PROPRIETORS:

This letter is not from the president or any other executive of the A. D. S. It is from me, M. S. Kahn, a druggist like any of you. Apart from owning a good drug store in Baltimore and holding an office I'm proud of in the N. A. R. D., I am not known. But here I am in the office of the president of the A. D. S. and I have an experience to tell that will make your ears tingle if I can find words to tell it as it should be told.

Many of you will remember those bitter days back in 1905 when the manufacturers and jobbers had us so firmly in their toils that our outlook seemed hopeless. Like you I grasped the helping hand of the A. D. S. and bought shares and goods to protect myself and my customers. When Goddard told us in those days that it would grow, we hoped with him, but we doubted.

Gentlemen, in the last few days I have seen that growth. Down in Huntington, W. Va., I saw our stamping and enameling plant. Without announcement I walked in and saw the whole plant and processes from start to finish.

It was obvious even to a layman why A. D. S. enamel ware should be the highest quality in the world and sell at a price so low that it annoys competition. We are located so that the special earths and oxides can almost be wheeled into our door. We get the sheet metal from the local steel mills almost in our back yard, and gas fuel at next to nothing.

Clip This Coupon—It is Worth 50 Cents

COMPLIMENTARY COUPON—This coupon entitles the reader of Hearst's International Magazine, who signs on the blanks below, to one full size tube of

CHLOR-E-DIXO—the Tooth Paste for Acid Mouth

Free With purchase of a single tube from any A. D. S. druggist when he displays this scientific A. D. S. product, as above.

Famous stars of the stage and screen use and endorse Chlor-e-dixo. Made by AMERICAN DRUGGISTS SYNDICATE, Long Island City, New York.

Name.....

Street.....City.....

This coupon will only be accepted wherever a CHLOR-E-DIXO campaign is on during 1922.

The books were brought out for my inspection, and it would do your heart good, as it did mine, to see our growth. Where we shipped tens and fifties, we now ship hundreds and thousands of bowls, bed pans and other items of hospital wear. And I found out that we have capacity to supply the hospital needs of the entire country. (And the plant is owned by you and me).

From there I went up to East Killingly, Conn., and saw our cotton mill produce the finest gauzes, bandages and such cotton supplies that the drug trade has ever seen. The mill is run on water power. The cotton is washed in water from the mountain lakes in a location entirely free from dust. Our operators learn their business from the cradle. They are descendants of descendants of cotton experts.

Next I visited this plant of ours at Newark, N. J., where they make the chemicals for Long Island City. To you and me who are accustomed to dealing only in small quantities of chemicals it is an interesting sight to see what large scale production really is.

I saw productions in quantities that seemed large enough to supply the world. It needs assurance of a positive kind to realize that all this is yours and mine.

It was only a short trip from there to the Long Island City plant where I gave Goddard, our President, and the other executives, a real surprise by walking in on them unannounced. Though I could have had the President for a guide, I made my tour of this plant, also, alone. We seemed to have a whole city of people working for us there. Over twelve hundred in all I saw the wonderful time-saving devices we have for preparing our pharmaceuticals, perfumes and toilet preparations. I followed them every step of the way from the raw materials to the attractive packages you and I display on our shelves.

Imagine, three thousand different items produced in this one plant, which we own.

Gentlemen, it is something in which every one of us can feel a personal pride.

But that is not as far as we are going. We are going to bring prices down further. We have all the necessary equipment to increase our production. I found out that we will not have to increase our overhead any more than slightly. The increase in volume at little or no increase in cost is going to mean a nice reduction in prices to your customers and mine.

There will be no difficulty about the increase in sales. It will mean merely talking a little more to our customers about this A. D. S. of ours. And, Man! we have something to talk about. From now on every customer of mine is going to hear the story behind the A. D. S. How it started, what it did, and what it is doing now.

People will be glad to cooperate with us. They don't like the trusts or the chain stores any better than we do. When they learn that our objective is to reduce retail prices, they will be with us. Our policy of a square deal for the customer and the man behind the counter will keep them with us.

Yours for the Customer and the A. D. S.

M. S. KAHN.

Therefore, dear reader, the next time your A. D. S. druggist wants to talk about his work and his hobby, the A. D. S., let him talk. He might tell how you and your neighbors have, perhaps unconsciously, helped him out of his old difficulties and put him in a position where he can sell you what he thinks best from a standpoint of quality and price.

If he talks of his A. D. S. tooth paste give him all your attention. There is more romance packed in that prosaic tube than you ever dreamed of. There is an ideal, a venture and a fight. These pages may tell you of them in a coming issue.

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Gouverneur Morris's New Novel of an Amazing Marriage—Continued from page 60

The Better Wife

lot of voice she had, and how easy it was to make it do things. If he'd let her have some of his music, she'd learn a lot of his songs, so they could sing them together. She could read the tune part. She had had some experience in a choir, in Brooklyn. She wasn't a New Yorker, not really.

When he was singing Ben Bolt, Mother Jessup's skinny, bony hand (she couldn't get her wedding-ring off now, because the knuckle was in the way of it, and she had never had any engagement ring, only a kiss on the lips to bind a bargain and to make dreams come true) lay clawed on the arm of her chair. Farmer Jessup's hand dropped lightly on it, and covered it, and hid it from view. They rocked, then, in unison.

Had she heard this one? Did she know that one?

It became bedtime, high bedtime for broken arms.

Bedtime was it? It was time Mrs. Highland knew "What Will You Do?" If she didn't know that one, she had missed something. If she didn't hear it before she went to bed, she would go to bed as an uneducated person. That was what time it was! Now, please, mother! And mother pleased, and he sang a song that was to haunt Mary in her sleep, so flowing and sweet was the melody.

It is an old song written by a Lover (by S. Lover rather) for other lovers:

"What will you do, Love, when I am going
With white sails flowing, the seas beyond?
What will you do, Love, when waves divide us,
And friends do chide us for being fond?"

"Though waves divide us, and friends do chide
us,
In faith abiding I'll still be true,
And I'll pray for you, Love, upon the ocean,
In deep devotion—that's what I'll do."

He made a pretty thing of it. He had the score somewhere. There were some more verses. But they needed fixing—they didn't scan right. You had to torture the words for the sake of the beats, and the beats for the sake of the words. He'd fix the words up somehow, and she'd learn the girl's part and they'd give a concert—that's what they'd do.

A YOUNG man with a broken arm gets his old father to help him undress, and then he goes to sleep flat on his back.

His old father and mother sleep in the room next to him. The old father sleeps like a top. The old mother keeps awake a good deal of the time listening. She is listening to see if the boy is still in pain. He might moan if he were, and she might hear him. She thought she had heard some of the music. She had beaten time on the arm of her chair to let them all know that she was hearing and enjoying. She had beaten march time when they were singing waltz time. But she didn't know that. We'll hope that the young man does have one twinge in the night, and moans once, just to please her with the sense of being needed and useful. We'll hope that his moan, to be on the safe side, will be loud as a cannon shot.

A husband is lying with his head to the west, and he goes bumping and jolting toward the east. He is very gritty with cinders by this time. He is traveling as cheaply as he may; and he is praying that God will not have mercy on the soul of the man who invented the upper berth, or the fat woman, with the two children, who is snoring in the lower one. That's what he is doing.

How, pray, does a pretty young wife sleep? She doesn't.

She lies on the extreme inner edge of her husband's great bed, so as not to be in the way. That's what she does.

Even when he is away seeing his second son by his first wife, habit is strong, and she doesn't come rolling out into the middle, and toss her arms this way and that. She doesn't, no matter how restless she is. Not once.

She lies extended with her pretty face toward the wall, and, as it were, hugs close to her bosom the delicious laughter, the adorable facetiousness, and the touching melodies of a perfect day.

MARY thought her husband the noblest thing in all the world. She thought there could be no higher ambition than to please him; no greater reward than to have succeeded. She must revamp her notion about life altogether, since life had given her someone to look up to; to go through all the rest of her life with a man to look up to, would be enough. She asked no more than that privilege of life; and this also, that life itself might be long.

Now here was life, of which she asked no more than the enduring opportunity to look upward, giving her other things. The things that she might have had if she had just been allowed to grow up naturally. A companion in whose eyes she was actually and uncontrovertibly as innocent as she felt. She felt more and more, lately, like doing all the things that a girl as young as she was, as innocent as she felt, and as naturally gay, sweet-tempered, and high-spirited feels like doing.

With Bud she would never feel this same innocence, so suited to her years. To seem real even to herself, it required the connivance of a companion to whom it was real. She and Bud were good companions now, jolly even sometimes, but always, they were tacitly agreeing to overlook those many threads of destiny that could never be untangled.

How could anything she ever did that becomes a girl of her age, seem anything but play acting in her husband's eyes?

But Fred Jessup and Farmer Jessup and darling Mrs. Jessup—to them a gale of high spirits was a gale of high spirits and no more. If she had now in her eye a little of that innocent, lilting light that hungrily courts admiration, it was to them precisely what it was, and no more. For them, there could be behind it no possible history of one who has had to charm for bread and butter.

Bud might not have liked her to seem so young and gay and enthusiastic and innocent and frolicsome. He might have thought that she was overdoing things—considering. How could he believe that, as she seemed, so she felt?

The Jessups put upon all her known good qualities the highest possible valuation. With Bud away, the Jessups were her whole world. Who was hurt then, if there were moments when she accepted herself at their valuation of her? Then came out of her, all by themselves, pretty little airs and graces and ready gifts of mirth and sympathy by which she herself was continually and delightfully surprised. She charmed, she magnetized.

TIME, which had so often dragged for her, so often seemed (as it does when there is horror) to stand still, flew now.

It was no sooner time for breakfast, than it seemed as if the delightful meal, from the red Chauteris and the yellow cream to the golden brown rich cakes, was over. How the mornings galloped by, with their snippings of flower stems in the hot garden, and the arranging of the flowers in the cool pantry, and the replacing of the bowls and vases in their appointed places; and the brisk walk with Fred before dinner; the early afternoon in the shade of the roses, the men smoking.

The sudden cooling of the air about five of the clock, and the big drive behind old Mingo, with Fred beside her, no longer coaching her facetiously, but accepting her part mastery of old Mingo as just one more of those accomplishments that her friends expected of her—how the days did gallop by! How everything went at the gallop except old Mingo—and he would (almost) if you pulled the reins so hard that he really thought you were trying to make him sit down.

Then bedtime, and the young people begging to stay up just a little longer (it was so cool and sweet) and staying up sometimes, and quite a little longer, after the old ones had gone to bed!

One night Fred jumped suddenly to his feet, stepped down into the garden, walked as far as the old figurehead of the good Harvest, turned and (she could only hear him, it was such a pitchy night) sang:

"What will you do, Love, when I am going
With white sails flowing, the seas beyond?"

He moved still farther away:

"What will you do, love, when waves divide us,
And friends do chide us for being fond?"

There was silence then, a pause; there had to be. You couldn't answer questions like that offhand. You had to think them over, digest them. It took a little time. But presently, she began to smile in the dark, the sweetest smile, that parted a little presently, so that her answer could escape and go out to him, catch him, before the white sails flowing had carried him too far:

"Though waves divide us, and friends do chide
us,
No farther abiding I'll still be true,
And I'll pray for you, love, upon the ocean,
In days devotion, that's what I'll do."

Amazing Offer
Genuine
DIAMOND
PLATINUM RING

Send No Money!

This exquisite Solid Platinum Ring, set with a superior blue white perfect-cut Diamond, sent FREE for examination and approval. If entirely satisfied, upon arrival pay only $10. Balance—only $5 a month.

For Only $5.00 a Month

Blue-White perfect-cut diamond. Solid Platinum mounting carved and pierced. SWEET'S Special Price $65

FREE Diamond Book Thousands of other wonderful values in Diamonds, Watches and Jewelry shown in our newest 98-page diamond book. Send for a copy to Dept. 152-F

Capital $1,000,000

"THE HOUSE OF QUALITY"
L.W. SWEET INC.
1650 - 1660 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

PATENTS

SPECIAL OFFER Free Opinion as to Patentable Nature

Send for Record of Invention Blank and our Three Books, mailed FREE

Highest References, Prompt Attention, Reasonable Terms

VICTOR J. EVANS & CO.
PATENT ATTORNEYS
764 Ninth WASHINGTON, D. C.

RAG JAZZ Piano, Saxophone, or Tenor Banjo in 20 lessons. Christensen Studios in most cities, or Learn by Mail. Write for Booklet, or money-making teacher's opportunity

CHRISTENSEN STUDIOS 16 E. Jackson, Chicago

An Easy Way to Remove Dandruff

If you want plenty of thick, beautiful, glossy, silky hair do by all means get rid of dandruff, for it will starve your hair and ruin it if you don't.

The best way to get rid of dandruff is to dissolve it. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp, and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most, if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and three or four more applications should completely remove every sign and trace of it.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop, and your hair will look and feel a hundred times better. You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store. A four-ounce bottle is usually all that is needed.

The R. L. Watkins Co., Cleveland, Ohio.

She felt just as young and innocent, as any girl of twenty-one ought to feel. That which she was, that peculiar and personal entity of the spirit, had never been taken from her by any man, nor given by her to any man. It was still her own. She was still complete. What if the Indians had burned away the half of her head in their camp-fire; and she remembered their doing so? Here she was, bobbed up again, serene and comfortable, with not so much as one least scrap of her pretty round head missing.

There was Bud's first wife, for instance. Nobody would point the finger of scorn at Bud's first wife, because she had only broken the spirit of the moralities. Loving Bud in the first place, she had given him all that she had to give. Tiring of Bud, she found herself trying to take back from Bud that which can by no means be taken back, so that she might bestow the same on someone else.

Whatever it was that she had to bestow and wished to bestow could not, without besmirchment, be bestowed, until the law said that she was no longer Bud's wife. Impurity was not so much in the fact of being impure as in the wishing to be impure. Yet as the world goes, the impure wisher has only to restrain herself until a judge has spoken.

The first Mrs. Highland could think evil and do evil and get away with it, but Mary Highland, to whom evil had been done by others, was damned.

So Mary sets foot on dangerous ground. Over her floods a wave of self-pity—and her husband is away, while close at hand is a man who, innocent of her past, finds her charming. Can she tread safely a path so beset? See Hearst's International for October, ready September 20th.

Simon Called Peter

The Book of the Month by Robert Keable—Continued from page 93

herself. "Girls," she said, "we must go. It's fearfully late."

Donovan sat up. "What about taxis?" Peter went to the door. "They'll fetch them," he said. "I've made an arrangement." He went a little unsteadily to find the maitre d'hôtel and settled the bill. They were tramping down the stairs as he came out of the little office, Julie leading, laughing uproariously at some joke.

A taxi came up. "Jump in, Julie," said Peter. She got in and Peter put his hand on the door. "I've settled everything, Donovan," he said. "See you tomorrow. Good night, Tommy."

In the closed and darkened taxi, he put his arm around Julie and drew her to him. "Oh, my darling," he murmured. "Julie, do you love me, as I love you? I can't live without you." He covered her face with hot kisses, and she kissed him back.

"Julie," he said at length, "my leave's come. Couldn't you possibly be in England when I'm there? I saw you first on the boat coming over—remember? And you're due again."

"It would be heaven, Peter. I could meet you in town easily," she told him. "I'll run down for a day or two to some friends in Sussex, and then come up to visit more in town."

"Splendid!" he answered. "I'll make all the arrangements. Shall we take a flat, or shall we go to a hotel? A hotel's more fun, perhaps, and we can have a suite."

She leaned over against him and caught his hand with a little intake of breath. "I'll leave it all to you, my darling."

IN LONDON, he met Julie. For three days, they were constantly together—from Friday until Monday morning when Peter's leave expired. What part the girl played in the great change in his attitude toward life and religion that occurred during that time Peter did not realize; it is doubtful if he ever realized it. Certainly, in many of the things she said, he did not follow her, but, nevertheless, the change took place. On Sunday, he went to church and when he came back, Julie was waiting for him.

Peter did not go over to her at once as she had expected. It was not that he felt he could not, but simply that he was thinking of her in a secondary way.

"Where have you been and what have you seen?" demanded Julie.

"I've seen," said Peter, "a bigger thing than I thought the world could hold. I've seen something so wonderful, Julie, that it hurt—oh, more than I can say. I've seen Love, Julie."

She could not help it. It was a foolish thing to say just then, she knew, but it came out: "Oh, Peter, did you have to leave me to see that?"

"Leave you?" he questioned. Then he smiled and he came over to her, and took her hand and sat down, his eyes still full of light. "It's far bigger than you or I, Julie. Our love is like a candle held up to the sun beside it. Our love wants something, doesn't it? It burns, it—it intoxicates, Julie. But this love waits, waits, do you understand? It asks nothing; it gives, it suffices all. And you can spurn it, spit on it, crucify it, and it is still there when you need it, Julie."

Julie heard him through. "And when you saw this—this love, Peter, how did you feel?"

"I don't know, Julie. It went through and through me."

"And then you came back to Julie, eh, Peter?" she questioned.

He frowned. "What do you mean? Don't you understand? It was God's Love that I saw."

She hesitated a minute, and then her face relaxed into a smile. "You're as blind as a bat, my dear, but I suppose all men are, and so you can't help it. Now go and ring for breakfast while I change." And Peter, because he hated to be called a bat and did not feel in the least like one, went.

It rained on that last day so that Julie cried, "Why does it always rain in London on Sunday!" But they got out in the afternoon, and in the evening they went together to church. The sermon meshed with Peter's thoughts of the morning and as soon as they were out he began telling Julie how the words had impressed him:

"Oh, it's all so plain!" he cried. "Nothing ultimately can kill the Heart of Jesus."

If there were a way to that Heart, one would be safe. I mean a way that is not an emotional idea, not a subjective experience, but something practical. Some way that a Tommy could travel as easily as anyone, and get to a real thing. Julie, I never saw the idea before. It's colossal. It's a thing to live and die gladly for. I can see a great, wonderful vision, and it fills my sight."

"I, too," she said, "but it's not your vision, Peter."

"What is it, then?" he demanded.

"Oh, Peter, don't you know yet?"

He took her arm very tenderly at that. "My darling," he said, "the two aren't incompatible. Julie, don't be sad. I love you far more than anything else. I won't give you up, even to God!"

There, then, he sealed her with his kiss.

JULIE stirred in his arms the next morning, but the movement did not wake him. She switched on the light. It was 5:30 and necessary. She kissed him and he opened his eyes.

"Half-past five, Peter," she said as gaily as she could. "You've got to get a move on, dear. Two hours to dress and pack and breakfast—no, I suppose you can breakfast on the train. How it brings the war home, doesn't it? Jump up."

Peter sighed. "Blast the war. I shan't move. Kiss me again, darling, and let your hair fall over my face."

She did so and its glossy curtain hid them. Beneath the veil she whispered, "Come, darling, for my sake. The longer you stay here now, the harder it will be. Now go and shave and bathe while I pack for you."

While he splashed about she sought his things and packed for him as she never packed for herself. She filled the suitcase but she could not fasten it. "Come and help, Peter," she called. He came out and shut the suitcase.

"Now," he said, "I'll be ready in a second and then we can have a few minutes together."

At the glass he marshaled his arguments, and then he came over to her. He dropped down and wound his arms about her. "Julie," he whispered, "my darling, say you'll marry me. You know how I love you. I love you so much that I can't live without you. I'll give up everything for you. I want to start a new life with you. I want to put you right in the center of everything and live for you, Julie. Say, yes, my love. You must say, yes."

She made no reply and a kind of despair seized him. "Oh, Julie, what can I say or what can I do? You're cruel, Julie; you're killing me. You must say yes before I go. We'll meet in Havre I know; but that will be so different. I must have my answer now. Oh, my darling, please speak. You love me, Julie, don't you?"

"Peter," said Julie slowly. "I love you so much that I hardly dare speak, lest my love should carry me away. But, Peter, I've watched you for three days; I've watched you in France. I've watched you from the moment I called you over because I was interested and felt my fate, I suppose. I've watched you struggling along, Peter. You're built for great things, my dear. I love you so that my love for you is my center, it's my all in all, it's my hope of salvation, Peter. Do you hear, my darling, my love, it's my one hope! If I can't keep that pure and clean, Peter, I ruin both of us. I love you so, Peter, that I won't marry you."

He gave a little cry but swiftly she put a hand over his mouth. She smiled at him as she did so, a daring little smile. "Be quiet, you Solomon, you. I haven't finished. Now listen again, Peter: you can't help it, but you can't love me as I love you. I see it. I—I hate it, I think; but I know it and there's an end. You, my dear, you would put me in the center, but you can't. You would give up God for me, but you can't, or if you did, you'd lose us both. But I, Peter—oh, my darling, I have no god but you. And that's why I'll worship you, Peter, and sacrifice to you, Peter, sacrifice to your ultimate happiness, Peter, and sacrifice my all."

He sank his head into his hands and she heard him sobbing.

"Ah, don't, don't," she pleaded, "don't, Peter. It's not so bad as that. Your life is going to be full, my beloved, with a great and burning love. And I, my dear, I have something even now which no devil, Peter, and no god can take away."

He looked up. "Then there's a chance, Julie? You won't say yes, but don't say no. Let us see. I shall take no vows, Julie. I haven't an idea what I shall do. Oh, say you'll wait a while, Julie, to see!"

It was the supreme moment. She saw no crucifix to sustain her, but she did not hesitate. "No, Peter," she said, "I would not take that and you never could give it. I did not mean such place as that. It never can be, Peter."

THE MAID came in answer to her ring. "Will you light a fire, please?" said Julie. "I suppose Captain Graham has gone?"

"Yes, ma'am, he's gone and he felt it terrible, I could see. But don't you fear, ma'am, he'll be kept, I know he will. You're that good, he'll come back to you, never fear. But it's 'ard on those they leave, ain't it, ma'am—their wives and all?"

"Yes," said Julie, and she never spoke more bravely. "But it's got to be, hasn't it? Would you pull the blind up? Why, it's sunny. I'm glad. It will be good for the crossing."

"It will that, ma'am. We gets the sun first up here. Shall I bring up the tea, ma'am?"

"I'll ring," said Julie, "when I want it. It won't be for a few minutes yet."

The girl went out and the door shut behind her. Julie lay on still for a little and then she got up. She walked to the window and looked out and she threw her arms wide with a gesture, and shut her eyes, and let the sun fall on her. Then she walked to her little trunk and rummaged in it. From somewhere far down, she drew out a leather case, and with it in her hand she went over and sat by the fire.

One by one, she drew out a few worthless things—a withered bunch of primroses, a couple of little scribbled notes, a paper cap from a cracker, a menu card, a handkerchief of her own that she had lent to him and that he (just like Peter) had given back. She held them all in her hand a minute, and then she bent forward and dropped them into the open fire.

And the sun rose a little higher and fell on the tumbled brown hair that Peter had kissed and that now hid her eyes.

Is Your English a Handicap? This Test Will Tell You

Thousands of people make little mistakes in their everyday English and don't know it. As a result of countless tests, Sherwin Cody found that the average person is only 61% efficient in the vital points of English. In a five-minute conversation, or in an average one-page letter, five to fifty errors will appear. Make the test shown below, now. See where you stand on these 30 simple questions.

Sherwin Cody

Make This Test Now

Correct answers shown in panel below

1. Would You Write—

|                        |    |                          |
|------------------------|----|--------------------------|
| Between you and I      | or | Between you and ME       |
| I FEAR it would come   | or | I WISH it would come     |
| WHO shall I call       | or | WHOM shall I call        |
| It's just AS I said    | or | It's just LIKE I said    |
| How MANY are there     | or | How MUCH are there       |
| I WOULD like to go     | or | I SHOULD like to go      |
| The FIRST TWO lessons  | or | The TWO FIRST lessons    |
| He sat AMONG the three | or | He sat BETWEEN the three |
| The wind blows COLD    | or | The wind blows COLDLY    |
| You will FIND ONLY one | or | You will ONLY FIND one   |

2. How Do You Say—

|              |                |    |                |
|--------------|----------------|----|----------------|
| evening      | EV-ning        | or | EVE-ning       |
| ascertain    | AS-cer-tain    | or | as-CER-tain    |
| hospitable   | HOS-pli-ta-ble | or | hos-PIT-able   |
| abdomen      | ab-DO-men      | or | ab-DO-men      |
| majority     | MAY-or-al-ty   | or | may-OR-al-ty   |
| unmanageable | a-ME-na-ble    | or | a-MEN-able     |
| acclimate    | ac-CLi-mate    | or | ac-CLi-mate    |
| prefound     | pre-FOUND      | or | pre-FOUND      |
| beneficiary  | ben-e-FISH-ary | or | ben-e-FISH-ary |
| culinary     | CU-li-na-ry    | or | CU-li-na-ry    |

3. Do You Spell It

|           |    |          |    |             |    |             |
|-----------|----|----------|----|-------------|----|-------------|
| calendar  | or | calendEr | or | repEtition  | or | replition   |
| receive   | or | recIve   | or | separate    | or | separate    |
| reprieve  | or | reprieve | or | acomodate   | or | acomodate   |
| donkeys   | or | donkeys  | or | trafficking | or | trafficking |
| factories | or | factoryS | or | acS-Sible   | or | acC-Ssible  |

New Invention Improves Your English in 15 Minutes a Day

Mr. Cody has specialized in English for the past twenty years. His wonderful self-correcting device is simple, fascinating, time-saving, and incomparably efficient. You can write the answers to 50 questions in 15 minutes, and correct your work in 5 minutes more. You waste no time in going over the things you already know. Your efforts are automatically concentrated on the mistakes you are in the habit of making, and through constantly being shown the right way, you soon acquire the correct habit in place of the incorrect habit. There is no tedious copying. There is no heart-breaking drudgery.

FREE Book on English

Every time you talk, every time you write, you show what you are. Your English reveals you as nothing else can. When you use the wrong word, when you mispronounce a word, when you misspell a word, when you punctuate incorrectly, when you use flat, ordinary words, you handicap yourself. Write for our new book "How to Speak and Write Masterly English." Merely mail the coupon, and it will be sent by return mail. Learn how Sherwin Cody's new invention makes command of language easy to gain in 15 minutes a day. Mail this coupon or a postal AT ONCE.

Answers

1
Between you and me
I wish it would come
Whom shall I call
It's just as I said
How many are there
I should like to go
The first two lessons
He sat among the three
The wind blows cold
You will find only one

2

EVE-ning
AS-cer-tain
HOS-pli-ta-ble
ab-DO-men
MAY-or-al-ty
a-ME-na-ble ac-CLi-mate
ben-e-FISH-ary
CU-li-na-ry

3

calendar receive reprieve donkeys factories
repetition separate accommodate trafficking accessible

SHERWIN CODY SCHOOL OF ENGLISH
179 Searle Building - Rochester, New York

Sherwin Cody School of English
179 Searle Building, Rochester, N. Y.

Please send me at once your Free Book "How to Speak and Write Masterly English."

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

C. Aldous Huxley's Story of a Strange Woman and a Stranger Plot—Continued from page 28

The Gioconda Smile

view of poor Emily's health." Mr. Hutton held open the gate that led into the drive.

"Libbard is only a country doctor. You really ought to see a specialist. I am serious. I think poor Emily is in a very bad state. Anything might happen—at any moment."

He handed her into the car. She leaned forward and shot a Gioconda in his direction. "Remember, I expect you to come and see me again soon."

Mechanically he grinned, made a polite noise and as the car moved forward waved his hand. He was happy to be alone.

A few minutes afterwards Mr. Hutton himself drove away. Doris was waiting at the cross-roads. They dined together, twenty miles from home, at one of those bad, expensive country hotels frequented by motorists. It revolted Mr. Hutton, but Doris enjoyed it. She always enjoyed everything.

It was after eleven when Mr. Hutton reached home. Dr. Libbard met him in the hall.

"Libbard?" said Mr. Hutton in surprise. "You here? Is my wife ill?"

"We tried to fetch you earlier," the soft, melancholy voice replied. "It was thought you were at Mr. Johnson's, but they had no news of you there."

"No. I was detained. I had a breakdown." Mr. Hutton answered irritably.

"Your wife wanted to see you urgently."

"Well, I can go now." Mr. Hutton moved toward the stairs.

Dr. Libbard laid a sympathetic hand on his arm. "I am afraid it's too late. Mrs. Hutton passed away half an hour ago. It was heart failure brought on by a violent attack of nausea, caused in its turn by the eating of something of an irritant nature."

IT'S A PITY they should have chosen the day of the Eton and Harrow match for the funeral," old General Grego complained.

Mr. Hutton overheard the remark. Was there no respect for the dead? In theory he didn't much care; let the dead bury their dead. But here at the graveside he had found himself actually sobbing. Poor Emily, they had been pretty happy once.

That evening, Mr. Hutton sat up late in his library reading the life of Milton. It was after midnight when he had finished. He got up from his armchair, unbolted the French windows and stepped out on the little paved terrace. He began to think with a kind of confused violence.

Oh, he was a futile and disgusting being. Everything convinced him of it. It was a solemn moment. He went to bed humble and contrite but with a sense that grace had entered into him. He slept for seven and a half hours and woke to find the sun brilliantly shining. Milton and death seemed somehow different in the sunlight. As for the stars, they were not there. But the resolutions were good; even in the daytime he could see that.

He had his horse saddled after breakfast and rode round the farm with the bailiff. After luncheon he read Thucydides on the Plague at Athens. In the evening he went to his library and made a few notes on malaria in Southern Italy.

On the sixth morning of his new life Mr. Hutton found among his correspondence an envelope addressed in that peculiarly vulgar handwriting which he knew to be Doris's. He opened it and began to read. His wife dying like that, and so suddenly—it was too terrible. Mr. Hutton sighed, but his interest revived somewhat as he continued reading:

"Death is so frightening, I never think of it when I can help it. But when something like this happens or when I am feeling ill or depressed then I can't help remembering it is there so close and I think about all the wicked things I have done and about you and me and I wonder what will happen and I am so frightened. I am so lonely, Teddy Bear, and so unhappy. I am so wretched and helpless without you, I didn't mean to write to you. I meant to wait till you were out of mourning and could come and see me again. But I was so lonely and miserable, Teddy Bear, I had to write, I couldn't help it. Forgive me. I want you so much, I have nobody in the world but you. You are so good and gentle and understanding; there is nobody like you. I shall never forget how good and kind you have been to me. You are so clever and know so much I can't understand how you ever came to pay any attention to me, I am so dull and stupid, much less like me and love me, because you do love me a little, don't you, Teddy Bear?"

POOOR LITTLE DORIS! He would write to her kindly, comfortingly, but he wouldn't see her again.

Five days later Doris and Mr. Hutton were sitting together on the pier at Southend. Doris in white muslin with pink garnishings radiated happiness; Mr. Hutton, legs outstretched and chair tilted, had pushed the Panama back from his forehead and was trying to feel like a tripper. That night, when Doris was asleep, he recaptured the rather cosmic emotion which had possessed him that evening not a fortnight ago when he had made his great resolution. And so his solemn oath had already gone the way of so many other resolutions. Unreason had triumphed; at the first itch of desire he had given way. He was hopeless, absolutely hopeless.

For a long time he lay with closed eyes, ruminating his humiliation. The girl stirred in her sleep. She was beautiful, desirable. Why did he lie there moaning over his sins? What did it matter? If he were hopeless, then so be it. A glorious sense of irresponsibility filled him. He was free, magnificently free. The girl woke, bewildered, almost frightened, under his rough kisses.

The storm subsided into a kind of serene merriment. The atmosphere seemed to be quivering with enormous, silent laughter.

"Could anyone love you as much as I do, Teddy Bear?" The question came faintly from distant worlds of love.

"I think I know somebody who does," Mr. Hutton replied. The submarine laughter was swelling, rising, ready to break the surface of silence and resound.

"Who? Tell me. What do you mean?" The voice had come very close, charged with suspicion, anguish, indignation; it belonged to this immediate world.

"A—ah!"

"Who?"

"You'll never guess." Mr. Hutton kept up the joke until it began to grow tedious and then pronounced the name, Janet Spence. Doris was incredulous. "Miss Spence of the manor? That old woman?" It was too ridiculous. Mr. Hutton laughed.

"But it's quite true," he said. "She adores me." Oh, the vast joke! He would go and see her as he returned. "I believe she wants to marry me," he added.

"But you don't intend. . . ."

Mr. Hutton laughed aloud. "I intend to marry you," he said. It seemed to him the best joke he had ever made.

When Mr. Hutton left Southend he was once more a married man. It was agreed that for the time being the fact should be kept secret. In the autumn they would go abroad together and the world should then be informed.

The day after his return he walked over in the afternoon to see Miss Spence. She received him with the old Gioconda.

"I was expecting you to come."

"I couldn't keep away," Mr. Hutton gallantly replied.

They sat in the summer-house.

"I am thinking of going to Italy this autumn," said Mr. Hutton.

"Italy. . . ." Miss Spence closed her eyes ecstatically. "I feel drawn there, myself."

"Why not let yourself be drawn?"

"I don't know. One somehow hasn't the energy and initiative to set out alone."

"Alone. . . . Yes, traveling alone isn't much fun," he replied.

Pressed to stay to dinner, Mr. Hutton did not refuse. The fun had hardly started. The table was laid in the loggia. A huge cloud was mounting up the sky and the first drops of rain fell.

MISS SPENCE broke a long silence.

"I think everyone has a right to a certain amount of happiness, don't you?"

"Most certainly." But what was she leading up to? Happiness—he looked back on his own life and saw a cheerful, placid existence. And now he was not merely happy, he had discovered in irresponsibility the secret of gaiety.

"People like you and me have a right to be happy some time in our lives."

"Me?" said Mr. Hutton, surprised.

"Poor Henry! Fate hasn't treated either of us very well. You're being cheerful. That's brave of you. But don't think I can't see behind the mask."

Miss Spence spoke louder and louder as the rain came down more and more heavily.

"I have understood you so well and for so long, Henry."

A flash revealed her, aimed and intent, leaning toward [Continued on page 126]

30 Volumes Less than 8¢ a Volume Shakespeare

Master Interpreter of Life

At the seemingly impossible price

$2.35
for 30 Volumes less than 8¢ a Volume

Published for Business
People Who Find Little Time to Read

Thirty Volumes of Inspiring
Drama, Comedy, Tragedy, Love and Human Understanding.

|                     |                              |
|---------------------|------------------------------|
| Macbeth             | King Richard III             |
| Romeo and Juliet    | Measure for Measure          |
| Julius Caesar       | King Henry IV                |
| Merchant of Venice  | Part I                       |
| Hamlet              | King Henry IV                |
| Midsummer Night's   | Part II                      |
| Dream               | Much Ado About               |
| King Henry V        | Nothing                      |
| Venus and Adonis    | Othello, The Moor            |
| King Henry VIII     | of Venice                    |
| Merry Wives of      | King Henry VI                |
| Windsoer            | Part I                       |
| Taming of the Shrew | King Henry VI                |
| As You Like It      | Part II                      |
| The Tempest         | King Henry VI                |
| Twelfth Night       | Part III                     |
| King Lear           | Sonnets                      |
| King John           | The Life of Shake-speare |
| Comedy of Errors    |                              |
| King Richard II     |                              |
| Pericles            |                              |

WHY and HOW this Startlingly LOW PRICE Is Made Possible

FOR more than two years I have worked on an overwhelming ambition to give Shakespeare's literary treasures to the world at a price within everyone's means. And because I have succeeded in this ambition, I believe I have the right to speak frankly.

Are You Often Embarrassed?

Have you just met Shakespeare? Or do you really know him—know him intimately as the Master Interpreter of Life? When your well-read friends find numerous occasions to quote beautiful, forceful passages from Shakespeare, do you know and appreciate these gems? Or, are you deluding yourself and friends with a passing nod of approval—a nod designed to divert the conversation to less dangerous channels?

Are You Comfortably Confident?

Have you wondered why these same friends are more human, more interesting, more attractive, more at ease and comfortably confident, with a better understanding of life?

We're all busy! And many of us feel both the lack of time and money for the world's greatest books at present prices. But, because I have learned from experience that good reading is the greatest agent of happiness and fulfillment of ambition, I have been consumed with the ambition to solve these time-and-price problems.

How This Price Is Possible

Now these problems are solved! Buying paper by carload lots, publishing one size of books and selling them, brand new, direct from specially built presses to you, has at last made it possible to offer Shakespeare at a cost per volume of less than 8¢—a little more than the cost of your Sunday paper.

Many business men and women think they have little time for reading. This set of Shakespeare published in pocket size, 3 1/2x5 inches, solves the problem. You will read these book treasures to and from the office, at the lunch hour and during your spare moments in the evening. And within a short time, you will realize a wonderful benefit through Shakespeare's complete understanding of life. It will influence you in your home and social life—giving you a better understanding of your family and your friends. And your purchase of this set of Shakespeare, at less than 8¢ a volume, will also entitle you to purchase other sets of World's Famous Books at a seemingly impossible price.

250,000 Sets!

This almost unbelievable price of less than 8¢ a volume is based on my belief that the American public really appreciates the big and beautiful things of life, found in and resulting from good reading. And when I've found 250,000 warm friends for Shakespeare I will have realized a greater reward than any slight recompense resulting from selling Shakespeare at less than 8¢ a volume.

E. Haldeman-Julius

Send No Money Each volume is attractively printed on a good quality of paper in clear type of newspaper size and bound neatly in blue cover stock. If you are not satisfied, return them within 5 days and your money will be refunded. Send this coupon, properly filled out, immediately, for this unusual offer of less than 8¢ a volume.

HALDEMAN-JULIUS COMPANY, Dept. C-22, GIRARD, KANS.

A FREE TRIP TO EUROPE

Twelve readers of Shakespeare will be given a trip to England to Shakespeare's birthplace and other points of interest in England and France, with all expenses paid. Each set of Shakespeare contains full information as to how, without selling effort or solicitation, you will automatically become a contestant.

HALDEMAN-JULIUS COMPANY, Dept. C-22, Girard, Kansas

Please send me, at once, by parcel post your set of thirty volumes of Shakespeare. I will pay the postman $2.35 plus postage when the set arrives, this payment to be the first and last. If I am not satisfied after examining the books, I will return them within five days and my money will be refunded.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

Those living in Canada or other foreign countries please send, with order, postal money order for $2.35 plus 30 cents for parcel post, a total of $2.65. Those in the United States who wish to send cash, with order, send check or postal money order for $2.65 and mark X in this square. [ ]

WE TEACH COMMERCIAL ART

Meyer Both College, a Department of the Meyer Both Company, offers you a different and practical training. If you like to draw, develop your talent. Study this practical course taught by the largest commercial art organization in the field, with twenty years' success—which each year produces and sells to advertisers in the United States and Canada over 10,000 commercial drawings. Who else could give you so wide an experience? Commercial art is a business necessity—the demand for commercial artists is greater every year. It's a highly paid, intensely interesting profession, equally open to both men and women. Home study instruction. Get facts before you enroll in any school. Get our special booklet, "YOUR OPPORTUNITY"—for one half the cost of mailing—4c in stamps.

MEYER BOTH COLLEGE OF COMMERCIAL ART
Michigan Ave. at 20th St., Dept. 24 CHICAGO, ILL.

NOTE:—To Art and Engraving Firms: Secure practical artists among our graduates. Write us.

Elinor Glyn says—

"Thousands who don't dream they can write really can. YOU have ideas for stories and plot-plays—why don't you turn them into cash? There are just as many stories of human interest right in your own vicinity as there are in Greenwich Village or the South Sea Islands. And editors will welcome a story or photoplay from you just as quickly as from any well-known writer if your story is good enough. They will pay you well for your ideas, too—a good deal bigger money than is paid in salaries. You can accept my advice because millions of copies of my stories have been sold. My book, 'Three Weeks,' has been printed in every tongue, except Spanish. My photoplays are known to millions. I do not say this to boast, but merely to prove that you can be successful without being a 'genius.' I believe thousands of people can make money in this absorbing profession. I believe this so firmly that I am going to show YOU how easy it is when you know how. Simply write to my publishers, The Authors' Press. They will send you a handsome little book called 'The Short-Cut to Successful Writing.' This book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. No charge—no obligation. Write for it NOW. Just address Elinor Glyn's publishers, THE AUTHORS' PRESS, Dept. 200, Auburn, N. Y."

Learn to Fly

We announce the opening of a school of personal instruction in Aviation beginning in May for which enrollment applications are now being received. It is really a great privilege to learn to fly where the Wright Brothers developed the airplane and where you will benefit by the experience and facilities that surround the pioneer aviation.

DAYTON WRIGHT COMPANY
Moraine Aerodrome Dayton, Ohio

Salesmen Sell our wonderful tailored to order, $25.50, virgin wool suits and o'coats direct to wearer—all one price—$30.00 cheaper than store prices. You keep deposit. Everything guaranteed. Big branch outfit free. Protected territory for hustlers. J. B. SIMPSON, Inc., Dept. 137, 631 W. ADAMS ST., CHICAGO

THE authorized agents of the Periodical Sales Company, 538 South Dearborn St., Chicago, Illinois, with branches in twenty principal cities, are authorized to solicit, and accept, yearly subscriptions to Hearst's INTERNATIONAL, at the regular subscription price of $3.00 per year.

HEARST'S INTERNATIONAL
119 West 40th St.
NEW YORK

[Continued from page 124]

him. The darkness reengulfed her.

"You were a lonely soul seeking a companion soul. What you needed, Henry, was a soul mate."

A soul mate, he! a soul mate. It was incredibly fantastic.

"My heart went out to you. I could understand. I was lonely, too." Miss Spence laid her hand on his knee. "You were so patient. But I could guess, I could guess, Henry."

"How wonderful of you."

"Don't you feel that you have within you something that is akin to this storm?" He could imagine her leaning forward as she uttered the words. "Passion makes one the equal of the elements."

Mr. Hutton suddenly took fright.

"Passion? No," he desperately answered. "I am without passion."

But his remark was either unheard or unheeded, for Miss Spence went on, speaking so rapidly, and in such a burning intimate whisper that Mr. Hutton found it very difficult to distinguish what she was saying. Darkness, and then flash! her face was there, close at hand. A pale mask, greenish white; the large eyes, the narrow barrel of the mouth.

He began devising absurd plans for escaping. He might suddenly jump up, pretending he had seen a burglar. The spasmodic clutching of her hand recalled his thoughts.

"Marriage is a sacred tie and your respect for it even when the marriage was, as it was in your case, an unhappy one, made me respect you and admire you and—shall I dare say the word—yes, love you, Henry, all the more. But we're free now, Henry," she pleaded.

Free? There was a movement in the dark and she was kneeling by his chair.

"Oh, Henry, I have been unhappy, too."

Her arms embraced him and by the shaking of her body he could feel that she was sobbing. She might have been a suppliant crying for mercy.

"You mustn't, Janet," he protested. Those tears were terrible, terrible. "Not now, not now. You must be calm, you must go to bed." He patted her shoulder, then got up, disengaging himself from her embrace. He left her still crouching on the floor beside the chair on which he had been sitting.

How heartrendingly she had sobbed!

What had she said about passion and the elements? Something absurdly stale, but true, true.

She was probably kneeling by that chair in the loggia crying.

"WHAT are you thinking about, Teddy Bear? You look so solemn."

"Nothing."

There was a silence. Mr. Hutton remained motionless, his elbows on the parapet of the terrace, his chin in his hands, looking down over Florence.

"Are you worried about anything?"

"No, thank you."

Mr. Hutton turned round, smiled and patted the girl's hand. "I think you'd better go in and have your siesta."

"Very well, Teddy Bear. Are you coming, too?"

"When I've finished my cigar."

Mr. Hutton continued his contemplation of Florence. He had need to be alone. Doris was always with him, like an obsession, like a guilty conscience.

He pulled an envelope out of his pocket. He hated letters; they always contained something unpleasant—nowadays since his second marriage. This was from his sister. He began skimming through the insulting home truths of which it was composed. Then his eye fell on a sentence at the bottom of the third page. His heart beat with uncomfortable violence as he read it. It was too monstrous! Janet Spence was going about telling everyone that he had poisoned his wife in order to marry Doris.

Then suddenly he saw the ridiculous side of the situation. The notion that he should have murdered anyone in order to marry Doris! If they only knew how miserably bored he was.

FOR a good many days the Hutton case had a prominent place on the front page of every newspaper.

Mr. Hutton's first emotion when he was summoned from Italy to give evidence at the inquest was one of indignation. It was a monstrous, a scandalous thing that the police should take such idle, malicious gossip seriously.

The inquest was opened; the astonishing evidence unrolled itself. The experts had examined the body and found traces of arsenic; they were of opinion that death was caused by arsenic poisoning.

Arsenic poisoning. . . . Emily had died of arsenic poisoning? When was the poison administered? The experts agreed that it must have been swallowed eight or nine hours before death. About lunch-time. Clara, the parlor-maid, was called. Mrs. Hutton, she remembered, had asked her to go and fetch her medicine. Mr. Hutton had volunteered to go instead; he had gone alone. Miss Spence confirmed Clara's statement and added that Mr. Hutton had come back with the medicine already poured out in a wine glass; he did not have the bottle.

Mr. Hutton's indignation evaporated. He was dismayed, frightened. It was all too fantastic to be taken seriously, and yet this nightmare was happening.

The inquest was adjourned. That evening Doris went to bed with a headache. When he went to her room after dinner Mr. Hutton found her crying.

"What's the matter?" He sat down on the edge of her bed and began to stroke her hair, mechanically.

"It's my fault, it's my fault!" Doris suddenly sobbed out. "I shouldn't have loved you. If they do anything to you I shall kill myself," she cried.

She drew him inert and passive toward her, clasped him, pressed herself against him. "I didn't know you loved me as much as that, Teddy Bear. But why did you do it, why did you do it?"

Mr. Hutton undid her clasping arms and got up. His face became very red. "You seem to take it for granted that I murdered my wife. What do you all take me for? A cinema hero?" He had begun to lose his temper. "It's all such damned stupidity. I suppose you imagined I was so insanely in love with you that I could commit any folly. When will you women understand that one isn't insanely in love? I don't know what the devil ever induced me to marry you. It was all a damned stupid, practical joke."

Mr. Hutton stamped toward the door. "Teddy Bear!" The voice that came through the closed door was agonized. He touched the handle, then withdrew his fingers and quickly walked away. When he was half-way down the stairs he halted. She might try to do something silly, throw herself out of the window. Should he go back? He was damned if he would—he hated her.

He sat for a long time in the library. What happened, what was happening? He turned the question over and over in his mind and could find no answer. Suppose the nightmare dreamed itself out to its horrible conclusion. Death was waiting for him. He felt that some extraordinary kind of justice was being done. In the past he had been wanton and imbecile and irresponsible. Now Fate was playing as wantonly, as irresponsibly with him. It was tit for tat, and God existed after all.

He went upstairs to ask Doris's forgiveness. He found her lying on the couch at the foot of the bed. On the floor beside her stood a blue bottle of liniment; she seemed to have drunk about half of it.

"You didn't love me," was all she said when she opened her eyes.

Dr. Libbard arrived in time to prevent any very serious consequences. "You mustn't do this again," he said, while Mr. Hutton was out of the room. "There's nothing to prevent you," he said. "Only yourself and your baby. Isn't it rather bad luck on your baby, not allowing it to come into the world just because you want to go out of it?"

Doris was silent for a time. "All right," she whispered. "I won't."

Mr. Hutton sat by her bedside for the rest of the night. He felt himself now to be indeed a murderer. At six o'clock he undressed and went to bed for a couple of hours' sleep.

In the course of the same afternoon the coroner's jury brought in a verdict of wilful murder and Mr. Hutton was committed for trial.

MISS SPENCE was not well. She slept badly and suffered from nervous indigestion. Dr. Libbard used to call every other day. She talked to him a great deal—mostly about the Hutton case. Wasn't it appalling to think that she had had a murderer in her house? Wasn't it extraordinary that one could have been for so long mistaken about the man's character? And then the girl he had gone off with—so low class! The news that the second Mrs. Hutton was expecting a baby—the posthumous child of a condemned and executed criminal—revolted her; the thing was shocking, an obscenity.

One morning he interrupted her in the midst of her customary tirade. "By the way," in his soft melancholy voice—"I suppose it was really you who poisoned Mrs. Hutton, wasn't it?"

Miss Spence stared at him for two or three seconds with enormous eyes and then quietly said, "Yes." After that she started to cry.

"In the coffee, I suppose?"

She seemed to nod assent. Dr. Libbard took out his fountain pen and in his neat, meticulous calligraphy wrote out a prescription for a sleeping draught.

*From the Week End Box
The Hinds Cre-Maids
Step gaily forth
With Beauty's Aids.*

First of all in this Beauty Team,
Comes Hinds Honey and Almond
Cream,
Hinds Soap and Face Powder next
in line,
Hinds Cre-mis Talcum, pure and fine.

Hinds Disappearing Cream—a treat,
Hinds Cold Cream, and the line's complete.

A "Line of Beauty" sweet and gay
Ready to serve you every day.

Fashioned of perfumes rich and rare
With finest of products from everywhere

Gathered, selected and blended true,
Beauty and health they bring to you.

Aids to your toilet—all the best—
Hinds Week-End Box is a Treasure Chest.

You will find the Hinds Week-End Box especially convenient and useful now, as it contains those essentials for the comfort and attractiveness of the face and hands. Trial size: Hinds Honey and Almond Cream, Cold and Disappearing Cream, Soap, Talc and Face Powder. 50c. Try your dealer first. Write us if not easily obtainable.

All druggists and department stores sell Hinds Honey and Almond Cream. We will mail you a small sample for 2c or trial bottle for 6c. Beauty Booklet Free.

A. S. HINDS CO., Dept. 15, Portland, Maine

Henry Holt's Story of a Girl Stowaway—From page 75

Peggy

Was it bruised? Was the skin broken? Here was need for a liniment or for an antiseptic. But which?

Absorbine, Jr. combines the beneficial properties of liniment, antiseptic and germicide. All in one container for greater convenience in such emergencies.

Neglect of the hundred little hurts that occur unexpectedly often means infection, unnecessary pain or slow recovery.

Thousands are never without Absorbine, Jr. in their homes. It is safe; of a clean, pleasant odor and without the usual liniment stain. It is powerfully concentrated. Only a few drops are required in all ordinary applications.

At your druggist's, $1.25, or postpaid. Liberal trial bottle, 10c, postpaid.

W. F. YOUNG, Inc.
470 Temple St.,
Springfield, Mass.

Absorbine, Jr.
THE ANTISEPTIC LINIMENT
TRADE MARK REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

LIKLY
(LIKELY)
Luggage

WHEN YOU GO AWAY, to school or anywhere, take LIKLY LUGGAGE of character. Luggage is a part of your wardrobe—just as essential to that favorable "first impression". And LIKLY LUGGAGE lasts.

Sold by the best stores everywhere
HENRY LIKLY & COMPANY
Rochester, N. Y., U. S. A.

Be sure the luggage you buy bears this trademark. It identifies LIKLY distinctive quality.

WRITE Dept. R for illustrated price list of BAGS, TRUNKS, CASES and PORTFOLIOS.

Short-Story Writing
A Course of Forty Lessons, taught by Dr. J. Burg Esenwein, Editor of The Writer's Monthly. One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time. Hundreds are selling right along to the leading magazines and the best producing companies.

Also courses in Play Writing, Photoplay Writing, Ventriloquism, Journalism, etc.

150-Page illustrated catalogue free. Please Address

The Home Correspondence School
Dept. 205 Springfield, Mass.
ESTABLISHED 1897 INCORPORATED 1904

funnel, she peered back and saw him standing right at the edge of the wharf, his face crinkled with amusement.

Peggy felt it was her turn to be amused. Like a panther, she darted under cover along the well deck, and sped up the gangway. She was immediately behind her tormenter, and then with a swift dart forward, pushed him into the sea.

When his head bobbed to the surface a minute later, Peggy leaned back and shrieked with laughter.

A figure appeared suddenly on the freighter's deck. There were hurried footsteps and a rope was flung over the side. "Hi! Catch hold, quick. Sharks!" came in a sailor's voice.

The grim warning sent a shiver through Peggy's frame. The boy grasped the rope. A fin, darting along the surface, cut a sharp ripple. Peggy's eyes filled with horror. She watched until the dripping boy's form was hauled over the rail. Then she fled into the fastness of piled up merchandise, there to sit hidden, curled up on a bale, shivering in the heat.

LIFE took Peggy over at least five of the seven seas during the next few years, for when the ship returned to America nothing would induce her to leave Pop. She grew up untamed as ever. Here and there, men made love to her. Once it was the Nancy's second mate who, in his innocence, built visions of happiness with her as his wife.

Then in Peggy's twentieth year, the Nancy called again at Iloilo. The freighter was to lie there for two days and nights. Peggy looked at Iloilo through different eyes this time. Devilment she would always seek, but it was now only a distraction from problems that were growing ever deeper.

She heard that at night there was dancing, of sorts, at the Assembly Room. Now, to Peggy, the dancers she met anywhere were only incidental; the dancing was the thing. Most of the men she met were raw specimens, but they stirred something of the savage within her. She chuckled quietly over one or two incidents of the evening.

Next evening Peggy re-adorned herself in the jade and sequins dress for another night of glitter, and had just emerged from the companionway when she saw a man crossing the gangway.

"Is Captain Fenton on board?"

Peggy looked at him for full ten seconds before replying.

"Not just now. He'll be back soon."

The man gave her a keen look, as though searching for some vague memory. Peggy's brain sped backward.

"Yes, it's me," she said. "I've tried to figure out sometimes what it would have been like—for me—if that shark got you."

A slow smile came to the man. Amusedly, he extended a hand to Peggy.

"Why, we're quite old friends, aren't we?" he said. "That must have been—"

"Seven years ago," she prompted. Peggy was rather pleased that she was wearing her bespangled jade-green dress. "I'm not in any hurry. Come below and have a drink."

"You been here at Iloilo all the time?" she asked, setting glasses on the table.

"No, I was in England for five years—only came back six weeks ago. Leaving again in the fall."

Peggy regarded him with curious gravity. She might know sailors from A to Z but there were qualities about this man which no sailor shared. There were things about him that she wanted to store up in her memory.

Tomorrow the sea would lie between them. Her eyes narrowed the barest shade at the thought. Why didn't she want him to go away now? Why—her brain was flooded by a succession of puzzling questions.

"I want to ask you a question," she said at last, looking at the man keenly. "Maybe you'll think I'm a hell of a fool. What I want to get at is this: Why are you different from the other men I know?"

"In what way?" came from him with quick sympathy for her mood.

"I don't know. Can I talk like this to you? I think I can, somehow. I mean, you wouldn't think I was—mushy, huh?"

"I believe," he said, "that you and I could talk to one another a whole lot and not misunderstand. It's mental sympathy, I suppose, and—and mutual liking. One doesn't often find that in the truest sense. When it exists between a man and a woman, that sympathy and liking develop to something else that generally calls out the best in each. It's a case of reaching out at the stars."

Peggy frowned. "Do you mean gettin' married?" she asked.

"IN THE story books, yes. But life doesn't always work out that way. I wonder if you'll understand if I quote another line: 'A man's reach should exceed his grasp, or what's a heaven for?'"

The frown on Peggy's forehead deepened as she thought this over.

"Does it mean that love is all kidding? If so, it's wrong. I know. What's that last line again?"

He repeated it.

"Well, is it true that a woman's reach should exceed her grasp or what's a heaven for?"

The man smiled and shook his head.

A heavy step on the deck, and two minutes later, Pop and Jeffry Vance were immersed in the question of freights. Peggy, the dance forgotten for the time, sat listening and watching.

"All right, captain," he said at last. "You're sailing at noon tomorrow. I'll come down and (his glance shifted for an instant to Peggy) see you in the morning before you go."

Next morning the ship sailed, making Peggy desolate.

"Member young Vance who came down to the ship last night?" Pop asked.

"Why, yes, I kinda remember something about him," agreed Peggy.

"He's broke his blame leg," Pop said. Just six months after the Nancy sailed from Iloilo, she sidled to the wharf at Hoboken where Captain David Fenton left the freighter to the tender mercies of the highest bidder. Up in Vermont he dropped his anchor for the last time. Peggy cooked his meals and sewed on his buttons, and took care of him, but it was a subtly changed Peggy.

The fall brought double pneumonia to Pop. Peggy bit her lip hard when the doctor told her the truth.

The sun sank out of Peggy's life when Pop died. He was the only human being she had ever known—save one—with whom she could talk always with perfect understanding. "Mental sympathy and mutual liking," Jeffry Vance called it.

PEGGY, in her twenty-second year, foot free, in New York City opened up a field largely speculative. A hundred times, in retrospect, since that evening in the Nancy's cabin at Iloilo, she had gone over her conversation with Jeffry Vance, and struggled to analyze the bewildering emotion with which he had inspired her.

What was that he had said about people like him and her if they were together long enough? If they were together long enough! What had she missed?

Of a sudden, Peggy sat stiffly upright. "Blamed if I don't make myself like he'd like me to be!" she said aloud.

"Sally," she said to a fellow boarder next afternoon, "I got to earn money. You're on the stage, dancing. Think you could fix me with a job?"

Sally, very much amused, looked sideways at Peggy.

"You'd better come along and see little Rosenbaum," she observed.

Rosenbaum, fat, nervously irritable but marvelously clever, watched Peggy dance as she had danced in short skirts to an audience of sailors.

"Samuel," Rosenbaum grunted to the man by his side, "my bet is that inside six months this girl will be a hit in vaudeville."

It was a sort of Box and Cox life that Peggy lived in the six months during which the clever little Jew's prophesy came true. One of the boarders at the Ninetieth Street establishment had been an English governess looking for a job. A germ idea in Peggy's brain grew to a conviction until it boiled over in words.

"Say, Mary, you've got somethin' I want," she said impulsively. "If money'll do it, I've got the price. I'm going to take a little apartment. If you come an' live with me, how long will it take you to make me talk your way? Act your way, too. Can it be done?"

"It could—" Mary began hesitatingly, "in time, if you wanted it hard enough."

A WOMAN of twenty-six, with gray-green eyes about which lurked innate devilry, leaned back in the cushions of her limousine while it slid swiftly through the streets of Philadelphia. The car glided to a standstill and the woman swept into a house whose windows blazed with lights. Three minutes later, standing before her hostess, her hand turned ice-like and her face became as marble.

"Mr. Jeffry Vance," the hostess was saying, utterly unaware that, for one of her guests, the world had suddenly stood still as Jeffry Vance bowed over the hand of the vaudeville comet.

"I have had the honor of seeing you once before, Miss Saxley," he said, affably.

"Of seeing me?"

"Yes. On the stage of the Oxford in London, four years ago."

"I was in London then, of course." Peggy hardly knew what she was saying. Fate shouldn't play sudden pranks like this on people without warning.

"I'm not likely to forget it," he said, his face clouding slightly.

"Not—why, Mr. Vance? You rouse my curiosity."

He searched her eyes swiftly, a curious light in his own.

"The girl I was engaged to was with me that evening," he began. As the signal for dinner was given, he went on hurriedly: "I don't know why on earth I should tell you, but if I may somehow I'd like to, later this evening. May I?"

"You may," she said with a smile and a slight inclination of her queenly head as they parted.

She was within three feet of Jeffry Vance again. Her eyes traced the outline of him, rested on the tinge of gray about his temples, and then smiled into his eyes—smiled valiantly.

"I wanted to tell you about that night in London," he was saying.

"Oh, yes," Peggy acquiesced. "Before you were married."

"Quite so. As I told you, my fiancée was with me." He paused thoughtfully, his features suddenly serious. "Miss Saxley—stop me, won't you, if this is bromidic?—but you know there's a theory that nine out of every ten men who marry carry to the grave the ideal memory of the woman they didn't marry. And it is you I have to thank that I'm not one of the nine. I never married."

A wordless sound came from the woman, but her eyes were marvelously steady.

"THE ONLY girl who ever made a lasting, a permanent impression on me," he went on, "was extraordinarily like you, Miss Saxley. I only met her once, and she has haunted me ever since the day I lost sight of her."

There was a queer note in Peggy's little laugh.

"Perhaps—perhaps she wasn't a bit like the girl you imagine. I wonder what really made you tell me this."

"I wonder," he agreed.

"This girl you only met once—tell me about her, won't you?" she asked. "How was she like me?"

"It is remarkable," Jeffry Vance looked at her closely. "The more I see of you the more impressed I am by the resemblance. And yet—and yet, somehow—"

"Somehow, what?"

"Well, her face and hair and even her voice were like yours, but she was a rough diamond."

"How rough?"

"Well, very. However, does that count in the eternal scheme of things?"

Peggy's heart sang within her as she rose suddenly.

"Will you call on me when you come to New York?" she asked.

"On Sunday next, if I may."

"I shall expect you."

LUCKY STRIKE CIGARETTE

One extra process

It's toasted

This gives a delightful quality—impossible to duplicate

Guaranteed by
The American Tobacco Co.
IN BLENDED TOBACCO

We Will GIVE You this Great Book

We want you to have "Kindred of the Dust" because it is the best loved book of that well loved writer, Peter B. Kyne, and we will give it to you without cost so that you may read of

Three persons whose lives you will never forget

HECTOR McKAYE, the old Laird of Tyee, as square and lovable an old tryant as ever bound up all his hopes in a son and accordingly tried to dictate how that son should live. NAN BRENT, the Outcast girl of the Sawdust Pile, who has the courage to give up the man she loves when marriage with her would dim his brilliant future. DONALD McKAYE, the young Laird, who is torn between his love for Nan and for his proud old father, who would rather see him dead than married to Nan.

How to get the Book without cost

If you will send us the subscription of a friend to Hearst's International for one year, we will send you a copy of this book. The subscription must be other than your own, as Hearst's International does not give premiums. Mail the coupon and enclose with a remittance to cover the cost at $3.00 a subscription. (Canadian postage 50 cents extra a year; Foreign, $1 extra.)

MAIL THE COUPON TODAY

HEARST'S INTERNATIONAL MAGAZINE
DEPT. 922
119 WEST 40TH STREET
NEW YORK CITY

Gentlemen: Enclosed find (insert amount of your remittance) for which please send Hearst's INTERNATIONAL MAGAZINE one year to the friend whose name appears on the attached list. Send copy of "Kindred of the Dust" to me.

Name.....
Street No.....
City.....
State.....

"Mary," said Peggy, her eyes smouldering, "if you love a man so badly that it hurts, if you want him so much that nothing else in the world counts, and you know you can have him if you set yourself to the task, and if you know you're only a counterfeit like me, and you know you'll be putting one over on him if you take him, should you take what the gods offer, or leave him for some other girl who could give him children with real blood instead of the counterfeit thing?"

"Peggy," she managed at length, "you have never spoken of it, but ever since you and I first talked I have known there was a man to whom you looked—a man you loved. Whether you receive it or not, you have earned the greatest reward life could offer."

Peggy sat very still, very white.
"What a tangled mess life can be," she said slowly.

FROM the depths of a trunk, Peggy unearthed a frock. There was something of the old untamed tigress about her as she held the garment up and inspected it.

Four times since their meeting in Philadelphia, he had called at the apartment, and four times she had felt herself change as by magic to another being. Tonight they were all three to dine at the Carlitz—Jeffrey Vance, Mary and Peggy.

The limousine swept them toward the Carlitz. Vance came toward them, his gaze on Peggy. Then, in an instant, she had turned, passed through the revolving door and fled precipitately.

Jeffrey Vance stood awkwardly while you might have counted five, and then darted after her, only to hear the slam of a taxi door and the grinding of gears.

"Where has she gone?" he asked Mary. "I must find her. I must. A very wonderful thing has happened just now. It came to me in a flash as she stood there. Peggy is the girl I have always loved."

"Come, we will go back home. Peggy will be there," Mary said.

Jeffrey crossed the threshold softly, and found Peggy, a crumpled little ball of jade-green, shoulders shaking convulsively. He stooped over the settee, and laid a hand on her shoulder.

"Life is wicked, Mary," Peggy sobbed, without looking round. "Life is cruel. God knows I didn't ask to be born in an East Side tenement, and I didn't ask to love him. I couldn't help that. It had to be, from the moment I first saw him. He once saw me in this green dress. He might remember it and then he'd know. I'd be terrified of seeing his face when he knew—because it'd hurt me so. But that would be better, wouldn't it, Mary?"

Then, with a quick turn of the shoulders her tear-stained face was turned to his.

"You!" she cried.

Suddenly in that shaded room, time and space and accident of birth were swept away into nothingness on a flood of golden glory. He stooped over her, closer, closer, until his lips touched hers.

"My sweet," he said after a while, fingering the jade-green thing tenderly, "promise me that you will never part with this dress. I've always—always kind of associated it with heaven."

"Well," came from Peggy with a triumphant ring, her arms clinging, "this is heaven, isn't it?"

Blasco Ibañez Hears Peace and Fears War—Continued from page 54

Trembling Europe

European nations which are not at present in revolution know just as little where they are heading for. Lloyd George knows just as much as Lenin does about the Europe of next year. Both are equally blind, living only in the present, without any foresight today of what the hours contained in tomorrow will bring.

With all its diplomatic conferences and meetings for the maintenance of peace, Europe resembles an enormous ship, striving, in spite of its broken mast, to ride the storm. The officers meet on the bridge, and talk interminably, each one of them convinced all the while that he is saying nothing but empty words. The charts and nautical instruments on the table, the books, all that they have studied, all the experience they have had, are useless, for the storm is a tempest whose fury surpasses all the calculations of men; the force moving in it is a mysterious thing beyond human comprehension; new forces unknown to physics appear today to be moving about the world. Everyone talks as though possessed of a conviction and a faith; and everyone is in his heart convinced that no one has the remedy which can be sincerely trusted in by others, and which will conjure away the peril.

The only thing invariably noticeable in these meetings held by a restless Europe is the fear of war. Yet each representative there is doing all within his power to bring war about. Everyone affirms that he desires peace; and we can believe that peace is really desired inasmuch as without it all of these people must die. But each one wants peace on his own terms with special provisions for his own convenience. With a whole series of truths each one supports his own particular peace project. But alas! Absolute truth is nothing but an illusion designed to embellish our lives. As a matter of fact there are as many truths as there are interests. For this reason, just as long as men try to establish peace on truth, and not on sacrifice and mutual self-abnegation, we shall be doomed to war.

CHARITABLE and pacific enterprises find it difficult to obtain funds because such enterprises are usually managed by individuals. As war is the undertaking of governments, funds can always be found for its support. After peace was last declared, at a moment when all resources seemed exhausted, we saw a number of poor and unimportant nations go right on warring with one another in Asia Minor; apparently they do not lack for money. To do good is the difficult thing. If it is difficult among men, it is even more so among nations.

I hate war; and I believe that while it exists humanity will continue to live in that prehistoric period which began when men made their lairs in caves; it is not in this period that their real history is to be found. That all lies in the future. But, while I love peace, I also love clearness of vision.

The Russian communists, anti-militaristic and enemies of property as they are, are maintaining a Red Army of constantly increasing size, with which to crush any small republic which is disobedient to the red despotism at Moscow, and, when the moment is opportune, to invade Poland and other border states.

The Germans preserve their warrior class intact, and it is a large one.

England is in search of whatever is to her interest, nothing else. Everyone knows, of course, that God created the rest of the world so that England could have colonies.

France, seeing that her eternal enemy is still intact and still threatening her on her own threshold, remains on guard, disposed to strike so as not to see herself again in the same position of ceaseless anxiety that she experienced for forty-four years.

The nations take their seats at conference tables in much the same fashion as do the uncouth riders of certain South American desert lands, who sit down to talk and have a drink at the tavern table, all the while keeping their revolvers in their belts, a finger on the holster. Suddenly there is a general flare-up and everyone is firing at everyone else, while no one knows exactly who began the fracas.

I do not see peace in this Europe that is constantly meeting to look for it. Europe thinks it is to be won by words, but in the thoughts behind the words Europe has not even the faintest semblance of any truly Christian feeling.

Sani-Flush

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
Cleans Closet Bowls Without Scouring

Sani-Flush does the work that you formerly had to do by hand, or by other uncertain methods.

Simply sprinkle a little of it into the bowl, follow the directions on the can—and flush.

Sani-Flush makes the closet bowl and the hidden trap spotlessly clean—and consequently odorless. And it cleans without injuring either the bowl or connections. Keep it handy in your bathroom.

Sani-Flush is sold at grocery, drug, hardware, plumbing and house-furnishing stores. If you cannot buy it locally at once, send 25c in coin or stamps for a full sized can, postpaid. (Canadian price, 35c; foreign price, 50c.)

THE HYGIENIC PRODUCTS CO.
Canton, Ohio

Canadian Agents
Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd., Toronto

VENUS PENCILS

The largest selling Quality pencil in the world

Known the world over as the perfect pencil. Unsurpassed in smooth writing and drawing qualities. Famed for the satisfaction they give.

17 Black Degrees—3 Copying

Everywhere at stationers and stores American Lead Pencil Co.
219 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

VENUS

TYPEWRITERS

We Save You 50 %

FREE TRIAL—EASY TERMS

Your choice of all STANDARD MAKES, UNDERWOOD, ROYAL, SILENT, G. SMITH, Self-starting REMINGTON, etc. Rebuilt by the Famous Young Process. Guaranteed good as new. Lowest cash prices. Time payments or rentals with special purchase privilege. Largest stock in U. S. Write for special prices and terms.

YOUNG TYPEWRITER CO., Dept. 429 CHICAGO

Continuing from page 23 William Slavens McNutt's Story of The Boy Who Read Dime Novels

"I mean that what he may be before you get through with him 'll get scared of what you may be by that time. I'm pretty sure of what he ain't, but I'm not quite certain of what you are, Adam. My scheme may not be any good, but it's the best there is, because there ain't any other that's any good at all. What do you say?"

"I'll—I'll do anything you tell me," Adam said desperately.

"Then go get this big roughneck and hit," Peg commanded. "Sneak up on him and hit him once anyhow!"

"You mean—now?" Adam faltered.

"Right this minute!"

ADAM hesitated, trembling, every aching nerve and tortured tissue protesting in terms of eloquent pain.

Old Peg watched him closely. "There is them that says it's better to be a live dog than a dead lion," he said solemnly. "But somehow, I figure that if I was, say, a lady lion, I couldn't get up much pride about having a dog for a mate, just because he happened to be alive."

Adam found Hotchkiss playing poker in the Pike's Peak gambling-house. He got in one blow.

He was unconscious for half an hour after Hotchkiss finished with him. Some men carried him to his shack in the rear of Peg Shelby's store and put him in his bunk. He lay there for hours, weeping convulsively like a whipped child. Several times old Peg crept to the door, listened and went away. The last time he did this there were tears in his eyes as he departed, and when he was out of hearing he blew his nose violently.

"Dang me!" he muttered to himself. "If I was that scared and hurt about anything, I don't know for sure—but what I'd find some yellow in me some place that I'd never known was there before."

In the morning he stumped across the street to the Gold Hill restaurant and talked with Nora for a long time.

"I suspicion that that boy of yours is liable to get to be a right sizable man all of a sudden," he said. "Don't look for him to come around courtin' no more till it happens, and for the love o' Sam Hill don't go spoonin' around him while his growin' pains are hurtin' him the way they are now! If you love him, keep away from him!"

Peg stumped away then and found Badger Hotchkiss taking his eye-opener at the bar of the Pike's Peak.

"Mornin', Badger," the old man greeted him affably. "I hear you been kind o' workin' on that young fellow that's been clerkin' for me."

"He ain't got sense," Badger growled. "I licked him in the afternoon and the damn' greedy little hop-toad come sniffin' round last night lookin' for more. I sure give it to him! You tell that young mosquito the next time he comes buzzin' round me, I'll smash him good and proper with an ounce of lead!"

"That's what I come to see you about, Badger," Peg said casually, leaning against the bar. "You know I'm an old man. I been round a lot o' places and seen a great deal one way an' another. An' then again, my rheumatism gives me more of a misery each winter. Sometimes I get to feelin' like as if I'd be better off dead. The way it is with me now, I just naturally don't give a damn, one way or another, whether I live a little longer or die now. O' course I may not be quite as fast at gettin' down to business as I was when I was younger, but then the way I look at it—what's the difference? I wouldn't be a bit surprised if you was to beat me on the draw, in case you an' me should have to argue the thing out that way."

MUCH of the color went suddenly out of Badger's face. He wet his lips with his tongue and swallowed once before he spoke.

"What are you getting at, Peg?" he asked, with a note of real apprehension in his voice.

"Why, what I was talkin' about," Peg rambled on. "Bout this business o' your usin' a gun on this boy, Adam Cravath, that clerks over to my place. He didn't grow up in a gun country, Badger. Just as long as you don't use anything on him but your feet an' fists, I can't see no call for me to find out whether age and rheumatism have slowed me up so much that you could put a gun into business before I could get mine to workin'. But the way I

2,000,000 PEOPLE have bought his books!

James Oliver CURWOOD

FOR years each novel he has written has outsold its predecessor—his photoplays have packed the world's moving picture theatres. And now he has produced a tale of wilderness love that beats all of his previous work. Read:

The Country Beyond

Whether or not you are one of the millions who know how good Curwood's novels are—Don't miss this greatest of his stories!

At all Bookstores. Price $2.00

Cosmopolitan Book Corporation
119 West 40th Street, New York

feel about it, me bein' so old, like I was tellin' you an' havin' seen such a lot an' not much carin' a damn whether I live any longer or not, why if you ever get to operatin' on that boy with a gun or knife, why I reckon I'll just have to give you the opportunity to show me how sudden you can be with your weapon when it's put up to you where you have to be a damn' sight sudden 'n you ever were yet, if you want to stay where you can look down at the daisies, 'stead o' bein' put where they grow up from."

He stumped away for a few feet, turned, looked back at Badger and drew himself erect. His face was grim and there was a hard glitter in his eyes.

"What I said, goes!" he said sternly, all pretense of affability gone from his tone. "Get that, Badger! It goes!"

A DAY later, as Badger Hotchkiss was passing along the street, Adam jumped out of an alley and tore into him with a ferocity that, coupled with the surprise of his attack, enabled him to black Badger's eye and split his lip before the bigger man got well going. When Badger did get started, he did a job of brutal punishment which made his small opponent a dragged mess that inspired horror and pity, even in the minds of the callous men who carried him away to his shack and summoned a doctor to bandage him up.

"You better lay off of this fellow!" the doctor advised Adam when he had finished with him. "What ails you anyhow? You can't lick him."

"I know it," Adam said, "but I can try!" It was two days later when Adam, still bruised and scarred, rushed into the Pike's Peak saloon, just as Badger was lifting a drink to his lips, and sailed into his enemy. Hotchkiss caught him with a right to the jaw before the boy landed. The blow stretched Adam unconscious on the floor.

The sudden termination of this bout enabled Adam to recover during the night and to arrive early and be waiting for Badger at ten o'clock the next morning when the big fellow came in for his first drink. The boy inflicted some punishment before he was knocked cold this time; and when he was carted away and Badger stood grumbling against the bar, some one noted that his hand trembled, as he lifted his whisky to his lips.

He got very drunk during the afternoon and that night after nine o'clock Adam caught him on the street, reeling and maudlin, and for the first time managed to do some real damage. The fight went about ten minutes. On this occasion, and when Adam was finally knocked out, Badger Hotchkiss was almost as unpleasant a sight as the boy he had whipped.

On the following day, Adam tried again and was rewarded with a fractured rib that laid him away for a week and gave Hotchkiss a vacation.

At the end of the week, Adam sought out his enemy and the fight was on again.

The last boat for Nome and the outside—the Ice King—was due to leave Kasanak on the afternoon of the fourteenth of September. After that boat churned away from the bank, those who remained in camp were practically locked in for the winter.

On the night of the thirteenth, Adam lay alone in his bunk, sleepless, racked with pain, enduring his crucial agony of mind and body. Throughout the long morning, he lay there with the blanket drawn over his head, fighting desperately for strength to resist the growing impulse to get aboard the Ice King and escape the well-nigh unendurable nightmare of punishment.

At one o'clock the first warning whistle blew. The boat would leave in half an hour. For twenty-five minutes thereafter, Adam lay in his bunk writhing in an agony of physical opposition to the panicky impulse for flight. At twenty-five minutes after one the final whistle blew. The boat would leave in five minutes.

Adam could endure the strain no longer. He rolled out of his bunk and started for the door. He meant to catch that boat.

Across the way Nora Nelson stood in the doorway of the Gold Hill restaurant, staring sullenly at the ground. Old Peg Shelby sat on a bench in the front of his store, smoking, apparently dreamily oblivious to all that went on about him. Across the street, a half block from the Gold Hill restaurant, stood Badger Hotchkiss, leaning against the front of a building.

He wondered if he had better duck back and run around the rear of the store to keep from having to pass the dread enemy. As he wondered this, there flashed into his mind a complete, startlingly clear picture.

It was a picture first painted for him in his imagination, when he was a boy of twelve, lying concealed in the hay-mow one summer afternoon, reading a forbidden paper-back weekly, a wild, impossible tale of a young tenderfoot in the Colorado mining camps, a local bully and a girl. The picture was of the hero of the story, the young tenderfoot, walking boldly across the street to thrash the villain while the girl looked on, at first, terror-stricken, and then proudly exultant, as the beardless young stripling vanquished his sinister-looking foe.

Those who believe that fiction is more a reflection of humanity than humanity a reflection of fiction, may find it difficult to credit what followed.

ADAM threw back his shoulders and laughed exultantly. He called across the street to Nora in a clear, strong voice:

"Don't worry, Nora, I'll take care of this fellow."

And then he started diagonally across the street toward Badger Hotchkiss, deliberate, smiling, the picture of cold, confident anger.

Hotchkiss dropped his hand to his hip and then held it suddenly out at arm's length, ostentatiously exhibiting an open palm; for, coincident with his initial move, a long, black-barreled .45 had appeared in old Peg Shelby's right hand. Peg was not aiming the weapon at anyone in particular. He appeared to be idly examining it.

But Hotchkiss understood. He understood Peg, but he did not understand Adam. Adam was not behaving according to Badger's understanding of the manner in which a human being would act. And there was in him no reservoir of sheer courage, from which to draw strength when he faced opposition he could not understand. The fear that shook him was the same fear he would have felt if confronted with a ghost. He turned and walked down the street toward the boat with an effort at nonchalance.

"Wait!" Adam called after him sharply. "I've got something to say to you."

Hotchkiss quickened his pace. Adam broke into a run. Hotchkiss looked over his shoulder and fled.

Old man Shelby made the afternoon suddenly hideous with a shrill rebel yell and let loose his gun in the air as an accompaniment. Badger Hotchkiss did not look around to find out whether the old man's gun was aimed at him. He took that for granted, and his feet moved more rapidly in answer to his understanding of the situation. He went through the shouting crowd on the bank like the wind through the air, and negotiated the six feet of distance between the shore line and the deck of the Ice King with an admirable leap. Badger Hotchkiss was on his way.

Adam Cravath turned back and walked up the street toward the Gold Hill restaurant. Nora Nelson rushed into his outstretched arms, weeping in relief.

"There, there!" said Adam, masterfully protective, patting her shoulder. "Don't cry, little girl! Everything's all right!"

Across the street, old man Shelby was reloading his gun with trembling fingers. He was all filled up with emotions that nothing but shrill rebel yells to the accompaniment of gunfire could properly express.

"You bet ever'thing's all right!" he cackled, as he worked his long forefinger on the trigger of his upthrust gun. "Wheel Yip-pee! Wheel Yip-pee!"

* * *

As explained earlier in this narrative, the Rev. Jason Ogilvie's one objection to Adam was his unfortunate taste in reading.

The Inside Story of Ford's Jew-Mania—Continued from page 48

Henry Swallows Old Bait

conclude their arrangements. Rodionoff sent his answer back to No. 124 X, as follows: "I explained clearly that it was impossible to postpone my departure. My conditions are following: During six months I will furnish you exclusively with material agreed upon. You to advance monthly fifteen hundred American dollars payable in Yokohama specie bank. You to pay for material already furnished. Rodionoff."

At the same time that he sent his telegram he also sent a letter to No. 124 X, repeating his money terms and saying, "Miss De Bogory is already translating my material and I hope you will find such satisfactory to you."

Absolutely no doubt seems to have existed even yet about the Hebrew gold mine in the neighborhood of Harbin. For, while Rodionoff is in Seattle, waiting to sail, we find Operator No. 124 X suggesting to the organization that a new offer be made to Rodionoff, this time dealing not with any photographs, but with the actual originals.

In dealing with such spurious matter as the Protocols the Ford secret service agents were bound to be made the victims of intrigue. They forced their enemies to make use of forged documents and spurious letters. Notice the similarities to, and the differences from, the letter reproduced on page 46. There is no doubt in my mind that this is questionable, even though it is signed with a faithful-looking signature of Rodionoff:

March 17th, 1921.

Mr. C. W. Smith,
20 Broad Street, New York City.

Dear Sir: Referring to our recent conversation, I am so fortunate as to have in my possession valuable material about Zionist work in Russia and other countries abroad. Moreover, I have very valuable documents in Russian language. I can get photographs from the originals, or the originals themselves if they are wanted, of the Zionist Protocols which are now being written by a JEW in Japan. These documents are of colossal importance. In the Far East I have my workers with whose assistance the above mentioned material could be translated into English. . . . For this work I need a fund of $3,000 a month. . . . I would like an appointment for a conference of all our agents of the Russian National Society and Mr. Ford's agents. I believe that such a conference should take place about March 20. I have already communicated with Mr. Boris Brasol and other agents and instructed them to be at your office on the above mentioned date at about eight o'clock in the evening.

THERE is little doubt that such a meeting would have been just the thing Rodionoff desired, but that he wrote such a letter or that such a meeting was held, I doubt. Every Ford sleuth who had met him had been taken in by him, and had made excellent reports to his superior regarding him, and there was no need of the anti-Ford forces making use of a letter which looks like a forgery. The Black Hundred Boris Brasol, supporter of the Beilis murder trial, lawyer of the Russian school, fingerprint expert and detector of forgeries in the Russian government, would probably not have let himself be led into sitting down with Ford agents. He met Ford agents elsewhere. At least one of his close friends and supporters worked in the office of C. C. Daniels and was on the Ford-Daniels payroll.

If the forger of this letter had wanted to prove that Boris Brasol was to be put in touch with Ford agents he had no need of writing the letter. Boris Brasol, through Miss De Bogory and Dr. Houghton, was in touch with Ford supporters ALL the time. And they were in touch with him.

And while this contact with the Ford forces existed, Boris Brasol at the same time was in contact with the National Civic Federation, a crowd of standpatters who represent everything reactionary in American life. Ralph Easley, of this Federation, was dependent upon Brasol for his information about affairs in Russia.

At a certain date Easley began to be cautious. Brasol wrote for Easley, and Easley sent this information to members of the Federation. A protest was sent to the directors of the Federation, because of the anti-Semitic stuff which Brasol was putting into his material, and Easley was in-

X-BAZIN

The French way to remove hair

SO dainty, so pure, and so safe is X-Bazin that French women have, for more than a hundred years, been using it with marvelous results, on the face as well as on the arms and under the arms.

It's Safe For Your Face!

